
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

UC-NRLF

B 3 473 597

A Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture

THOMAS NELSON AND SONS LTD
Parkside Works Edinburgh 9
3 Henrietta Street London WC2
312 Flinders Street Melbourne C1
5 Parker's Buildings Burg Street Cape Town

THOMAS NELSON AND SONS (CANADA) LTD
91-93 Wellington Street West Toronto 1

THOMAS NELSON AND SONS
19 East 47th Street New York 17

SOCIÉTÉ FRANÇAISE D'ÉDITIONS NELSON
25 rue Henri Barbusse Paris V^e

First published February 1953

Copyright 1953 by Thomas Nelson & Sons

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 53-9447

Printed and bound in the United States of America

A Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture

EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

Dom Bernard Orchard M.A. (Cantab.)
General Editor and New Testament Editor

Rev. Edmund F. Sutcliffe S.J., M.A. (Oxon.), L.S.S.
Old Testament Editor

Rev. Reginald C. Fuller D.D., L.S.S.
Secretary of the Catholic Biblical Association

Dom Ralph Russell D.D., M.A. (Oxon.)
Hon. Secretary and Treasurer

WITH A FOREWORD BY THE CARDINAL ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER

דְּבַר־אֱלֹהֵינוּ יָקוּם לְעוֹלָם

The word of our God endureth for ever

Isaias 40:8

515.0.

Thomas Nelson and Sons

London Edinburgh Paris Melbourne Toronto and New York

NIHIL OBSTAT : R. C. Fuller D.D., L.S.S., Censor Deputatus

IMPRIMATUR : E. Morrogh Bernard,
Vic. Gen.

WESTMONASTERII, die 9 Aprilis 1951

FOREWORD

WHEN shortly after my appointment as Archbishop of Westminster at the end of 1943 I learned that some members of the Catholic Biblical Association were contemplating the preparation in one volume of a Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture, I readily gave this ambitious venture my full approval and blessing. I was well aware of the need of such a work, and I was confident that those who proposed setting about this task were encouraged to do so largely by what our Holy Father, Pope Pius XII, had written earlier that year in his encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU. After dealing with the improved conditions for biblical study, His Holiness had written : ' Now, therefore, that textual criticism has attained such a high level of perfection, biblical scholars have the honourable though not always easy duty of using every endeavour to procure that, as soon as it is possible and opportune, editions of the Sacred Books and the ancient versions shall be prepared by Catholics in conformity with these critical standards ; editions, that is, in which a scrupulous observance of all the laws of criticism shall be combined with the deepest reverence for the sacred text '.

The editorial committee have laboured hard for nine years to produce this commentary. They have realized that their efforts will not produce a ' popular ' work, but all serious readers of the Bible will appreciate the immense value of this commentary. With new translations of Holy Scripture and with the improved presentation of texts which have come about by the devoted interest of publishers, more and more people are reading the Scriptures. There is a need for guidance in this matter and the appearance of this work is most opportune.

In his encyclical the Holy Father referred particularly to the serious obligation incumbent on the faithful to make use of the Scriptures and of the distilled wisdom of those who have endeavoured with great labour to interpret Holy Writ, for, writes the Pope, ' God did not grant the Sacred Books to men to satisfy their curiosity or to provide them with an object of study and research ; these divine oracles were bestowed as the Apostle tells us in order that they might " instruct to salvation by the Faith which is in Christ Jesus " and " that the man of God may be perfect, furnished to every good work " '.

There is no dearth of Catholic scriptural scholars and the committee has been fortunate in having so wide a field from which to select its commentators. Indeed, they are drawn from throughout the English-speaking world, from the secular clergy and the religious orders alike. I am confident that for many years the value of this commentary will be deeply appreciated by all English-speaking Catholics. I thank the Catholic Biblical Association and, in particular, the editorial committee for all they have done in so worthy a cause. Their work has borne great fruit, and I am confident that in welcoming the appearance of this commentary I am speaking for thousands who will appreciate its immense value and scholarship.

✠ BERNARD CARDINAL GRIFFIN
Archbishop of Westminster

30 April 1952

MS61799

P R E F A C E

A CATHOLIC COMMENTARY ON HOLY SCRIPTURE is the result of nine years' work by a group of scholars, who believe that biblical learning must be integrated with traditional Christianity if it is to bear any spiritual message or fruit for modern society. Their endeavour has been to sum up the results of international scholarship during the last fifty years, and put them at the disposal not only of Catholics but also of all those who respect and would be glad to know more of the Catholic Church's teaching on Scripture and of the way in which her members interpret it.

The Commentary thus fills a gap in English theological literature by providing a critical survey of modern biblical knowledge from the standpoint of all those, Catholic and non-Catholic alike, who accept the full doctrine of biblical inspiration. Those who deny in greater or lesser degree the objective truthfulness and the divine inspiration of the Bible have had ample opportunities for stating their views. It is desirable, bearing in mind the recent advances in biblical science, that there should be a more widespread knowledge and appreciation of the viewpoint of the religious body which gave us the Bible and claims it for her very own. Thus we venture to hope that the Commentary will help to restore the Bible to its true place in the culture and worship of the English-speaking nations.

The idea of a one-volume Commentary on Holy Scripture was first put forward at the 1942 meeting of the Catholic Biblical Association at Cambridge. Later on, in December 1943, a small group discussed the project in detail and decided to accept responsibility for it as the Editorial Committee. Archbishop (now Cardinal) Griffin gave his full approval. By a happy coincidence, when the scheme was taking shape, His Holiness Pope Pius XII published (30 September 1943) his encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU, in which he gave further encouragement to undertakings of this kind. The Committee was fortunate in securing the collaboration of Catholic scholars from Great Britain, Australia, Canada, Eire, Malta and the United States of America, as well as two from Austria and Germany.

The work is based on the full acceptance (1) of the divine Inspiration of Holy Scripture and of the teaching and discipline of the Catholic Church as a divine institution owing its origin to Christ himself, and (2) of the assured findings of modern research, in the conviction that there can be no clash between the Word of God and scientific truth. We claim that orthodoxy and freedom of spirit can and ought to go hand in hand to produce a satisfying synthesis. It should be added that this attempt to assess the present state of biblical knowledge from the Catholic standpoint is quite unofficial; the official teaching of the Church on Holy Scripture is found in the decrees of the various Councils, and in the declarations made from time to time by the Holy See. There is no 'official' view on any but a minute handful of biblical texts, and there is ample room for diversity of interpretation within the bounds of orthodoxy.

How wide those bounds are, and how effectively faith and learning combine to solve the problems which arise, will be shown, we think, by an unprejudiced reading of this work. We do not claim that all biblical problems are solved here, or solved correctly, but we claim that in principle we have the correct approach to them. It should not be forgotten that all scholars approach the Bible with certain preconceptions. Some of these are dangerous and the more so if unrecognized. Those critics, for example, who refuse to admit the possibility of miracles, automatically modify their interpretation of the texts and fail to account for all the facts. As long as they hold such presuppositions they cannot be expected to assent to the conclusions of this Commentary. Our work will be as unsatisfactory to them as theirs is to us. Yet we who interpret the Bible as children of the Church which possesses the living voice of Christ, have tried to ensure that our work is fully in accord with scientific investigation and right thinking. It has been well said that if Christianity is true, orthodox exegesis has all the advantages.

Contributors have freely stated their own views on their own responsibility. The Committee, however, has occasionally made a correction in a matter of fact and has offered many comments and suggestions, which for the most part have been adopted by the contributor. Any independent insertions of the editors have been initialled. Where there is more than one important and acceptable interpretation of a text, whether proposed by Catholic or non-Catholic, the alternatives have been stated, though the scope and character of the Commentary as well as considerations of space have precluded any extensive exposition of some of the more recently expressed views in Old Testament and New Testament criticism. Discussion of the main unorthodox positions has been relegated for the most part to the introductory articles. The preferences of individual contributors have naturally resulted in divergences on particular points of exegesis and on such matters as chronology, the interpretation of some Old Testament books, authorship in the Pentateuch, the synoptic problem and eschatology. Views not accepted by the contributor have been recorded with the respect required by the Holy Father in Divino afflante Spiritu.

PREFACE

Attention is drawn to the following points :

(1) The chief object of the Commentary is to open to the reader the true sense, the doctrinal import and, as far as may be, the spiritual value and marvellous beauty of the Word of God.

(2) The Douay Version of the Bible has been taken as basis ; it is the version still in widest circulation among Catholics. But the aim of every commentator has been to control it throughout by reference to the original text, and all important variations are noted. The Commentary assumes that the reader has a copy of this Version at hand, but it can easily be used in conjunction with the Authorized or Revised Version, or with more recent translations, such as the Westminster Version or Monsignor Knox's, to which many references are made.

(3) In the commentaries on individual Books a special endeavour is made to give adequate treatment to the doctrinal and spiritual content. Wherever possible the comment is so worded as to provide answers to current unorthodox views.

(4) The introductory articles, while preserving as far as possible the direct exposition of Catholic teaching, also take into consideration widely held unorthodox positions.

(5) Selected bibliographies are given for each Book and article. The mention of non-Catholic works in the bibliographies and elsewhere is not itself an indication that they are recommended to the Catholic public in general ; it means that scientific study must take account of them.

(6) The maps make full use of the modern Palestine Survey and of the researches of the Dominican School in Jerusalem.

(7) Each contributor has been responsible for checking his own references.

Acknowledgements. The grateful thanks of the Editorial Committee are due in the first place to His Eminence Cardinal Griffin for his patronage and warm support ; to the Right Reverend Abbot R. S. Trafford and the Very Reverend F. Mangan, S.J., then Jesuit Provincial, for the support and encouragement which made possible the inception of the project ; to the Abbot of Downside, the Prior of Ealing, the Rectors of Heythrop College and the President of St Edmund's College, Ware, for their hospitality to the Committee on many occasions ; to Mr Peter Morrison, the Managing Director of Messrs Thomas Nelson and Sons, for his belief in the enterprise, and for his unflinching patience, understanding and friendship, and to his Editorial Staff ; to Mr B. C. Widdowson, for supplying the materials for the maps, and to the Rev. H. Richards for helping to complete the topography ; to the Rev. E. Power, S.J. for his advice on topographical questions and for his unflinching support at all times ; to Mr Kenneth Thompson, for his devoted work in the compilation of the Index and for the valuable assistance he has rendered to the Editors in preparing the text for publication ; to the many friends, impossible to name, who have helped us from time to time ; and, certainly not least, to all our contributors, whose labours, often involving great sacrifice, have now borne fruit in a common work which we hope will stand the test of time.

We cannot conclude without asking our readers' prayers for the two contributors who did not live to see the completion of this work, the late Fr Hugh Pope, O.P., one of the pioneers of modern Catholic Biblical scholarship in this country, whose own contribution has since been expanded and revised by Fr Sebastian Bullough, O.P. ; and the late Rev. E. C. Messenger, Ph.D., who died last year after a long illness.

EALING PRIORY, W.5
30 September 1952

BERNARD ORCHARD, O.S.B.
EDMUND F. SUTCLIFFE, S.J.
R. C. FULLER
RALPH RUSSELL, O.S.B.

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

- BARTON, Right Rev. Mgr J. M. T., D.D., L.S.S., F.S.A., Consultor of the Pontifical Biblical Commission, sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture, St Edmund's College, Ware, President (1952) of the Society for Old Testament Study
- BÉVENOT, Rev. M., S.J., M.A., Professor of Fundamental Theology at Heythrop College, Oxon.
- BIRD, Right Rev. Mgr T. E., D.D., Ph.D., sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture, Oscott College
- BULLOUGH, Rev. S., O.P., M.A., S.T.Lect. & Lic., Scripture Master, Blackfriars School, Laxton
- BUTLER, Right Rev. Dom B. Christopher, O.S.B., M.A., Abbot of Downside
- CORBISHLEY, Rev. T., S.J., M.A., Master of Campion Hall, Oxford
- CREHAN, Rev. Joseph H., S.J., M.A., Professor of Fundamental Theology, Heythrop College, Oxon.
- DESSAIN, Rev. C. Stephen, M.A.
- DEVINE, Rev. Charles F., C.S.S.R., L.S.S., Professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew at St Alphonsus Seminary, Woodstock, Ontario
- DYSON, Rev. R. A., S.J., S.T.D., L.S.S., Professor of Old Testament Exegesis at the Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome
- FOSTER, Rev. R. J., S.T.L., L.S.S., Professor of Sacred Scripture, Oscott College
- FULLER, Rev. R. C., D.D., L.S.S., sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture, St Edmund's College, Ware, Editor of Scripture
- GINNS, Rev. R., O.P., S.T.M., L.S.S., sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture, Lector Primarius at the Dominican House of Philosophy, Hawkesyard Priory
- GRAF, Rev. Dom E., sometime Lecturer in Sacred Scripture, St Mary's Abbey, Buckfast
- GRAHAM, Very Rev. Dom A., S.T.L., sometime Professor of Dogmatic Theology, Ampleforth Abbey
- GUTWENGER, Rev. E., S.J., D.D., Ph.D., Professor at Innsbruck ; sometime Professor of Fundamental Theology at Heythrop College
- HODOUS, Rev. E. J., S.J., M.A., S.T.L., L.S.S., Professor of New Testament, West Baden College, Indiana, U.S.A.
- JONES, Rev. A., S.T.L., L.S.S., Professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew, Upholland College, Wigan
- KEARNS, Rev. C. J., O.P., D.S.S., Professor of Sacred Scripture, Dominican House of Studies, St Mary's, Tallaght, Co. Dublin
- LATTEY, Rev. C., S.J., M.A., sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture, Heythrop College ; President (1947) of the Society for Old Testament Study
- LEAHY, Rev. D. J., D.D., Ph.D., L.S.S., Professor of Sacred Scripture, St John's Seminary, Womersley
- LEAHY, Rev. M., S.T.L., L.S.S., Old Testament Professor, St Patrick's College, Maynooth
- LEONARD, Rev. W., D.D., Ph.D., D.S.S., sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture at St Patrick's Seminary, Manly, Sydney, N.S.W.
- McKAY, Rev. Hugh, O.F.M., D.D., Professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew in the English Franciscan Province

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

- McKENZIE, Rev. John L., S.J., M.A., S.T.D., Professor of Old Testament Exegesis and Hebrew, West Baden College, Indiana, U.S.A.
- MACKENZIE, Rev. R. A. F., S.J., M.A., S.T.L., L.S.S., Professor of Old Testament Exegesis, Jesuit Seminary, Toronto, Canada
- MARTINDALE, Rev. C. C., S.J., M.A.
- † MESSENGER, Rev. E. C., Ph.D., sometime Professor of Philosophy, St Edmund's College, Ware
- MORRIS, Rev. P. J., D.D., L.S.S., Professor of Sacred Scripture at St Joseph's College, Mill Hill
- O'FLYNN, Rev. John A., L.S.S., New Testament Professor, St Patrick's College, Maynooth ; Lecturer in Biblical Theology, University College, Dublin
- O'HERLIHY, Rev. D. J., Ph.D., D.D., L.S.S., Vice-Rector of the Irish College, Rome ; sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture, All Hallows College, Dublin
- ORCHARD, Rev. Dom Bernard, M.A., sometime Lecturer in Sacred Scripture, Downside Abbey
- † POPE, Rev. H., O.P., S.T.M., D.S.S., sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture in the English Dominican Province
- POWER, Rev. E., S.J., Doct. Ling. Or., Professor of Sacred Scripture at Milltown Park, Dublin, sometime Professor of Biblical Archaeology and Geography, Arabic and Syriac at the Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome
- REES, Rev. W., M.A., B.Litt.
- RUSSELL, Rev. Dom R., M.A., D.D., Professor of Dogmatic Theology, Downside Abbey
- RYAN, Rev. C., D.D., L.S.S., Professor of Sacred Scripture, St Patrick's College, Thurles
- SAYDON, Very Rev. Mgr P. P., D.D., L.S.S., Professor of Sacred Scripture at the Royal University, Valletta, Malta
- SHEARER, Rev. S., C.P., sometime Lecturer in Sacred Scripture, St Anne's Retreat, Sutton, St Helens
- SMYTH, Rev. K., S.J., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Fundamental Theology, Milltown Park, Dublin
- SUTCLIFFE, Rev. E. F., S.J., M.A., L.S.S., Professor of Old Testament Exegesis and Hebrew, Heythrop College, Oxon.
- THEISSEN, Rev. A., D.D., sometime Professor of Sacred Scripture, Ushaw College, Durham ; Professor of Sacred Scripture, Priesterseminar, Cologne
- WILLMERING, Rev. H., S.J., M.A., L.S.S., New Testament Professor, St Mary's College, St Mary's Kansas, U.S.A.

CONTENTS

ARTICLES OF GENERAL INTRODUCTION

		Sections
The Place of the Bible in the Church	W. Leonard and B. Orchard	1
The Formation and History of the Canon (OT and NT)	R. J. Foster	11
The Languages, Texts and Versions of the Bible	E. Power	19
The History of the Rheims-Douay Version	H. Pope and S. Bullough	29
The Literary Characteristics of the Bible	D. J. Leahy	32
The Inspiration and Inerrancy of Holy Scripture	J. Crehan	34
The Interpretation of Holy Scripture	R. C. Fuller	39
Higher Criticism of the Bible	R. A. Dyson and R. A. F. MacKenzie	43
The Replies of the Biblical Commission, with Introductory Note	E. F. Sutcliffe	47
The Physical Geography of the Holy Land	E. Graf	54
The Political Geography of the Holy Land	E. Power	57
The History of Israel to 130 B.C.	E. Power	59
The History of Israel, 130 B.C.—A.D. 70	T. Corbishley	69
Archaeology and the Bible	E. Power	76
Measures, Weights, Money and Time	E. Power	82
Our Lady in the Scriptures	E. C. Messenger	84
The Miraculous Element in the Bible	E. C. Messenger	87
The Apocrypha—OT and NT	R. J. Foster	92

ARTICLES OF INTRODUCTION TO THE OT

		Sections
The Meaning of the OT	E. F. Sutcliffe	99
The Religion of Israel	E. F. Sutcliffe	104
The Gentile Neighbours	E. Power	116
The Chronology of the OT	E. F. Sutcliffe	123

COMMENTARIES

	Sections		Sections
Introduction to the Pentateuch (with a section, Some Recent Catholic View-points, R. A. Dyson)	E. F. Sutcliffe 126	1 & 2 Kings	H. McKay 248
Genesis	E. F. Sutcliffe 136	3 & 4 Kings	K. Smyth 265
Exodus	E. Power 162	1 & 2 Paralipomenon	E. F. Sutcliffe 282
Leviticus	P. P. Saydon 182	Esdras-Nehemias	R. A. Dyson 288
Numbers	P. P. Saydon 196	Tobias	C. F. DeVine 300
Deuteronomy	R. A. F. MacKenzie 210	Judith	M. Leahy 308
The Historical Books	E. Power 223	Esther	C. Ryan 310
Josue	E. Power 227	The Poetical and
Judges	E. Power 238	Wisdom Literature	R. A. Dyson 313
Ruth	W. Leonard 246	Job	E. F. Sutcliffe 317
		Psalms	T. E. Bird 334
		Proverbs	R. A. Dyson 364

CONTENTS

	Sections		Sections
Ecclesiastes	M. Leahy 376	Joel	P. J. Morris 522
Canticle of Canticles	P. P. Saydon 382	Amos	M. Leahy 524
Wisdom	C. Lattey 388	Abdias	S. Bullough 530
Ecclesiasticus	C. J. Kearns 396	Jonas	E. F. Sutcliffe 531
The Prophetical Literature	E. F. Sutcliffe 409	Micheas	K. Smyth 533
Isaias	E. Power 419	Nahum	S. Bullough 537
Jeremias	C. Lattey 452	Habacuc	S. Bullough 539
Lamentations	M. Leahy 469	Sophonias	S. Bullough 541
Baruch	P. P. Saydon 472	Aggeus	S. Bullough 543
Ezekiel	E. Power 477	Zacharias	S. Bullough 545
Daniel	P. P. Saydon 494	Malachias	E. F. Sutcliffe 555
Osee	P. P. Saydon 514	1 & 2 Maccabees	T. Corbishley 559

ARTICLES OF INTRODUCTION TO THE NT

	Sections
The Textual Criticism of the NT	J. M. T. Barton 581
The Jewish World in NT Times	J. L. McKenzie 584
The Pagan World in NT Times	W. Rees 597
The Gospels and Non-Catholic Higher Criticism	E. Gutwenger 604
The Synoptic Problem	B. C. Butler 610
The Person and Teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ	A. Graham 616
Christianity in Apostolic Times	M. Bévenot and R. Russell 629
The Epistles of the NT	B. Orchard 661
The Life of St Paul	D. J. O'Herlihy 663
The NT Teaching on the Second Coming	E. J. Hodous 670
The 'Brethren of the Lord'	S. Shearer 672
The Chronology of NT Times	T. Corbishley 674

COMMENTARIES

	Sections		Sections
St Matthew	A. Jones 677	1 & 2 Thessalonians	B. Orchard 914
St Mark	J. A. O'Flynn 724	The Pastoral Epistles
St Luke	R. Ginns 744	(1 & 2 Timothy, Titus)	R. J. Foster 918
St John	W. Leonard 776	Philemon	S. Shearer 926
Acts	C. S. Dessain 814	Hebrews	W. Leonard 927
Romans	A. Theissen 844	St James	H. Willmering 945
1 & 2 Corinthians	W. Rees 864	1 St Peter	H. Willmering 949
Galatians	B. Orchard 893	2 St Peter	H. Willmering 952
Ephesians	D. J. Leahy 898	1, 2 & 3 St John	H. Willmering 955
Philippians	C. Lattey 905	St Jude	H. Willmering 960
Colossians	D. J. Leahy 909	Apocalypse	C. C. Martindale 962

Maps (with Index of Place Names) based on material supplied by B. C. Widdowson Obl. O.S.B., B.A., F.R.G.S., completed by H. Richards S.T.L., L.S.S., and E. Power S.J.

Index (General) Kenneth C. Thompson M.A.

NOTES FOR THE READER

The Commentary is based on the current Douay Version of the Bible, but may be used with any other translation, such as the Westminster Version or Monsignor Knox's Version. The Douay Version is quoted between inverted commas and suggested emendations are printed in italics. Round brackets () indicate omission to be made in the Douay Version.

Wherever possible, the commentary has been arranged according to the sense divisions of the text. Each such division has been given a brief heading indicating the subject-matter. Division of verses are indicated by one of the first letters of the alphabet.

Psalms are quoted according to the Vulgate enumeration, but that of the Revised Version is often added in brackets.

Cross-references and index references are given by section number and letter (and not by page numbers). Cross-references are not intended to take the place of the index, which is very full and will also be found a valuable guide to biblical theology.

A list of abbreviations and transliterations will be found on pages xiv-xvi.

The bibliographies are selective. The names of non-Catholic writers are marked with an asterisk. Their inclusion does not necessarily imply that they are recommended for general use. Index figures above dates in the bibliographies indicate the number of the edition.

Spelling of proper names. The Douay Version has been followed for names of persons except where some other form is universally accepted, as in the case of Assyrian kings. Similarly geographical names have been adapted as far as possible to conform to current usage.

Every effort has been made to ensure accuracy. But 'humanum est errare', and the Committee would welcome notification of errors or misprints as well as suggestions for improvements. All such comments and suggestions should be forwarded to the General Editor, or to the Old Testament editor in matters concerning the Old Testament.

ABBREVIATIONS

★

BOOKS OF THE BIBLE

Old Testament: Gen Ex Lev Num Deut Jos Jg Ru Kg Par Esd Neh Tob Jdt Est Job Ps Prov Eccl Cant Wis Ecclus Is Jer Lam Bar Ez Dan Os Jl Am Abd Jon Mic Nah Hab Soph Agg Zach Mal Mac

New Testament: Mt Mk Lk Jn Ac Rom Cor Gal Eph Phil Col Thess Tim Tit Phm Heb Jas Pet Jn Jude Apoc

OTHER WORKS AND WRITERS

In all references to periodicals the number of the volume, the year of its publication and the page number are given in this form :

RB 48 (1939) 181-206, which stands for Revue Biblique, volume 48, published in 1939, pages 181-206

Serial modern editions of ancient works and works in more than one volume are quoted by volume and column (or page, if the columns are not numbered), thus :

PL 35, 420—which stands for Patres Latini (Migne), vol. 35, col. 420 ; and DBV(S) 3 (1936) 318-524 which stands for volume 3 of the Supplement to Vigouroux's Dictionnaire de la Bible, published in 1936, columns 318-524

AAS	Acta Apostolicae Sedis	Bfr	Blackfriars
AASOR	Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research	BGDW	Bauer, Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch , Berlin, 1937 ¹
AER	American Ecclesiastical Review	Bi	Biblica
AJSLL	American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literature	BJP	Bonsirven, Le Judaïsme Palestinien , 2 vols, 1935
Amb.	St Ambrose	BJRL	Bulletin of the John Rylands Library
AOT	H. Gressmann, Allorientalische Texte , Berlin und Leipzig, 1926 ¹	Bs	Bibliotheca Sacra
Aquin.	St Thomas Aquinas	BS	Biblische Studien
ASML	Abbott-Smith, Manual Lexicon of the Greek New Testament	BZ	Biblische Zeitschrift
ASS	Acta Sanctae Sedis	CAH	Cambridge Ancient History
AtAb	Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen	CAP	Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha , 2 vols, Oxford, 1913
ATAT	H. Gressmann, Allorientalische Texte zum Alten Testament , Berlin und Leipzig, 1926 ¹	CB	Corpus Berolinense (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, Leipzig, 1897-)
Ath.	St Athanasius	CBi	Century Bible
Aug.	St Augustine	CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly
BA	Biblical Archaeologist	CBS	Cambridge Bible for Schools & Colleges
BASOR	Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research	CE	Catholic Encyclopaedia
BB	Bonn Bible Series	Chrys.	St John Chrysostom
BBSAJ	Bulletin of the British School of Archaeology, Jerusalem	CIC	Codex Iuris Canonici
BDB	Hebrew and English Lexicon , ed. Brown, Driver and Briggs, Oxford, 1906	CIS	Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum
BEJC	Bonsirven, Les Enseignements de Jésus-Christ , 1946	Civ. Catt.	Civiltà Cattolica
BEP	Bonsirven, L'Evangile de Paul , 1948	CM	Cornely-Merk, Compendium Introductionis
BEREP	Bonsirven, Exégèse Rabinique et Exégèse Paulinienne , 1939	CNT	Commentary on the NT (C.B.A. of America, 1942)
		Coll. Brug.	Collationes Brugenses
		CR	Clergy Review
		CSAB	Catholic Student's Aids to the Bible , revised ed. 1926-37, by Rev. H. Pope, O.P.

ABBREVIATIONS

CSEL	Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, Vindobonae	KAT	Kommentar zum Alten Testament
CSS	Cursus Scripturae Sacrae, Paris, 1890–	KHK	Kurzer Handkommentar zum Alten Testament
CSSL	Cambridge Summer School Lectures	KIB	Keilinochrisliche Bibliothek
Cyr. Alex.	St Cyril of Alexandria	Knab.	J. Knabenbauer, S.J.
DAC	Dictionnaire d'Archéologie Chrét. et de Liturgie (Cabrol), 1907–	KNT	New Testament in English , trans. Knox, 1945
DAFC	Dictionnaire Apoloétique de la Foi Catholique	KTW	Theologisches Wörterbuch zum NT h. v. G. Kittel (1932–)
DAS	Encyclical, Divino afflante Spiritu (1943)	Lagr.	M.-J. Lagrange, O.P.
DbR	Dublin Review	Lebr. ODT	J. Lebreton, S.J., Les Origines du Dogme de la Trinité , 1910
DBV	Dictionnaire de la Bible (Vigouroux); (S) = Supplement	LEERS	Lagrange, Etudes sur les Religions sémitiques , Paris, 1903 ¹
DHPH	Desnoyers, Histoire du peuple hébreu	LEJC	Lagrange, L'Evangile de Jésus-Christ
Dict. Spir.	Dictionnaire de Spiritualité	LGJC	Lagrange, Gospel of Jesus Christ , 1938 [Eng. ed. of above]
DR	Downside Review	LOT	Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament , Edinburgh, 1929 ¹
DTC	Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique	LTK	Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Buchberger)
Dz	Denzinger-Bannwart, Enchiridion Symbolorum	MCC	Encyclical, Mystici Corporis Christi (1943)
EB	Enchiridion Biblicum	MGC	Moulton and Geden's Concordance to Greek NT
EBCB	Encyclopaedia Biblica , ed. Cheyne and Black	MMV	Moulton and Milligan's Vocabulary of the Greek Testament , 1930
EcR	Ecclesiastical Review	Mn	The Month
Edersheim	Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah , 2 vols	NP	Novum Psalterium (Pontificii Instituti Biblici)
EE	Estudios Eclesiásticos	NRT	Nouvelle Revue Théologique (Tournai)
EHAT	Exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament	NtAb	Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen
ER	Etudes Religieuses (Paris, 1856–)	ODT	Lebreton, Origines du Dogme de la Trinité
EREH	Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics , ed. Hastings, 1908–21	OLF	Oxford Library of the Fathers
ERS	Lagrange, Etudes sur les Religions sémitiques , Paris, 1905 ¹	Orig.	Origen
ET	Expository Times	PCB	Peake's Commentary on the Bible
ETL	Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses	PD	Encyclical, Providentissimus Deus (1893)
Eus. HE	Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History	PEF	Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement (1855–1937)
Exp	Expositor	PEQ	Palestine Exploration Quarterly (1937–)
FSAC	W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity , Baltimore, 1940	PG	Patrologia Graeca (Migne)
Ges.	Gesenius' Hebrew Dictionary	PJB	Palästina-Jahrbuch
GK	Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar , ed. E. Kautzsch. Eng. ed. revised by A. E. Cowley	PL	Patrologia Latina (Migne)
Greg.	St Gregory the Great; also = Gregorianum	PW	Pauly-Wissowa, Real-encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft , 1894–
GT	Gressmann, Allorientalische Texte zum Alten Testament , Berlin und Leipzig, 1926 ¹	RA	Revue Apoloétique
HAT	Handkommentar zum Alten Testament	RB	Revue Biblique
HDB	Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible	RBn	Revue Bénédictine (Maredsous)
HDT	Lebreton, History of the Dogma of the Trinity	RCF	Revue du Clergé français
HE	Historia Ecclesiastica (Eusebius)	RHE	Revue d'Histoire Ecclésiastique (Louvain)
H-G	Höfl-Gut, Compendium Introductionis , Romae	RHPR	Revue d'Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuse
Hier.	St Jerome	RSPT	Revue des Sciences Philosophiques et Théologiques
HJ	Hibbert Journal	RSR	Recherches de Science Religieuse
Holz. Hist.	U. Holzmeister, S.J., Historia Aetatis Novi Testamenti , Romae, 1932	RSRS	Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites
Holz. Chron.	Holzmeister, Chronologia Vitae Christi , Romae, 1933	RT	Revue Thomiste
HPR	American Homiletic and Pastoral Review	SB	Strack und Billerbeck, Kommentar zum N.T. aus Talmud und Midrasch , 1922–8
HRCS	Hatch and Redpath, Concordance to the Septuagint , 1897–1906	SC	Studia Catholica (Nijmegen Univ.)
HTR	Harvard Theological Review	SCSS	Steinmueller's Companion to Scripture Study , 3 vols, New York, 1941–3
ICC	International Critical Commentary	Sen.	Seneca
IER	Irish Ecclesiastical Record	SHG	G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land
Ign. Ant.	St Ignatius of Antioch	Simon-Prado	H. Simon and J. Prado, Praelectiones Biblicae
ITQ	Irish Theological Quarterly	SP	Encyclical, Spiritus Paraclitus (1920)
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society	SPIB	Scripta Pontificii Instituti Biblici
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature (New York)	SSCC	Scripturae Sacrae Cursus Completus (Migne)
JE	Jewish Encyclopedia	ST	Summa Theologica of St Thomas Aquinas
Jer.	St Jerome	Std	Studies
JNES	Journal of Near Eastern Studies	StKr	Theologische Studien und Kritiken
Jos. Ant.	Josephus, Antiquities
Jos. B. J.	Josephus, De Bello Judaico
Jos. c. Ap.	Josephus, Contra Apionem
JPOS	Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society
JRB	Bulletin of the John Rylands Library
JRel	Journal of Religion
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies (Oxford)

ABBREVIATIONS

Tert.	Tertullian	WC	Westminster Commentaries
TG	Theologie und Glaube	WH	Westcott & Hort's ed. of NT
Th Rs (NF)	Theologische Rundschau (Neue Folge)	WV	Westminster Version
TLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung	WW	Wordsworth & White's Vg NT
TPQ	Theologische-praktische Quartalschrift (Linz)	WZKM	Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes
TQ	Theologische Quartalschrift (Tübingen)	ZATW	Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
TS	Texts & Studies	ZDPV	Zeitschrift des deutschen Palästina-Vereins
TU	Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur (3 series), ed. Harnack and others, Leipzig (1883-)	ZKT	Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie (Oen.)
		ZLG	Novi Testamenti Lexicon Graecum , auctore F. Zorell, S.J., 1931 ^a
VD	Verbum Domini	ZNTW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft
Vg	Vulgate (Sixtine-Clementine Edition)
VS	'Verbum Salutis' series

OTHER ABBREVIATIONS USED

Aram.	Aramaic	LXX	Septuagint : (A) Codex Alexandrinus ; (B) Codex Vaticanus
AV	Authorized Version	Mass.	Massorah
Bab. Ba.	Baba Bathra	MT	Massoretic Text
Bab. Tal.	Babylonian Talmud	NT	New Testament
Bk	Book	ob.	obit, died
c	circa, about	obs.	observe, observation cent.	century	op. cit.	in the work last cited, or in the bibliography above
col, cc	column, columns	OT	Old Testament
ch, chh	chapter, chapters	Pent	Pentateuch
CTS	Catholic Truth Society	RV	Revised Version
d. or †	died	RVm	marginal reading of RV
DV	Douay Version	Sam	Samaritan Pentateuch
E.Tr.	English Translation	SL	Sumerian Law
EVV	English Versions (AV + RV)	Syn.	Synoptic(s)
f., ff.	following verse(s), chapter(s), page(s), etc.	Syr.	Syriac Peshitta Version
Gk	Greek	s.v.	sub verbo : under the heading
Heb.	Hebrew	T.	Tell
HT	Hebrew consonantal Text	TB	Babylonian Talmud ibid.	in the same place	tr.	translation, translated by
id.	(idem), the same author (person)	VSS	Versions
Kh.	Khirbet (ruins)	W.	West, or Wadi
lit.	literal, literally
loc. cit.	in the place last quoted

★

TRANSLITERATION OF HEBREW LETTERS

א	= ' [with dages] and ' [without dages]	מ, ם	= m
ב	= b	נ, ן	= n
ג	= g	ס	= s
ד	= d	ע	= ' [with dages] and ' [without dages]
ה	= h	פ, ף	= p
ו	= w [consonantal] and u [vocalic]	צ, ץ	= z
ז	= z	ק	= q
ח	= h	ר	= r
ט	= t	שׁ, שׂ	= s
י	= y	שׂ, שׁ	= s
כ, ך	= k [with dages] and k [without dages]	ת	= t [with dages] and t [without dages]
ל	= l

Letters with a dages forte are written twice. Vocal and haṭef ʿwa (shewa) are written above the line, e.g. h'ālm. Vowels long by nature are written with a circumflex accent, those long by position with a horizontal line or bar, e.g. yōm, dāḥār.

THE PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

By WILLIAM LEONARD AND DOM BERNARD ORCHARD

1a Bibliography—Concilium Tridentinum (Görresgesellschaft Ed.) Tom. 5. Acta 1, 528-35; Tom. 12, Tractatus 1, 1-104; F. Cavallera, La Bible en Langue Vulgaire au Concile de Trente in Mélanges Podechard, 37-56 (1945); R. Bellarmino, Controversiae: De Verbo Dei, lib. 4; B. Malou, La Lecture de la S. Bible en Langue Vulgaire (2 vols, 1846); E. Mangelot, Écriture Sainte in DTC 4, 2092-2101; J. Pérennès, Tradition et Magistère in DAF; J. B. Franzelin, De Traditione et Scriptura (1870); C. Pesch, De Inspiratione S. Scripturae—cap. 6, De Perspicuitate et Sufficiencia S. Scripturae (1906); H. von Noit, Ueber Bibelkenntnis und Bibel (1896); J. Hoffmann, Die Heilige Schrift ein Volks- und Schulbuch (1902); H. Höpfl, Buch der Bücher (1904); N. Peters, Kirche und Bibel (1908); id. Unsere Bibel (1929); H. G. Graham, Where we got the Bible (1911); A. Stonner, Vom Sinn und Wert der Heiligen Schrift (1927); H. Pope, The Catholic Church and the Bible (1928); Th. Soiron, Das Heilige Buch (1928); Th. Paffrath, Gott Herr und Vater (1930); A. d'Alès and P. Vigué, La Bible et la Théologie in Initiation Biblique, ch. 30, 751-774 (1939); *B. F. Westcott, The Bible in the Church (1864); *A. Harnack, Bible Reading in the Early Church (1912); *A. C. Paues, A Fourteenth Century English Biblical Version (1902); also A Fourteenth Century Biblical Version (1904) by the same authoress; *M. Deanesly, The Lollard Bible and other Medieval English Versions (1920); B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1941); J. F. H. Tregear, The First English Bible, CR, Jan.-Feb. (1946).

b Introductory—It may seem a little strange to begin a work on the Bible with a discussion of its place in the Church rather than with a formal account of its general character and history. But since the true position and authority of the Bible in Christian Society has been most unfortunately confused and obscured in the aftermath of the religious dissensions of the sixteenth century, it seems the most logical and candid thing to state unequivocally at the head of this Volume the conviction underlying the work of all the contributors to it, viz. that it is impossible to understand aright the Bible and its message unless the Bible itself be first viewed in its right setting, i.e. not merely as the eclectic product of certain outstanding members of that divine society that has existed in the world ever since God called Abram out of Ur of the Chaldees, but rather as the divinely inspired crystallization of the spirit and teaching of that society at times and places specially chosen by the Spirit of God dwelling within it.

It will therefore be well to state at the head of this article that both Church ('the Israel of God') and Bible belong to an order of providence which has destined man to a supernatural end. The divine decree, which elevated mankind from the beginning to fellowship in the divine nature, made necessary a supernatural revelation of God's purpose, of the secrets of his divinity, of the counsels of his wisdom and goodness. This communication of heavenly knowledge began to be made from the day of man's creation and, as God's purpose was not revoked after the fall, but more wonderfully embodied in a plan of redemption, supernatural revelation continued. The preparation of the Redeemer's coming was a progressive revelation, but the definitive manifestation of all God's purpose on behalf of the human race was made by the Son of God Incarnate in the fullness of time, cf. Heb 1:1. A living teaching authority is prior to every single book of Divine Scripture—There is no evidence for the existence (or destruction) of any divinely-inspired Scriptures of pre-mosaic date. Whatever divine revelation or communication there was in the early days of the human race probably took place by word of mouth only, and was handed on orally from generation to generation. God communicated his message to certain men and they in turn on his behalf transmitted it to their fellow-men in human language. This is what we mean by prophecy, which became a permanent—though variously distributed—institution in Israel, and produced all or nearly all of the forty-five books that form the Old Testament. From Moses onward God made provision that a part of what emanated 'from the chair of Moses' for the instruction of the people should under a charisma associated with and akin to prophetic inspiration be committed to writing. Thus the Bible grew.

We are here concerned, however, not with the Hebrew 'Church' and its Bible but with the Christian Church and the Bible which it partly inherited from Judaism and partly created out of the fund of Christian revelation and history. The same providence, indeed, obtains and is even more visibly in evidence when the Church of Christ begins to execute her divine commission to go out and teach all nations from Judaea to the ends of the earth. It is absurd, even psychologically, that the grace of Pentecost should be dominated by the letter of a book. The fact is that, while the Apostles looked upon themselves primarily as witnesses of Christ, the living organism which is the pillar and the ground of truth, functioned as a voice, and its ministers were 'servants of the word', the term 'word' meaning the spoken word.

A living voice is not, however, incompatible with a written source of revelation. A written fount of truth has its own special advantages. It is the fixation of a considerable part of the deposit entrusted to the Church. Thus Scripture becomes her patrimony, and is rightly reckoned amongst her greatest treasures. In preaching the living word she has the support of a fixed text. The revelation which she holds is, therefore, as the Council of Trent defined, 'contained in written books and in traditions without writing'—traditions which were received from the mouth of Christ himself and from the Apostles under dictation of the Holy Spirit and have come down to us, delivered, as it were, from hand to hand' (Sess. iv, EB 46).

We must not, however, imagine Scripture and Tradition to be like two distinct reservoirs receiving the waters of divine truth from distinct and separate springs. There is in a sense but one source of revealed truth, viz. divine Tradition, by which is meant the body of revealed truth handed down from the Apostles through the ages and contained in the doctrine, teaching and practice of the Catholic Church. Yet since a large and important part of that revelation was committed to writing both before and after the time of Christ the Church is accustomed to speak of two sources of revelation, oral Tradition and Scripture. The peculiar character and importance of Scripture—the written part of this divine Tradition—derives solely from the 16 fact that it is the inspired word of God, 'a letter written by our heavenly father and transmitted by the sacred writers to the human race in its pilgrimage so far from its heavenly country' (Chrys. In Gen. hom. 2.2).

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

The two streams of oral Tradition and Scripture happily mix, for in the living magisterium of the Church these are living waters springing together unto life everlasting. It is the Church, the holder of Tradition, that gives life to the dead letter of Scripture. Experience shows that it is only in the life of the Church, the Bride of Christ, that Scripture, divinely inspired as it is, becomes 'living and effectual, and more piercing than any two-edged sword' (Heb 4:12).

f Since the Bible is not the only source from which the truths of revelation must be drawn, the Fathers of Trent expressly condemned the innovators who made the Bible the sole arbiter of doctrine, rejecting Tradition and substituting individual religious judgement for the judgement of a teaching Church. The things which the Church is commissioned to teach out of the Bible are matters of faith and morals pertinent to the building up of Christian doctrine. In regard to these truths the authority of Tradition and of the Bible is equal. Either one or the other will certify that a certain proposition is in the divine-apostolic deposit. Nevertheless, as we shall see later, the Church is superior to the Bible in the sense that she is the Living Voice of Christ, and therefore the sole infallible interpreter of the inspired Word, whenever an authoritative interpretation is required (§ 39b).

Moreover the inspiration of the whole Bible cannot be known from the Bible, but only through the Church. For the biblical Canon can only be established by the Church. Hence it is the Church alone that has made known which are the inspired books (cf. §§ 11-18). On the other hand the Church is not directly commissioned to teach everything narrated in the Bible, e.g. that Abraham lived in Hebron. Of itself the residence of a patriarch at Hebron does not enter into the edifice of Christian doctrine which guides souls by faith and good works to the bliss of eternity. The infallibility of the Church only pertains to all such necessary matters of faith and morality as lead men to heaven, while the infallibility of the Bible pertains to everything authentically contained in the biblical pages. It would be erroneous, however, to think that the Church has no interest in the fact of Abraham's residence at Hebron. It is asserted in Scripture and is therefore infallibly true. The Church, as the champion of the Bible's inerrancy, has the right to condemn any denial of an authentic biblical statement. At the same time, a secondary fact such as that mentioned from patriarchal history cannot itself directly be matter for a positive infallible definition.

Again the question is sometimes asked whether all revealed truth may not be found at least obscurely in Scripture. It is impossible, however, to make an absolute affirmation in the terms of the above question; but, relatively speaking, so much is contained in the Bible that it is difficult to assert that certain particular truths of Christian faith and conduct are nowhere found in it. It is, for instance, said that the Bible nowhere teaches the distinction between mortal and venial sin. The distinction, it seems, is nowhere clearly enunciated, but it is hard to say that it cannot be gathered from the whole assemblage of passages where mention is made of great sins such as exclude from the kingdom of God and of other faults which do not seem to be regarded as seriously staining the honour of those who commit them.

g Since Scripture is a communication from an all-loving Providence for the purpose of guiding mankind in the path of perfection (cf. § 2), it is clear that it should be studied primarily with a view to one's own spiritual profit. That is, we should seek its spiritual message and apply it to ourselves. This is Bible study par excellence, which for its success always requires the help of God's grace. It is of course connected, to a greater or lesser degree, with what we may call scientific Bible study, which aims at elucidating the meaning of the text with the aid both of secular sciences such as philology and 1g archaeology, and of Church Tradition.

Purely scientific Bible study has its own place and h value in biblical matters, but its subordinate position should always be recognized. Such study is ultimately justified only if it helps to make the spiritual content clearer and more readily available. The philological elucidation or literary analysis of a passage may well be elevated to the spiritual plane by the motive of the one carrying it out, but in itself it has no spiritual value. For example, the study of the Synoptic Problem is in itself an exercise in literary criticism that has no more spiritual value for the student than the study of the Baconian theory of Shakespearean authorship, although the materials under discussion, the words of the Bible, are of course infinitely superior from the point of view of their origin.

We shall now proceed to study our subject under the following heads:

- A. The Bible as the Book of Spiritual Perfection. 1
- B. The Church's Love of the Bible:
 - 1. Her use of the Bible:
 - (a) In the time of Christ.
 - (b) In the Apostolic Age.
 - (c) In the Early Centuries.
 - (d) In the Dark Ages.
 - (e) In the Middle Ages.
 - (f) In Modern Times.
 - 2. The History of Private Bible Reading.
 - 3. A Short History of Exegesis.
 - 4. Direction of Modern Biblical Study:
 - (a) General Account.
 - (b) Modern Catholic Biblical Activity.
 - (c) Achievement of Non-Catholic Scholarship.
- C. The Bible as the Church's Exclusive Possession.
- D. Appendix on Bible Circulation.

A. THE BOOK OF SPIRITUAL PERFECTION AND SANCTIFICATION

The primary reason why all Catholics should know 2a the Bible well is (as above stated) the advancement of their own personal sanctification, for 'to be ignorant of the Scripture is not to know Christ' (Jer. De Stud. Script. ad Paulin., Ep. 53, 3).

'All Scripture inspired of God is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice: that the man of God may be perfect, furnished to every good work', 2 Tim 3:16-17. These words of St Paul state clearly that God's purpose in giving the Scriptures to the Catholic Church was to make the man of God perfect. In order that we may 'be perfect as our heavenly Father is perfect' we must study Jesus Christ, who is, as St John so finely says, 'the exegesis' of the Father, 1:18. Prayer and good works without the proper direction of our spiritual effort resulting from earnest study of Our Blessed Lord (each according to his capacity) will be without fruit or use. This proper direction of our spiritual effort can result only from the continuous feeding, nay, saturation, of our minds with the teaching and atmosphere of Sacred Writ. For whosoever seeks true perfection by union with God and the perfect knitting of his soul and spirit with the Divinity must steadfastly aim to make himself like his Master Jesus Christ by imitating his virtues as they are depicted for us in the Gospels, Epistles and other New Testament writings (cf. § 10b).

Nor should we neglect the study of the OT where Christ is seen not so much in his own person but in his mysteries which are there prefigured. It was the Holy Spirit of Jesus, too, that inspired, for example, the writers of the Psalms, and the Books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus. What could be more profitable for a young man to meditate upon than Ps 118:33-40? Or, for an old man, Ps 70:5, 9-12, 17-19?

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

2a How can one meditate too long on Wis 6-8 describing the attractiveness of Wisdom, or fail to profit from a meditation on Eccles 31, describing the danger of riches and of the just man's scorn of them? 'Everything in the Sacred Book shines and glistens even in its outer shell: but the marrow of it is sweeter: if you want the kernel, you must break the shell' (Ep. 69, 9). With these words St Jerome encourages us to persevere in meditating on the Scriptures for our own profit and that of others.

b The fruit and reward of Bible study is, as Pope Pius X tells us, threefold: Spiritual delight, love of Christ and zeal for his cause. St Jerome, writing to his disciple Paula (Ep. 30, 13) thus describes that interior satisfaction of spirit: 'Tell me whether you know of anything more sacred than this sacred mystery, anything more delightful than the pleasure found herein? What food, what honey could be sweeter than to learn of God's Providence, to enter into his shrine and look into the mind of the Creator, to listen to the Lord's words at which the wise of this world laugh, but which are really full of spiritual teaching? Others may have their wealth, may drink out of jewelled cups, be clad in silks, enjoy popular applause, find it impossible to exhaust their wealth by dissipating it in pleasures of all kinds; but our delight is to meditate on the Law of the Lord day and night, to knock at his door when shut, to receive our food from the Trinity of Persons, and, under the guidance of the Lord, trample under foot the swelling tumults of this world.'

To know Christ is to love him. And how can our minds be fed with knowledge of his earthly life, save through the Scriptures that record it?

c How to study the Bible—But though the Bible is the Book of Spiritual Perfection no spiritual profit can be derived from its study unless it be undertaken in a prayerful spirit, in piety and humility and in submission of the intellect to the Rule of Faith. We must in fact be prepared to study the Bible on our knees. Being written by the Holy Spirit we 'cannot otherwise read or understand it' than the Holy Spirit by whom it was written demands'' (Jer. In Gal. 5:19). Hence to derive profit from Bible Study, in the true sense, we must live in a state of grace and be prepared like St Jerome to remove whatever in ourselves may prove a hindrance, i.e. detach ourselves from the love of the pleasures of this world and seek to form in ourselves 'the mind of Christ'. This latter involves our submission to the teaching authority of the Church of Christ, knowing that there can be nothing set down in the Bible by the Holy Spirit of Jesus that can in any way contradict the teaching of his Church, which is itself infallibly directed by the same Holy Spirit. We therefore follow in all our studies the Rule and Analogy of Faith. Lastly, to derive serious profit from our Bible study we must be as assiduously faithful to it as was Eustochium, the daughter of Paula, St Jerome's favourite disciple, to whom he wrote (Ep. 22, 17, 29): 'Read assiduously and learn as much as you can. Let sleep find you holding your Bible, and when your head nods let it be resting on the sacred page!'

B. THE CHURCH'S LOVE OF THE BIBLE

3a The love and veneration of the Church for the Bible can best be seen and appreciated by examining her use of it down the course of the centuries.

1. The Church's Use of the Bible—The use of the Bible for instruction is a practice which has descended from the one Master, Christ our Lord, through his Apostles to the Apostolic Church. Some of the Church's children may at times have neglected the Bible too much, but at no period of her history can it be said of her as a body that she kept the inspired writings closed and sealed.

b (a) In the Time of Christ—The example of our Lord is very striking. He came as one having authority, himself a fountain of wisdom and knowledge, speaking as no man ever spoke, and showing those potent motives of credibility which we call miracles. Yet he used the inspired Scriptures of the Hebrew people and appealed to them. He recognized them as writings that foretold him, Jn 5:39, as having irrefragable authority, 10:35, as writings of whose ordinances no jot or tittle should pass away, Mt 5:18. He solemnly read them and commented on them, Lk 4:16 ff.; he made it clear that his life, death and resurrection would be fulfilment of the Scriptures. He pointed out how they testified to his mission and divinity, Mt 22:42; 26:64; with three texts of Deuteronomy he met the temptations of Satan, Mt 4:4, 7, 10; he employed the Scriptures in his instructions to his disciples, Mt 13:14 and to the crowds, Jn 6:45; he had recourse to them in rebuking and refuting Pharisees and Sadducees, Mt 8:13; 15:8; 22:32. The same Christ cites Moses, David, Isaiah, Daniel by name, and touches the history of such biblical personages as the Queen of Sheba and Solomon, as Elias and the widow of Sarepta, Eliseus and Naaman the Syrian, Jonas and the Ninevites, Lot and his wife. Two of his seven words on the cross are Psalm passages, and a third contains an allusion to the words of a Psalm. Finally, after his resurrection Jesus explained the Scriptures—the Law, the Prophets and the Psalms, Lk 24:44—and opened the minds of his disciples to understand them.

3b

(b) In the Apostolic Age—It is no wonder, in view of this divine example, that the apostolic preaching of the Church's infancy is full of Holy Writ. St Peter's discourses at Jerusalem are mostly tissues of Scripture texts; similarly the discourse of St James at the Council of Jerusalem and the sermon of St Paul in the synagogue of Pisidian Antioch. All the writings of the NT—Gospels, Acts and Epistles—either abound in scriptural arguments or are dyed with the colours of biblical language and biblical allusion.

St Paul is the Scripturist par excellence. It is not merely on account of the number of his citations and biblical arguments, but above all on account of his penetration of the Christian fecundity of the sacred page that we can truly call the Apostle of the Gentiles the great exponent of the Law and the Prophets, which he had learned at the feet of Gamaliel, even before he received the fullness of enlightenment from the Holy Spirit. We also know his view of the power and utility of the Bible as an apostolic instrument (cf. Heb 4:12). The same Apostle reminds Timothy that the Holy Scriptures which he had known from childhood were full of saving instruction by the faith which is in Christ Jesus, 2 Tim 3:15. Hence he says to Timothy: 'Attend to reading', 1 Tim 4:13. Moreover, it is not merely as a Jewish patrimony to be used by Judaeo-Christians that he commends the use of the Bible. Writing to the predominantly Gentile community of Rome, after citing a text as an exhortation to patience and tolerance, he says: 'What things soever were written, were written for our learning: that through patience and the comfort of the Scriptures we might have hope, Rom 15:4. And only five verses further down, he cites no less than four passages from Ps, Deut and Is to show that 'the Gentiles are to glorify God for his mercy'.

(c) In the Early Centuries—Those who exercised the office of teaching in the Church realized the cogency of this example of Christ and the Apostles as a law for their own lives. We need only cite two great ecclesiastical writers who sum up that law of Bible study. The beautiful code of priestly duty which St Jerome so elegantly penned to Nepotian contains these words: 'You should read the divine scriptures very frequently; in fact, sacred reading should never be out of your hands. Learn what you must teach; hold that genuine form of speech which accords with sound doctrine. . . . The words of a priest should be seasoned with the reading of the Scriptures' (Ep. ad Nepotianum). Similarly that wise book, the Regula Pastoralis of St Gregory, which King Alfred translated into Anglo-Saxon, says: 'It is incumbent on those who attend to the office of preaching not to neglect the studious reading of the sacred volume' (Reg. Past 2, 11).

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

34 Practice did not differ from precept. Certainly the pastors of the Church showed that they regarded the Bible as the indispensable 'sacerdotal book'. A cursory look through the Apostolic Fathers with the help of Funk's (or Bihlmeyer's) Scriptural indexes and of the Oxford Committee's NT in the Apostolic Fathers will show how permeated with biblical citation, allusion and colour these writings are.

6 The earliest Apologists who wrote chiefly against paganism had less occasion to use Scripture (whose sacredness and antiquity, however, they do not omit to proclaim), but the vast array of biblical texts in Justin's Dialogue may be taken as representative of the Scriptural knowledge of these men (see Goodspeed's ed. with Index locorum). Certainly St Irenaeus exhibits an abundance (cf. Sanday-Turner NT S. Irenaei).

With the foundation of the Catechetical School (Didaskaleion) of Alexandria, a biblical centre in the strict sense of the term came into existence. Although its masters used Greek philosophy and science as a basic preparation, as Philo the Jew had done, their chief and almost exclusive occupation was the reading, exposition and defence of the written word of God. After producing an astounding mass of critical, expository, systematizing work, with Origen (†254) as its colossal genius, the Didaskaleion continued its work for a few centuries till after the death of Didymus the Blind (398), and then gradually foundered in the waves of the Origenistic controversies. We are not here concerned with the exaggerations of its allegorism. We should note, however, its strong influence over the East through Gregory Thaumaturgus (†270), through Eusebius of Caesarea (†339), through the Cappadocian Fathers, and also over the West through St Ambrose (†397). Alexandria had its last great exegete in Cyril (†444), the greatest theologian of the Oriental Church.

The rival School of Antioch, whose reputed founder was Lucian (†311), and which was, as it were, re-founded by Diodorus of Tarsus, produced a biblical movement which has few parallels in ecclesiastical history. St John Chrysostom (†407), disciple of Diodorus, is not only the prince of orators but the outstanding Catholic exegete of the Greek Church. The Antiochian method as represented by him is, in the main, the Catholic method of biblical exegesis. Syria had a similar master of genius in St Ephraem (†375). These are only a few names from Alexandria, Palestine, Antioch, Cappadocia, Syria, but they are names which show that the Bible was alive in the Catholic Church during that golden age.

1 The Latin Fathers were not less assiduous and enthusiastic. If some measure of representative proof is required for the years that ended with the fall of the Roman Empire and the coming of a new age, it may suffice to refer to the Testimonia ad Quirinum of Cyprian (†258), and to the works of Hilary (†368), Ambrose, Leo and Gregory. St Jerome (†420) is the Doctor Maximus of Holy Writ, who regarded biblical learning as one of the Church's chief bulwarks (In Is. 54, 12). St Augustine (†430) left an immense harvest of scriptural discussion, exposition, and biblico-homiletic instruction. With his acute mind he contributed more than any other Father to the opening and exploitation of the theological riches which the Sacred Books contain.

(d) In the Dark Ages.—Golden ages do not last indefinitely. In a devastated Mediterranean world and in a Europe which had to be re-made and largely conquered for Christian civilization episcopal centres of learning and Bible knowledge could not easily flourish although, indeed, there were such bishops as Isidore of Seville (†636), who strove to be the scholarly educators of their countries.

8 The Monks did their part valiantly to keep Bible learning alive from the 6th to the 11th cent. True, it was an age of copying manuscripts and exegetical compilation. Nevertheless Bede (†735), Alcuin, Walafrid Strabo, Anselm of Laon (†1109), Peter Damian (†1072) and Lanfranc (†1093) are names which remind us that the Bible was still a light in those so-called ages of darkness—a darkness out of which came the dawn of Christianity for Teutonic and Slavonic peoples. The splendid manuscripts of the Vulgate made in those centuries, the touching letter of St Boniface (†755) asking for a good copy of six Prophets as a consolation for his old age, the abundance of Scripture found in extant sermons, the wealth of patristic comment gathered into the Glossa ordinaria would rather suggest that the Bible was the one book that counted in that age. Moreover, all the sacred ministers of the Church and multitudes of religious were bound, then as now, to the daily recitation or chanting of the Divine Office. This involved not only constant familiarity with the Psalter, but also furnished them with a very considerable course of Scriptural reading (all the Books of the Bible being read through once a year) as well as of patristic lessons which were mostly comments on biblical texts.

(e) In the Middle Ages.—In the 12th cent. the mellifluous language of St Bernard springs from the Bible source; and in the great Scholastic century which followed, Holy Writ was (what it should be) the soul of theology, and consequently the life of Christian teaching. The greatest of medieval theologians, St Thomas Aquinas, was also the Prince of medieval exegetes.

From the Council of Vienne (1311), which introduced chairs of Hebrew and other oriental languages into the universities, to the Council of Trent (1545) the study of the Scriptures benefited by the new knowledge first of Hebrew and then of Greek antiquity, that led to the outstanding achievements of the following age. In 1546 the Council of Trent (Sess. 5 c. 1 de ref.) enacted that in cathedrals, monasteries, convents of friars and other religious houses, where study could conveniently flourish, exposition of Scripture should have its due place of honour and should be put in the hands of competent men. The same Council also strictly enacted that the preaching of the word of God should be a prime duty of pastors, so that on Sundays and solemn festivals the people should never be left without the food of God's word (ibid. c. 2).

1 The Bible in Art and Drama.—Neither the use of the written and printed page nor the more potent instrument of oral teaching exhausts the means which were employed by the Church to bring the word of salvation to the people. The renaissance of letters and the discovery of printing were great benefits in many ways, but they largely destroyed that visual kind of religious instruction which was so efficacious from the days of the catacombs to the days of Gothic cathedrals. The Bible in colour, chiefly as it appeared in the paintings of the catacombs and of Byzantine and Roman basilicas, the Bible in stone as it was given to the people by Gothic architects and sculptors, the Bible in stained glass in those same countries where Gothic art reigned—these were 'pedagogues to Christ' such as we can now appreciate only if we think back into the true historical atmosphere of the times. The parallel series of Old and New Testament scenes (representing type and antitype) painted on the walls of the parish churches filled the minds of the simplest folk with the truth of Christ, Saviour and Judge, as the real King and Centre of the ages of the world. The hand-drawn 'Bibles of the poor' with their scripts, and, after the invention of printing, the woodcuts with their scripts, continued this method of teaching, but later it was swamped in the prevalence of the printed page. The mystery-plays too of the Middle Ages were a potent factor in spreading knowledge of the Bible, especially among the unlettered.

(f) In Modern Times.—The post-Tridentine period (1560–1700) was like a return of the Age of the Fathers and is deservedly called the second Golden Age of biblical exegesis. Maldonatus and Cornelius a Lapide are but two of a whole host of scholars. There was no book of either Testament that did not find more than one able commentator, and no question of importance

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

3] at the time which did not exercise the minds of many scholars. The 18th cent. was much less brilliant, Calmet being perhaps the greatest commentator. Yet the biblical rationalism which had Semler for its father at the middle of this century did not find Catholic thought unprepared. On the eve of the 18th cent., Richard Simon had, in spite of many errors in his works, laid the foundations of Catholic critical-historical study of the Bible. However, new methods of meeting old and new difficulties do not come to maturity in a day. Simon was much ahead of his time, and it took more than a century for the seed which he cast to come to fruition, and this only after Catholic scholarship had battled with many winds of unorthodox temptation. Here the Holy See was a most beneficent lighthouse, as we shall see.

In the late 18th and early 19th cents., when the Church's enemies thought she was on her deathbed, scriptural activity was at a comparatively low ebb; but a glance at §§ 29-31 will show that at that time even in Protestant England a great many Catholic editions of the Bible were being issued.

In the past hundred years (since 1858) there has been a tremendous resurgence of Catholic biblical activity in every country of the civilized world, about which more will be found in §§ 43-6.

4a. 2. The History of Private Bible Reading—The world which Christianity first entered was a Greco-Roman world. Greek first and then Latin were its languages. The providential spread of Common Greek made it possible for the Church to use practically one Bible, namely the Greek Bible, and one liturgical language throughout most of the Roman empire for nearly two centuries. From the first half of the 3rd cent. Latin began to prevail as the Christian language throughout the wide domain of the west. In the east Greek remained predominant, although locally Syriac and Coptic and, later, Ethiopic and Armenian and Georgian limited its range. Until the fateful year 410, which marks the success of Germanic irruptions, those who read the Bible read it in Greek or Latin. Private reading of Holy Writ in these languages must have been fairly common. History shows that those who could read and write were not a few, and copies of certain books were astonishingly cheap. Few, indeed, could possess a whole Bible, and parchments were mostly beyond ordinary purses, but ancient authors and papyrological discoveries show what extensive circulation papyrus rolls and even papyrus codices must have had. At the end of the 4th cent. St John Chrysostom suggests that every household in Constantinople, rich and poor, could well be expected to have a copy of the New Testament or a considerable part of it, and that not for show but for constant use.

b There is no evidence that the Church showed herself hostile to Bible reading in those centuries, and, if we speak particularly of vernacular versions, we have the striking fact that in Egypt between the second half of the 3rd and the end of the 6th cent. Holy Scripture was read in four or five different dialects of Coptic, namely, Sahidic, Bohairic, Fayumic, Achmimic and a Sub-achmimic, which is sometimes called Asyutic. Thus, before the end of the great patristic age (broadly A.D. 500-600) several versions had established themselves in the East. Travelling from Ethiopia to Georgia a man could come into contact with the Scriptures in some ten languages or dialects other than Greek. In the European territories of the patriarchate of Constantinople we know of only two early versions, the Gothic of Ulfilas (Wulfilas) in the 4th cent. and the Slavonic of SS. Cyril and Methodius in the 9th.

c In the patriarchate of the West, Latin was the sole literary language, and it was on the basis of the religion and culture which voiced itself in Latin that the Teutonic peoples were Christianized and civilized. Whoever in western Europe learned to read at all learned Latin. It is no wonder, therefore, that the Latin Bible remained untranslated, till neo-Latin and Teutonic tongues attained some literary development. Anglo-Saxon translators were first in the field (counting from Caedmon's paraphrase of combined parts of the Bible about 670 to Ven. Bede's translation of St John's Gospel, finished by the dying Saint on the eve of the Ascension 735, and thence to Aelfric's partial translation of the OT about 990). The Norman invasion came to interrupt this growth of an Anglo-Saxon Bible. Meanwhile, before the memorable year 1066, not a great deal had been done in the way of translation on the Continent either. As far as we are aware, no French version had appeared before two Norman-French Psalters came into use about 1100. In lands of German speech there was more activity, the Benedictine monastery of Mondsee being a pioneer with the translation of St Matthew's Gospel in 748. In monasteries like St Gall and Ebersberg we know of translations made in the 10th and 11th cents. by such scholars as Notker Labeo and Abbot Williram. Translation of the Bible into the vernacular had evidently established itself by that time in Germany. According to W. Walther (Deutsche Bibelübersetzung des MA) there were about 3,600 manuscripts of complete or partial German Bibles in circulation before printing was invented. Translation, according to needs, and manuscript circulation of translations evidently went on without let or hindrance.

The Carolingian renaissance in France stimulated the use of the Latin language, but did not lead immediately to the upspringing of a French literature. This came only in the age of the Crusades and had its first centre in Normandy. In the course of the 13th cent., however, the stimulus of the University of Paris not only stirred men to revise the Vulgate, but to make a complete translation into French, the first complete French Bible. Things might have been the same in England, only that the English language had to await its victory over Norman French as the national language. The linguistic fusion in which the Anglo-Saxon element gained predominance was scarcely complete before the middle of the 13th cent. It has been said that the Psalter was the only part of the Bible to appear in English between 1250 and the days of the Black Death (the years before 1350). Just over 30 years later (1382) Wyclif's Bible appeared. This is the first Wycliffite Bible. A revised edition from the hand of the Wycliffite John Purvey appeared about 1388, some four years after Wyclif's death.

It may seem surprising that the first complete Bible in English was produced by heretics, but the fact should be considered in the light of the circumstances. In the first place, at a time when a large part of the population was illiterate there could hardly be any very widespread demand for a version in English. For the educated classes, most of whom were French-speaking and understood Latin, there were versions in both Latin and French. Wyclif and his followers, however, like so many other innovators before and since, felt acutely the need for a vernacular version as a means of propagating their unorthodox opinions. It is not that the Wycliffite translation is in itself unorthodox, but that they could more easily put their private interpretation on a translation in English. It has been well said, however, that even if the Wycliffites had not made one, an English translation would almost certainly have been produced in the 14th cent., for English was by then an established language.

In the event, it was the Wycliffite Bible which became generally used, not only by the common people, but also by the nobility and ecclesiastics. As a translation it was innocuous, as may be seen from extant copies, most of these being Purvey's revision, and once its heretical prologue had been removed there was no special reason why it should not be used by orthodox Catholics. The extant copies, once the property of kings, nobles and religious houses, testify that they were in fact so used. No doubt, a Bible produced by men notorious for unorthodox views was at first regarded with suspicion and even met with opposition. But as 44 time passed and it was seen to contain no erroneous doctrine, it circulated without let or hindrance.

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

5 This much should suffice against the charge that the Church kept the people in a state of Biblical starvation, and that this was especially the case before the Reformation. England, indeed, may have been slow in the sense explained above; for historically speaking she has usually been a generation behind the Continent in her ideas. On the Continent vernacular versions had long had wide manuscript circulation, and had come from the printing presses in goodly numbers before Luther's Bible was published. It has been calculated that 104 editions of complete vernacular Bibles were printed before the first Protestant Bible: 20 Italian, 26 French, 19 Flemish, 2 Spanish, 6 Bohemian, 30 German, not to speak of portions of Scripture, especially New Testaments and the Book of Psalms. We may add that the first printed Bible in German appeared at Strassburg as early as 1466.

On Bible reading in England since the Reformation, see §§ 29-31.

h In the midst of the modern inundation of the world with books whose spirit is earthly the Church has very decisively recommended to her children the pious use of the Bible, cf. the remarkable Brief of Pius VI to Monsignor Antonio Martini (16 Apr. 1778), and the Encyclical Spiritus Paraclitis of Benedict XV (5 Sept. 1920); cf. also the favour which the Holy See has shown, since its inception in Italy in 1902, to the Pious Society of St Jerome for the diffusion of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, and Pope Leo XIII's grant of spiritual favours in the form of Indulgences to spiritual reading made from the Bible: 'The faithful who spend at least a quarter of an hour in reading Holy Scripture with the great reverence due to the Word of God and after the manner of spiritual reading may gain an Indulgence of 300 days', and a plenary indulgence may be gained monthly by those who make this reading a daily practice, 13 Dec. 1898.

5a 3. A Short History of Exegesis—In our Lord's time there existed in Palestine a rabbinical system of biblical interpretation, but it was in the more scientific atmosphere of the Hellenistic world that Christian biblical exegesis grew up. A beginning had been made amongst the Jews of Alexandria. Gradually, in the hands of several scholars and particularly in the hands of the philosopher Philo († A.D. 42), a system of allegorical interpretation was elaborated which was almost entirely psychological, ethical, metaphysical and un-Messianic. The allegorism of Philo was inherited by the Christian exegetical School of Alexandria, but the Messianic typology which was the theological core of Christian interpretation of the OT held its due place. The Christian allegorism, which was often pushed to excess by Origen and others, was rooted in the true principle that the Bible has a deeper meaning than the mere letter can reveal. The historical truth which the words yield, though not denied, was much neglected by Philo, but Christian exegesis, admitting the principle of typology, could never depart so far from the ground truth of history. In this way the Alexandrian school was substantially scientific. Moreover the philological training of its masters, the pioneer work of Origen in systematic theology, and especially the immense critical labour which he devoted to the text forbid us to dub the Alexandrian didaskaleion as just nebulous. In one of the Alexandrian Fathers we find the following sober and 'modern' statement: 'Here (Heb 1:4) it is necessary (as indeed it is right and necessary in all Divine Scripture) to note the time at which the Apostle wrote, and the person about whom, and the point under consideration, lest the reader should from ignorance miss any of these or any like particular and thus be wide of the sense' (Athanasius, Contra Arianos 1, 54). He adds that the eunuch of Queen

Candace was a truly scientific inquirer (φιλομαθής), when he asked whether Isaiah in 53:7 was speaking of himself or of some other person. It should also be remarked that Eusebius, a follower of the Alexandrian School, laid the foundations of biblical ethnography and geography.

The truly scientific character of the School of Antioch is seen both in its theory and its practice. The Antiochians were careful to avoid that play of the imagination which found such easy indulgence in allegorization. They adhered to the letter, while admitting that the Bible leads the mind from smaller to greater realities. This occurs chiefly in the typical relation of Israel to the Christian church. Thus Osee's 'Not-my-people' becoming 'My people' is realized only in a small way in Israel, but fully in the abundance of mercy given to the Church called from the Gentiles (cf. Rom 9:25). This perception of higher things through the medium of lower things they called by the technical term theoria. The limits of such intellectual perception were determined in a thoroughly scientific way, for the boundaries were the words of the sacred text themselves. The literal and historical sense was never abandoned or neglected; see Bi (1920) 3-30.

St John Chrysostom, for example, a prominent representative of this school, was careful to determine the scope of a book and its historical setting. He discusses the exact meaning of words, and considers the context; he recognizes that divine books, being a mirror of the divine 'economy', must show a linguistic 'condescension' analogous to that of the Incarnation, while at the same time presenting akribeia or propriety of thought and expression; he admits only the plain literal sense, an ordinary allegorical sense (as in the wolf at peace with the lamb in Is 11), and a typical sense which he calls a 'prophecy through figure'. The name which he gives to the ascent from the mere letter to the higher sense is anagoge.

In the Age of the Scholastics we find a strong development of scientific and in some respects tediously scientific method in the scriptural field. Definition and division were the great instruments of those exact Doctors. They distinguished the various senses of the sacred words with a precision such as had never been attained before; they estimated the theological weight of texts; they divided and subdivided and defined the subject-matter of each part; they investigated the purpose of the writer; they explained the connexion of ideas. All this labour threw much new light on the meaning of obscure passages. Of scholastic commentaries, especially of those left by Aquinas, it may be said that patience is required to enter into sympathetic appreciation of their method, but once this is done, they richly repay the study of their thoughtful and powerful pages.

Of the Post-Tridentine Period, the second 'Golden Age' of Catholic exegesis (cf. 3j), we need say little here. Its close contact with patristic exposition was its main strength, but textual criticism, biblical geography and archaeology, and even metrology and numismatics received the attention of able scholars. It does not seem too bold to say that Lucas of Bruges deserves to stand amongst the greatest of textual critics, and that Agellius on the Psalms, Maldonatus on the Gospels, Estius on the Pauline Epistles (apart from his Bajanism) have never been surpassed.

Catholic Adoption of Modern Critical and Historical Methods—During all those centuries Catholic scholarship had mainly concentrated on the doctrinal content of the Bible. This emphasis was undoubtedly right, but, owing to the undeveloped state of historical method, earlier exegesis considerably overlooked the concrete facts of literary origins, of oriental idiom, of the progress of OT revelation, of the ethnic and political environment of the Hebrews and other such philological and historical considerations. Consequently, the application of critical and historical 5f methods to the study of the Bible introduced a new phase of biblical science.

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

Because of the errors which disfigured the works of Richard Simon (cf. § 3j), and more especially because of the political turmoil that filled the second half of the 18th and the first half of the 19th cents., the foundations of critical method laid by this bold and acute pioneer did not quickly prove their utility. Meanwhile natural sciences had developed, history had come to be written according to more critical standards, the study of monuments and the excavation of ancient sites had brought new light from the East; comparative philology and the scientific study of languages had made rapid progress, and the need had arisen to meet with new methods the rationalism which had invaded many centres of learning.

6a 4. The Direction of Modern Catholic Biblical Study

(a) General Account—Owing to the defensive positions into which the Church had been forced after the Reformation, the lead in utilizing these new archaeological and scientific investigations and of the new critical and historical methods fell to the Protestant, and often rationalist, scholars of Holland, France, Germany and Great Britain. They fell not unnaturally into many excesses and absurdities in testing out the new methods and in applying the new knowledge to the study of the Bible. Nevertheless they succeeded in making a tremendous advance in the science of literary and textual criticism, in linguistics and in the knowledge of sacred antiquities, in all of which, for the reasons above stated, Catholics scholars had little share, though they were much impressed by some of the work done. There was in consequence from the beginning of the 19th cent. a tendency among some Catholic scholars to relax the rule of traditional interpretation. The Vatican Council curbed a general rationalistic tendency of this kind which had shown itself in a few authors like Jahn; but a new crisis was soon to come, which we can only regard as a felix culpa in view of the magnificent measures then taken by the Holy See to guide Bible studies into the right path. A false view of inspiration, which allowed that the Bible did actually contain errors in matters of history and natural science, was the label of what came to be known as 'The Broad School'. The spread of this way of thinking from the publication of Lenormant's Origines de l'histoire d'après la Bible et les traditions des peuples orientaux (1880) to the appearance of Mgr d'Hulst's article La Question Biblique (Correspondant, 25 Jan. 1891) was the occasion of Pope Leo's celebrated Encyclical Providentissimus Deus. The document was published 18 Nov. 1893, and is justly called the Magna Charta of present day biblical studies. The teachings which it inculcated were further enforced and clarified by the Encyclical Spiritus Paraclitus of Benedict XV (15 Sept. 1920), and supplemented, as regards their application to present circumstances, by the Encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu of Pius XII (30 Sept. 1943). These great pronouncements and the practical provisions made by the Holy See for the promotion of biblical learning during the half century which they cover show where the Church now stands in regard to the scientific study of the Bible.

b The chief purpose of Providentissimus Deus was to set forth and defend the Church's doctrine on the absolute truth of the inspired Scriptures. There may be scribal errors in manuscripts, the meaning of a passage may be doubtful, a translator may be at fault; but in an original Scripture, as it left the hand of the hagiographer, there can be no lapse from truth. The ancient and constant faith of the Church peremptorily disallows any restriction of inspiration to certain parts of the Bible, such, for instance, as doctrinal parts only, and equally forbids the concession that in some points—even a minor point or an obiter dictum—the sacred writer may have erred. The formula is that every Scripture is as necessarily inerrant as it is necessarily impossible that God should be the Author of error.

After laying down the principles guiding the solution of the main difficulties Pope Leo went on to insist not only on close adherence to the Catholic tradition of interpretation, but also on the use of all modern helps, and especially on the utility of up-to-date introduction, of a knowledge of biblical and other oriental languages, of the critical establishment of the true text, of the rigorous application of sound hermeneutical rules, and of the external illustration of the Bible by apposite erudition—with the proviso that the doctrinal contents of the Bible be not swamped in a flood of philology, history, archaeology and the like.

The Encyclical of Pius XII, Divino afflante Spiritu, has, like its predecessors, insisted on the doctrinal content of the Bible, and has supplemented Leo's great charter by commending the use of the scientific instruments and helps which the last half-century has placed at our disposal—helps which change the condition of biblical studies considerably. It has become increasingly easy to acquire a knowledge of oriental languages; textual criticism has become an exact art, so that the best conditions for the preparation of critical editions of the biblical texts and ancient versions seem to have come in our day; the means are at hand to bring out the literal sense with a fullness that will increasingly satisfy present-day hunger to know the word of God as it is; knowledge of the biblical environment—literatures, events, customs, cults of ancient times—has grown in a surprising way; the discovery of papyri has shed an abundance of light on the times of our Lord and the apostles; greater attention has been given to the exegesis of the Fathers of the Church; ancient oriental modes of speech, writing and narrative have been deeply studied.

In view of all this, it will be understood that the time has arrived when the Catholic Church can draw more effectively on the wealth of its exegetical tradition and at the same time apply to the Bible all the varied erudition of the present age. Through modern methods and through the study of the Fathers Pope Pius XII hopes to see realized 'that happy and fruitful combination of the learning and spiritual unction of the ancients with the greater erudition and maturer skill of the moderns, which will bring forth new fruit in the field of Sacred Scripture, a field ever fertile and never sufficiently cultivated'.

Since the publication of Providentissimus Deus many provisions have been made by ecclesiastical authority for the promotion of Bible Study. The Biblical School founded at Jerusalem by the Dominicans in 1889 has published the quarterly Revue Biblique since 1892 and has, especially through the fertile pens of the late Père J.-M. Lagrange and his colleagues, given the world the admirable series entitled Études Bibliques. The Pontifical Biblical Institute, since its foundation in 1909, has done splendid work in forming Professors; also through its scientific quarterly Biblica (since 1920), through its less technical monthly (now bi-monthly) Verbum Domini (since 1921), and its numerous other publications. It has a house in Jerusalem, in which city there is (since 1924) also a Franciscan House of higher Biblical Studies to form lecturers in Sacred Scripture for the Order.

The founding of the Biblical Commission in 1902 and the subsequent institution of biblical degrees, the programme of Bible studies ordered for Seminaries by Pius X in 1906, and the appointment of a special commission for the revision of the Vulgate (in 1914) are further evidence of the Church's solicitude for the good estate of biblical science.

(b) Modern Catholic Biblical Activity—This solicitude of the Church has not been slow in fructifying. The works and periodicals of the Pontifical Biblical Institute at Rome and of the École Biblique of Jerusalem, bear witness to the scholarly thoroughness of much recent Catholic biblical work. Pius XII takes note of this fact: 'It is not only to the regulations,

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

6f instructions and exhortations of Our Predecessors that we must ascribe the advance which has been made in the knowledge and use of the Sacred Scriptures amongst Catholics ; it is Our pleasing duty to attribute it also in no small measure to the work and labour of all those who have readily complied with these behests, by meditating on the Sacred Scriptures, by their research, writings, teaching and preaching, and by translating and circulating the Sacred Books. The higher schools of Theology and Sacred Scripture, and especially Our Pontifical Biblical Institute, have already produced and are daily producing many scriptural scholars animated by an intense enthusiasm for Holy Writ, who are enkindling the same ardent enthusiasm in the young clergy and diligently imparting to them the learning they have themselves acquired. Not a few of them have promoted and continue to promote biblical science in many ways by their writings also : publishing critical editions of the sacred texts, explaining and commenting upon them, translating them into the vernacular, making them accessible to the faithful for their devout reading and meditation, and studying and utilizing secular sciences which help the interpretation of the Scriptures', DAS 14.

g Note should also be taken of the spread of biblical associations, of the biblical congresses and biblical weeks held in various places, of the efforts which are being made to propagate the reading and meditation of the Gospel. In the English-speaking world Catholic Biblical Associations have been founded both in the United States of America and in England ; and the example of these two countries is being followed in many other parts of the world. Much remains to be done, especially in elucidating the historical side of the Bible. The deeper study of the mode of inspiration has made it more and more clear not only that the Bible is an oriental book, but also that it must be read in the light of the personal characters, the social and cultural conditions, and the contemporary circumstances of the writers whom the Holy Ghost used as living instruments. The Encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu draws attention to these aspects of modern biblical study, and it should be read in its entirety, if a true estimate is to be formed of the freedom with which Catholics can face the many problems remaining to be solved in biblical science. (See also Letter of the Biblical Commission to Cardinal Suhard, § 53i-m.)

There can never be too much of the best scholarship dedicated to the study of the Bible, but the Bible can only be satisfactorily understood and expounded by those who bring to it not only adequate scholarship but also the standpoint of revelation and the tradition of its meaning. Without this Catholic requirement the most erudite exegesis will often be at fault.

h (c) Achievement of non-Catholic Scholarship—Many earnest religious men and highly competent scholars—who have not been Catholics—have been in the stream of Catholic exegetical tradition in a measure which does honour to their Christian character. Borrowing and applying the terms of a world broadcast by Pope Pius XII on 5 Sept. 1948, to the German Catholic Congress at Mainz, we can only avow the most sincere sympathy towards the quest of those men for the truth of God in the Scriptures, and we look forward, with hope in the power of the Almighty, to the day when we shall all 'be perfect in the same mind and in the same judgement', holding the fullness of truth in the unity of that Church to which Christ entrusted his teaching, with the promise that he will be with it during all ages till the consummation of the world.

All modern Catholic exegeses are directly or indirectly indebted to the tremendous stream of non-Catholic works on biblical subjects, which flows universally over the western world, for their suggestive ideas, scholarly exegesis and broad and bold hypotheses. These when tested and examined by the touchstone of the Rule of Faith have yielded, and continue to yield, valuable lights and fresh illustration of the truth of God's Word. There is no doubt for instance that in 6h retrospect the controversy over the Wellhausenian hypothesis (now seen to be false in its main elements) has had the good effect of giving us a deeper understanding of the composition of the Pentateuch. It is in fact one of the principal duties of the Catholic exegete to cull the good essence, like the bee, from every new hypothesis and exegetical suggestion and to incorporate it into the structure of Catholic hermeneutics.

C. THE BIBLE AS THE CHURCH'S EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION

It is the teaching of the Church that the Old Testament Scriptures were transferred to her ownership by Christ himself in view of her position as the new 'Israel of God' and the heir of the OT promises ; and that the New Testament Scriptures being written within the Church by some of its members for the benefit of all (or more precisely, within the society of the Catholic Church by Catholics and for Catholics), are likewise her exclusive property, of which she is the absolute Owner, Guardian, Trustee and Interpreter. To those outside her Communion this may seem a fantastic claim, quite out of touch with reality. But as it determines the place of the Bible in the Church it is now time to examine it in some detail.

The Exclusive Owner and Trustee of Scripture—The Church, being the divinely appointed trustee of the whole deposit of revelation, holds the Scriptures as her very own. They are part of the patrimony or dowry that she has received as the Bride of Christ. This truth was fully realized by Irenaeus and Tertullian, who both had to use their pens against the heretics of their time.

Irenaeus writes : 'The proofs being so great, we ought no more to look elsewhere for the truth which it is easy to get from the Church, the Apostles having therein deposited as in a rich storehouse whatsoever belongs to the truth, so that whosoever wishes can receive from her the draught of life. She is the entrance into life ; all the others are thieves and robbers. Therefore we ought to shun them and with all diligence to love what belongs to the Church and to lay hold of the tradition of truth. What then ? Even though a dispute on some small question were to arise, would it not be the proper thing to have recourse to the ancient churches, in which the Apostles lived, and from them to take concerning the present question what is certain and clear ? And even if no Scriptures had been left us by the Apostles themselves, should we not follow the order of tradition which they delivered to those whom they set in charge of the churches ?' (Adv. Haer. 3, 4, 1, Enchir. Patr. 213). Tertullian, in a famous work (De praescriptione haereticorum 37 ; Enchir. Patr. 298), argues that heretics should not even be allowed to use the Christian Scriptures, because they no longer belong to the society which has the right of possessing those same Scriptures. These words of Irenaeus and Tertullian against heretics are exceedingly severe. They refer of course to Marcion and Valentine and to their contemporaries who were in the sin of formal heresy, and they are not strictly applicable to the ordinary non-Catholic of the present day. Formal heresy extinguishes supernatural faith and separates entirely from Christ. A formal heretic is not a Christian even though he may call himself a Christian. It is the legal aspect of this theological truth that Tertullian considers in this remarkable passage.

A phrase occurs in the dogmatic constitution Dei Filius of the Vatican Council (Sess. 3, Cap. 2. De revelatione, EB 62) which does not always receive sufficient attention : 'The Church holds (the books of the Bible) as sacred and canonical, not because, after having been composed by human industry, they afterwards received the approval of her authority, nor again because they contain revelation without error, but because having been written under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost they have God for their author and as such have been handed to the Church herself'. The italicized words bring out the point which we have been expounding. The 7d Church is, by God's donation, exclusive Owner and Trustee of the Scriptures. The Scriptures are a sacred trust in her hands. In the course of time she made a careful inventory of them, establishing from the earliest days by use and solemn declaration the full canon which was consecrated by solemn conciliar definition at the Council of Trent. She cannot and never did pretend to live her life without those divine volumes. They contain the written word of God and as such are precious letters from our Father in heaven graciously transmitted through sacred writers to his pilgrim children, providing a solace for their journey to their everlasting country (Chrys., Aug., Greg.); they are an immense treasure of heavenly teachings (Chrys., Aug.); they are perennial fountains of salvation (Athan.); they are rich meadows or delightful gardens in which the flock of Christ can find admirable pastures and delicious refreshment (Aug., Amb.). In affirming the primacy and dominion of the Church in regard to the Scriptures, we in no way detract from their unique value as a sacred patrimony of divine truth. Their singular value comes from the fact that they are not merely a source of revelation but the revealed word of God.

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

e The Guardian and Defender—Because the Bible ranks amongst the most precious jewels of her patrimony, the Church is the Bible's jealous guardian and defender. She exercises a wise vigilance over the purity of its text and sees that it does not circulate amongst her children except they take it from her hands.

8a The Church's Care for the Purity of the Bible Text—Since the Jews as a nation did not come into the Church founded by their Messiah, the Hebrew Bible soon ceased to be the usual Bible of Christian teaching. Even the Apostles who were undoubtedly acquainted with the Hebrew text mostly cite from the Greek Alexandrian version the Septuagint (LXX), which was already, to a considerable extent, the Bible of the Jewish Diaspora. From the first days after Pentecost the Septuagint apparently became the Bible of the youthful Church. We therefore have no record of the solicitude of Christian pastors for the Hebrew and Aramaic texts of the OT. These remained in the hands of the Jews, and by the disposition of providence the Semitic conservatism and rabbinical scrupulosity of early Jewish scholars have secured for those Hebrew Scriptures—those of the Palestinian canon—a conservation which on the whole is singularly satisfying. These carefully copied synagogal manuscripts were the basis of the Latin translation of some forty Old Testament books made from the Hebrew texts by St Jerome.

b The Septuagint was surrounded by diligent ecclesiastical care. As far as we know, the first critical work carried out on this pre-Christian Greek Alexandrian version was due to Origen (†254). The immense work of the Hexapla would alone be sufficient to show that the desire for a pure biblical text was alive in the Church. Two other recensions also obtained currency, that by Hesychius, who is probably the same as a known martyr of the persecution of Diocletian (c 300), and that by Lucian a priest of Antioch martyred at Nicomedia in A.D. 311. Of these recensions St Jerome says: 'Alexandria and Egypt in their Septuagint give praise to the labours of Hesychius; Constantinople even to Antioch approves the copies of Lucian; the midway provinces between these read the Palestinian codices prepared by Origen and published by Eusebius and Pamphilus', Præf. in Paral. It will be remembered, that the Hexapla, on which Origen worked for some twenty-eight years, were deposited at Caesarea of Palestine about the year 245. The 'threefold variety' just mentioned was, no doubt, somewhat confusing, but each Church showed its solicitude to possess a pure form of biblical text. The western churches read the Scriptures in Greek till about the end of the 2nd cent. Two or more complete Latin versions seem to have been already in use by the middle of the 3rd cent. There were also innumerable versions of individual books. Their fidelity to the LXX was so great as to be almost servile, but from an exegetical point of view they were often very poor translations. To remedy this defect and the mistakes of copyists bishops were not inactive. Augustine was very concerned about choosing a version which adhered as closely as possible to the words of the LXX and, at the same time, gave a clear sense. His view of the necessity of emending current copies is expressed emphatically: 'The emendation of codices must be the first object of vigilant care on the part of those who desire to know the Scriptures, that those not emended should give place to emended copies' (De Doct. Christ. 2, 21).

St Jerome (†420), commissioned and supported by Pope Damasus, was the man of providence to give the Latin Church a splendid version of the Scriptures. Whatever defects the Vulgate may have, it is a masterly and majestic version. Its long use by the Roman Church, Mother and Mistress of all the churches, has given this translation a unique consecration. Care for the purity of its text has at intervals up to our own day given rise to critical revisions. There were almost unblemished copies of it in existence at the beginning of the 8th cent., as the great Codex Amiatinus shows, and in the 9th cent. the Alcuinian recension provided Charlemagne's empire with a very pure text. Less extensive emendation was carried out in the 11th cent. by Peter Damian and Lanfranc.

The Vulgate was the first book to be printed. It came from Gutenberg's own press at Mainz about 1452, and about 100 editions had appeared before 1500. Critical endeavours, which properly began only with the Complutensian Polyglot and were continued in the Hittorpien editions at Cologne and the Stephanic at Paris, led to the making and multiplication of new Latin versions. Here the Council of Trent intervened, choosing the Vg as the official Latin version and proclaiming its juridical authenticity (cf. § 22f).

The official Clementine edition of 1592 being inadequate, the work of preparing a critical edition of the Vg has been in the hands of a special Benedictine Commission since 1907, and since 1933 has become the special work of the Monastery of St Jerome in Rome. The task of the monks is to restore the text of St Jerome, as far as that is possible.

The foregoing summary, together with the fact that the excellent Sixtine edition of the LXX published in 1586 remained the received Septuagintal text for centuries, will show sufficiently the solicitude of the Church in providing correct copies of the Bible. Further critical work of the most modern kind has been encouraged by the Encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu of Sept. 30, 1943. In particular a new Latin translation of the Psalms and Canticles from the Hebrew for use in the Roman Breviary has been prepared by the Pontifical Biblical Institute (Liber Psalmorum cum Canticis Romani Breviarii, Rome 1945).

The Church the Sole Interpreter of the Bible—The Bible is a human book written by men according to current human modes of literary expression, and intended to be understood according to the rules of contemporary human language. Under this aspect the Bible is subject to all the laws of rational interpretation. There is, however, another aspect of the Bible. If it were merely a human book, philological and historical scholarship would suffice to discover and set forth its meaning. But the Bible is more than a human book; it is a divine book having God for its author. God produced it by giving the supernatural charisma of inspiration to certain writers, and willed their inspired writings to belong to the deposit of truth which is the teaching Church's spiritual patrimony, to be administered by her for the religious enlightenment and eternal salvation of souls. The Church is, therefore, the supreme interpreter of the sacred volumes.

We must, however, understand this in its proper sense. Some non-Catholic works convey the idea

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

9b that Catholic biblical scholars are entirely ruled by a teaching authority which is conceived as a sort of governmental machine for giving ready decisions and imposing them under threat of censure. The teaching Church—namely, the Pope and Bishops—is represented as holding the sense of every passage of the Bible ready, as it were, in scrinio pectoris, so that ecclesiastical interpretation is comparable to a ready-reckoner. According to this absurd view, in order to discover the meaning of a text all one need do is to find out how the local Ordinary, or the Bishops of a province, or the Pope or his representatives understand it; and there can be no departure from the fixed formulæ.

c Now it is quite true that the Church has occasionally forbidden all further controversy for a time on a disputed point, e.g. on the nature of efficacious grace in the 17th cent., when so much dust was raised and heat generated that the Church thought it necessary to allow the air to clear before permitting the resumption of the discussion. Similarly at the time of the Modernist Movement within the Church at the beginning of the 20th cent., the situation was so grave that the Biblical Commission, in the interests of Catholic scholars themselves as well as of the Church, had to undertake the delicate task of laying down the boundaries of biblical orthodoxy without killing the spirit of inquiry. Whatever some people may have felt at the time, the wisdom of their decisions has been proved beyond all doubt, (a) by the fact that the spirit of inquiry among Catholics after being warned off a false scent and momentarily checked, has resumed the main path with extraordinary success; (b) by the fact that the extremist theories current fifty years ago have now become obsolete and that there has been a general return all along the line towards the Catholic and orthodox position, a movement that is still in full swing.

d An interesting example of how the decision of authority may fruitfully lead an open-minded scholar to change his views is provided by the late Abbot Chapman in his Matthew, Mark and Luke, London, 1937. He originally accepted the Two-document Hypothesis, but after its definite rejection by the Biblical Commission (26 June 1912), he determined to review the whole Synoptic problem anew, with the result that he came eventually to the full acceptance of the traditional view of the priority of the Greek Matthew over Mark. His scientific exposition of the old tradition is gradually winning its way to acceptance by scholars, and only one who never knew the Abbot would dare to assert that his change of view was lacking in sincerity or tinged by self-deception (cf. §§ 610-15).

People outside the Church forget that because she is 'the pillar and ground of truth' she can afford to wait a few years or a few decades or even a few centuries in order to form an unbiased judgement. For she will never in any event relinquish the known truth for the sake of a passing fashion or some novelty. They also, quite naturally perhaps, fail to realize how fortunate Catholic scholars are in having an authority to point out the pitfalls of the fashionable folly of the moment, and to recommend suspension of judgement when the data are insufficient to justify a definite opinion.

We therefore see that the real purpose of the Biblical Commission is to afford true guidance to the scholar in doubt, without cramping the ardour of genuine scholarship, and Catholics are profoundly grateful to Pope Leo XIII for instituting it (cf. also §§ 47-53).

e Certainly the Church has no mechanical method of exegesis, and it would be wrong to regard her as a sort of studious professor of exegesis. She teaches faith and morals out of the two founts of revelation by acts of her ordinary every-day magisterium and sometimes by extraordinary acts of her solemn magisterium. Her judgement on the sense of scriptural texts relating to faith and morals has to mature under the guidance and working of the Holy Spirit, and this happens through the devout study which her Fathers and Doctors and theologians have given and give to the Sacred Page. Authoritative ecclesiastical judgement is given only when the situation is clarified.

f The teaching of the Church on her own scriptural magisterium is clearly stated in the Encyclical Providentissimus Deus: 'It must be recognized that the sacred writings are wrapped in a certain religious obscurity, so that no one can enter their precincts without a guide. This is God's own arrangement (as the holy Fathers often tell us) in order to compel men to search the Scriptures with more ardent desire and with more earnest study. What is thus obtained from the Scriptures by laborious application will be more deeply impressed on the mind and heart. But God wills men above all to understand that he has delivered the Scriptures to the Church, so that in reading and using his sacred word they must follow the Church as their most certain guide and teacher. From early times St Irenæus taught that where the charismata of the Lord are found, there the truth is to be learned; and it is, he says, by those with whom apostolic succession resides that Scripture is expounded without fear of error. This teaching of Irenæus and of the other Fathers the Vatican Council made its own, when, renewing the decree of Trent on the interpretation of the written word of God, it declared the following to be its mind: "In matters of faith and morals which belong to the building up of Christian doctrine, that sense is to be considered the true sense of Sacred Scripture which our Holy Mother the Church has held and holds. It is her prerogative to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures. Consequently no one is permitted to interpret Sacred Scripture contrary to this sense or contrary to the unanimous consent of the Fathers"' (EB 93).

g Pope Leo adds that this wise law of the Church puts no trammels on biblical science. It is really to its advantage, for it preserves from error and helps it on the way of true progress. The field open before the private scholar is exceedingly wide. He has plenty of scope for his industry, and, while he himself is helped by the Church, he can help her. There are innumerable scriptural passages which have not yet received a certain and final exposition. Here private investigation may serve as an instrument of God's providence. It is in general only after long preparation of study on the part of her members that the judgement of the Church matures. Where the Church has already defined the sense of a passage, the private interpreter can employ himself with equal fruitfulness by setting the ecclesiastical exposition more clearly before the faithful, giving it the support of learning, or defending it from hostile attacks (EB 94).

h Freedom of Research—There is no freedom to pursue falsehood, but in devotedness to truth the liberty of Catholic exegesis is the full freedom of the children of God. Pope Pius XII made this admirably clear in the Encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu. His Holiness points out that biblical scholars must not be treated with suspicion when they face difficulties valiantly in their efforts to find interpretations consonant with the teachings of the Church and in harmony with the certain conclusions of the secular sciences. Indiscreetly zealous critics of those hard working labourers in the Vineyard should remember 'that the rules and laws laid down by the Church are concerned with the doctrine of faith and morals; that among the many matters set forth in the legal, historical, sapiential and prophetic books of the Bible there are only a few whose sense has been declared by the authority of the Church, and equally few concerning which the opinion of the Holy Fathers is unanimous. There consequently remain important matters, in the explanation of which the sagacity and ingenuity of Catholic interpreters can and ought to be freely exercised, so that each in the measure of his powers may contribute to the common good, to the ever-greater advancement of sacred learning, and to the defence and honour of the Church', AAS, xxxv (1943) 319.

D. APPENDIX ON BIBLE CIRCULATION

10a Vigilance over Bible Circulation—The guardianship of the Church also provides that the Bible shall circulate amongst her children only under her supervision. Her attitude is clearly discernible in her legislation. She has enacted in her canon law that books of Sacred Scripture or notes or commentaries on such books must not be published even by laymen without ecclesiastical permission. This prohibition refers also to books that have to do with Scripture or theology (Codex Juris Canonici can. 1385).

Translations of the Sacred Scriptures into vernacular languages may not be printed, unless they are approved by the Apostolic See, or published under the vigilance of the Bishops, and unless they carry notes taken from Catholic sources, especially from the Fathers of the Church and from learned Catholic writers (can. 1391).

Hence, editions of the original text and of the ancient Catholic versions, even those of the Oriental Church, if published by non-Catholics, are thereby forbidden; likewise translations of Scripture into any language made or published by non-Catholics (can. 1399).

The use of non-Catholic editions of ancient Catholic versions and also of non-Catholic translations and of versions published without approval or notes is, however, permitted to those who devote themselves in any way to theological or biblical studies, provided that the said books are edited with fidelity and integrity, no dogma of Catholic faith being impugned either in their prolegomena or notes (can. 1400), cf. § 4f. Canon 2318, 2 subjects to the penalty of excommunication (not reserved) Catholic authors and publishers who cause books of the sacred Scriptures, or notes and commentaries on them to be printed without due licence.

In these days of armed neutrality and ideological propaganda there are few who doubt the wisdom of a wise censorship. And just as in the world of commerce big business enterprises employ trademarks and special signs to indicate the high quality of their goods, so for Catholics the Imprimatur of a bishop on the frontispiece of a Bible is a guarantee that the text provided is the official—and therefore the authentic—text.

b Is Bible Reading Necessary for Salvation?—Undoubtedly the Divine Scriptures have been given to the whole Church and to all the children of the Church for their instruction. The Bible is certainly an ordinary and universal means of instruction, but at the same time there is no universal precept, either divine or apostolic, that all the faithful—every man, woman and child—should personally read the Bible. Heaven is open to illiterates. It is the doctrine of the Bible that matters, not knowledge of the letter. Those who teach religion—the pastors of the Church—should know the Book, but the faithful may, according to circumstances, know and live the faith which the Bible teaches without having spelled one sentence of its pages. Even in this present age of paper and of printing numberless Catholics live admirable and even sublime lives of faith, hope and charity without any direct reading of Holy Writ. They nourish their minds with the substance of the Bible through the liturgy of the Mass, through the mysteries of the Rosary, through the prayers which they know by heart, and through the sermons which they hear. Just as in countries which have an old traditional culture illiterate peasants can have an exquisite refinement of soul and manners, so also bookless peasants who have lived in the stream of Christian tradition can have all the grasp of faith and right living which are necessary for any, even the highest, degree of sanctity (cf. § 31).

This is not a defence of illiteracy, but a warning against exaggerations. Self-instruction through reading must always be built on a basis of oral instruction received in the home, the school and the Church. The extent to which this supplementary aid can be used will depend on the available supply of books and on the ability of persons to read them fruitfully. Now these two things have varied considerably at various times. Some knowledge of this variation of conditions—varying book facilities and varying spread of education—is necessary, in order to understand the wise providence of the Church in regard to the Bible at different times. We must also keep in mind that whenever or wherever reading endangers the purity of Christian thought and living—the unum necessarium—it has to be wisely restricted.

The foregoing considerations will help us to view the Church's prohibition of non-Catholic Bibles not as obscurantist and tyrannical oppression, but as a reasonable measure justified by the circumstances.

The Church prevents any such circulation of the Bible amongst her children as is carried on under the pretence of false freedom and with the suggestion of the right of private interpretation. It was this duty of her guardianship that caused the Holy See to condemn the Bible Societies in the 19th cent., as she had condemned their forerunners since the end of the 12th.

The first known measure of this kind is found in two letters of Innocent III to the Church of Metz. They were written at the end of the 12th cent. with reference to a conventicle of men and women who (most probably under Albigensian or Waldensian influences) had several parts of the New Testament and the Moralia of St Gregory translated into French. In clandestine meetings these lay folk, men and women, read and discussed the said writings, and showed contempt for the reprimands of their pastors, who evidently regarded their practices as dangerous or schismatic. The Pope ordered a diligent inquiry to be made into the aims of the group, but gave instructions that kindness was to be used towards them in the meantime, in the hope of bringing them to a better mind.

We do not know the sequel of this case, but a Provincial Synod of Toulouse in 1229 prohibited the use of vernacular Scriptures to the laity. The motive of this enactment is plain enough considering that it was made, as it were, in the very heart of Albigensian territory. A very similar decree was issued in the 15th cent. (1408) by a Council of Oxford held under the presidency of Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury. It was occasioned by the insubordinate Bible activities of Wyclif and his disciples, and prohibited vernacular translations of the Scriptures, except such as were approved by the diocesan Bishop or by a Provincial Council. There was no question of suppressing vernacular versions as such.

By their fruits they are known. Bible study which produces or propagates heresy is a bad thing. In fact, as St Augustine noted, 'heresies have not arisen except when the good Scriptures were not well understood, and what was not well understood in them was rashly and boldly asserted', In Jo. Tr. 18, 1. The circumstances of the times have always to be taken into account, and laws which today seem severe must be judged accordingly. Thus we find that the legislation which obtained under civil authority against vernacular Scriptures in Spain from James I of Aragon to Ferdinand and Isabella (1276–1516) served in no small measure to preserve a Catholic country from the ravages of heresy. Through Luther, although Calvin seems to have been the first to announce Monobiblicism clearly, the Bible became the arm of the Protestant revolt. A dumb and difficult book was substituted for the living voice of the Church, in order that each one should be able to make for himself the religion which suited his feelings. And the Bible open before every literate man and woman to interpret for themselves was the attractive bait used to win adherents. Not the solid rock of truth but the shifting sand of private interpretation is the foundation on which Protestantism was built. It is no wonder then that the Council of Trent drew up censorship regulations, later codified in the 3rd and 4th rules of the Index of 1564.

The utility and necessity of universal Bible-reading

PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN THE CHURCH

10d was also advocated at the end of the 17th cent. by the Jansenist Paschase Quesnel, but his extreme views, in the sense in which he proposed them, were rejected in the condemnation of 101 of his propositions by the dogmatic constitution Unigenitus of Clement XI (8 Sept. 1713). Seven of these propositions (79-85; Dz 1429-35) refer to Bible reading. The views of Quesnel survived in Jansenistic circles and were again condemned, after they had been formulated by the Synod of Pistoia, in the Bull Auctorem fidei of Pius VI (28 Aug. 1794; Prop. 67, Dz 1567).

6 Protestant Bible Societies—Within the past two hundred years the Church has from time to time had to take action to protect the faithful from the activities of certain Protestant societies publishing and disseminating indiscriminately copies of the Bible without note or comment. The dangerous fallacy underlying their activity is that of the 'private interpretation' of the Scripture, a principle whose falsity is demonstrated by the infinite and absurd variety of doctrine and opinion wherever it has flourished. Not infrequently also the Sacred Book has been used as an instrument of proselytism against the Catholic Church in Catholic countries.

In condemning these Societies and the principles on which their activities are based the Church is not condemning Bible reading under proper conditions, as we have already noted above, §§ 2, 3, 5.

f The history of the Bible Societies, which is a long one, can only be lightly touched here, for we are only interested in the action of the Holy See in their regard. German Pietism had prepared the way for them. Before 1800 the Bibelanstalt founded in 1710 by Baron von Canstein at Halle had distributed 33,000,000 Bibles or parts of the Bible. Before the end of the 18th cent. the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (SPCK) and the Religious Tract Society were propagating the Bible from London. But the first Bible Society of world-wide scope and organization was the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) founded at London, 7 March 1804. On its model and with its support a number of similar societies sprang into life in Germany, one of which (founded in 1813) is well known internationally, namely, the Württemberg. Bibelanstalt which in recent times has published the various editions of Nestle's NT, Kittel's Hebrew Bible, and Rahlfs's Septuagint.

Between 1812 and 1815 two Bible enthusiasts, Paterson and Pinkerton, agents of the BFBS, had 10f toured the whole of northern Europe, initiating the establishment of Bible centres in many cities of Scandinavia, Holland, Germany, Finland and Russia. It was after this invasion of Bible Society activities that the Holy See took action.

g The first papal document is a letter of Pius VII to Ignatius Raczyński, Archbishop of Gnesen in Poland, dated 29 June 1816. This prelate had denounced the work of the Bible sectaries who had been dishonestly disseminating the Polish Catholic version of the Jesuit, James Wujek, without note or comment. In praising the Archbishop the Pope recalls the above-mentioned rules of the Index of 1564 and the decree of the Index issued under Benedict XIV, 13 June 1757, allowing to Catholics only the use of vernacular versions approved by the Holy See or published with notes taken from the Holy Fathers or learned Catholic interpreters.

On 3 Sept. of the same year, 1816, Pius VII sent a severe letter to Stanislaus Siestrzeniewicz-Bohusz, Archbishop of Mohilev, who had approved the propagation of the forbidden versions in his diocese. The Archbishop was neither very Catholic nor very zealous, but a rather unripe convert from Calvinism and a creature of the Empress Catherine II. The Pope explained the Catholic position at considerable length and demanded that the Archbishop should repair the scandal which he had caused.

The other documents where the Bible Societies are mentioned in the same condemnatory terms are the Encyclicals of Leo XII Ubi primum (5 May 1824), of Pius VIII (24 May 1829), of Gregory XVI Inter præcipuos (6 May 1844), the Syllabus of Pius IX (8 Dec. 1864), and the Constitution Officiorum et munerum of Leo XIII (15 Jan. 1897).

h Admiration for the beautiful and often very useful publications of the Bible Societies must not prevent us from seeing the wisdom of this ecclesiastical attitude. Ancient versions faithfully edited and vernacular versions that are serviceable the Church freely allows to theological or biblical students, but she forbids the faithful generally to take, keep or use the versions of the Bible Societies, because their fundamental intention is to offer the Bible to all in disregard of the laws which the Church has made to keep her members from error. The Church is uncompromising in her guardianship of the truth and she wisely withholds from her children an excessive religious liberty which would lead them into unwholesome pastures.

THE FORMATION AND HISTORY OF THE CANON (OT AND NT)

By R. J. FOSTER

11a Bibliography—S. M. Zarb, O.P., Historia Canonis Utriusque Testamenti, Rome (Angelicum), 1934; M. J. Lagrange, O.P., Histoire Ancienne du Canon du Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1933; Initiation Biblique (ed. A. Robert and A. Tricot), Paris, 1939; H. Pope, O.P., CSAB, vols 1 and 4 London, 1926¹ and 1931; J. E. Steinmueller, A Companion to Scripture Studies, New York, vol. 1, 1941; J. H. Newman, Development of Christian Doctrine, London, 1897¹⁰; *B. F. Westcott, A General Survey of the Canon N.T., London, 1896⁷; *H. E. Ryle, The Canon of the Old Testament, London, 1892; *A. Rahlfs, Septuaginta, Stuttgart, 1935; *F. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient MSS, London, 1939⁶; Art. in DTC 2, 1550 ff., DBV 2, 134 ff., CE 3, 267 ff., HDB 3, 604 ff.

b Inspiration—Catholics have never admitted that the inspiration of a book can be judged by its effects upon the mind and heart of the reader. Inspiration is one thing, the power of inspiring is another, depending, as it must, upon the peculiar dispositions of the reader at the time of reading. We shall see later (§§ 34–38) that the inspired books are those which have God for their author. Before, however, we discuss the nature of Inspiration we will first consider the practical but kindred questions: which are the inspired books, what is their number, how do we know that they alone are inspired, why does the Catholic Bible differ from and contain more books than the Protestant Bible? (cf. 13a ff.; 15d). All these questions lie within the scope of the present article, for the Canon of Scripture is precisely the list or collection of books which are inspired.

c Meaning of Canon—The Greek word which gives us the word Canon primarily signified a rod or bar, and so came to mean a measuring rod. Then it was used metaphorically for any rule or standard of excellence in art or literature—thus the ancient Greek authors were called canons (Kanones)—or for a rule of conduct, as by St Paul, Gal 6:16. Similarly, the rules, decisions and decrees, enacted by the Church to be the standard of doctrine, discipline and worship, were called canons, and, for a like reason, men talked of the 'Canon of Scripture' or of the 'Canonical Scriptures', because they contained the rule or standard of faith and morals. But this is not the sense in which the phrase 'Canon of Scripture' is commonly used. The word Canon was also used of lists or catalogues, of persons or objects to serve as a rule for distinguishing one from the other (cf. H. Stephanus, Thesaurus Graecae Linguae, London, 1823¹, 5, 4762). For example, Ptolemy's Canon of Kings, compiled in the 2nd cent. A.D., is a list of Babylonian, Persian, Greek and Roman kings with the length of their reigns (cf. Cambridge Ancient History, 1, 149; A. Deimel, S. J., Vetus Testamenti Chronologia, Rome, 1912, pp 25 ff.). The term 'Canon of Scripture' might possibly have been used originally in this sense.

However the common understanding of the term is that it denotes the collection or list of books acknowledged and accepted by the Church as inspired. i.e. Canon is taken in the passive sense of the books conforming to the 'rule' for their acceptance as inspired works. In which case the list or catalogue would serve to distinguish the sacred from the profane writings. Similarly books are said to be 'canonical' or 'canonized' when they form part of the Canon. The earliest certain evidence of this usage is from the works of St Athanasius (c 350), although there are some who believe (from indications in Latin versions of his works) that it was used much earlier by Origen (†254). This scriptural Canon comprises the OT and NT, and it is the purpose of the present article to trace the formation and history of both.

THE OT CANON

Its Contents—Both for purpose of reference and the sake of clarity it might be well at the outset to name the present Catholic Canon of the books of the OT. They are, in the order in which they occur in the Vulgate, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Josue, Judges, Ruth, four Books of Kings (the first two are also called 1 and 2 Samuel), 1 and 2 Paralipomenon (or Chronicles), 1 and 2 Esdras (the second also known as Nehemias), Tobias, Judith, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticle of Canticles, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus (Sirach), Isaias, Jeremias, Lamentations, Baruch, Ezechiel, Daniel, 12 Minor Prophets, 1 and 2 Maccabees. To anyone comparing this list with the Protestant OT, it will be apparent that the latter is shorter and does not contain several books referred to as the Deuterocanonical Books, viz. Tob, Jdt, Wis, Eccclus, Bar, 1 & 2 Mac, and certain parts of Esther and Daniel, viz. Est 10:4–16:24; Dan 3:24–90; chh 13 & 14. These were found in the Greek Bible adopted by the Church but not in the Palestinian Canon as fixed in post-Christian times, which was the one eventually adopted by the Protestants. The Protocanonical Books, which form the Protestant Canon, therefore consist of the full list of the Catholic Canon given above, less the seven Deuterocanonical Books; Esther and Daniel count as Protocanonical, though each has its deuterocanonical portion. But a further and fuller discussion of this important question can be given only in the light of the gradual formation and definition of the OT Canon.

FORMATION OF THE OT CANON

Esdras and the Great Synagogue—Nowhere in the Bible do we find a description of the formation of the OT Canon, nor even a list of the books comprising it. The whole question is, therefore, largely one of inference from the evidence available, and the view adopted will depend inevitably upon the date and authorship assigned to the individual books of the Canon. Here we presuppose what is treated in the Special Introductions (e.g. the question of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch). For a long time the opinion was current amongst the Jews that the formation and fixing of the Canon was the work of Esdras. It was supposed that Esdras gave it its final form and that no books written after his death were accepted as canonical. The origin of the ascription of this role to Esdras may be traced back to 4 Esd 14:42 ff. (c A.D. 95) where we are told that Esdras dictated ninety-four books (there are variant readings of the number), some of which were for the worthy and unworthy to read, and seventy for the wise only. This work is neither inspired nor authentic, and the story lacks foundation. It is 11c true that Esdras played a prominent part in the re-establishment of the observance of the law, but the formation of the Canon was not his work. A later form of the story was set forth in the 16th cent. by the Jewish scholar, Elias Levita, according to whom the Canon was completed by a body of men known as the Great Synagogue, over whom Esdras at one time presided. This suggestion also lacks any solid foundation in Jewish tradition, and to-day it is doubted whether there ever was such a body as the Great Synagogue, in the sense of a permanent body wielding authority. Everything seems to depend upon 2 Esd. 8-10, where, certainly, we read of a great meeting at Jerusalem, which subscribed to the covenant to observe the Law, but where there is nothing to show that it was an authoritative commission (cf. *W. Robertson Smith, The OT in the Jewish Church, 1892^a, pp 168 f.).

f The Beginnings of a Canon—The formation of the OT Canon must have been gradual, spread over the long course of Israel's history from the time of Moses until the Christian era. Several passages in the earlier OT books point to the beginning and gradual increase of a collection of books held in special esteem (cf. CSAB 1, 129 ff.; 134 ff.). We read that Moses, at God's command, began to write and that he intended his writings to be a permanent record and guide to the Chosen People, cf. Deut 31:9-13, and Ex 17:14, where he is told to 'write this for a memorial in the book (bassêper)', its singular character being emphasized by Moses' command to 'put it in the side of the ark that it may be there for a testimony against thee', Deut 31:26. Inspiration did not cease with Moses, nor was it to be limited to his writings, but was to continue through the successive ages (cf. Heb 1:1). His successors in the leadership of Israel seem to have added to his work, and, as it were, continued it, e.g. Josue (Jos 24:26) and Samuel (1 Kgs 10:25).

Further Development—Later on, there is evidence of another collection of sacred writings, including those of David and Asaph, the Seer, in official use for the praise of God (2 Par 29:30) and of the industry of the scribes of Ezechias in preserving the proverbs of Solomon, Prov 25:1. Moreover, it was to be expected that the prophets, who were so largely responsible for the spiritual welfare and development of Israel, should leave some record of their teaching and prophecy; and of this, too, there are several indications (Jer 36:4, 32; Zach 7:12). Already the nucleus of the later Jewish division of the OT, the Law, Prophets and Writings, is beginning to appear. By the time of the writing of the Prophecy of Daniel, some sort of recognized collection of sacred writings was in existence, for the writer referred to 'the books', Hasspârim (Dan 9:2), which was to become the most frequent designation for the whole collection of biblical writings (cf. JE 3, 140). This does not, however, mean that the collection was either complete or final.

12a The Threefold Division of the OT—A further indication of the tendency to group the sacred writings into some definite form is to be found in the threefold division of the Hebrew Bible, the Law, the Prophets and the Writings. The author of Eccles seems to have known this division (cf. Eccles 46-49; 44:5; 47:8-9, 17) and his grandson, who translated the book into Greek c 130 B.C., mentions it three times in his prologue. It may also be implied in our Lord's words after the Resurrection: 'All things must needs be fulfilled which are written in the Law of Moses and in the prophets and in the psalms, concerning me', Lk 24:44.

b The Law—The first collection comprised the five books of Moses or the Pentateuch; it was certainly the oldest part of the Canon, and its sacred character and the high esteem in which it was held early in Jewish history is illustrated by its close association with the ark of the covenant (cf. supra). In 621, in the reign of Josias, an historic event of some importance occurred, when the 'Book of the Law' was discovered in the house of God. Whether this was the whole Pentateuch or only Deuteronomy, it is clear that there was attached to it a special authority as containing God's law for Israel. During the exile the written word acquired a new significance and a more prominent place in the life of the nation. After their return its authority was still maintained, and it was solemnly and publicly read by Esdras to the people, who in turn pledged themselves to live up to its requirements (cf. 2 Esd 8 ff.). From then onwards it was read in the synagogues of Palestine and in the Diaspora, studied and copied by scribes, accepted by the Samaritans and, most important of all, translated into Greek for the benefit of the Jewish community at Alexandria.

The Prophets—This second section is divided into the 'Earlier' Prophets (Jos, Jg, Kgs) and the 'Later' Prophets. The former are really historical books, and form a natural sequence to the Pentateuch, but the reason why they are grouped together with the Prophets is either because they relate the lives and teaching of several of the Prophets (Samuel, Nathan, Elias, Eliseus, Isaías and others), or because they were supposed to have been written by prophets (cf. Josephus c Apion 1:8). These books, together with those written by prophets, sometimes at God's express bidding (Is 30:8; 34:16; Jer 30:2), were probably recognized as sacred in character within a short space of time and quite independently of their being assigned to any particular collection of rolls.

The factor which shaped this collection was, according to some writers, the synagogue liturgy and worship (cf. S. M. Zarb, O.P., De Historia Canonis Utriusque Testamenti, 1934^a, pp 98 f.). The Pentateuch had been divided into sections so that the whole could be read publicly in a definite period of time. For some time the Pentateuch alone was used in this way, but later it was decided to illustrate the Pentateuch by passages selected from other sacred books. These in turn were, by this means, linked together and gradually formed the second collection of the Canon which was probably complete by 200 B.C.

The Writings—The third group is composite in character and seems to have been made up of smaller collections. It is hard to discover any unifying principle. It was certainly in process of formation when the prologue of Eccles was written (c 130 B.C.) and its limits remained undefined and uncertain even after the beginning of the Christian era.

While this threefold division cannot account for the formation of the OT Canon, since many of the books were recognized as sacred and canonical before they were assigned to any of the three groups, it does throw light on the clearer delineation of the extent of the Canon. Though we cannot decide too categorically in such a matter, the suggestion made by Steinmueller, A Companion to Scripture Studies, I p 68, may correspond to the facts: 'The threefold division is not based upon three different degrees of inspiration, nor upon a distinction between the prophetic office and the prophetic gifts, nor upon three stages in the religious development of the people (monotheism, prophetism and Judaism), but upon three different aspects in the evolution of synagogal liturgy'.

Summary of Process of Formation—The process of formation, then, may have been somewhat as follows. The Law, the foundation of the Scriptures, would have been naturally recognized and declared sacred by the religious leaders of the people, by prophet and priest, though not necessarily by any formal process. Gradually other writings were accepted, under their guidance, because they assured the practice of the Law, were regarded almost as its continuance, or were written by men imbued with the Spirit of God. Later on this tradition, in process of formation, would crystallize under the influence of the synagogue liturgy and the scribes, until at last, towards the close of the pre-Christian era, the collection of sacred writings came to be regarded more and more as a perfect whole,

FORMATION AND HISTORY OF THE CANON

12a whose content should not be modified. After the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 the Pharisees, anxious to preserve all they could of the past, and above all the sacred writings, affirmed their list of sacred writings at the Synod of Jamnia, c. A.D. 90-100. Discussions regarding the canonicity of some books, however, continued even during the 2nd cent. (cf. infra §§ 13 f.).

OT CANON IN PALESTINE AND ALEXANDRIA

13a Protocanonical and Deuterocanonical Books—The picture is as yet by no means complete. We must remember that besides the Palestinian Jews, there was a large flourishing community of Greek-speaking Jews, whose principal centre was at Alexandria. These Jews played a most important and far-reaching part in the history of the Canon, because their practice differed from that of Palestine. It was for their benefit that the Greek translation of the Scriptures known as the Septuagint (LXX) was made, which contained together with the books found in the present Hebrew Bible additional books and passages now known as deuterocanonical books and passages.

b In view of the important place these parts of the Bible occupy in the succeeding pages and discussion, we ought to consider the meaning of the phrase a little more carefully before proceeding further. All the books found in the Hebrew Bible are called protocanonical, those found only in the Greek are called deuterocanonical. These phrases were first used by Sixtus of Siena, in 1566, protocanonical denoting those books whose inspired character had always been accepted, and deuterocanonical denoting those whose inspiration was recognized throughout the Universal Church after it had been doubted in some places, and which consequently came to occupy, in point of time, the second place in the Canon. Anglicans always refer to the deuterocanonical books as the Apocrypha, and in their Bibles they are printed separately under that heading, though nonconformist Bibles omit these altogether in accordance with the general Protestant rejection of them. Confusion may easily arise, unless it is borne in mind that for the Catholic apocryphal means that a work is neither inspired nor authentic, i.e. is not the work of the author to whom it is ascribed, or, if it is anonymous, does not belong to the date to which it is assigned. For the Protestant it might, according to context, have this meaning or it could refer to a deuterocanonical work. Because of the double use of the word apocryphal Catholics avoid applying it to the deuterocanonical books.

c Reason for Difference—What is the explanation of this discrepancy between the books accepted by the Palestinian and Hellenistic Jews? Some suppose that the facts prove the existence of two Canons, a shorter Palestinian one and a more extensive Alexandrian one. Others maintain that prior to the Christian era the limits of canonicity were more widely drawn, and embraced all the books of both Canons, and that later the deuterocanonical books were rejected by the application of narrow and rigid pharisaical criteria. The question is not an easy one to answer. First of all, it is unlikely that the Alexandrian Jews would go so far as to set up a different official Canon from that of Jerusalem, and, secondly, there is no trace of dissension between the communities upon this point. What is really more probable is that the Hellenistic Jews conceived a broader view of inspiration, not restricting it either to the Hebrew language or to the centuries preceding Esdras (cf. Wis 7:27), and that they used a larger number of books without troubling about whether they had received any formal sanction. In a word, then, the Alexandrians would accept books as inspired which might not be acceptable to the doctors in Jerusalem; but even in Palestine some of the deuterocanonical books seem to have been received and used before and after the Christian era, e.g. Baruch seems to have been used in the synagogues in commemorating the fall of the Holy City (cf. Apostolic Constitutions; PG 1, 896), and, according to Irenaeus and Origen, appears at one time to have been united with Jer (cf. Ad. Haer 5, 35; PG 7, 1219; Com in Ps I 12, 1084). Ecclesiasticus too was held in high esteem and was frequently quoted in rabbinical literature (cf. JE 3, 148). Similar evidence is available for the other deuterocanonical writings. Doubts and differences were reduced for the Palestinian Jews towards the end of the first century A.D. when they seem to have accepted as sacred and canonical only those books distinguished by certain characteristics. It is suggested that these were: (i) Conformity with the Law of Moses (cf. Josephus c. Apion 1:8), (ii) Antiquity, i.e. written not later than the time of Esdras (ibid.), (iii) Hebrew language (*cf. E. Schurer, A History of the Jewish People, Eng. Tr. 1898, Div 2, vol 1, p 9 f.; Div 2, vol. 2, p 81 f.), (iv) Palestinian origin, as illustrated by the attempts to place the writing of Ezechiel in Palestine (*cf. H. E. Ryle, The Canon of the OT, 1892, p 263 f.). The deuterocanonical books did not meet these strict requirements, and despite the great spiritual value of some of them and the esteem in which they had been held, they were ultimately rejected. Wis and 2 Mac, for instance, were written in Greek, Ecclesiasticus and 1 Mac after the time of Esdras, Baruch outside Palestine, the rest probably in Aramaic, both of Palestinian and non-Palestinian origin. (On the whole question, cf. Zarb, op. cit. pp 71-78.)

Closing of Palestinian Canon—Josephus and 4 Esd, towards the end of the 1st cent. A.D., give us the earliest estimates of the number of sacred books, but they do not actually name them. 4 Esd implies that the number is 24 (cf. § 11c supra, JE 3, 142); Josephus gives it as 22, which is probably an artificial modification suggested by the letters of the Hebrew alphabet and obtained by joining Ru to Jg and Lam to Jer (cf. JE 3, 151; c. Apion 1:8). He appears to leave it an open question whether there might not also be other sacred writings besides these 22: 'It is true, our history hath been written since Artaxerxes very particularly, but hath not been esteemed of the like authority with the former by our forefathers, because there hath not been an exact succession of prophets since that time', c. Apion, 1:8.

At Jamnia—At the Synod held here decisions were reached which greatly influenced the opinion of Palestinian Jewry, but in the light of the discussions which continued long after it, one would hardly be justified in holding that the Palestinian Canon was finally settled then. For various reasons objections continued to be raised against several of the protocanonical books, e.g. Prov, Ru, Est, Eccl and Cant (cf. HDB 1, 773; 3, 606 f.), which were not completely eliminated even at the end of the 2nd cent. At the same time there are signs that some at least of the deuterocanonical books found acceptance in Palestine (cf. supra, § 13c and JE 3, 148). The available evidence points to the end of the 2nd cent. as the time when the shorter Canon was virtually settled. The earliest explicit testimony which is to be found in the Talmudic treatise Baba Bathra dates back to that time. 'In the course of the 2nd cent. of the common era a fixed group of hagiographa, to which a relatively less importance was ascribed than to the prophets, was constituted. The earliest testimony as to the contents of this group is B.B., 14b' (JE 3, 153). The Canon of Jewry, then, which finally excluded the deuterocanonical books, is later than the apostolic age, after which no Christian revelation was made, and during which, therefore, the Christian Canon must have been fixed in principle.

THE OT OF THE CHURCH

The First Three Centuries—Whatever the decisions of the Pharisees at Jamnia and of the later rabbinical writers, the Christian Church was not bound by them. The only source from which she could receive the OT

14a Canon was our Lord himself or the Holy Spirit through the Apostles. By their teaching and frequent appeal to the OT Scripture as the word of God, they, as it were, consecrated its authority and stressed once again its permanent and abiding value, Mk 7:13; Rom 3:2. But, which was the OT handed on to the Church? Neither our Lord nor his Apostles have left us an explicit list of inspired OT writings, so that the answer is to be discovered by examining works of apostolic origin and tradition. From this combined evidence it may be shown that the Apostles recognized the Greek Bible, not indeed by any official decree, but rather by the use they made of it. The continuance of this same usage is witnessed in the apostolic and post-apostolic Fathers (cf. DTC 2, 1574 f.). We cannot know for certain exactly which books the Alexandrian Jews accepted, since we do not possess any Jewish MSS of the LXX, but, in view of the important part played by the OT in the conversion of the Hellenistic Jews, it is reasonable to suppose that they coincided, broadly speaking, with the books acknowledged by the Church and found in the earliest Christian MSS.

b In the NT itself there are no explicit, formal quotations from the deuterocanonical books—although one might almost claim Heb 1:3 (Wis 7:26) as an example. Referring to this passage one Protestant writer remarks: 'It is almost certain that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews adapted the phrase ἀναγνώμα τ. δόξης . . . ἀνθρώπου in 1:3 from Wis 7:26; but such an adaptation, in view of the sacredness and importance of the subject—the Divine nature of the Son of God—would seem to imply a recognition of the authority of this book. Taken in connexion with the reference to 1 Mac in ch 11, it suggests that this Alexandrian writer accepted the whole collection of the Alexandrian LXX as Scripture' (HDB 3, 609). But the absence of explicit quotation is not a conclusive argument against their acceptance, for the same also obtains in the case of several protocanonical books. There are, however, many passages which betray the influence of the disputed works: Mt 6:14 (Ecclus 28:2); Mt 27:39 ff. (Wis 2:13 ff.); Rom 1:20 ff. (Wis 13-14); Heb 11:35 (2 Mac 6:18-7:42); Jas 1:19 (Ecclus 5:13); 1 Pet 1:6 ff. (Wis 3:3 ff.). Many other instances might be cited, though with less certainty. Moreover when the OT is quoted in the NT it usually agrees with the LXX: it is said that of about 300 quotations less than 50 disagree with it.

c Furthermore, the Greek Bible was, under Divine Providence, a most powerful factor in the conversion of the world to Christianity. Since knowledge of the Greek language was widely diffused, the Apostles, their helpers and successors, found in the LXX a ready point of contact wherever a knowledge of the OT had spread. In the synagogues they could prove to the Jews of the Dispersion and their adherents that Christ had fulfilled the OT prophecies, and, gaining some success, were usually able to gather together a number of people anxious to continue their instruction in the Christian religion. It was the success thus achieved that caused the Jews to become alienated from the LXX and eventually to repudiate it (cf. *A. Rahlfs, Septuaginta, 1. p. xxiii; *F. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient MSS, 1939, pp 55 ff.).

d We must remember, as already stated, that it is only in the light of tradition that the evidence becomes conclusive, for the early Church would hardly have ventured to make use of the larger list of books and endorse it, unless this conformed to apostolic tradition and practice: yet this it has consistently done from the beginning, using all the books as equally the word of God and the source of doctrine. With the exception of Baruch which was usually added to Jer, and about the acceptance of which there can be little doubt, all the deuterocanonical writings are quoted in the apostolic and early Fathers in the same way as the rest of the sacred books. 'Thus', writes Swete, 'Clement of Rome places the story of Judith side by side with that of Esther; the Wisdom of Sirach (Ecclus) is cited by

Barnabas and the Didache, and Tobit (Tobias) by Polycarp; Clement of Alexandria and Origen appeal to Tobit and both the Wisdoms, to which Origen adds Judith. Our earliest MSS of the Greek Bible confirm the impression derived from the quotations of the earliest Christian writers'. *H. B. Swete, Introduction to OT in Greek, 1900, p 224. The witness of Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Tertullian and Cyprian is the same.

The Earliest Lists—In view of all this evidence in favour of the wider Canon in the early Church, it appears strange that the first lists of canonical books given by Christian writers should contain only the protocanonical books. The first is the one given by Melito of Sardis to Onesimus, to whom he writes: 'Having therefore gone up to the East and come to the place where these things were proclaimed and done, and having exactly learnt which are the books of the OT, I send you the list as given below'. Then follows his list, which does not include Est and the disputed books (Eus H.E. 4:26; PG 20, 395-398). The omission of Est may have been unintentional or it may be readily explained by the uncertainty felt by some Rabbis regarding its canonicity. Quite clearly, Melito is giving the Canon as he found it in Palestine, where by this time the deuterocanonical books had been rejected from the Canon. His purpose may have been polemical and his intention to give a list which the Jews would accept in controversy. It is, however, suggested by some that he himself did accept the shorter list on the authority of the Jews, and that, in so doing, he was departing from the established tradition of the Church. The second list is the one given by Origen; in this case we naturally expect to find the deuterocanonical books excluded, for he tells us that he is giving the Jewish Canon. He begins with the words: 'But be it known that there are twenty-two books according to the Hebrew tradition . . . these are the twenty-two books according to the Hebrews . . .', op. cit. 6, 25 (PG 20, 579-582). Later writers used this passage as though it represented Origen's teaching on the Canon. The contrary is borne out by his constant practice of quoting as Scripture passages found only in the Alexandrian Canon and also by his own words, when he refers to the question at issue. In his letter to Julius Africanus, for instance, he shows us the precise way in which he regarded the disputed books. Africanus had refused to accept the history of Susanna as canonical because, amongst other things, it was 'not contained in the Daniel received amongst the Jews'. The reply of Origen is interesting because he defends this and other deuterocanonical passages on the ground that the Greek Bible had been received by the Church, and adds the warning from Prov 22:28. 'It is well', he says, 'to remember the words "Thou shalt not remove the ancient landmarks which thy Fathers have set"', Ep. Afric.; PG 11, 56-60. Summing up this period, a Protestant theologian writes: 'Once more we recall that the Christian theologians of this period knew the OT only in the Greek form (known as the Septuagint) and, consequently, made no further distinction between what we call canonical books (Hebrew) and apocryphal books (Greek). They quote the latter with the same confidence as the former, with the same titles of honour, and attribute to them an equal authority founded on an equal inspiration.' *E. Reuss, Histoire du Canon des Saintes Ecritures, Strasbourg, 1863, p. 99.

The wide popularity the deuterocanonical books enjoyed in the early Church is finally shown by their use in the liturgy and from the many illustrations taken from them found in the catacombs; there are representations from Tob, Jdt, Bar, Mac and Dan 3:24 ff. (DBV 2, 155). They were made with the approval of the pastors of the Church who appreciated the value of pictures for instruction in the truths of religion. This would explain the presence of pictures from the deuterocanonical books and the absence of any from apocryphal works.

Rightly, then, it may be said that the practice of the early writers, together with the common use of the

FORMATION AND HISTORY OF THE CANON

14g books amongst the faithful, points back to a tradition coming from the Apostles themselves, who in turn received it from our Lord himself or through revelations of the Holy Spirit.

15a From the Beginning of the Fourth Century—This century introduces us to a period of confusion and uncertainty. Several factors seem to have been responsible. First of all, the appropriation of the Greek Bible by the Christians and the use made against the Jews of the Messianic prophecies as found in the LXX (especially Is 7:14) led the Jews to reject the Greek version (JE 3, 152). In consequence, the Christians in controversy were compelled to argue solely from books acknowledged as canonical by the Jews themselves (cf. St Justin Martyr, Dial. Tryph. 71; PG 6, 641-3). This in turn would lead to doubt about the divine authority of the books to be left aside.

b Secondly, the circulation of many apocryphal books (cf. §§ 92-4) bearing titles similar to genuine books of the Bible, tended to redound to the discredit of the deuterocanonical books. Sometimes these apocryphal works were quoted by the Fathers as Scripture, but at no time were any of them received by all the churches of the East and West and read with the canonical books in public services. There was a vast difference between the position enjoyed by the most favourably received apocryphal book and the deuterocanonicals, which explains why the former fell into oblivion, while the latter retained their position and continued to be used together with the protocanonical books. Nevertheless, this circulation of the apocryphal books led to a strict scrutiny of the claims of all inspired works. Many Fathers, owing to a too rigid conception of canonicity, were inclined to accept only those books recognized by the Jews, while setting aside the disputed books in a category of their own as 'useful for edification and instruction'.

c In Alexandria St Athanasius (295-373) drew up a Canon in which he recognizes only the Jewish canonical list, with the exception that he rejects Est and retains Bar, Ep. of Jer and the whole of Dan. St Cyril of Jerusalem, St Epiphanius and St Gregory Nazianzen also reject the deuterocanonical books, and Eusebius of Caesarea calls them 'antilegomena' or disputed writings. The 60th Canon of the provincial Council of Laodicea (c 360) supports their view, and, even though its authenticity has been contested, it is an ancient witness to the opinions prevalent in Asia Minor in the 4th cent. Such was the general position in the East, and to deny it is to disregard the evidence. It is, however, remarkable that these same Fathers, who in theory confine inspiration and canonicity to the Palestinian Canon, in practice highly esteem and quote as Scripture all the books of the wider Canon. In this context one might well repeat Davidson's remark: 'Surely the practical use of writings is an evidence of their canonicity as strong as theoretical opinions'. (*S. Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, 1878⁴, p 60 f.)

d Quite plainly in the case of the Eastern Fathers, however great may have been their hesitation, it did not greatly influence their practice, for in teaching the faithful and setting forth the proofs of revealed doctrine, they instinctively turned to the Greek Bible, and used indiscriminately all the books found there. They knew of a Jewish and Christian OT, and, while they had a bias towards the Jewish, they recognized the other as the one historically transmitted by the Church. Swete (loc. cit.) remarks: 'When Origen and the Greek Fathers who follow him fix the number of sacred books at twenty-two or twenty-four, they follow, not the earlier traditions of the Church, but the corrected estimate of Christian scholars who had learned it from their Jewish teachers'.

In the West the position was different and the rejection of the deuterocanonical books proved to be rather the exception. It was, of course, to be expected that the views so frequently expressed in the East should exercise some influence also in the West. Hilary of Poitiers (c 315-366), for instance, reproduces the

Canon of Origen, and Rufinus (c 345-410) will allow the disputed books to be called 'ecclesiastical' but not canonical. 15d

St Jerome and the OT Canon—Most important of all is the attitude of St Jerome (c 342-419), who, carried away by his long sojourn in Palestine and his Hebrew studies, threw the great weight of his authority against the canonicity of the deuterocanonical books. Frequently he repudiates any book not found in the Hebrew Bible; and in the famous Prologus Galeatus, preface to his translation of Kings, he states that Wis, Ecclus, Tob and Jdt are 'not in the Canon'. Unlike the other Fathers, he carried his opposition even to the extent of sometimes quoting them with the caution 'that they are not canonical', in Jonan 1, PL 25, 1119. But that is not all. His attitude is not consistent, for he does occasionally quote them as Scripture in accordance with the common practice, and so becomes an involuntary witness to their established position, Ep 65; PL 22, 624; Com. in Eccl 23, 1128; Com. in Is 24, 40. 'There is no book or fragment of the deuterocanon', says Cornely, 'which he does not use with reverence and as a divine authority', CSS 1, Introd. Generalis, Paris, 1885, p 107. Moreover towards the end of his life (c 402) he does try to justify himself to Rufinus regarding his rejection of the deuterocanonical portions of Dan and argues that he himself never really denied their inspiration, but was rather expressing 'what the Jews were accustomed to bring up against us'. Apol. contra Ruf. 11, 33; PL 23, 476. A further illustration of the established position of the wider Canon in the Church is St Jerome's admission that he translated the deuterocanonical books into Latin as a concession to the authority of the bishops, and that the Church herself had them read for the edification of the faithful (cf. Praef. in lib. Tob; PL 29, 24-25). Against those who put forward St Jerome's authority as decisive, it has been pointed out that after the decisions of the African Councils St Jerome seems to have changed his whole attitude to the deuterocanonical books: 'He would appear to have been influenced by the declarations of the Councils of Hippo and Carthage, and hence modified his opinion in his later works. In his later commentaries, for example, in that on Isaias, he quotes—as we have seen—the Deuterocanonical books as authorities, and that without hesitation. And it should be noted that his very wavering is the best proof of the Christian tradition in favour of the Deuterocanonical books; the Church has never confined herself to the authority of one doctor, and it is at least remarkable that all through St Jerome's life we have repeated ecclesiastical and patristic testimonies in favour of the canonicity of the books of the second canon', CSAB 1, 146 f.

St Augustine and the African Councils—St Augustine, for instance, simply accepts the longer Canon and affirms its contents on the authority of the Church; for him, this argument was paramount, De Doct. Christ. 8; PL 34, 41. Often he has to defend the disputed books and does so by recalling the Church's testimony. He defends the canonicity of Wis because 'it was found worthy of being read from the lector's pulpit in the Church of Christ for so long a course of years, and of being heard with the veneration due to divine authority by all Christians, from bishops even down to the lowest laity, the penitents and catechumens', Lib de Praedest. Sanctorum, c. 14; PL 44, 980.

It is quite likely that the position taken up by St Jerome was responsible for the earliest enactments of the Church which have come down to us. Reaction against his views was strong in Africa, where a list of canonical books, which included the deuterocanonicals, was drawn up at the Council of Hippo in 393, and subsequently repeated at the 3rd and 4th Councils of Carthage in 397 and 418. Appended to this decree on the contents of the Canon was a plea that their decision be sent to Rome for approval and confirmation: 'Let this also be made known to our brother and fellow priest, the holy Boniface, Bishop 15h of Rome, or to other priests of those parts, for the confirmation of this Canon; for we have learned from the Fathers that we should read these in the Church'. The explanation of this request would appear to be the desire of the African bishops to counter the widespread views and influence of St Jerome. They reaffirm tradition regarding the Canon.

1 Another official document was due to similar circumstances. St Exuperius, Bishop of Toulouse and friend of St Jerome, who had dedicated to him his commentary on Zacharias, wrote to Innocent I a formal letter asking him which were the canonical books, no doubt uneasy at his friend's defence of the shorter Canon. The Pope's reply, given in the letter Consulenti Tibi in A.D. 405 (EB 16) reaffirms the canonicity of the disputed books and the list given at Hippo a few years previously.

2 Despite these decisions, opinion remained divided in the succeeding centuries. The majority of writers seem to have accepted the deuterocanonical books as part of the Canon, but a minority, including some important names, took up the position they thought was supported by the authority of St Jerome. Even Pope St Gregory the Great inclined to this view and speaks of the disputed books as 'books which, though not canonical, are received for the edification of the Church', Lib. Mor. 19, 21; PL 76, 119. During the Middle Ages the divergence of opinion was even more pronounced, important ecclesiastical writers being found both for and against the complete authority of the full Canon. The Prologus Galeatus of St Jerome was widely known and those who accepted the views which are there expressed, reconciled their position with Church practice and Papal decrees by accepting a special dignity and authority for the deuterocanonical books and attributing to them great value for edification, though still refusing them full canonical status.

3 Decisions of the Councils—The tradition of the Church was again proclaimed at the Council of Florence (1441) in the Decree for the Jacobites, Dz 703. The Council settled the question by issuing a list of books which were inspired writings, a list identical with that of the African Councils and Innocent I. Whether because the decision of the Council was not sufficiently widely known or fully appreciated, uncertainty was not altogether dissipated; there were still some who hesitated and reserved the designation canonical for the Hebrew books alone, including the learned Cardinals Ximenes and Cajetan. In 1546 the Council of Trent repeated the decision of Florence and the books comprising the Canon were formally defined. Contrasted with this definition was the attitude of the Reformers, who, disapproving some of the doctrines which found support in the deuterocanonical books (e.g. purgatory in 2 Mac), were content to reject their authority in doctrinal matters. The Reformers were willing to admit their value as works of edification, and so they were included in many Protestant Bibles, but were placed apart under the heading 'Apocrypha'. This is practically the position adopted by the Anglican Church. The sixth of the Thirty-nine Articles reads: 'In the name of the holy Scriptures we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church'. Then follows a list of the protocanonical books. It then adds 'and other books (as Hierome saith) the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet it doth not apply them to establish any doctrine'. Though there is some discussion as to the meaning of the Article, the classic commentators regard it as equivalent to a rejection of the decision of Trent (cf. *E. J. Bicknell, A Theological Introduction to the Thirty-nine Articles, p 164; *E. C. S. Gibson, The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, p 258). Nevertheless the Anglican Church legally requires these books to be present in her Bible, and, in fact, considerable use has been made of them in her liturgy.

4 The Council of Trent formally discussed the position and status to be assigned to the disputed books. It 15i finally decided that all the books, deuterocanonical and protocanonical were inspired and were of equal authority. 'This holy Synod receives and venerates with equal devotion and reverence all the books of both the OT and NT, since the One God is the Author of both. . . ' Then follows the list which is that of Florence and Hippo. All doubts were now set at rest by the decision of the Council. This decision was reaffirmed at the Council of the Vatican in 1870.

m In the Greek Church similar fluctuations of opinion prevailed. The position adopted by the Trullan Council is obscure; it did not enumerate the separate books, but referred to older authorities, including the African Councils. It is maintained by some writers that it adopted the Roman Canon, but the evidence is not decisive. After the Reformation, the Patriarch, Cyril Lucar, favoured the doctrine of the Reformers, and upheld the old distinction between canonical and ecclesiastical books. The 'Confession of Cyril Lucar' was rejected by his successors and by the Synod of Constantinople and Jerusalem in 1672, A. Fortescue, The Orthodox Eastern Church, pp 264 ff. Since the 18th cent. the shorter Canon has again found more and more acceptance, but the matter has not been settled for the Greeks by conciliar decision.

THE NT CANON

16a Its Formation—The formation of the NT Canon was, like that of the Old, a gradual process; it was not produced all at one time as a completed whole. The writings of which it is made up were, in the first instance, separate, independent writings, called into being at different times, in different circumstances, to meet various needs. There was no intention on the part of the Apostles and their disciples of collaborating in the production of a common work to be left as a legacy. Our Lord and his Apostles were teachers rather than writers; they taught and preached the word of God, for, in St Paul's words, 'Faith cometh by hearing' (Rom 10:17). The written word was used as an additional means of spreading the gospel. We must remember that each book of the NT was issued separately and has its own history. St Paul, for instance, would write a letter to a community to meet some practical need, to give further instruction, to exhort or give warning against impending dangers. Such letters written to the different churches throughout the Empire would be interchanged between them, sometimes at the request of the Apostle himself (Col 4:16). The letters would increase in number and each community would acquire a collection of them; we can already see how the germ of a Canon arose. This small collection of books would increase as further writings, which bore the unmistakable stamp or guarantee of apostolic origin, were added to it. In the NT itself there are clear signs of such a collection, in process of formation, taking its place alongside the OT Scriptures: 'As also our most dear brother Paul, according to the wisdom given him, hath written to you: as also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are certain things hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, to their own destruction', 2 Pet 3:15 f.

b As the number of living witnesses gradually dwindled, and as the number of communities increased through the rapid spread of the faith, it became more and more apparent how valuable it would be for the instruction of future generations if there were written records of the teaching, life, death and resurrection of our Lord. These written records, or Gospels, as they came to be called, would pass from one community to another in the same way as the letters, and each community would add the new writings to its collection as soon as they came to hand. Striking evidence regarding the early circulation of the Gospel of St John, for instance, has recently been produced by the discovery

FORMATION AND HISTORY OF THE CANON

- 16b of P 52, a papyrus fragment of Jn, which comes from Egypt and is dated as belonging to the first half of the 2nd cent. (cf. *C. H. Roberts, An Unpublished Fragment of the Fourth Gospel, 1935). Collections were not made rapidly, for progress would be impeded by slowness and difficulty of communication and limited means for the multiplication of copies of writings. In fact, a considerable period of time must have elapsed before the widely scattered churches possessed all the writings in circulation. There were other difficulties too: it was, for example, sometimes hard to tell if a smaller letter, more private in character and of less important doctrine, really emanated from genuine apostolic sources. In addition, the circulation of spurious and tendentious works, claiming apostolic origin, would tend to make people wary of accepting anything which was not of proven and undoubted apostolic authority. In these circumstances, then, it is not surprising that there were several books, genuine and inspired, whose full canonical status was not universally acknowledged for a long time. These have become known to us as the deuterocanonical books of the NT (cf. § 13a, b). They are Hebrews, James, Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and the Apocalypse. But there are no differences between Catholics and Protestants regarding the books which constitute the NT Canon: they are the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, fourteen Epistles of Paul, the seven Catholic Epistles (James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2 and 3 John, Jude), and the Apocalypse.
- 17a History of the NT Canon—It is reasonable to suppose that, quite early on, the more important churches, Rome, Alexandria, Corinth, Antioch and others, would possess apostolic writings which they regarded as authoritative, though at this stage their lists might vary. Already we have seen that there is evidence in the NT of a collection of Pauline writings received as Scripture. The Apostolic Fathers further illustrate the unique place occupied by the Gospels and the writings of the Apostles. The careful line of demarcation between these writings and their own is quite noticeable. St Clement of Rome, writing to the Corinthians (c. A.D. 96), says: 'Take into your hands the epistle of the blessed Paul the Apostle. What did he write to you when the Gospel was first preached? Truly, under divine inspiration (πνευματικῶς) he wrote to you concerning himself, and Cephas, and Apollo, because even then you had formed parties among yourselves', Ep. Cor 47:1; PG 1, 305. St Ignatius of Antioch († c. 117) remarks to the Ephesians that St Paul makes mention of them in 'every epistle', a hyperbole which implies a collection of Pauline epistles of acknowledged authority, Eph 12:1; PG 5, 656. Eph 4:26 is quoted by St Polycarp (c. 70–156), together with Ps 4:5, as in the 'Scriptures', Phil 12:1; PG 5, 1014.
- b Quite apart from these explicit passages, there are many incidental references and coincidences of thought and language which betray a remarkable acquaintance with the writings of St Paul, cf. F. X. Funk, Patres Apostolici (Index Locorum SS). 'Elsewhere in the Apostolic Fathers', writes Westcott, 'there are clear traces of a knowledge of the Epistles of St Paul to the Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philipians, and 1 and 2 Timothy, of the Epistle to the Hebrews, of the Epistle of St James, the first Epistle of St Peter, and the first Epistle of St John. The allusions to the Epistles of St Paul to the Thessalonians, Colossians, to Titus and Philemon, and to 2 Peter are very uncertain; and there are, I believe, no coincidences of language with the Epistle of Jude, and 2 and 3 John', History of Canon NT, p. 48. In fact, their familiarity with the epistles is so extensive that we can hardly doubt that a collection of them was in wide circulation and commonly known.
- c There are allusions, too, to the written Gospels, although our Lord's life and teaching were still familiar from oral tradition (cf. Funk loc. cit.). Mt 22:14 is quoted by the Epistle of Barnabas (c. 100) with the Scriptural formula ὡς γέγραπται, 'as it is written', 17a 4:14 PG 2, 733. The judgement of the early writers is, therefore, clear, for they use the books as authoritative, accept them as apostolic and quote them as inspired.

The Apologists—During the succeeding period in the life of the Church when she was faced by the persecution of the Roman Empire and the attacks of heretical false brethren, the Apologists came to her aid. In their works evidence for the canonical writings is abundant. St Justin Martyr describes them as resting upon apostolic authority: 'For the Apostles', he writes, 'in the memoirs composed by them, which are called Gospels, have handed down to us what Jesus had thus enjoined upon them', 1 Apol 1, 66; PG 6, 429. These 'memoirs' were read together with the Prophets when the Christians met for worship on Sundays (1, 67), thus bearing witness to a Christian collection of writings which had taken its place alongside that of the OT. That Justin is speaking of the four Gospels which we possess today, seems to be confirmed by the work of his disciple, Tatian, who composed his Diatessaron, or harmony of the Gospels, exclusively from them. Justin also quotes the Apoc as by St John. St Denis of Corinth († c. 176), in an interesting passage, complains of heretics corrupting his writings, but consoles himself with the thought that the same is done even to the Scriptures of the Lord, Euseb, H.E. 4, 23; PG 20, 389. The heretic Marcion (c. 150) also gives direct testimony to the existence and authority of a NT Canon by drawing up one of his own, which included a mutilated Lk and ten Pauline epistles.

By the end of the 2nd cent. all the NT books were generally known and the divine character of most of them universally admitted. Irenaeus († 202), familiar with the traditions of Asia Minor, Gaul and Rome, and connected through his teachers with the close of the apostolic age, explicitly names and accepts the four canonical Gospels, rejects the claims of others which are apocryphal, quotes twelve Epistles of St Paul as Scripture, accepts the Apoc as Johannine, and makes use of the Catholic epistles (CSAB 4, 84; Adv. Haer. 3, 11; PG 7, 885). He has no reference to Phm and does not think that Heb was written by St Paul.

The witness of Tertullian in North Africa and Clement in Alexandria is the same. The former, writing against Marcion, reproves him for his treatment of the Gospels, and defends their authenticity and authority, Adv. Marcion 4, 2. He quotes all the NT books except 2 Pet, 2 and 3 Jn, but ascribes Heb to Barnabas and excludes it from Scripture. Clement quotes all the undisputed books of the NT, and, according to Eusebius, gave concise accounts of all the canonical Scriptures, not passing over the disputed books, i.e. Jude and the other Catholic Epistles, and also the Ep. Barn. and Apoc. Pet. He regarded Heb as Pauline, written in Hebrew for Hebrews, and translated into Greek by Luke, H.E. 6, 14; PG 20, 549.

The earliest list that has come down to us, though it need be by no means the earliest written, is the Muratorian Fragment (c. 200) discovered by Muratori in the Ambrosian Library, Milan, in 1740. It contains a catalogue of books which were recognized as authoritative at Rome at the end of the 2nd cent., viz. the four Gospels, the Epistles of St Paul (except Heb), two Epistles of Jn, Jude, Apoc. It omits, in addition to Heb, Jas, Epistles of Pet., and one Epistle of Jn. There also seems to be a reference to the Apoc. Pet. which 'some of us do not wish to be read in the Church'. The Pastor of Hermas is excluded because of its recent date. (Text CSAB 4, 90 ff.).

The NT part of the Chester Beatty papyri, dating back to the first half of the 3rd cent. or earlier, comprises three codices which, when complete, would have covered the whole NT, except the Pastoral and Catholic Epistles. P 45 contains parts of the four Gospels and Ac; P 46, most of the Pauline Epistles 17h with Heb in the second place; P 47, part of the Apoc.

It is generally admitted from the evidence that, from the beginning of the 3rd cent., the NT was composed essentially of the same books as our present Canon. This does not mean that there was no hesitation, discussion or examination of the claims of the deuterocanonical books; this there was, but the outcome of it all was that the writings, acknowledged as authoritative at the end of the 2nd cent., retained their status. Other writings which were held in high esteem, occasionally quoted as Scripture, and sometimes added to NT MSS., as, for instance, Ep. Clem., Pastor Herm., Ep. Barn., Didache, were excluded from the Canon. The pretensions of Marcion and the Edict of Diocletian (A.D. 303), which ordered the destruction of all sacred books, may have had some influence in furthering the final delimitation of the Canon.

i The Position of the Deuterocanonical Books—During the 3rd cent. some of the Fathers hesitated to accept some books because of doubts cast upon their authenticity. Some were short and not well known and, when their claims for full canonical status were considered, it is easy to understand that they might not be immediately conceded. Others, like the Apoc and Heb, were suspect for more positive reasons. The Apoc had been almost universally received from the earliest times but, during the 3rd cent., there was a reaction against it in the East. The occasion of the interruption of the long tradition seems to have been the use made of the Apoc to support the Millenarian heresy. It was this that led St Denis of Alexandria to examine again the claims of the book to be the work of an Apostle. He does not venture to deny its inspired character or canonicity—tradition was too strong—but the differences of style, thought and language led him to the conclusion that the fourth Gospel and the Apoc were not written by the same person. Almost inevitably doubts regarding the authorship resulted in hesitation as to its canonical authority. In the 4th cent. this hesitation is illustrated by Eusebius who strangely classes the Apoc both amongst the 'accepted' books and amongst the 'spurious' books, whereas in reality he calls in question only its authenticity. His writings are of interest because he actually undertakes to record any tradition which would throw light on the formation of the Canon (H.E. 3, 3; PG 20, 217), and gives a summary of his results

j (ibid. 3, 25; Text CSAB 4, 77 f.). The books which he here enumerates are grouped into four classes: (i) The accepted writings, viz. four Gospels, Ac, fourteen Pauline Epistles, 1 Jn, 1 Pet, and Apoc 'if it seems right'. (ii) Disputed books, but accepted by the majority, Jas, Jude, 2 Pet, 2 and 3 Jn. (iii) Spurious writings, Ac of Pl, Shepherd Herm, Apoc Pet, Ep Barn, Didache and Apoc, 'if it seem right. This last, as I said, is rejected by some, others place it among the accepted writings'. (iv) Various heretical gospels and acts which are to be wholly rejected. In the first two classes, he has our present Canon, indicating, at the same time, the 'disputed' character of the deuterocanonical books.

k The Apocalypse was not included amongst the canonical books by St Cyril of Jerusalem, the Council of Laodicea, St Gregory Nazianzen, Amphilochius and others in the East. In the West, however, the authority of the Apoc was upheld by St Jerome, St Augustine and the other great Latin Fathers. Finally, it was accepted in both East and West. St Athanasius mentions it and receives it along with other NT writings as one of the springs of salvation, Ep 39; PG 26, 1438.

l Hesitation in the acceptance of Heb was due to similar circumstances, but in this case, it was in the West and not in the East that it persisted for any length of time. In the West the epistle was not regarded as Pauline, and, in consequence, its canonical character was called in question. In the East it was generally regarded as belonging to St Paul, either directly or indirectly. Origen, for instance, suggested that the thought was the Apostle's but the style and composition were that of a disciple reproducing his master's teaching. Others followed this opinion and, though the immediate authorship of the book might be considered uncertain, it retained its traditional place amongst the canonical writings. Athanasius, who lists all our present canonical books, enumerates fourteen epistles of St Paul, including, of course, Heb. From the 4th cent., though its authorship might still be disputed, its canonical authority was recognized and acknowledged in the West as well as the East. It was included in the lists of the African Councils and that of Innocent I (cf. 154). By the end of the 4th cent. the difficulties occasioned by certain books disappeared, and there was no further serious attempt to dispute the claims of accepted books. The Canon then received was the one finally defined at Trent and is the NT Canon universally accepted to-day.

CRITERION OF CANONICITY

Various Theories—We cannot conclude this survey without some reference, however brief, to the principle governing the formation of the Canon. As we have seen, the books comprising it are those which are inspired and are acknowledged as such by the Church. But since the inspiration or divine authorship of any particular work can be made known to us only by the Divine Author himself, any criterion or principle by which we can judge the inspired or canonical character of a book must include a divine witness. Such divine testimony is to be found solely in tradition coming from Christ and his Apostles, faithfully preserved in the Church and supported by her authoritative pronouncements. 'Let us omit', writes Augustine, 'the fables of those scriptures which are called apocryphal, since their obscure origin was unknown to the Fathers from whom the authority of the true Scriptures has come down to us by a most certain and well ascertained succession', De Civ. Dei 15, 23, 4; PL 41, 470. In the case of the NT Canon, a further question arises: in what way did the Apostles make known the canonical books to the Church? Some are of opinion that the last surviving Apostle, St John, explicitly indicated them and formally made known the scriptural Canon. This hypothesis, however, could hardly be sustained in the light of later hesitation regarding the canonicity of some books and there is no confirmation of it from history.

Another suggestion has been put forward which attempts a different answer (cf. Zarb, op. cit. pp 518 ff.). It is urged that, since the Apostles were sent to teach in the name of Christ and were his ambassadors, whatever they taught was to be received as the word of Christ, Rom 2:16; 16:25; 2 Cor 4:3. But why limit their teaching to the spoken word? Were they not just as much the ambassadors of Christ when they wrote as when they spoke? In this way, whatever was written by an Apostle was inspired and, on this understanding, was accepted by the faithful. The writings of Mk and Lk were received because they were considered as coming from Peter and Paul respectively. But, we may ask, is it right to make the transient charisma or gift of inspiration coextensive with the permanent office of apostleship, or to elevate Mk and Lk virtually to the status of Apostles? In fact, it is possible to commit an Apostle's teaching to writing faithfully and yet not be inspired in the true sense of the word.

Other writers avoid these difficulties by maintaining that the Apostles pointed out the NT scriptural books equivalently or implicitly in the way they treated and regarded them: by setting them apart, by putting them on a level with the OT books, by sanctioning their use in public worship. The Apostles, in the various regions where they preached the Gospel, would guide 18d the faithful in their acceptances, and apostolic tradition thus formed would be handed down in the great apostolic sees. This would leave room for the later hesitation, when smaller books, written to more isolated communities, became known, and for variations in the number of accepted books in different communities.

- The Catholic is free to take whatever view commends itself to him. The present state of our knowledge makes it impossible to be too definite. But in whatever way the apostolic teaching and guarantee regarding the Canon were conveyed to the Church, it was these which determined the acceptance of the books. The unerring precision of acceptance is remarkably demonstrated in the case of the small and almost private letter to Philemon which won universal recognition, while other writings, Ep. Clem., Ep. Barn., Pastor Herm., were rejected. In this regard, St Jerome writes in the Prologue to Phm, 'Those who uphold its genuine character urge that it would never have been received by all the churches throughout the whole world unless it had been believed to be the work of Paul, the Apostle', PL 26, 637.

The divine witness thus graciously given, was faithfully received, carefully handed down and, when occasion demanded, infallibly defined.

- I Conclusion—On looking back over the history of the Canon, we see how different are God's ways from those which superficial minds expect of him. They would have him define everything from the outset. If he inspires a book, they would have him reveal to all mankind from the first moment of its production that he is the Author. They do not pause to think how God's providence always works through human minds, and does not spare them the anxieties and hesitations of struggle. An explicit grasp of much that was revealed is only reached after much labour.

If we turn our eyes back from the Canon, as defined in the 16th cent., to the writings of the early Fathers, we find a striking coincidence of range between their quotations and implicit references, and the limits of the present Canon. The reason is not far to seek. The scriptural Canon is a dogma, a revealed truth and as such has its history or development, not in the sense of addition or increase, for this is not possible after the death of the last Apostle, but in the sense of being more fully, more explicitly understood. Revealed truth is only gradually unfolded, and is not immediately understood in all its aspects, penetrated in all its depths, appreciated in all its richness and beauty, nor foreseen in all its implications. Newman, writing about the books of the NT Canon says, 'The fifth century acts as a comment on the obscure text of the centuries before it, and brings out a meaning, which with the help of the comment any candid person sees really to be theirs', Development of Christian Doctrine, 4:1, 3. The truth made known by our Lord and his apostles was received by the Church, was generally known in the 2nd cent., was made clearer by the opinions and controversies of the third and fourth, and when occasion demanded, was made explicit and final by definition. A later age holds more explicitly and, in this sense, more fully, what an earlier age accepted implicitly, but it does not possess a different doctrine or a new revelation.

THE LANGUAGES, TEXTS AND VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE

By E. POWER, S.J.

- 19a Bibliography 1. Languages—P. Dhorme, Langues et écritures sémitiques, Paris, 1930; P. Joüon, Grammaire de l'hébreu biblique, Rome, 1923; *A. B. Davidson, An Introductory Hebrew Grammar, Edinburgh, 1932²⁴; id., Hebrew Syntax, ibid., 1924; C. F. Jean, Inscriptions Sémitiques, DBVS 4 (1943) 384-417; *G. A. Cooke, North Semitic Inscriptions, Oxford, 1909; *K. Marti, Kurzgefasste Grammatik der bibl.-aram. Sprache, Berlin, 1925³; G. Messina, L'Araméo antico, Miscell. Bibl. 2 (1934), 69-163; J. Linder, Das Aramaeische im Buch Dan, ZKT 59 (1935) 503-45; F. M. Abel, Grammaire du Grec biblique, Paris, 1927; *J. H. Moulton, A Grammar of NT Greek, London, 1920; *Moulton-Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament Illustrated from the Papyri, London, 1930; J. Vergote, Grec Biblique, DBVS 3 (1938) 1330-69. 2. Hebrew OT Text—*C. D. Ginsburg, Introduction to the Massoretico—Critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible, London, 1897; *A. S. Geden, Outlines of Introduction to the Hebrew Bible, Edinburgh, 1911; J. Vandervorst, Introduction aux textes hébreu et grec de l'AT, Malines, 1935; *F. C. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient MSS, London, 1939⁴; *B. Kennicott, VT hebraicum cum variis lectionibus, Oxford, 1776-88; G. B. de Rossi, Variae lectiones VT et Scholia critica in VT libros, Parma, 1784-98; *H. L. Strack, Prolegomena critica in VT hebr., Leipzig, 1873; *J. Kennedy, An Aid to the Textual Emendation of the OT, Edinburgh, 1928; L. Dennefeld, Critique textuelle de l'AT, DBVS 2 (1934) 240-56; J. Coppens, La critique du texte hébreu de l'AT, Bi 25 (1944), 9-49; *A. von Gall, Der hebr. Pentateuch der Samaritaner, Giessen, 1914-19; H. Hyvernat, Petite introduction à l'étude de la Massora in RB 11-14 (1902-05); *P. Kahle, Massoreten des Ostens (Leipzig, 1913), des Westens (Stuttgart, 1927). 3. Greek NT Text—*Westcott-Hort, The NT in the Original Greek, Intro., Oxford, 1881; *Scrivener-Miller, A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the NT, London, 1894⁵; C. R. Gregory, Prolegomena ad NT graece, ed. Tischendorf, Leipzig, 1894; id., Textkritik des NT, ibid., 1900-09; id., Die griechischen Handschriften des NT, ibid., 1908; *H. von Soden, Die Schriften des NT., I, Berlin, 1900-10; E. Jacquier, Le NT dans l'Eglise chrétienne, Paris, 1913; *E. Nestle, Einführung in das griech. NT., Goettingen, 1923⁶; H. J. Vogels, Handbuch des newest. Textkritik, Muenster, 1923; *A. T. Robertson, Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the NT, New York, 1925; *K. Lake, The Text of the NT, London, 1928⁷; L. Vaganay, Initiation à la critique textuelle néotestamentaire, Paris, 1934 (trans. by B. Miller, London, 1937); M. J. Lagrange, Critique Textuelle 2. Critique rationnelle, Paris, 1935; *F. C. Kenyon, The Text of the Greek Bible, London, 1937; *K. Lake and *R. P. Blake, The Caesarean Text of the Gospel of Mark, HTR 21 (1928) 207-404; T. Ayuso, Texto caesariense o precasariense? Bi. 16 (1935) 369-415; *F. C. Kenyon, The Western Text of the Gospels and Acts, London, 1939. 4. Septuagint—*H. B. Swete, An Introduction to the OT in Greek, Cambridge, 1902 (revised by Otley, New York, 1914); *P. de Lagarde, Septuagintastudien, Goettingen, 1892; *E. Nestle, Septuagintastudien, Stuttgart, 1899-1907; *A. Rahlfs, Septuagintastudien, Goettingen, 1904-11; id., Verzeichnis der griech. Handschriften des OT, Berlin, 1914; *O. Procksch, Studien zur Geschichte der Septuaginta, Leipzig, 1910; *R. R. Otley, A Handbook to the Septuagint, New York, 1920; A. Ceriani, Le recensioni dei LXX, Rendiconti R. Istit. Lombardo 19-21 (1883-84); *L. F. Schleusner, Lexicon in LXX, Leipzig, 1820-21; *Hatch and *Redpath, A Concordance to the LXX, Oxford, 1897; *H. Thackeray, A Grammar of the OT in Greek, Cambridge, 1909; F. Wutz, Die Transkriptionen von der Sept. bis an Hieronymus, Leipzig, 1925 (cf. A. Barrois, Une nouvelle théorie de l'origine des LXX, RB 39 (1930) 332-61); A. Venard, Citations de l'AT dans le NT, DBVS 2 (1934) 23-51. 5. Other Versions—L. Haefeli, Die Peschitta des AT, Muenster, 1927; C. Peters, Das Diatessaron Tatians, Roma, 1939; H. J. Vogels, Die altsyr. Evangelien in ihrem Verhaeltnis zu Tatians Diatessaron, Freiburg, 1911; *G. Zuntz, The Ancestry of the Heraklean NT, London, 1945; *R. P. Blake, Ancient Georgian Versions of the OT, HTR 19 (1926) 271-97; S. Lyonnet, Vestiges d'un Diatessaron arménien, Bi 19 (1938) 121-50; id., La première version arménienne des Evangiles, RB 47 (1938) 355-82; *H. von Soden, Das latein. NT in Afrika zur Zeit Cyprians, Leipzig, 1909; A. d'Alès, Vetus Romana, Bi 4 (1923) 59-90; F. Stummer, Einführung in das latein. Bibel, Paderborn, 1928; *A. V. Billen, The Old Latin Texts of the Heptateuch, Cambridge, 1927; A. Allgeier, Die alllatein. Psalterien, Freiburg, 1928; *A. Juelicher und *W. Matzkow, Das NT in alllatein. Ueberlieferung Mt-Mk, Berlin, 1938-40; A. Condamin, Les caractères de la traduction de la Bible par Saint Jérôme, RSR 1-4 (1911-14); *S. Berger, Histoire de la Vulgate pendant les premiers siècles du moyen-âge, Paris, 1893; C. Vercellone, Variae lectiones vulgatae latinae Bibliorum editionis, Roma, 1860-64; J. M. Vosté, De latina Bibliorum versione quae dicitur Vulgata, Roma, 1927; H. J. Vogels, Vulgata-studien, Muenster, 1928; H. Quentin, Mémoire sur l'établissement du texte de la Vulgate, Roma, 1922; P. Salmon, La révision de la Vulgate, Rome, 1937; J. M. Vosté, La Vulgata al Concilio di Trento, Bi 27 (1946) 301-19; H. Hoepfl, Beitrag zur Geschichte der Sixto-Klement-Vulgata, Freiburg, 1913.
- Languages of the Bible—The protocanonical books of the OT, i.e. those contained in the Hebrew Bible, are all written in Hebrew except parts of Daniel (2:4-7:28) and Esdras (4:8-6:18, 7:12-26), and one version of Jeremias (10:11, most probably a later insertion), which are written in Aramaic. Baruch, Judith, Tobit, 1 Mac and the deuterocanonical parts of Daniel and Esther are extant only in a Greek version. Ecclesiastes also was only known in a Greek version until 1896, when about two-thirds of the Hebrew text was discovered. 2 Mac, Wis, and all the books of the NT except Mt were composed in Greek. Mt originally written in Aramaic, has only been preserved in a Greek version. Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek are thus the languages of the Bible. Greek belongs to the Aryan or Indo-European, Hebrew and Aramaic to the Semitic group of languages.
- Semitic Languages—The chief characteristics of this linguistic family are the following. The roots or ground forms from which the words are derived are usually composed of three consonants, though there are indications of biliteral roots in the earliest period. Vowels do not form part of the roots but merely help to express various modifications of the radical sense. They are 19g thus of much less importance than in Aryan languages and are usually not expressed in alphabetical writing since a reader, familiar with the structure of the language, can supply them from the context. The simple form of the verb is modified by added letters, lengthened vowels and reduplicated radicals to express intensive, causative, reciprocal and reflexive action. The passive is distinguished from the active by a change of vowels. Person and number are indicated by prefixes and affixes derived from the corresponding personal pronouns. Abbreviated forms of these pronouns are also affixed to verbs and nouns when governed by them. The Semitic verb has no tenses in our sense of the word but modes of action. The perfect is the mode of completed, the imperfect of incompleted action, but both may express past, present and future time according to the context. The structure of the various nominal forms is in general similar to that of the verbal forms. Through the loss of short final vowels the cases of the nouns and the moods of the verbs, preserved in literary Arabic, have largely disappeared in Hebrew and Aramaic. In syntax the relation between the various parts of the sentence and in particular the exact character of dependent clauses are not as definitely expressed as in Aryan languages and must often be determined from the context. In general Semitic languages are defective in indicating delicate shades of meaning and are better adapted to narrative and poetry than to philosophical or scientific discussion. Finally they have some guttural sounds, not easily pronounced by non-Semites. When the Greeks borrowed the Phoenician alphabet they used these unfamiliar consonants to express vowels.

1 The Semitic languages are usually divided into South-Semitic—Arabic, Ethiopic and Sabaeen; East-Semitic—Assyro-Babylonian; and West-Semitic—Canaanite and Aramaic. Hebrew and biblical Aramaic are respectively dialects of Canaanite and Aramaic. Arabic is the most faithful to the ancient form of the original Semitic tongue, has an extensive literature and is still spoken in many parts of the East. Assyro-Babylonian lost the peculiar Semitic guttural sounds when adopted by non-Semites, but, like Babylonian civilization, was widely diffused in ancient times and appears as the diplomatic language of the Near East in the fourteenth cent. B.C. Canaanite and Aramaic as the languages of neighbouring regions, Canaan and the Syrian hinterland, are most closely allied. As languages of trade and commerce both were widely diffused at a later period. Canaanite was planted along the Mediterranean seaboard by the Phoenicians after 1200 B.C. Aramaean land traders made their language international over the Near East in the Persian period.

2 Hebrew—The name is derived, through the Latin Hebraeus, Greek Ἑβραῖος, from the Aramaic ʿebṛāyā and primarily designates not the language but the people. Similarly ʿebṛāyōtī, lit. 'in Hebrew', in the NT usually indicates not Hebrew but Aramaic, the language then spoken by the Hebrew people. In the OT the language of the Hebrews is called 'the lip of Canaan' (Is 19:18) and yḥūḏīt or Jewish (4 Kg 18:26, 28; 2 Esd 13:24). That Hebrew is the language of Canaan may also be inferred from the regular use of yām, lit. 'sea', for west and negeb, lit. 'arid land', for south. Canaan is peculiar in having both desert for its southern and sea for its western boundary. The Hebrews therefore when they settled in Canaan adopted the language of the country, to which however their ancestral language, usually called West-Semitic and regarded by some as Canaanite, by others as Aramaic, was closely akin.

3 For the study of the Hebrew language and script we have besides the biblical texts a number of inscriptions in Hebrew and other Canaanite dialects. The earliest Hebrew inscription is the agricultural calendar of Gezer, now dated about the tenth cent. B.C. It briefly enumerates the field labours associated with the different months of the year. Next come the seventy-five inscribed ostraca or potsherds, recording deliveries of oil and wine from various persons and places to the royal palace of Samaria in the early ninth cent. B.C. The Siloe inscription commemorates the building of a tunnel at Jerusalem in the reign of Ezechias, by which the waters of its only spring, Gihon, were conveyed into the city. The numerous but laconic inscriptions on jar-handles found in various cities of southern Palestine and most of the inscribed seals, whose owners can sometimes be identified with biblical personages, belong to the late monarchical period. Lastly the sixteen inscribed ostraca discovered at Tell ed-Duweir and commonly known as the Letters of Lachish were written shortly before the exile. These letters are invaluable for the information they give on the character of popular literary composition in the late pre-exilic period.

Ancient inscriptions in other Canaanite dialects begin with the pre-Canaanite texts of the library recently discovered at Rās-Shamra (Ugarit) on the coast of northern Syria. They are dated c 1400 B.C. and are particularly important from their number and religious character. The Canaanite glosses of the Tell el-Amarna tablets belong to the fourteenth cent. B.C. The earliest Phoenician text is the sepulchral inscription of Ahiiram of Byblos in the thirteenth cent. B.C. The Phoenician alphabet, here fully developed, is used in all the Hebrew inscriptions mentioned above. Phoenician inscriptions are very numerous, cover a wide area and extend down to the second cent. A.D. They consist chiefly of dedications and memorials on tombs, are brief in content, and rarely antedate the Persian period. More closely akin to Hebrew is the long inscription of Meša (c 840 B.C.) discovered at Dibon in northern Moab.

Pre-exilic and Post-exilic Hebrew—Though every language evolves in the course of centuries there is little trace of evolution in biblical pre-exilic Hebrew. The canticle of Deborah alone informs us of dialectal peculiarities in the language of the northern tribes. The Shibboleth episode manifests diversity of pronunciation. Archaisms like ḥay'îlō (Gen 1:25, etc.) are rare and not easily explained. In general the early books of the Bible exhibit the same stage of the language as the Lachish letters. It does not follow from this that all these books are of late pre-exilic origin. Writing was in common use among the Hebrews at a much earlier period. Moses and Josue were ordered to write. The copy of the Law discovered accidentally in the reign of Josias was of much earlier origin. Pre-exilic historical books attest the use of earlier written sources. The kings had their scribes. Ezechias collected the Proverbs of Solomon. Isaías and Jeremias were ordered to write some at least of their prophecies. The conclusion to be drawn from the linguistic uniformity of earlier and later texts is therefore that the language of the earlier writings was modernized in the later period.

The post-exilic Hebrew writers are markedly inferior in literary genius to their pre-exilic predecessors. There is a corresponding deterioration in the language which manifests itself principally in two ways. The niceties of Hebrew idiom are often neglected and Aramaic forms of expression are adopted into the language. Some examples will show the character of these innovations. The first is exemplified by various irregularities in the use of the particle w, abbreviations of expression such as not repeating a preposition before a noun in apposition with its object or a governing noun before several succeeding genitives, double plurals in genitival combinations like 'men of names' for 'men of name', use of the article as a relative, frequent substitution of the infinitive absolute for a finite verb. The second is illustrated by new forms of the infinitive with m prefixed and of the pi'el of verbs with w as second radical, use of hēn 'behold' for 'im' 'if', anticipation of noun object by a pronominal suffix, prefixion of l to noun object when 20b determined. The chief prose exponent of post-biblical Hebrew is the author of Chronicles, Esdras and Nehemias. Aramaeans in poetry are less remarkable as a form of poetical ornament. Their frequency in a prose writer like the Chronicler seems to indicate that Aramaic was the spoken language and Hebrew a dead language in his time.

c Transition from Hebrew to Aramaic—It is clear from 4 Kg 18:26 that the common people of Jerusalem did not understand Aramaic in 701 B.C. That the change of language was made in Palestine between this period and the exile is excluded by the testimony of the Lachish letters written in Hebrew. It was most probably during the exile when the Jews came into close contact with Aramaic-speaking peoples in southern Babylonia that they began to speak Aramaic. The objection made to this view that biblical Aramaic is not an eastern but a western dialect can no longer be sustained. The peculiarities of eastern Aramaic not found in biblical texts appear first in eastern Aramaic writings of the Christian era. Biblical Aramaic lacks no peculiarities of early eastern Aramaic texts discovered in Assyria and elsewhere. The passage of a people from one language to another is usually gradual. There is an indication that Hebrew was still spoken in the second half of the fifth cent. B.C. The Chronicler calls Hebrew y hūdiš (2 Par 32:18) and uses the same term for the language of the Jews in 2 Esd 13:44. The Aramaisms of the Chronicler and the use of Aramaic by Esdras not only in official documents but also in historical narrative make it very probable that the transition was completed in the fourth cent. B.C. d Aramaic—This language, the rudest and simplest in syntactical structure of all the Semitic tongues, takes its name like Hebrew from the people who spoke it, the Aramaeans. They were nomads who spread from Arabia into Mesopotamia and thence crossing the Euphrates founded a number of city-states in the region extending from Armenia in the north to Transjordan in the south. Thus controlling the international highway of the Near East, for which empires had fought at an earlier period, they exercised a preponderating influence in international commerce in the early first millennium B.C. It is owing to this fact and the adventurous spirit of the Aramaean traders that Aramaic became so widely diffused as the language of trade and commerce.

e Our knowledge of ancient Aramaic is derived from recently discovered texts which range in time from the eighth cent. B.C. to well into the Christian era, and in space over all the countries of the Near East from Taxila on the Hydaspes to Elephantine on the Nile. The earliest and most important inscriptions discovered at Zingirli and in the neighbourhood of Aleppo in northern Syria belong to the eighth cent. B.C. Then too begin the Aramaic inscriptions on weights and Aramaic endorsements on Assyrian contracts. It was, however, in the Persian period that the language became most widely diffused, as the texts discovered in Iran, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Syria, Arabia and Egypt abundantly attest. The Aramaic documents of Esdras and narratives of Daniel belong to this period. For their better understanding and the solution of the vexed question of their date the considerable number of Aramaic papyri and ostraca discovered half a century ago at Elephantine are particularly important. These are dated in the fifth cent. B.C. The Aramaic texts of the Bible, if authentic, must exhibit, at least in their original form, the same stage of linguistic development.

f Languages develop in two ways, structurally and phonetically. Structural development is exhibited by the disappearance of old and the appearance of new forms in the structure of the language. As these forms are usually too firmly fixed to be much affected by textual transmission, the structural stage of a language is easily discerned. Phonetic development appears in sound changes and assimilation of sounds originally distinguished. When our knowledge of the pronunciation of a language is derived from written texts its phonetic stage is often difficult to determine. Writing is orthographical as well as phonetical. It sometimes fails to register sound changes, as in modern English and French where spelling and pronunciation differ widely. There is a further difficulty in the case of biblical texts frequently copied. The original writing may have been modernized and systematized. We may conclude therefore that structural forms rather than alterations of letters, which may or may not attest phonetic development and in some cases can be definitely attributed to later copyists, are the best means of determining the original character of biblical Aramaic. Of these the causative forms of verbs, the prefix of the reflexive forms, the inner passives and the remains of the jussive attest a stage of the language at least as ancient as that of the Elephantine papyri. For the authenticity of the Esdras documents it is important to note that they maintain the ancient final m of the 2 and 3 pl. pronominal suffixes. The Esdras narrative and Daniel have the later final n while the Elephantine papyri have both forms. The systematic use of d in biblical Aramaic to represent an ancient z has been interpreted as a sound change completed in the third cent. B.C. The sound in question, however, an aspirated d, which has no equivalent in the Phoenician alphabet, is expressed by d as well as z in Assyria in the eighth century. The omission or mode of expression of a final a is also a matter of orthography. These examples show that alterations of letters are less reliable indications of the date of biblical Aramaic than structural forms, even in the very improbable hypothesis that the biblical texts, repeatedly copied, are exact reproductions of the original.

21a Biblical Greek—The Greek of the original texts and of the LXX version of the Bible, recognized in the Renaissance period as a debased form of classical Greek, could not be satisfactorily explained as long as it remained an isolated phenomenon. The study of the numerous Greek papyri, discovered in Egypt during the last century, has finally revealed to us its origin and character. It is not a biblical or Jewish or Alexandrian dialect of Greek but the Koine or common Greek which supplanted the classical form of the language and became international in the Hellenistic period inaugurated by the African and Asiatic conquests of Alexander the Great. The zeal of Greek rulers for the Hellenization of their eastern subjects and still more the exigencies of trade and commerce account for its world-wide diffusion. Attic Greek had lost its purity even in Greece itself in the fourth cent. B.C. and was in any case, in its classical form, ill adapted to popular and international use. The Koine is the current Attic Greek modified and accommodated to a new and wider sphere of utility. It was naturally used by the sacred writers as the language understood by their contemporaries, providentially designed and admirably adapted for the preaching of the Gospel to all nations.

b The Koine was not merely a spoken language. It was taught in the schools and was the ordinary medium of literary expression. It thus preserved a general uniformity despite the variations resulting from the nationality or lack of education of the writer and the colloquial or literary character of his composition. It differed from Attic Greek mainly in aiming at a simpler and easier but at the same time clearer and more vigorous mode of expression. The vocabulary is less rich but more varied in its origin. In phonetics there is a tendency to reduce diphthongs to simple vowels. Declensions and conjugations are simplified and occasionally assimilated by analogy. There is a preference for longer and composite rather than shorter and simple words. Co-ordination of dependent clauses is also preferred to subordination and direct speech to indirect. Prepositions are more frequently used not only in composition with verbs but also to strengthen the case endings of nouns and even pleonastically with adverbs. Pleonasm also appears in an 21e excessive repetition of personal pronouns. The vocative is often accompanied by the article for greater emphasis. The infinitive is used loosely with or without the article in final, consecutive or explanatory clauses, but is preferably replaced on the other hand by a ḥi clause after verbs of saying and perceiving. The article is used more frequently and before clauses as well as nouns. Adjectives are often replaced by substantives in the genitive. The popular character of the Koine is manifested by sense constructions, anacolutha and other grammatical irregularities.

d The Greek of the Bible is distinguished from that of profane literature by the presence of semitisms, both hebraisms and aramaisms. The Septuagint interpreters of a Hebrew and sacred text reproduced in Greek some of the modes of expression and phraseology of the original Hebrew. These hebraisms vary in number according to the freedom or literalness of the different translators. They appear also in the NT owing to the influence exerted on the sacred writers by the language of the Septuagint which they consciously or unconsciously imitated. The aramaisms of the NT are explained by the fact that Aramaic was either the native language of the inspired writers or the language of sources which they used.

e The discovery in the Egyptian papyri of nearly all the words previously considered peculiar to Biblical Greek established the Koine origin of the NT vocabulary. The semitisms discovered in Egyptian Greek have been similarly interpreted as Koine idioms by many scholars. It should be noted, however, that semitisms in the Bible may appear as copticisms in the papyri. Coptic has many non-Greek idioms in common with Hebrew and Aramaic. Coptic writers would naturally reproduce their native modes of thought in their new medium of expression.

f The Hebrew Text of the OT—Under this heading the Aramaic texts are implicitly included. The deuterocanonical parts of the OT on the other hand, whether written originally in Greek or only extant in a Greek version, belong to the history of the Septuagint. By way of introduction to the history of the text some account must be given of the medium by which it was transmitted.

g Papyrus was the ordinary material used for writing in Palestine in biblical times. We learn from the narrative of Wen-Amon that it was imported in large quantities from Egypt to Canaan in the eleventh cent. B.C. Its rapid disintegration in a damp climate explains why so few literary remains and biblical texts have been discovered in Palestine. It was too fragile also to be a suitable material for Babylonian script, for which fine clay, not easily procurable in Palestine, was required. We may conclude therefore that the sacred text was not originally written in cuneiform characters but in alphabetic script, especially since the inscription of Aḥiram, discovered at Byblos in 1923, has shown that the Phoenician alphabet was fully developed before the time of Moses. From the use of this Phoenician script in ancient Hebrew inscriptions we may infer that it was the regular medium for the transmission of the Hebrew text of the OT.

h The Samaritan Pentateuch which retains the Phoenician script and may be approximately dated c. 400 B.C. gives us a terminus a quo for the adoption of the Aramaic or square characters with which readers of the Hebrew Bible are familiar. The transition from Phoenician to Aramaic script was, however, very gradual and scarcely completed before the close of the third cent. B.C. The Nash papyrus variously dated (II cent. B.C.—I cent. A.D.) is written in Aramaic characters. Scribal errors in the Hebrew text, caused by the similarity of letters, attest the use of both forms of script.

i The form of the book in OT times was the roll or volume (cf. Jer 36). A long strip of papyrus was attached at one end to a support round which it was rolled. The writing was usually only on the inner side of the papyrus and began at the further end so that the volume would be gradually unrolled as it was read. Besides papyrus, leather or parchment was also used at least in the Greek period. The roll form of the book limited its dimensions, so that the Torah for instance filled five rolls or volumes and was therefore called Pentateuch by the Greeks. The codex form of the book was later admitted by the Jews for private copies of the sacred text but not for use in the synagogue.

The Phoenicians like the Greeks usually failed to indicate the separation of words in their inscriptions. The Hebrews and Aramaeans on the other hand marked the end of each word by a point, like the Latins, in their inscriptions and by a short interval in their papyri. Errors in the division of words are of comparatively rare occurrence in the Hebrew text. Moreover the earliest specimens of the square script exhibit the peculiar final forms of the Hebrew letters. We may conclude, therefore, that the separate words were indicated, though perhaps not very clearly at times, certainly in the later and probably in the earlier period. Punctuation marks and vowel points are of later Massoretic origin.

History of the Hebrew Text—Our present Hebrew text undoubtedly contains corruptions of various kinds—omissions attested by the LXX, incorrect readings, alterations of numbers and dates, errors in orthography and lexicography, interpolated glosses and marginal notes. There are many indications on the other hand that this text has remained practically unchanged from c. A.D. 100 to the present day. The divergences from the archetype belong therefore almost entirely to the period of its gradual formation. This is not surprising since no special human safeguards would be devised for its preservation before its scattered parts were united and its sacred character was generally recognized. God undoubtedly watched over the text which he had inspired and preserved its substantial integrity, but he did not protect it from the minor alterations which all texts suffer in course of transmission.

Period of Formation—There are some means of establishing by comparison the state of the text in the later part of this period. Passages repeated in different parts of the OT can be compared, e.g. Ps 14 and Ps 53; Ps 18 and 2 Kg 22; Is 36-39 and 4 Kg 18:13-20:19; Jer 52 and 4 Kg 24:18-25:30, etc. In all these cases we find substantial conformity of the texts compared, diversified by ordinary scribal errors. The Samaritan Pentateuch, when compared with MT, exhibits a few transpositions of short passages, a number of additions mostly superfluous and many unimportant variants chiefly orthographical and grammatical. The insertion of Deut 27:3-7 immediately after the decalogue in Ex and Deut and the alteration of Hebal to Garizim in this passage constitute the most interesting but least authentic peculiarity of this text. The comparison of the MT with the LXX Greek version, dated c. 250-100 B.C., covers a wider field and gives more important results. The LXX supplies short omissions in the MT, has occasionally better readings and is particularly remarkable for diversity in the order and extent of the matter contained in some books or parts of books. The chief instances of this diversity are Ex 36-39, where the order is different and the narrative shorter; 1 Kg, where 17:12-31 and 17:55-18:5 are omitted; 3 Kg, where the order is different in chh 4-7; 1 Par, where 1:10-23 are omitted; 2 Esdr 11-12, where 23 verses are omitted; Prov 24:23-31:10, where the order is different and there are short omissions and additions; Jer, where the prophecies against the Gentiles are in the middle instead of at the end of the book and in a different order; Lam, which has an introduction; the deuterocanonical additions. From these peculiarities of the LXX we may conclude that the Hebrew text was not yet standardized when the Greek version was made. This conclusion is borne out by the Nash papyrus, recently assigned by Albright to the Maccabean period, which exhibits a Hebrew text of the Decalogue and Deut 6:4

21m much closer to the LXX than to the MT. Josephus also sometimes differs from the MT in his citations from the Hebrew. On the other hand the recently published text of Isaias discovered in Palestine in 1947 and not later in date than the Nash papyrus is said to be practically identical with the MT (cf. §§ 80l, 422g). The study of the differences between the earlier LXX text and the later MT shows their substantial conformity but does not authorize an unreserved preference of one to the other. The individual cases of divergency must be judged according to their merits.

22a The History of the MT—Versions made from the Hebrew in the second cent., and later, exhibit a remarkable agreement with the MT against the LXX. This is the chief reason for assigning the unification of the Hebrew text to c. A.D. 100. It was the work of the Hebrew Academy in Palestine, transferred to Jamnia after the fall of Jerusalem and thence later to Tiberias. A notice in the Talmud informs us that the single standard text was made by majority rule from three different texts preserved in the temple. All texts differing from the standard text were officially banned. Readings disagreeing with the MT may be found in Jewish and Christian works but are extremely rare.

b The Hebrew text received a further development in the period between its unification and our earliest extant MSS from the critical studies of the Scribes (I–VI cent.) and the Massoretes (VI–X cent.). The Scribes divided the text into verses, indicated the places where words should be altered or omitted or supplied by the reader, and marked with points doubtful or spurious readings. They are also supposed to have altered slightly some expressions which sounded irreverent. The euphemistic substitution of bless (God) for curse (God) may be cited as an instance. The Massoretes supplied the vowel points and the accents by which the pronunciation, the tone and the interconnection of the words were indicated. These innovations belong most probably to the seventh cent. and were only admitted in private copies of the text.

c Massora means tradition. The Massoretes also committed to writing traditions relating to the sacred text and handed down orally from the period of the Scribes. The Massora or textual tradition was usually written either on the lateral margins (massora parva) or at the top and bottom of the page (massora magna), or at the end of the papyrus roll (massora finalis). Such critical indications as the number of times a rare word occurred in the Bible, variations in the spelling of certain words, alterations of the written word to be made by the reader, were noted briefly in the parva but more fully in the massora magna. The massora finalis gave the number of verses in the different books or parts of books and other minute computations as well as various notes on peculiar words and expressions. The Massoretic schools of Palestine and Babylonia differed not only in their method of expressing the vowels but also to a less extent in the traditions which they recorded. In Palestine itself the rival schools of Ben Asher and Ben Neptali flourished in the tenth cent. Later, however, the Tiberian vowel system was generally adopted and the Massora of Ben Asher prevailed over that of his rival. The present division of the text into chapters is of Christian origin. It was first introduced into the Latin Vulgate in the thirteenth cent. to facilitate references and later adopted by the Jews in private but not in liturgical copies of the sacred text.

d The earliest MSS of the Hebrew Bible, if we except that of Isaias mentioned above (§ 21m), belong to the tenth cent. The relatively few variants exhibited by the MSS have been collected by Kennicot and De Rossi. The first and less accurate editions of the printed Bible were superseded by that of Jacob ben Chaim (Venice 1525) which became the textus receptus. The third edition of Kittel's Biblia Hebraica (Stuttgart, 1937) is based on a Leningrad MS of the text of Ben Asher dated A.D. 1008. It gives also the massora parva (edited by Kahle) on the outer margin of the page 22e and a full critical apparatus underneath.

The critical authenticity, or conformity with the originals of the MT may be inferred from its conformity with the ancient versions and from the scrupulous care of its custodians to preserve intact their sacred text. This authenticity is only substantial and does not exclude various corruptions which may often be corrected with the aid of the ancient versions, more especially the LXX. In such cases the authenticity of the rendering and its derivation from a different Hebrew text must be proved. Corruptions which occurred before any versions were made may also be corrected by conjectural emendation. These corrections presuppose grave doubt about the genuineness of the text, and may only be admitted when the recognized rules of textual emendation have been fully observed. From the dogmatic point of view the authenticity of the Latin Vulgate, decreed by the Council of Trent, presupposes the authenticity of the original Hebrew text which St. Jerome translated.

The Greek Text of the NT—Some preliminary remarks on the material and method of writing in early NT times will help us to understand the difficulties encountered in the transmission of the text. Papyrus was the fragile material on which it was written during the first three centuries. Only recently have valuable fragments of these early texts been discovered in Egypt. The use of the more durable parchment in the fourth cent. marks the beginning of manuscript tradition. In the early second cent. the codex form of book had supplanted the roll in papyrus copies of the sacred text. The writing in these copies was cursive, but the letters were neither connected by ligatures nor divided into separate words. The uncial script of the earlier MSS differs from the cursive in its large rounded letters written separately and continuously. There are no word intervals, no accents or breathings, no punctuation marks. The custom of assigning a separate line to the individual members of parallelisms in the poetical books of the OT gave rise to a similar indication of the sense divisions in NT prose in the fourth cent. The minuscule script of the later MSS first appears in the ninth cent. and replaces the uncial or majuscule in the eleventh. This cursive writing is distinguished from that of the papyri by the ligatures with which the letters are connected. Only in these later MSS do we find small letters distinguished from capitals, intervals between the different words, breathings, accents and punctuation marks. As parchment was costly some old MSS were used a second time after the original writing had been obliterated. By deciphering the earlier script ancient biblical texts have been recovered from these MSS called palimpsests.

The Codices of the NT—The codices from which our direct knowledge of the text is derived are estimated at about 210 uncials, 2,400 minuscules, 50 papyri and 1,610 lectionaries. Most of these are incomplete or fragmentary; the lectionaries are restricted to liturgical texts; 53 codices contain the whole NT. Individual codices in each of the four classes are now generally indicated by arabic numerals, according to the system introduced by C. R. Gregory, used alone for the minuscules but preceded by O, P and I respectively when designating uncials, papyri and lectionaries. The earlier method of indicating the 45 oldest uncials by Latin and Greek capitals is however generally retained and S usually replaces the Hebrew aleph for the cod. Sinaiticus. The oldest and most important codices are the following: B = Vaticanus, fourth cent., probably of Egyptian origin. contains the whole Bible from Gen 46:28 to Heb 9:14; S = Sinaiticus, fourth-fifth cent., discovered in the monastery of Mt Sinai but now in the British Museum, contains the whole Bible with many OT omissions; A = Alexandrinus, fifth cent., belonged to the Patriarch of Alexandria, but is now in the British Museum and contains the whole Bible with occasional k Classification of the Codices—The critical investigations of numerous scholars during the last century have resulted in the division of the various witnesses to the NT text into families and groups and the recognition of three different types of text usually called Western, Eastern and Antiochian. These types are all recensions, i.e. deliberate revisions of earlier texts assumed to need correction and therefore amended according to the corrector's idea of the original text. The western recension of the Catholic Epistles and the Apocalypse is no longer extant. A fourth recension of the Gospels called Caesarean has been recently discovered.

22] omissions; C = Codex Ephraemi rescriptus, fifth cent. palimpsest now in the Paris National Library, contains only fragments of the OT but nearly all the NT; D = Codex Bezae, sixth cent., property of a Lyons monastery, presented by Beza to Cambridge University, contains Gospels and Acts in Greek and Latin; D = Claromontanus, sixth cent., now in the Paris National Library, contains the Epistles of St Paul in Greek and Latin.

l Character of the Recensions—The western recension is popular. It alters the text freely, clarifies obscurities by paraphrasing and eliminates difficulties by harmonizing. It has some peculiar additions adapted to popular taste and occasionally of a marvellous character. The eastern recension is critical and conservative. It has very few harmonizations. It avoids also linguistic alterations retaining the vulgar forms of Koine Greek and the stylistic peculiarities of the different sacred writers. It is remarkable for concision, and has some noteworthy omissions. The Antiochian recension is learned and ecclesiastical. It aims at elegance, clearness and fullness. The language is corrected by the substitution of classical for Koine forms. Obscurities are clarified, but more smoothly, and harmonizations appear, but less extensively than in the western recension. Variants derived from the two earlier recensions appear together in conflated texts. The different method of the three revisers is illustrated by their treatment of the shorter Lucan form of the Lord's Prayer. The eastern preserves it unaltered, the western substitutes for it the Matthaean form, the Antiochian supplements it by appropriate additions from St Matthew. The Caesarean recension appears to be a reconstitution of the text based on the earlier eastern and western recensions.

23a History of the Recensions—The western recension is found in the Uncial D, Beza (Gospels and Ac) and Claromontanus (Pauline Epistles) and in the Old Latin and early Syriac versions. Fragments of Ac in P 38 (IV cent.) and P 48 (III cent.) and of Lk in O 171 (IV cent.) attest a Greek text of this recension in Egypt, where it very probably had its origin. It gives us the earliest known type of NT text which prevailed in the West and in Syria from the late second to the early fifth cent. and left traces in the Egyptian texts and versions of the third cent. The eastern recension is exhibited by the earliest uncials, A (except the Gospels which are Antiochian) SBC, by many other uncials and minuscules, by nearly all the papyri fragments and generally by the Latin Vulgate and by the Coptic, more especially the Bohairic, versions. Its use by Origen at one period of his critical emendation of the Gospels and in the Acts and Pauline Epistles of the Chester Beatty papyri establishes its existence in the early third cent. It prevailed in Egypt until the Arab conquest, and is still, substantially at least, the official text of the Latin Church. It is now generally recognized as exhibiting the best form of the NT text. The Antiochian recension is contained mostly in late uncials, minuscules and lectionaries. The Gospels alone are early attested in A. It is universally attributed to Lucian, martyred at Antioch in 312 and author of a recension of the LXX which exhibits the same characteristics. The Syriac Peshitta version (V cent.)

is based on it. From Antioch and Constantinople 23b it spread over the entire East after the Arab conquest of Egypt and Palestine and thence to the West after the fall of Constantinople where it became the text of the AV and was highly esteemed and the textus receptus until the critical studies of the nineteenth cent. revealed its defects. The Caesarean recension d appears in the eighth cent. uncial θ Koridethi of Palestinian origin, the minuscules fam. 1 and 13 and MSS 28.565.700, the Egyptian uncial W, P 45 and the Armenian and Georgian versions. It is attested in Palestine by Origen and Eusebius but seems to be of Egyptian origin. As a fusion of the earlier eastern and western recensions it offers a more mixed and less uniform type of text. In this sense the Latin Vulgate, predominantly eastern, may be called Caesarean.

e Editions of the Greek NT—Critical editions of the Greek NT begin in the nineteenth cent. when the Antiochian textus receptus, on which previous editions were based, was superseded by the better Eastern text. Noteworthy are those of C. Lachmann (Berlin, 1831), S. Tregelles (London, 1857-79), Westcott-Hort (Oxford, 1881), B. Weiss (Berlin, 1892), E. Nestle (Stuttgart, 1898-1941¹¹) and the major editions with very full critical apparatus of C. Tischendorf (Leipzig, 1872⁹) and H. von Soden (Berlin, 1913). Mk and Mt (ed. S. E. F. Legg) have already appeared in an Oxford major edition of Westcott-Hort. Recent Catholic critical editions are those of H. J. Vogels (Duesseldorf, 1922), J. Bover (Madrid, 1943) and A. Merk (Rome, 1922⁷).

f Authority of the NT Text—No classical text exhibits claims to authenticity approaching those of the Greek NT, whether we consider the number and antiquity of its sources, all in substantial agreement, or the internal evidence of these sources, revealed by a century of critical investigation, or the unanimous verdict of critics of all schools of thought. The variant readings collected from so many codices are naturally very numerous but usually manifest unimportant differences in orthography, grammar, choice of synonyms and order of words. The sense is affected in about two hundred cases of which fifteen are important. The dogmatic teaching of the NT, derived from passages undoubtedly authentic, is independent of these variants.

g Versions of the OT. The Septuagint—The ancient versions of the Bible give us valuable information about the original text and its traditional interpretation. Of these the Greek version of the OT made at Alexandria and known as the Septuagint is by far the most important. It preserved for us the inspired deuterocanonical parts of the OT, was generally used in preference to the Hebrew text by the NT writers in their scriptural citations and was the Vulgate of the eastern and western Church for several centuries until it was superseded among the Latins by the Vulgate of St Jerome. The method of its transmission as regards writing, book-form, etc. was similar to that of the NT text, with which it is sometimes associated in the codices. The uncials and minuscules in which it is contained are 1534 in number but rarely exhibit the whole OT. The earliest and most important uncials are BSA already described. Still earlier fragments of the Septuagint have been recently discovered in Egypt, of which the Chester Beatty Papyri, Vol IV-VII of Kenyon's edition, are particularly important. Two short fragments of Deut, PRG 458, published by C. H. Roberts at the Manchester University Press in 1936, and P. Fouad 266, reproduced and studied by W. G. Waddell JTS 45 (1944) 158-61, may also be mentioned as our oldest Greek biblical texts belonging to the Maccabean period.

h Origin and Character of the Septuagint Version—The Greek Letter of Aristaeus to Philocrates, composed at latest in the second cent. B.C., informs us that Ptolemy II Philadelphos (285-247), a great bibliophile, 23b had the Hebrew Torah translated into Greek for his famous library by 72 Hebrew scholars summoned from Jerusalem and domiciled in the island of Pharos where they completed the version of the Pentateuch in 72 days. The segregation of the translators in different cells and the marvellous agreement of their different versions is a further embellishment of Philo. The later assumption that the whole OT was then translated explains the name Septuagint (LXX). Though the letter is a literary fiction and its author is not very trustworthy the version of the Pentateuch may be dated c 250 B.C. It seems to have been used by the Jewish historian, Demetrius, towards the close of the third cent. B.C. The need felt by the hellenised Alexandrian Jews for a version of the sacred text is the most probable explanation of its origin and suggests also that the other sacred books were translated without much delay. The Prologue of Ecclesiastes written in 132 B.C. records the translation into Greek of the Law, the Prophets and the Sacred Books as an accomplished fact. That the work was protracted over a considerable period may be concluded from the large number and different qualifications of the translators, revealed by internal evidence. It is generally supposed that the translators used texts written in Hebrew characters. The ancient theory of Tychsen, who supposed that the texts had been previously transliterated from Hebrew into Greek, has been recently revived by Wutz. This hypothesis, unsupported by solid arguments, is generally rejected.

The character of the translation varies with the translators. It is literal in the Canticle, Ecclesiastes, the Psalms and the Prophets (except Daniel), faithful in the Pentateuch and the historical books, free in Job, Proverbs, Daniel and Esther. The Greek is good in the original works Wis and 2 Mach and in Job and Prov, fair in Pent., Jos, Is, 1 Mach but poor elsewhere. The sense of the Hebrew text is best indicated in the Pent., least well in Is, Minor Proph., Job, Prov. Important variations from the MT, due to the translators and to be distinguished from those already indicated as due to a different Hebrew text, are the following: frequent omissions in Job amounting to a sixth of the text, some additions and amplifications in Prov, a rendering of Dan so different from the original that it was rejected in the third or fourth cent., and replaced by the version of Theodotion.

Later Greek Versions—For the better understanding of the history of LXX some account must be given here of the Greek versions made by Jews from the Hebrew text of the second cent. A.D. Disputes between Jews and Christians and the existence of a standard Hebrew text emphasized the differences between the text recognized by the Jews and the version to which the Christians appealed. The Hellenistic Jews in particular needed a Greek version of their official text for use in their synagogues and for polemical purposes. Three Greek versions of the whole Hebrew Bible were thus made in the second cent. by three Jews: Aquila (c 140), Symmachus (c 200) and Theodotion (c 180). According to St Jerome Aquila aimed at a word for word rendering, Symmachus sought to express the sense exactly, Theodotion reproduced with slight alterations the older LXX version. Three other anonymous translators of the poetical books are mentioned and cited by Origen. All these translations were utilized in his revision of the LXX.

History of the Septuagint—The natural and well attested tendency of most ancient revisers of the LXX was to bring it into closer conformity with the Hebrew text. In the Greek OT as in the NT deliberate alterations are largely due to harmonization. Hence in cases of variant readings a free rendering which differs from the Hebrew is usually preferred to a slavish rendering in agreement with the Hebrew. This is the chief reason why the Vatican cod. B, though by no means free from errors, is generally held to be the best witness to the original form of the text in the Greek OT as well as in the NT. The citations from LXX in Philo, Josephus and the NT rarely however exhibit B readings in disputed passages. NT citations from Dan agree with the later version of Theodotion against LXX. These OT citations in the NT may have been subsequently altered. It is more probable, however, that they are derived from a recension of LXX existing in the first cent. A.D. and later used by Theodotion.

Origen and the Hexapla—In compiling this monumental work c A.D. 240 Origen's aim was twofold: to aid Christian apologists in their disputes with the Jews by indicating exactly what was and what was not contained in the Hebrew text and to provide the Church with a uniform text by removing the variants found in the codices. The Hexapla is so called from the six corresponding columns into which it was divided and which contained respectively: (1) the Hebrew text in Hebrew letters; (2) the same in Greek letters; (3) Aquila; (4) Symmachus; (5) LXX; (6) Theodotion. An edition containing only the four Greek versions was called Tetrapla. The words Heptapla and Octopla are used to indicate the occasional addition of a seventh and eighth column containing extracts from the anonymous Greek versions mentioned above. The fifth column not only exhibited Origen's recension of the LXX text but also indicated how it differed from the Hebrew original. Words or groups of words not in the Hebrew were marked by an obelus (+ or -) while the deficiencies of the LXX supplied from the other Greek versions were marked by an asterisk. The end of the LXX redundancy or deficiency was also marked by a metobelus (: or / or /.). In establishing his LXX text Origen chose from the variant readings of the codices those which were supported by the later Greek versions. St Jerome rightly condemns this criterion as compromising the purity of the text. He also blames Origen for introducing into his fifth column passages from Theodotion's version (marked by asterisks). Origen followed the Hebrew order of the text in his Hexapla except in Prov, where however it was clearly indicated and Greek transpositions were marked by a combination of obeli and asterisks.

The Hexapla which must have numbered about 12,000 pages was too vast to be ever copied in its entirety. But the recension of the LXX text in the fifth column was widely diffused and highly esteemed. The use made of the later Greek versions if critically questionable was practically advantageous for an ecclesiastical text thus brought into closer conformity with the inspired Hebrew original. The textual confusion resulting from Origen's recension must be attributed to the scribes who failed to reproduce the asterisks and obeli in their copies. Only two codices G = Colberto-Sarravianus (Gen-Jg) and 88 = Chisianus (Proph.) exhibit a marked text. The recension is found without the marks in 376 426 (Gen-Jg), A 247 (Kg), V 253 (Wisdom books), Q (Proph.). The marks have also been preserved in a Syriac version and in Jerome's Latin recension of Job, but are missing in the Armenian version and the Gallican Psalter. Fragments of the Hexapla and parts of Aquila's version were recovered half a century ago from two palimpsests found respectively in the Ambrosian library at Milan and the geniza or lumber-room of a synagogue at Cairo. Other additions made to Field's collection of citations from the Hexapla in 1879, are still dispersed in various publications.

Recensions of Hesychius and Lucian—St Jerome informs us (Praef. in Paralipom.) that three important recensions of the LXX were made respectively by Hesychius at Alexandria, Origen at Caesarea, and Lucian at Antioch, and were in general use, each in the country of its origin. We have no other direct information about Hesychius but he is generally identified with the Hesychius, martyred at Alexandria c A.D. 300. The character of his recension which became the Egyptian text of the fourth and fifth cent. can only be deduced from the citations of the Egyptian Fathers 24a and the Coptic versions. It was closer to the Hebrew than that of Origen, having been emended directly from the Hebrew text as well as from the later Greek versions in the columns of the Hexapla, and is found in MV 29 121 (histor. books) and Q 86 198 233 (Proph.). Some writers less probably find this recension in B which however is usually pre-Hexaplar and most probably contains the neutral text which Hesychius and Origen revised.

b Lucian and his recension are much better known. He was a priest of the Church of Antioch, where he died a martyr in A.D. 312. He is particularly noted for his knowledge of Hebrew and his extensive use of the original text in his emendation of the LXX. His renderings are sometimes peculiar, but scarcely imply, as some have held, that his Hebrew text differed much from the MT. His recension is used in the commentaries of the great Antiochian exegetes, Chrysostom and Theodoretus, and is sometimes explicitly indicated in the MSS. by a marginal l. It is found in K 54 59 75 (Gen-Jg) ; 19 82 93 108 (histor. books) ; VZ 22 36 48 51 281 (Proph.). It displays the same characteristics as have been already noted in the Antiochian recension of the NT : clearness and elegance of language, conflation of readings from different codices, additions chiefly from Theodotion, harmonizing corrections from the Hebrew. The text which he revised was different from that used by Origen and Hesychius and less close to B. This recension though most widely diffused in Byzantine times did not however supplant the others like Lucian's NT recension. The chief difficulty in reconstituting the original text is the mixture of the recensions in the different codices.

c Editions of the LXX—The Polyglot Bible of Cardinal Ximenes (Alcala, 1517) exhibits mainly a Lucianic text. The Aldine edition (Venice, 1518) is more doubtfully regarded as Hesychian. The Vatican edition of Sixtus V (Rome, 1587) is based on B, but other codices were also used to supply lacunae and correct errors. The resultant text was so highly esteemed and so frequently reproduced by various editors that it may be called textus receptus. Grabe's edition (Oxford, 1707-20) is based on A with various emendations always expressly indicated. The first really critical edition was that of Holmes and Parsons entitled VT Graecum cum variis lectionibus (Oxford, 1798-1827). Though not always accurate it is still useful as a storehouse of materials. The edition of Tischendorf (Leipzig, 1869⁴) supervised by Nestle (ib. 1887⁷) has a revised Sixtine text with a critical apparatus derived from ASC. Lagarde's half-completed edition (Gen-Esth, Goettingen, 1883) is a reconstitution of Lucian's recension. Finally the Universities of Cambridge and Goettingen produced two minor editions of the LXX, Swete's in England (1894) and Rahlfs' in Germany (Stuttgart, 1935), and inaugurated two major editions of which the Pentateuch and the historical books (ed. Brooke and McClean) have already appeared in England and Ps (ed. Rahlfs), 1 Mac (ed. Kappler) and Is (ed. Ziegler) in Germany. The critical apparatus, generally restricted to the early uncials in the minor editions, is elaborate and carefully selected in the major editions. The printed text is traditional, that of B supplemented when necessary from S and A in the English editions, but critical as reconstituted by the editors in the German.

e Authority of the LXX—The substantial authenticity of our LXX text is critically established by the number and antiquity of the codices, all in substantial agreement, in which it is contained. Its authority as an authentic version of the inspired OT may be critically deduced from its substantial conformity with the MT and is dogmatically established by its exclusive use as the OT of the infallible Church for several centuries. The numerous critical studies of the codices during the last century, of which the fruits have now begun to appear, have for their object the restoration of the text to its original form. The older Hebrew text on which the LXX version is based can then be determined with some degree of confidence and critically 24e used to correct errors and clarify obscurities in the later MT.

The Targum—When Hebrew became a dead language, f unintelligible to the common people, the Palestinian Jews experienced the same need of an Aramaic version of the Bible as their Hellenistic brethren did of a Greek version. They preferred, however, to retain the sacred Hebrew text in their liturgy, but made it intelligible to all by adding an Aramaic version. Targum means 'version'. The Targums were ex tempore versions made by interpreters and preserved for centuries by oral tradition before they were committed to writing. They vary in origin, date, character and dialect. Three Targums of the Pentateuch are known, but only fragments of the earliest, called Jerusalemite or Palestinian, survive. The Targum of (Pseudo-) Jonathan derived from this renders the text freely and adds explanatory amplifications. The Targum of Onkelos (Aquila?) is Babylonian and renders the text as literally as Aquila rendered it in Greek. This Targum came into general use after the fourth cent. A.D. and was so highly esteemed as to be provided with a Massora. The Targum of the Prophets (histor. books and proph.) is attributed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, a disciple of Hillel, but belongs to the fifth cent. in its present form. It is not so literal as that of Onkelos especially in interpreting difficult passages. The Targums of the Sacred Writings show considerable variety. They are usually literal in Job, Ps, Prov, but very free and diffuse in the five Megilloth. In Job and Ps moreover double versions appear. In Prov the interpreter depends on the Syriac OT. Two Targums of Esther are extant but none of Dan and 1-2 Esdr. The Targums are less important for textual criticism than for the knowledge they give us of Jewish traditional interpretation. The principal ones will be found in the Polyglot Bibles and in the editions of A. Berliner (Onkelos; Berlin, 1884) and P. de Lagarde (Prophetæ, Hagiographa; Leipzig, 1872-73).

Syriac Versions of the OT. The Peshitta—The word h peshitta literally means 'simple' and, when applied to the Bible, indicates either the text of the simple and ordinary people as opposed to that of the learned or the simple text not marked with critical signs. The name first appears in the tenth cent. and distinguishes the Syriac version made from the Hebrew and in common use from later OT versions made from the Greek and of interest to scholars. The Peshitta OT, as attested by the early Syriac writers Aphraates and St Ephraem in the fourth cent., contained all the protocanonical books and Eccles translated from the Hebrew and the remaining deutero-canonical books rendered from the Greek. The Hebrew text used differed little from the MT and the translators were apparently Jewish Christians. The Jewish element predominated in the early Syriac church and the Targums exercised a considerable influence especially on the version of the Pentateuch. The version is 1 usually dated in the second cent. A.D. Though more homogeneous than the LXX it gives indications of different translators and different periods. The rendering is, however, generally clear and elegant, neither too literal nor too free. The Peshitta has many readings, especially in Ps, Is and Minor Proph., in agreement with the Greek version where it differs from the MT. These might be due to the original translators or to later revisers. The two hypotheses are not mutually exclusive but the second is by far the more probable. Greek culture penetrated among the Syrians when they became subject to Rome in the third cent. and there is abundant evidence from the fifth cent. onwards of the efforts they made to conform their biblical texts to those of their highly esteemed Greek neighbours of the school of Antioch. The codices of the Peshitta are remarkable for their antiquity, as many belong to the fifth-sixth cent., and for their general uniformity. The chief editions are those of the Paris and London Polyglots (XVI cent.)

241 of Lee (London, 1823) and the missionaries of Urmiah (1852), both incomplete, and (latest and best) that of the Dominican Press (Mosul, 1888). Critical editions of a few books have appeared but none of the whole OT (cf. W. E. Barnes, Peshitta Psalter, Cambridge, 1904; Pentateuchus syriace, London, 1914).

25a Syriac Versions of the LXX. 1. The Philoxenian—This version of the whole Greek Bible takes its name from Philoxenus, the Monophysite Bishop of Mabbug, the Syrian Hierapolis, at whose bidding it was made by a certain Polycarp, c 508. Only fragments of Is and Ps are extant from the OT. They have been edited by Ceriani (Monumenta sacra et profana 5, 1, Milan, 1873) and Mingana (Exp 8, 19 [1920], 149-60).

b 2. The Syro-Hexaplar—Paul, Bishop of Tella, by order of the Patriarch of Antioch, Athanasius, translated into Syriac the Hexaplar text of Origen in 615-17. The version is very literal, reproduces exactly the critical signs of the original and gives a number of variants from the later Greek versions. It is thus of the greatest importance for the reconstitution of Origen's text. The first part of the eighth cent. codex of the Ambrosian Library of Milan in which it was preserved was lost in the sixteenth cent. The second part, containing the later Prophets and Sacred Writings, was published by Ceriani (op. cit. 7) in 1874. 4 Kg and other fragments from Paris and London MSS were edited by P. de Lagarde (Goettingen, 1886).

c 3. The Syro-Palestinian—This version of the Greek OT and NT was probably made in the fifth cent. for the use of the Melkite Syrians of Palestine. It is particularly remarkable for its west Syrian dialect, generally regarded as the best representative of the language used by Christ and his Apostles. It first became known from lectionaries of late date, but fragments were subsequently discovered in various codices, chiefly palimpsests, dating back to the sixth cent. and showing that the version was not restricted to merely liturgical texts. Of the deuterocanonical books Ecclus and Wis are represented. The text is hexaplaric and is entirely unaffected by eastern Syriac tradition. The most complete collection of the texts is that of H. Duensing, Christlich-palaestinisch-aramäische Texte und Fragmente, Goettingen, 1906.

d Syriac Versions of the NT. 1. The Diatessaron—The first Syriac version of the Gospels was a harmonized narrative, called in Greek Gospel by means of the Four (i.e. Evangelists) and in Syriac Gospel of the Mixed (i.e. Evangelists). It is still disputed whether the original harmony was written in Greek or in Syriac, but the recent discovery of a Greek fragment at Dura-Europos in NE Syria dated c 225 shows that it was used in the east in Greek form at a very early period. Its author was Tatian, Syrian by birth but Greek by education. He was a disciple of St Justin, whom he accompanied to Rome and whose school he directed after his master's martyrdom, c 166. Later he returned to the east where he manifested heretical tendencies, condemning marriage and the use of wine and flesh meat, c 172. Traces of these tendencies in his work confirm its traditional authorship and indicate its approximate date. Tatian's object was to provide his countrymen with a popular life of Christ, compiled from its four authoritative sources after the fashion of oriental historians, and freed by harmonization from the difficulties encountered by ordinary readers in establishing the chronological order of events and reconciling the variations of the different evangelists.

e His skill in arranging his materials and the charm of his presentation of the Gospel narratives are universally recognized and explain the success of his work. Our knowledge of it is chiefly derived from an Arabic eleventh cent. version of a Syriac Diatessaron, in which however the later Peshitta text had been generally substituted for that of Tatian, and from a fifth cent. Armenian version of St Ephraem's Syriac commentary. The later Latin harmony and its derivatives are also helpful. From these we conclude that the original order of the Diatessaron has been preserved in the Arabic version and that it contained some important passages attested by the western and the Antiochian, but not by the eastern recension. The text and sources of Tatian remain uncertain. There is an English version of the Arabic Diatessaron by J. H. Hill (Edinburgh, 1910³). The most recent critical edition with French translation is that of A. S. Marmardji (Beirut, 1936). Moesinger published Ephraem's comm. in Latin (Venice 1876). A 13th cent. Persian translation of a very interesting Syriac Diatessaron is described by its discoverer, G. Messina, in Bi 24 (1943) 59-106.

2. Gospel of the Separate (Evangelists)—Two Syriac codices of the separate Gospels were discovered within the last century, one, called Curetonian from its first editor, in a monastery of the Nitrian desert in Upper Egypt, the other, a palimpsest, called Sinaitic though of N. Syrian origin, in the monastery of St Catherine on Mt Sinai. They have approximately the same date (5th cent.) and the same type of text (western) and, though both incomplete, exhibit together nearly the whole four Gospels. This Syriac version, later than the Diatessaron but earlier than the Peshitta NT, was most probably made in the third-fourth cent. Under the title Evangelion da Mepharreshe F. C. Burkitt has edited the Curetonian text with the variants of Sin. (Cambridge, 1904) and A. S. Lewis the Sin. text, which she discovered, with the variants of Cur. (London, 1910). With these Gospels may be associated the first Syriac version of the Ac and the Pauline Epistles, attested by Armenian versions of Ephraem's commentaries and exhibiting undoubtedly in the Ac, but less markedly in the Epistles, the same western type of text. No trace remains of other books of the NT included doubtless in this early version.

3. The Peshitta NT—Rabbula, Metropolitan of Edessa (411-35), according to his almost contemporary biographer, made a fresh translation of the NT from Greek into Syriac and ordered the separate Gospels to be read in the churches instead of the Diatessaron. This translation or recension is generally identified with the Peshitta NT, used by all Syriac writers, whether Jacobites, Nestorians or Catholics, after c 450. A new version universally received must have emanated from a source of outstanding authority and at a time prior to the disruption of the Syrian Church after the Council of Chalcedon. In Rabbula we have the time and the man. The Peshitta was probably a recension rather than a new translation and may be compared to the slightly earlier NT recension of St Jerome. It resembles it in aiming at fidelity and correctness of language and retaining many expressions consecrated by usage, but differs from it in its type of text, not eastern but Antiochian. The original Peshitta omitted 2 Pet, 2-3 Jn, Jude and Apoc, added in the codices from later versions. As in the OT the codices are remarkable for their antiquity and their uniformity. G. H. Gwilliam's Tetraevangelium Sanctum (Oxford, 1901) is an excellent critical edition of the Gospels. His revision of Ac, Pauline Epistles, Jas, 1 Pet, 1 Jn and J. Gwynn's edition of 2 Pet, 2-3 Jn, Jude and Apoc are incorporated in the Bible Society's NT in Syriac (London, 1920).

4. The Heraklean NT—It is still disputed whether the Heraklean version of Syriac tradition is identical or not with the NT of the Philoxenian Bible mentioned above, § 25a. The latter was intended for the Monophysites and rendered the Greek much more literally than the Peshitta. Thomas of Harkel, according to his own account, merely provided the Philoxenian NT text c 616 with critical signs (obeli and asterisks) and marginal notes derived from a collation of three Greek MSS. The obeli undoubtedly marked words or passages not in the Greek and to be omitted. The asterisks must therefore have marked words and passages to be retained as attested in the Greek and consequently authentic. The marginal notes supplied variants from the Greek MSS consulted. It is more probable therefore that Thomas retained the Philoxenian text while providing materials for its revision.

- 25] Gwynn's edition of the lacunae in the Peshitta NT (Dublin, 1897 and 1909) exhibits a version undoubtedly different from the Heraklean and resembling the Peshitta in the freedom with which the Greek is rendered. It seems therefore that the missing books of the Peshitta were translated into Syriac before the Philoxenian version. The marginal variants of the Heraklean NT exhibit a western type of text. The only edition is that of J. White (Oxford, 1778-1803).
- k 5. The Syro-Palestinian—To the remarks already made on the OT version it may be added that the NT exhibits a marked dependence on Origenian tradition in the place names and seems to be based on a Caesarean text.
- l Coptic Versions of the Bible—Coptic is the language of the Egyptians, written in Greek letters with some supplementary characters, in the first cent. A.D. Though it is less well adapted than either Latin or Syriac to give an exact rendering of Greek texts the Coptic versions of the Greek Bible are nevertheless of great critical as well as historical importance owing to the types of text which they exhibit. They are written in five different dialects: Sahidic (S. or Upper Egypt), Bohairic (N. or Lower Egypt), Fayumic, Achmimic and Subachmimic or Assiutic (Middle Egypt). Of these Sahidic and Bohairic are the most important. All the NT except a few verses is extant in these two dialects and has been published with English translation and critical apparatus by G. Horner (The Coptic Version of the NT in the Northern Dialect, 4 vol., Oxford, 1898-1905, in the Southern Dialect, 7 vol., ibid. 1911-24).
- m Only parts of the less complete OT have appeared in scattered publications. The Sahidic version is usually assigned to the third cent., the Bohairic to the fifth. The need of a vernacular rendering was felt earlier in S. Egypt and among the monks of the Thebaid than in N. Egypt where Greek was better known. The Bohairic exhibits moreover the greater precision and skill in translation which usually distinguishes later versions from earlier ones. A Sahidic Papyrus codex of OT fragments and Ac (Brit. Mus. Or. 7594) belongs to the very beginning of the fourth cent.
- n Both Sahidic and Bohairic versions of the NT exhibit in the main an eastern type of text. The Sahidic has however many readings, but none of the manifestly spurious additions, of the western text. The Bohairic has a purer eastern text with some Antiochian contaminations. Thus the versions confirm the testimony of the papyri to the existence of a western type of text in Egypt in the second cent., gradually replaced by the better eastern type. The change, begun in the north, took some time to reach the south. The Sahidic has a mixed text in the Ac, the Bohairic and the Chester Beatty papyrus (early 3rd cent.) a relatively pure eastern text. The Coptic versions of the OT were made from the Greek, not the Hebrew, and include the deuterocanonical books. Though sometimes emended from other Greek codices they generally follow B. Fragments of the Sahidic Job in the Vatican library are uncontaminated by hexaplar additions.
- 26a Armenian and Georgian Versions—These versions may be considered together since it is now fairly certain that the Georgians derived their version from that of their Armenian neighbours. The latter, when converted to Christianity c 300, were alphabetic and seem to have first used the Syriac Scriptures. Traces of a Syriac Diatessaron have been discovered in their liturgy. The invention of their alphabet derived from the Greek is attributed to a certain Mesrop and was immediately followed by the translation of the Scriptures into Armenian undertaken by the Patriarch Isaac (390-440). There are independent reasons for dating the practically contemporary Georgian version before 450. The Armenian version of the separate Gospels was made directly from the Greek. Its many Syriacisms are best explained as due to the original translators who reproduced Syriac expressions from their Diatessaron. The Armenian language is an excellent medium of translation and the version is both faithful and elegant. The critical importance of the Armenian and Georgian versions is derived from the Origenian text of the OT and the Caesarean text of the Gospels which they exhibit. A plausible explanation of the existence of such a text at Constantinople is provided by the fifty Bibles copied in Palestine for the Emperor Constantine by Eusebius of Caesarea. The earliest codices of both versions belong to the eighth-ninth cent. The best edition of the Armenian Bible is that of J. Zohrab (Venice, 1805) which gives a collection of variant readings. Mt and Mk have already appeared in the excellent critical edition of the Georgian NT by R. P. Blake in Patr. Orient., 20, 3 (Mk 1929) and 24, 1 (Mt 1933).
- e Gothic Version—According to the historian Philostorgius the Gothic Bishop Ulfilas (+383) translated the whole Bible except Kgs into Gothic. More than half the Gospel text is extant in the sixth cent. Codex Argenteus now at Uppsala but of North Italian origin. There are fragments of other books in various MSS. The type of text is Antiochian revised from the Old Latin. (Cf. W. Streitberg, Die gotische Bibel, 2 vol., Heidelberg, 1919-20, and W. S. Friedrichsen, The Gothic Version of the Gospels, Oxford, 1926.)
- d Arabic Versions—There is no definite indication of an Arabic rendering of the Scriptures before the eighth cent. The Gospels and other books of the NT were then first translated from the Syriac Peshitta. The later version of the Syriac Diatessaron already mentioned is the only Arabic scriptural text of critical importance. The OT was translated from the Hebrew by Saadiya Gaon in the tenth cent. Other and probably earlier versions were made from the Syriac Peshitta and the Greek LXX. The Arabic text in the Paris and London Polyglots is partly from the MT (Pent.), partly from the Peshitta (Histor. Books and Job), and partly from the LXX (Prophets and Wisdom Books).
- e Ethiopic Version—As the Ethiopians or Abyssinians were converted to Christianity in the fourth cent., the version of the Bible in their native language called Ge'ez must have been begun at latest in the fifth. It was most probably based on a Greek text of the B type and of Egyptian origin but not always correctly translated. This version was subsequently revised first from the Sahidic and later (c 13th cent.) from Arabic texts. The revision is occasionally manifested by double translations. The codices do not antedate the thirteenth cent. The only complete edition of the O and NT is that of the Italian Catholic Mission (Asmara, 1920-26). There are critical editions of parts of the OT by Dillmann (Leipzig, 1853-94), Bachmann (Berlin and Halle, 1893), Pereira (Patr. Orient., 2.9.13) and Lofgren (Paris, 1927, and Uppsala, 1930).
- f Slavonic Version—This is the latest version made directly from the Greek in the ninth cent. by the Slavonic Apostles, SS. Cyrillus and Methodius, who provided their converts with an alphabet derived from the Greek and a vernacular version of some of the sacred books. The version was generally believed to exhibit the Antiochian text then used in Constantinople. Of late, however, it is contended that the earlier codices (10th-11th cent.) differ from the later in presenting many Hesychian and Caesarean readings. The translators would then have derived their text from a codex of their monastery near Brussa. Gennadius of Novgorod completed the version from the Vg in the fifteenth cent.
- 27a The Old Latin Versions—The name indicates the versions of the Scriptures used in the Western Church before the introduction of the Vulgate of St. Jerome. The need of a Latin version was felt earlier in the provinces than at Rome where Greek was better understood and more generally spoken. There is some indication of such a version in Gaul in 177 and the books and Pauline Epistles possessed by the martyrs of Scillium, who knew no Greek, attest the existence of a Latin version in Africa in 180. Tertullian confirms this attestation though he usually prefers his own render-27a ings from the Greek. The numerous and consistent citations of St Cyprian indicate an African Latin version of the whole Bible and enable us to determine some of the codices in which it is found. The earliest indications of a Latin version at Rome belong to the middle of the third cent.

b St Augustine and St Jerome distinctly affirm the multiplicity of the Old Latin versions. Similarities of expression found in most codices are explained by the use made of earlier versions by later translators. It is now generally admitted that the older African is distinct from the later Italian version. The earlier version, as might be expected, is ruder and freer than the later. Hence St Augustine in a famous passage seems to prefer the Itala, which he discovered at Milan, to the African interpretations, which he previously used, as combining a more literal rendering of the Greek with a clear indication of the sense, verborum tenacior cum perspicuitate sententiae. This preference may have been particularly suggested by the version of the Pauline Epistles subsequently used by the Saint and partially extant in r (Les fragments de Freising, ed. De Bruyne, Rome, 1921). The vexed question of the Itala is discussed by B. Botte in DBVS 4 (1948) 777-82.

c The fragmentary remains of the Old Latin versions were collected and edited by P. Sabatier, Bibliorum sacrorum latinae versiones, 3 tom., Paris, 1751. A new edition is in preparation. Old Latin Biblical Texts (OLBT), Oxford, 1883-... and Collectanea Biblica Latina (CBL), Rome, 1912-... supplement Sabatier.

d Character and Value of the Old Latin Versions—All the versions are from the Greek and in popular Latin suited to the lower classes for whom they were intended. They are thus linguistically important for the study of the evolution of the Latin language. The early renderings, always literal but often mechanical and inexact, have little exegetical but much critical value as witnesses to the Greek text of the second cent. Unfortunately however the original versions are contaminated in the codices by the later Greek recensions. The NT exhibits predominantly a western type of text. Many codices have been revised from the Vulgate. The citations of the early Latin Fathers are the chief means of distinguishing in doubtful cases between Old Latin and Vulgate readings.

e The Latin Vulgate Version—The Latin Church owes its Bible to St Jerome (c 340-420), admirably fitted for his task by his learning and piety and the authority which he enjoyed among his contemporaries. He first in 383 ff. emended from the Greek the Old Latin versions of the NT. He next in 386 ff. emended the Old Latin versions of the protocanonical books of the OT from the Greek Hexapla. The Vulgate or Gallican Psalter belongs to this emendation. He finally in 390 ff. rendered the OT directly into Latin from the Hebrew and Aramaic. The NT emendation, undertaken at the bidding of Pope Damasus, was received with general applause and spread rapidly over the whole Latin Church. The OT version from the Hebrew, a private enterprise, encountered much initial opposition, but gradually imposed itself by its intrinsic merits and after two or three centuries secured universal recognition. Instead of the Hebrew Psalter, however, the Hexaplar version, called Gallican from its early popularity in Gaul, was used everywhere except at Rome and Milan.

f The Vulgate NT—St Jerome's object in emending the NT was to replace the discordant and corrupt Latin versions by a uniform and correct text. He selected therefore early Greek codices, free from harmonizations and later additions, and from them corrected the Latin codices. He improved the Latinity of previous translators but retained their diction when it rendered the sense correctly. As the Greek codices which he used were chiefly of the S and B types he thus endowed the Latin Church with a version revised from the more correct eastern text. St Jerome's revision of the NT is unduly restricted to the Gospels by a few critics. He himself repeatedly affirms that he revised the NT. 271 The other books of the Vg NT exhibit the same characteristics as the Gospels and are united with them in the codices. The Gospels, however, more deeply corrupted by harmonizations, were revised more carefully. An excellent critical text of the Vg NT has been published by Wordsworth and White in a complete minor (Oxford, 1911) and nearly complete major edition (ib. 1889-...).

g The Vulgate OT—Much more difficult than the emendation of the NT was the substitution for the Latin version of the LXX, sanctioned by ecclesiastical tradition, of a new version of the inspired Hebrew text used by Christ and his Apostles. Recognizing the impossibility of correctly interpreting a text not previously well understood, St Jerome first spent long years under Jewish instructors in acquiring a thorough knowledge of Hebrew and Aramaic. He did not aim at a literal rendering, but sought instead to reproduce the exact sense of the original in elegant Latin. His translation, though not free from defects, mostly inevitable in the time and circumstances, has been universally praised for its clearness, fidelity and elegance. Agreement with the Targum attests at times the influence of his Jewish preceptors. He also utilized the Greek versions of Aquila and Symmachus. Sometimes he retained the LXX interpretation either through haste or out of respect for tradition.

h History of the Vulgate Text—From its origin until the Council of Trent the text of the Vulgate suffered much from Old Latin interpolations, scribal errors and unskilled correctors. The MS tradition is chiefly represented by two families, the Italian and the Spanish. The Italian cod. Amiatinus is generally regarded as the best of all the surviving codices. It was copied c 700 in a Northumbrian monastery from an excellent ancient codex of Roman origin and contains the whole Bible. The early English Gospel codices Lindisfarnensis, Oxoniensis, Cantabrigiensis and the codices Karolinus, Rorionis, Paulinus, Turicensis, Vallicellanus, which contain the recension of the whole Bible presented by Alcuin to Charlemagne in 801, are based on the Amiatinus. The early south Italian Fuldensis and Epternacensis and the north Italian Mediolanensis, Foroiulianus, Anconitanus and Sangallensis are closely akin to it. Except for the Amiatinus and its derivatives, the early Anglo-Saxon and Celtic Vulgate MSS have little critical but in some cases great artistic value (cf. S. Berger, Histoire de la Vulgate, ch 3). The oldest and best representative of the Spanish family is the Pentateuchus Turonensis sixth-seventh cent. Later come the Cavenensis (9th cent.) and the Toletanus, Legionensis, and Complutensis (10th cent.). The much interpolated recension of the Visigoth Theodulphus, Bishop of Orleans (†827), contained in the codd. Mesmianus, Sangermanensis parvus, Anicianus, Hubertianus, and less popular than the Alcuinian recension which it contaminated, is based on Spanish tradition. The next important stage in the history of the Vulgate is the establishment of a uniform text for the students of the University of Paris. The Paris Bible first exhibits the division into chapters introduced by Stephen Langton in 1214. Its corruptions produced many correctoria. The first printed Vulgate Bible, produced by Gutenberg at Mainz in 1452, and those which immediately followed it exhibit the corrupt Parisian text. A better text based on Italian codices was edited by Leonardus Basileensis at Vicenza in 1476. Marginal corrections and variants first appear in the edition of Alb. Castellanus (Venice, 1511). Critical editions based on a collation of various codices followed, of which the Stephanian (Paris, 1528) and the Hitorpian Cologne, 1530) may be mentioned. The Stephanian edition of 1555 is memorable as the first to contain the division of the whole text into verses indicated by marginal numbers. Other critical editions either added to or substituted for the Vulgate in various places new interpretations. Finally entirely 27] new Latin versions like those of the NT by Erasmus (Basel, 1511) and the OT by Sebast. Munsterus (ib., 1534) made their appearance. The confusion and uncertainty produced by the number and variety of the Latin biblical editions emphatically demanded a remedy from the Council of Trent. The Church required a trustworthy and uniform text.

28a The Vulgate and the Council of Trent—The corruption of the Vulgate text and the rejection of its authority were the evils to be remedied. The Council, therefore, in the second decree of its sixth session in 1546 proclaimed the juridical authenticity of the Vulgate and ordered the preparation and publication of a corrected edition of its text. Eadem sacrosancta Synodus considerans non parum utilitatis accedere posse Ecclesiae Dei, si ex omnibus latinis editionibus quae circumferuntur sacrarum librorum, quoniam pro authentica habenda sit, innotescit, statuit et declarat, ut haec ipsa vetus et Vulgata editio, quae longo tot saeculorum usu in ipsa Ecclesia probata est, in publicis lectionibus, disputationibus, praedicationibus et expositionibus, pro authentica habeatur et ut nemo illam reicere quovis praetextu audeat vel praesumat . . . Sed et impressoribus modum in hac parte, ut par est, imponere volens . . . decernit et statuit, ut posthac S. Scriptura, potissimum vero haec ipsa vetus et Vulgata editio quam emendatissime imprimatur.

b Sense of the Decree—The decree is not concerned with the original texts or the various non-Latin versions but only with Latin editions of the sacred text. It does not judge or condemn any of these but prefers the Vulgate to the others and declares it the official Bible of the Latin Church. The essential requisite of an official Bible at all times and especially at the time of the decree was freedom from doctrinal error. The preference accorded to the Vulgate was based therefore not on its critical but on its doctrinal accuracy. Its long use and approbation in the Infallible Church guaranteed its substantial conformity with the original texts and its definite authority in matters of faith and morals. It was therefore declared authentic or authoritative in the sense that its testimony in doctrinal matters can never be legitimately rejected. Its accuracy in other respects is neither asserted nor implied. In his recent Encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu Pius XII stresses the fact that the decree applies only to the Latin Church and the public use of the Scriptures and that it in no way diminishes the authority and value of the original texts in corroborating, confirming and elucidating Catholic doctrine (cf. AAS 35 (1943) 309).

c The Emendation of the Vulgate Text—A reconstitu-

tion of the text of St. Jerome according to the modern 28c canons of textual criticism could scarcely be expected at this period. Nevertheless the third Congregation of Cardinals appointed to prepare the new emended edition under the presidency of Cardinal Carafa in 1586, if we may judge from the record of their labours preserved in the Codex Carafianus, would have produced an excellent critical text had not Sixtus V rejected their corrections and himself prepared the Sixtine edition of the Vulgate, published at the new Vatican Press in 1590. This edition, recognized as needing correction even by Sixtus himself, was almost immediately withdrawn from circulation. The new and final edition of Clement VIII in 1592, prepared by Toletus, left much to be desired from the critical point of view. It was not until 1907 however that an official revision of the Vulgate text was undertaken by Pius X. The Benedictines to whom the work was assigned have already published an excellent text with a full critical apparatus of Gen-Kings. More recently Pius XII ordered the preparation of a new Latin version of the Psalter from the original texts, published in 1945, and permitted the use of this version in the daily recitation of the Breviary.

Vernacular Versions—Versions of the whole or of part d of the Bible in the language of the common people appear first in England and Germany in the eighth cent., in France and Hungary in the twelfth, in Italy, Spain, Holland, Poland and Bohemia in the thirteenth. The decree of the Council of Trent makes no reference to such versions, but the question was raised in the deliberations of the Council, and Cardinal Madruzzo emphatically declared that they should be not only permitted but encouraged. Subsequent Catholic vernacular versions were naturally from the official text of the Vulgate. The progress recently made in determining the original form of the Hebrew and Greek texts and the desire to provide the faithful with scriptural versions, not only doctrinally sound like the Vulgate, but also critically exact and accurately rendered, have produced in recent years numerous Catholic vernacular versions from the original texts. The use of these, previously restricted to private reading, has been extended by Pius XII, in a decree of the Biblical Commission in 1943, to public reading and instructions; see § 53b-d. An authoritative interpretation of the decree by the Secretary of the Biblical Commission will be found in Bi 27 (1946) 319; see § 53c. The Church desires the faithful to be spiritually nourished from the best possible rendering and interpretation of the original inspired texts.

THE HISTORY OF THE RHEIMS-DOUAY VERSION

By HUGH POPE, O.P.

(originally written by the late Fr Hugh Pope, O.P. (†1946), and since rewritten by Fr Sebastian Bullough, O.P.)

29a Bibliography—Preface to Rheims NT, 1582; Preface to Douay OT, 1609; N. Wiseman, Catholic Versions of Scripture, DR 2 (1837) 475 ff., repr. in Essays on Various Subjects, Vol. 1; *H. Cotton, Rhemes and Douay, 1855 (a work of bibliography and collation that no student of the subject can neglect, though the viewpoint is hostile, and details occasionally incomplete or inaccurate); J. H. Newman, History of the Text of the Rheims and Douay Version of Holy Scripture, in the Rambler, July 1859, repr. in Tracts Theological and Ecclesiastical, ed. 1895, p. 403 (important); J. G. Shea, A Bibliographical Account of Catholic Bibles and Testaments translated from the Latin Vulgate and printed in the United States, 1859; E. B. O'Callaghan, A List of the Editions of the Holy Scriptures printed in America previous to 1860, 1861; J. Gillow, Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics, art. Martin, Challoner, Pinkard, Haydock; *J. G. Carleton, The Part of Rheims in the Making of the English Bible, 1902; E. H. Burton, Life and Times of Bishop Challoner, 1, 270–89, 1909; B. Ward, The Eve of Catholic Emancipation, 2, 189–204, 1911; J. S. Phillimore, Scripture Versions and Variants, DR 170 (1922) 20–46 (important judgement on DV style); H. Pope, O.P., CSAB 1, 246–73; Newton Thompson, Verbal Concordance to the Rheims NT, 1928; Newton Thompson and R. Stock, Concordance to the Bible (DV), 1942; R. A. Knox, 'Challoner and the DV', in Richard Challoner, 33–6, 1946, repr. in On Englishing the Bible, 41–8, 1949; H. Pope, O.P., The MacMahon Bibles, IER 68 (1946), 1–11; T. Connely, The Haydock Bible, in Scripture 1 (1946) 81–5; R. C. Fuller, Bishop Challoner and the Douay Bible, in Scripture 2 (1947) 8–18; W. J. Anderson, A Note on the Challoner Revision, in Scripture 2 (1947) 42 f.; H. Pope, O.P., English Versions of the Bible, 1952.

In the standard histories of the English Bible Rheims-Douay is usually mentioned, but quite inadequately, e.g. in *J. Eadie, The English Bible, 1876; *W. F. Moulton, The History of the English Bible, 1878, 1911; *J. H. Dore, Old Bibles, 1888; *B. F. Westcott, A General View of the History of the English Bible, 1905 (good but brief); *J. Mombert, The English Versions, 1907; *F. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, 1939 (very inadequate); *I. M. Price (revised ed.), The Ancestry of our English Bible, 1949; *L. A. Weigle, The English NT, 1949.

b General Observations—The standard Catholic Bible in use for three and a half centuries has been the Douay Version, and the present commentary uses that text. The name comes from that of the OT volumes published at Douay in 1609–10. The NT had already been published, in 1582, at Rheims. The correct term for the NT is therefore the Rheims Version, with the name Douay for the OT, or by extension for the whole Bible, subsequent publications of the OT alone having been very rare. In the original editions the place-names were anglicized: Rhemes and Doway; and it is worth noting that although the spelling now used is closer to the French, the old English pronunciation has always remained current among Catholics. Both the NT and OT were translated by Gregory Martin at Rheims, whither the English College of Douay removed for fifteen years, from 1578 to 1593, and where he was Professor of Theology, Scripture, Hebrew and Greek from 1578 until his death in 1582. The printing of the OT was postponed until after the College had returned to Douay, where the President, Dr Worthington, saw it through the press in 1609–10.

Yet the Rheims-Douay version, as we know it now, does not present the text as it left Dr Martin's hands: first of all Dr Witham published a revision of the Rheims NT in 1730, with new notes. This revision was, however, soon superseded by the several revisions made by Dr Challoner between the years 1749 and 1772, and it is on these that our current editions are based. Thus it is more exact to refer to our present texts as 'Rheims-Challoner' or 'Douay-Challoner'. During the century following Challoner's death (1781) there was much confusion in the subsequent editing of the text, but during the last sixty years a fairly stable text has emerged, and the variants in current editions are in fact only in small details. In 1935 and 1941 fresh revisions were made in America. The history of the Version is therefore somewhat complex, and is best divided as follows for more detailed study: I The Situation before Rheims, II The Original Rheims and Douay, III The work of Dr Challoner, IV Subsequent editions of Challoner's text, and V The Present State of the Text. An Appendix will mention modern revisions, and include a note on Catholic versions independent of the Rheims-Douay-Challoner tradition.

I The Situation before Rheims—The earlier history of English vernacular versions is simply outlined in the Preface to Rheims (1582), where mention is made of Bede's translations, of versions 'extant in English even before the troubles that Wycliffe and his followers raised in our midst', and of the 'provincial constitution of Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, in a Council holden at Oxford [1408], where strait provision was made that no heretical version . . . should be suffered nor . . . permitted to be read, being not approved and allowed by the Diocesan before. . . . So also it is there insinuated that . . . [no lawful translations] were ever in our country wholly forbidden'. The subject of the Pre-Wycliffite Bibles is a controversial one, and may here as well be left in Gregory Martin's terms.

With regard, however, to printed texts, we are on more certain ground. The first printing of a biblical text in English was that of John Fisher's Penitential Psalms in 1505 (by Pynson), again printed in 1508, 1509, 1525 and 1529 by Wynken de Worde, and in 1510 again by Pynson. Most of these had appeared before Tyndale's NT of 1525, justly acclaimed as the first printed NT in English. Tyndale's Protestant text was soon followed by others, Coverdale's Bible 1535, 'Matthew's' Bible (J. Rogers) 1537, the Great Bible 1539 (often known as Cranmer's because of his preface to the 2nd ed.), Taverner's 1539, the Geneva (Whittingham) 1560, and the 'Bishops' Bible' 1568; to which should be added the English translations of Erasmus' Latin NT in 1540, and of Beza's in 1576, the latter, by Tomson, soon replacing the NT in the Geneva Bible (from 1603). (AV, 1611, of course came after both Rheims and Douay.)

The above were the texts of which Dr Allen, president of Douay College, wrote in 1578: 'Our adversaries, however, have at their finger tips from some heretical version all those passages of Scripture which seem to make for them, and by a certain deceptive adaptation 29g and alteration of the sacred words produce the effect of appearing to say nothing but what comes from the Bible. This evil might be remedied if we too had some Catholic version of the Bible, for all the English versions are most corrupt. . . . If his Holiness shall judge it expedient, we ourselves will endeavour to have the Bible faithfully, purely, and genuinely translated according to the edition approved by the Church, for we already have men most fitted for the work' (Letters and Memorials of Cardinal Allen, ed. Knox, pp 64 f., in Latin).

b II The Original Rheims (1582) and Douay (1609-10)

—The task was entrusted to Gregory Martin, an illustrious scholar of St John's, Oxford, who had been compelled to flee to Douay in 1570. Dr William Allen, later Cardinal, and at the time President of Douay, was also an Oxford man (Oriell), who had had to leave Oxford in 1561. The two others who were concerned were Richard Bristow and William Reynolds, both Oxford men (Exeter and New) and converts. The Douay Diary for 1578 has the entry: 'On Oct. 16 or thereabouts Mr Martin started translating the Bible into English in the hope of thus providing an antidote to the corrupt heretical versions which have been so long a misery to nearly everybody in our own land. With a view to the speedy production of what will, we trust, prove an exceedingly useful work, he will translate two chapters a day; while to secure its exactitude, Drs Allen and Bristow will read them carefully and, if need be, make any corrections which prudence may demand'. Four years later (March 1582): 'This month the final touches were given to the English version of the New Testament' (Records of the English Catholics [= Douay Diaries I & II], pp 145, 186, in Latin). It is not now certain what share the others had beyond revision: the translation is entirely Martin's, Bristow perhaps wrote the notes (though he died already in 1581), Allen had worked in Rome on the preparation of the Sixtine Vulgate, and Reynolds it was who came in 1583 to write a refutation of the attacks upon Martin's work. It is very important to emphasize that these men were the very flower of Oxford scholarship, most learned men, and (as Dr Worthington put it in the Preface to Douay) 'well known to the world, to have been excellent in the tongues, sincere men, and great divines', for these facts have been obscured by the obloquy that was poured on them from England at the time, and by the oblivion into which they fell in later years. If their version is considered to lack literary grace, it must be realized that this was done of set purpose.

1 The NT was published at Rheims in 1582 at a cost of 1,500 crowns, 1,000 of which had been collected by Fr Persons. The title page runs: The New Testament of Jesus Christ, translated faithfully into English, out of the authentical Latin, according to the best corrected copies of the same, diligently conferred with the Greek and other editions in divers languages. With the Arguments of books and chapters, Annotations and other necessary helps for the better understanding of the text, and specially for the discovery of the corruptions of divers late translations, and for clearing the controversies in religion of these days. In the English College of Rheims . . . Printed at Rheims, by John Fagny, 1582.

2 The publication of the NT provoked an immediate storm of abuse from the Protestants. William Fulke of Cambridge had already in 1583 written a tract against one of Martin's on the corruption of Scripture by Protestants; in 1583 William Whitaker attacked Martin's version, and similar attacks were launched by Thomas Bilson in 1585 and by George Wither and Edmund Bulkeley in 1588. In 1589 Fulke returned to the fray and published the Rheims text in parallel with the Bishops' Bible (at that time the official version of the Church of England), with the object of indicating the errors of Rheims, although this edition and its three reprints probably served to bring the Rheims version to the notice of many who might not otherwise have seen it, among whom were probably the framers k of the Authorized Version itself. But meanwhile 29k preparations continued and Dr Worthington published the first volume of the OT (Gen-Job) at Douay in 1609, and the second (Ps-Mac) in 1610, the translation being Martin's, but the notes, preface, tables, etc., his own. The title page runs: The Holy Bible, faithfully translated into English out of the authentical Latin. Diligently conferred with the Hebrew, Greek and other editions [etc. as in Rheims]. Printed at Douay by Laurence Kellam at the sign of the holy Lamb, MDCIX. The principal cause of delay (the Preface says) was 'our poor estate in banishment', but there was also, since 1582, the matter of the revision of the Vulgate text itself, the Sixtine edition appearing in 1590 and the definitive Clementine text in 1592. Dr Worthington in the preface says: 'we have again conferred this English translation, and conformed it to the most perfect Latin Edition'.

Both Rheims and Douay were provided with lengthy 1 prefaces, both of which are at pains to defend three main contentions: (1) That the Catholic Church has never forbidden vernacular versions—indeed many had appeared during the previous 300 years—but that she had expressly forbidden the use of heretical versions ('no other books in the world being so pernicious'), and always required the approval of lawful authority. At the present time a special necessity had arisen, which prompted the publication of this text. (2) That m the translation was deliberately made from the Latin Vulgate rather than from the original tongues principally because of the uncertainty of the existing Greek text compared with the considerable security of the existing Latin. Let us here add that subsequent studies of the Greek text, showing the corruption of the editions then current, have amply justified the wisdom of this move. One of the Protestant gibes at the time was this translation from the Latin, but we should observe that of all the Protestant versions that had by then appeared (cf. above f), only Tyndale's was truly a translation of the original: Coverdale's is from the Latin, and the others were all revisions of the preceding translations, ultimately Tyndale's or Coverdale's, though Taverner did consult the Greek, and Geneva both the Greek and the Hebrew; yet the Rhemish translators made no less a claim when they 'diligently conferred' their text with the original. (3) That the translation was deliberately n literal: 'following our copy . . . sometimes in the very words and phrases, which may seem to the vulgar reader and to common English ears not yet acquainted therewith, rudeness or ignorance: but to the discreet reader that deeply weigheth and considereth the importance of sacred words and speeches, and how easily the voluntary translator may miss the true sense of the Holy Ghost, we doubt not but our consideration and doing therein shall seem reasonable and necessary: yea, and that all sorts of Catholic readers will in short time think that familiar, which at first may seem strange, and will esteem it more when they shall otherwise be taught to understand it, than if it were the common known English' (Rheims preface). Herein lies an important principle: that rather than bring down the sacred text to the level of ordinary language, everyday language must be enlarged to accommodate the language of Scripture. A glossary was therefore provided at the end of the NT, containing 'the explication of certain words in this translation, not familiar to the vulgar reader, which might not conveniently be uttered otherwise'. Some of these are purely biblical terms, such as Pasche, Azymes, Parasceve, etc., while others were regarded as theological technical terms which should be learned and understood ('far better to keep in the text and to tell their signification in the margin or in a table for that purpose, than to disgrace both the text and them with translating them'—Rheims preface), such are 'promerited', Heb 13:16, and the famous 'exinanited himself', Phil 2:7—a theological notion indeed, which has suffered mistranslation several times since, and notably in AV. Rheims preface adds, 'We cannot possibly attain to express these words fully in English, and we think much better that the reader staying at the difficulty of them, should take an occasion 29n to look in the table following, or otherwise to ask the full meaning of them, than by putting some usual English words that express them not, so to deceive the reader'. Other words again have passed from that glossary into current English, as Martin said they would, such as 'acquisition, advent, adulterating, allegory, character (= mark or stamp), co-operate, evangelize, gratis, issue (= good event), neophyte, prescience', cf. Phillimore, DR 170 [1922] 38).

HISTORY OF THE RHEIMS-DOUAY VERSION

o With these deliberate notions in mind we can approach the criticism of the English style of Rheims-Douay in a reasonable manner. It is probably true that the English language has been enriched by many words of Latin origin precisely through the influence of Rheims, perhaps by way of AV; for the debt of AV to Rheims is now openly admitted, though of course Rheims was not specified for consultation by King James' revisers, and their sole reference to it is a contemptuous remark in their preface. Yet the revisers of 1881 allow that the AV 'shows evident traces of . . . the Rhemish, made from the Latin Vulgate, but by scholars conversant with the Greek Original' (Preface to RV NT), and since Dr Carleton's book in 1902 (cf. above a) the matter is beyond question. It was Professor Phillimore (op. cit. p 36 ff.) who pointed out how in spite of its many Latinisms Rheims in fact often uses the everyday word rather than the consciously archaic as does AV (e.g. 'danger' in I Cor 15:30, for AV 'jeopardy'), producing in AV a 'biblical English' more suited to the recitation of lessons in church than to everyday thought, for a Protestant version indeed sets out to provide a liturgy, while a Catholic version sets out to provide everyday instruction for simple folk whose daily liturgy is in Latin. Phillimore further (ibid. p 45) pleads for Rheims 'on its merits as a piece of English, to be read by those whose taste and training fit them to add the literary to the spiritual enjoyment', and, adds Ronald Knox in this connection, 'he knew what style was' (On Englishing the Bible, p 44).

Yet it must be admitted that the very literal rendering from the Latin presented frequent difficulties, and that the oft-repeated gibe 'It is a translation which needs a translation' is not entirely without justification, though Martin would have been the first to agree that it needed a glossary. The translation of the Psalms is regarded as particularly deplorable, but it must be remembered that the Latin text as it stands is far from satisfactory, and that among Protestants the AV Psalms are equally deplored and compare unfavourably with those of the Prayer Book. Be that as it may, certain phrases of Rheims-Douay have been universally condemned as worthless translations, such as 'The voice of thy thunder in a wheel', Ps 76:19, 'Deliver me from Bloods', Ps 50:16, or 'sindon upon the bare', Mk 14:51; though in fact contemporary Protestant texts are hardly less guilty, e.g. Geneva's 'harberous' for Rheims 'given to hospitality', Tit. 1:8, Coverdale's 'overbody coat' for 'ephod', Jg 17:5, or Tyndale's and Great Bible's 'linen upon the bare'. The call, however, for revision of Rheims-Douay was not long in coming, and this work is the subject of the succeeding sections of this article.

p Subsequent Editions of the Rheims NT were in 1600 (8vo Vervliet, Antwerp) and a 3rd in 1621 (16mo, Seldenslach, Antwerp). This 3rd edition was closely reproduced by the publisher in 1630, and is a rare book—the only copy known to Fr Hugh Pope was at Fort Augustus—and it is usually not listed. The next edition, that of 1633 (4to, Cousturier, Rouen) is therefore entitled the '4th'. The '5th' edition, appearing in 1738 (fol., probably in London) was almost certainly the work of Dr Challoner, and the erratic spelling of 1582 was modernized and certain phrases were revised. The '6th' edition appeared in 1788 (fol., Ferguson, Liverpool), and further copies were sold in Dublin in 1789 with a new title page bearing the name of Wogan (Cotton). This rare edition was printed after Dr Challoner's revisions had been made. Its text was printed again in Dr Troy's Bible of 1816. After this some editions of the 1582 text were made for historical interest only: a Protestant edition in 1834 (Leavitt, New York, modern spelling), 1841 (Bagster in the English Hexapla, original spelling), 1872 (Bagster—with Vulgate parallel, but by anachronism the Clementine Vulgate!—modern spelling), and lastly in 1926 the edition with modern spelling by Dom Roger Huddleston, O.S.B. (Burns, Oates & Washbourne). All other editions represent one or other of the revisions.

The only Subsequent Edition of the Douay OT was that of 1635 (4to, Cousturier, Rouen), all other editions being later revisions.

It should be added that the three original 4to volumes of 1582, 1609 and 1610 far surpassed in type, paper and general appearance any previous English version.

The Authority of Rheims-Douay, or of its revisions, has always been that of local episcopal approbation, and upon such approbation depends the authority of every vernacular version, and among Catholics it can hardly be said that a version is 'authorized' or 'appointed to be read in churches' as the Bishops' Bible or the AV was among Protestants. It is only the Latin Vulgate that is in this sense declared 'authentic' (Trent, sess. 4 [1546], EB 46). But Catholics are bound to use a vernacular text approved by ecclesiastical authority (Leo XIII Officiorum ac munerum § 7, EB 124-5), and may not, under pain of excommunication, print a text without this authorization (Canon Law, 1391, 2318). Thus the Catholics of these islands have always rightly refused to make use of heretical texts and have clung to the Catholic version. One of the earliest cases was the insistence of Mary Queen of Scots at her trial in 1587 on taking her oath upon the Rheims Testament (quoted by Eadie, 2, 136; Dore, 306; Mombert, 317). And in English courts of law a Catholic Bible has now to be provided for the oath of a Catholic witness. What is, however, probably the first public use of the words 'official version' occurs in Cardinal Griffin's preface to Mgr Knox's NT of 1945, where both that version and Rheims receive this title. Mgr Knox's NT furthermore has the word 'authorized' on the title page, which is explained by Mgr Knox himself (preface to OT) to mean 'authorized for use in church', an authorization not yet granted to his OT. In 1934 the Biblical Commission decreed that for public reading in church an approved translation of the Vulgate must be used, though translations from the original may be approved and (according to the further decree of 1943) recommended to the faithful for private reading.

III Dr Challoner's Work—Richard Challoner (1691–1781) entered the college at Douay in 1704, and he became vice-president in 1720. The president at that time was Dr Witham who in 1730 published under the initials R. W. the first revision of Rheims NT, including new and admirable notes, with the title Annotations of the NT, in two volumes. A second edition appeared in 1733. Dr Challoner must have been in close contact with Dr Witham while the latter was preparing his text, and indeed Dr Challoner was called upon to give the nil obstat, so that a certain influence of Witham's text upon the later work of Challoner may well be conjectured. Challoner left Douay for the mission in 1730. Evidently it was while he was working in London that he began to feel the pressing need of an adequate English Bible. In 1738, with the assistance of the Carmelite Fr Blyth, he issued the slightly revised text of Rheims already noted, though no name of a reviser appears on the volume itself.

In 1741 Challoner was consecrated a bishop and became coadjutor to the Vicar Apostolic of the London district. In 1749 he brought out his 1st Revision of the NT. The revision was far-reaching and marks a turning-point in the history of the version. The book was published in one volume in 12mo, without any indication of author or place of printing. Challoner himself would have been the first to admit that his work was not one of scholarship, though his ordinary Douay training would not have left him unfitted for such a work. But in his revision he had a purely 30b practical end in view, namely, of providing the faithful with a more portable and more readable edition of the Scriptures. His first preoccupation was therefore the modernization of the language and the presentation of the text in the attractive little volume that he produced, but at the same time he adjusted the text to that of the Clementine Vulgate, which had appeared since 1582 (cf. title page). The next year 1750 saw his 2nd Revision, this time a five-volume set in the same format, the Douay OT being revised for the first time and the NT revised again to the extent (on Dr Cotton's estimate) of 124 new changes. These two revisions of the NT in 1749 and 1750 may be called the 'Early Challoner', and they are quite distinct from the later revisions, which involved much more drastic alterations. The distinction is important for the study of later and current editions. It is commonly stated (e.g. in Burton's Life, 1, 281) that in his revision Challoner had frequent recourse to AV, yet deliberately avoided a close reproduction. This is, however, more particularly true of the 'Late Challoner', the revisions from 1752. In all his revisions he altered the old translation of 'Dominus' as 'Our Lord' to 'the Lord', and he also standardized the proper names in the Bible, using the Vulgate forms throughout, so that the same forms are found in both OT and NT, e.g. Elias and Isaias, which is not the case in AV. It is not now possible to ascertain what assistance, if any, Challoner had in his work: Fr Blyth is sometimes again mentioned, but since Fr Anderson's article in Scripture 2 (1947) 42 f. this seems no longer tenable, and it is likely that the work was largely shared by Fr Robert Pinkard (cf. also Gillow, art. Pinkard).

6 In 1752 appeared the 3rd Revision of the NT, still in the same size and type, but this time with (on Dr Cotton's estimate) over 2,000 alterations from 1750, mostly in the direction of AV. Certain omissions of 1749, such as 'And he commanded the people to sit down on the ground' in Mk 8:6, and 'of promise, as in a strange country' in Heb 11:9 were made good, but it is curious that the word 'counsel', Ac 5:38, of 1582, 1749, 1750 and AV should appear in this and many later editions as 'council'. The style and syntax is considerably modernized, and in particular the inversions and participial constructions of the old version (e.g. Ac 21:12 'Which when we had heard') were altered ('And when we . . .'). In 1763-4 was published again the whole Bible, as before in five volumes in 12mo. This is the 2nd Revision of the OT with very few differences from 1750, and the 4th Revision of the NT hardly differing from 1752. The edition of the NT in 1772 is the 5th Revision with scarcely any further variations. This time the printer's name is given: J. Coghlan, of London. The identity of the printer of the earlier editions is disputed: Thomas Meighan, of London, is usually given, but Fr Anderson proposes Needham. The revisions of 1752-72 represent what may be called the 'Late Challoner'. All later editions were based on the earlier or later work of Challoner, but it is curious that all current editions have almost entirely rejected the later modernized text in favour of the earlier revisions. It should be observed that a revision of 1777 was mentioned by both Dr Milner and Charles Butler (cf. Cotton, pp 50, 118), but if it was ever made, no copy has come down to us.

d IV Subsequent Editions of Challoner's Text—During the first quarter century after Challoner's death in 1781 considerable confusion reigned with regard to the text of the NT, though Challoner's 1750 OT has remained almost unchanged to this day. It will only be possible here to notice the more important editions, and especially those which have had an effect on our current texts. In the first place we have the important editions of the Rev. Bernard MacMahon in Ireland, beginning with the NT commissioned by Abp Carpenter in 1783. (This text was only twice seen by Dr Cotton, and no known copy now exists; it was called the '4th' edition, ie. the next after the 3rd revision of 1752.) The text is basically that of 1752, with many modifications, certain of which have lasted to this day, notably 'What is that to me . . .' in Jn 2:4, where Challoner consistently had 'What is to me . . .'. In 1791 MacMahon produced a complete Bible for Dr Troy, which was reprinted in 1794. This text of Dr Troy was that used in the famous Haydock Bibles, the 1st edition of which appeared in weekly parts in 1811-14, printed in Manchester by Thomas Haydock, whose brother the Rev. George Leo Haydock composed new notes. The volumes were beautifully produced in folio, and came to be, in their several editions, the typical Catholic Family Bible of England. The most well-known is the 5th edition of 1853, known as Provost Husenbeth's from his abridgement of the notes. About the same time we have in 1790 the Philadelphia Bible in 4to, in which the text is that of 1752, and the Anonymous Edition of 1792, probably printed at Edinburgh, the sole survivor of which is in the British Museum, and which again has basically the text of 1752, but with considerable alterations, notably 'What is it to me . . .' in Jn 2:4, which is still found in many editions. This text was reproduced in Fr Worswick's edition of 1812 at Newcastle, as far as Rom 3, after which he reverts to a pure 1752 (Cotton). The Bible authorized by Dr Hay in Edinburgh in 1796 follows mainly the text of the late revision of 1763-4 (Cotton). Thus most of the texts of this period represent the 'Late Challoner' tradition, with notable changes introduced by MacMahon and the 1792. In 1813, however, O. Syers, a Manchester publisher produced a Bible in parts (as Haydock had begun to do), reproducing the 1750 text in both OT and NT, together with Dr Witham's notes on the NT (Cotton). And thus began the return to the 'Early Challoner'.

In 1815 we find a NT that reverts to the 1749 revision, though it incorporates many readings of 1750 and a few of 1752 (notably 'debased himself' in Phil 2:7 for 'emptied himself' of 1749-50). This was the famous edition of the 'Catholic Board', a body founded in 1807 which in 1813 began to occupy itself with the production of a standard edition of the Catholic NT, edited by the Rev. Thomas Rigby for Dr Poynter (cf. Ward, Evangelium . . ., 2, 189 ff.). This move was occasioned by the recent formation of the 'Catholic Fund', a predominantly Protestant organization for the diffusion of a Rheims-Douay text (without notes) among Irish Catholics, which did in fact publish its noteworth NT in 1820. It is here that we first find the misnomer 'Douay NT'. A reproduction of this Protestant edition was still on sale in Dublin in 1938. The 'Catholic Board' edition was a handsome 8vo volume, which was reprinted seven times down to 1850. About the same time many other editions appeared in England and Ireland, the most important of which were Dr Gibson's Liverpool Edition of 1816 in folio, following basically 1752 and reprinted in London for Dr Bramston in 1829; the ill-fated Dr Troy's Bible of 1816, which, owing to a misunderstanding between the archbishop and the printer, reproduced the NT text of 1582 (ed. 1788-9) with its controversial notes, which were regarded as unpropitious at a time when Catholic Emancipation was in near view (cf. Ward, op. cit., p 201). During the first decades of the 19th cent., therefore, the dominant texts were MacMahon's of 1791 in Ireland, Haydock's of 1811-14 (which follows MacMahon) and the Catholic Board edition of 1815 in England, Dr Hay's of 1796 or Fr Worswick's of 1812 in Scotland and the north, and in America either Challoner's 1752 text of 1790 or an edition of MacMahon's of 1824. If the impression gained from the above sections is one of confusion, it is the right impression.

It was in 1825 that the Abp of Dublin, Dr Murray, produced his Stereotype Edition, the NT of which, like the 'Catholic Board' edition, was based on 1749, with some renderings of 1750, but hardly any of 1752. Dr Murray's Bible and his NT were reprinted many times, and especially notable is the long series of NTs that began in 1836 with the approbation of Dr Denvir, and is the basis of the current Irish editions. The texts

HISTORY OF THE RHEIMS-DOUAY VERSION

30j of Dr Murray and Dr Denvir became current in England in the mid-19th cent., and especially in their smaller format rivalled the large volumes of Haydock or the 'Catholic Board', for instance in 1851 we find Dr Denvir's text being issued in London, with many further editions later. Thus it happened that the Stereotype edition became the basis for the current 'English text' (see l, n below). One more special effort must, however, be chronicled: Dr Wiseman's NT published in 1847 by Richardson of Derby. This was a deliberate attempt at standardization, but its weakness was its dependence upon Haydock and therefore on MacMahon. One of the last editions of MacMahon's 1791 text was published by Sadlier of New York in 1852.

l V Current Editions—In more recent years a sort of 'textus receptus' of the Rheims-Challoner NT has emerged. This text, which has become universal in modern editions, is mainly that of 1749-50, and 1752 has been almost entirely abandoned. It is derived from the Stereotype edition of Dr Murray, but small variations can be found, chiefly in the matter of adopting certain readings of 1752 or other later texts. These small variants can be grouped to form an 'English text' on the one hand, or an 'American text' on the other, where a few more readings of 1752 or MacMahon are adopted. The parentage of a current edition can only be determined by the observation of such variants, and sometimes by the inheritance of certain misprints. The title page seldom assists us, and sometimes, as in certain recent American editions claiming descent from 1752, positively misleads us. An interesting feature of nearly every modern edition is the abandonment of Challoner's reading in Jn 2:4 in favour of 1792 (English) or MacMahon (American).

m The table on this page lists the more interesting variants, their origin in Challoner's revisions being given with an abbreviated date.

	English Text	American Text
Mt 2:23	Nazarite 49-50	Nazarene 52 (correct)
7:29	their scribes 49-50 (correct)	the scribes 52
Mk 16:1	brought (Murray, mispr.)	bought (Chall., correct)
Jn 2:4	What is it (1792)	What is that (MacMahon)
Ac 5:38	counsel 49-50 (correct)	council 52
11:29	proposed (1896 mispr.)	purposed 49-50
14:16	with good (1896 mispr.)	with food (Chall., correct)
Gal 2:2	conferred with 49-50	communicated to 52
Col 3:8	lay you 49-50	put you 52
2 Pet 1:15	that after my decease also, you may often have 49-50	that you frequently have after my decease (MacMahon)

n A suitable starting point for the study of current editions is Cardinal Vaughan's NT of 448 pp in 16mo ('pocket') published by Burns & Oates in 1896. This is a typical 'English text' and exhibits all the 'English' variants listed above, with its own peculiar misprints. This edition was reprinted by Burns, Oates & Washbourne about 1922 with a few alterations (the fresh type being clearly discernible), notably 'Nazarite' corrected to 'Nazarene', a confusion in 1 Tim 2:1-2 also corrected by 1752, and, a curious feature, in 2 Pet 1:15 the MacMahon rendering of the 'American text' was introduced. In this corrected form the text remained in print until 1937. In 1898 the 8vo 'pulpit edition' of 495 pp was published, again with the approbation of Cardinal Vaughan. The text, reprinted in 1914 and 1934, is exactly that of 1896, except for the correction of 1 Tim 2:1-2. An exact reprint was published in America with Dr Corrigan's approbation of 1898, and this is still in print with Benziger with Cardinal Hayes' approbation of 1931. This is the only current example of an 'English text' in America. About the same time another 'pocket' 16mo edition of 574 pp appeared with Cardinal Vaughan's approbation. This text generally follows the 448 pp edition, even including the misprint 'good' in Ac 14:16, but the correction to 'Nazarene' is made, the inferior reading 'council', Ac 5:38, is introduced, and 'put you', Col 3:8, from 1752. MacMahon is followed in 2 Tim 1:15. The omission of a line of print in 2 Tim 1:9 reduces the verse to nonsense, and the false reading 'therefore' for 'heretofore' in Gal 4:13 is found only here. This 574 pp edition was exactly reprinted in 1950 with merely reset title page and page-headings. The CTS Gospels of 1900 follow exactly the original 1896 text, but the reprint of 1920 deserves special mention for departing from all editions of the past 160 years and printing Challoner's reading in Jn 2:4, 'What is to me . . .', although unhappily the 1949 reprint has inserted the word 'that', which is quite alien to this type of text. Fr Hugh Pope's annotated Layman's NT (1928, 1934) follows the emended 448 pp edition, except for the reading 'the scribes' in Mt 7:29.

Meanwhile the important Baltimore Bible appeared o in 1899 with the approbation of Cardinal Gibbons. The NT of this Bible exhibits all the variants of the 'American text', showing traces of the 1752 and MacMahon persisting in America. This text was reproduced in Washbourne's Bibles of 1900 and 1914, the latter having a preface by Cardinal Bourne and being the most widely used Bible in England today. The same text appears in Washbourne's 707 pp 16mo ('pocket') NT of 1909, which remained in print until 1939. The 1914 Bible was exactly reproduced in 16mo by Burns, Oates & Washbourne in 1931 (reprinted up to 1946 and 1947—the 1946 edition was actually printed in 1939 but lay in sheets in Belgium throughout the war), preserving faithfully even the amusing misprint proper to 1914 in Nah 2:10 'all the lions lose strength', for 'loins'. This standard English Bible, 1900, 1914 or 1931, is therefore in the 'American' tradition and not the 'English' as found in most NTs. The only peculiarity of the NT text is in 2 Tim 1:9 where in 1914 'our own works' appears for 'our works' of all previous editions, while in the same verse in 1931 the same line of print is omitted as in the 574 pp NT.

The 'American text' was continued in the United States by Herders in Cardinal Farley's Bible of 1911, in the well-known edition with an additional approbation of 1912, which includes many photographs of the Holy Land, and in Cardinal Hayes' Bibles of 1919 and 1929. More recently the Douay Bible House began to issue a very practical pocket NT in 1941. On the title page the text is stated to be that of 1752, but in fact it is the ordinary 'American text' with no more than the few readings of 1752 that are to be found in any edition. A merit, however, is that both Mk 8:6 and Heb 11:9 are completed from 1752, a rare enough feature in modern editions, which all follow basically 1749-50. Benziger's 'Red Letter Bible' of 1943 (with the words of Christ printed in red) has the usual text, but has its own special merit of at last correcting 'guard' in Neh 3:15 to 'garden', a misprint occurring in every edition after 1609, where the word stood at the end of a line, abbreviated 'gardē'.

The most recent fruit of the 'English' tradition is the NT edited by Dr Arendzen, with new notes, and published by Sheed & Ward in 1947 as a handsomely

HISTORY OF THE RHEIMS-DOUAY VERSION

30q printed cr. 8vo volume. The text incorporates some of the best features of the 'English text' (based on 1749-50, not '1746' [sic] as stated in the introduction), including 'counsel', Acts 5:38, and 'their scribes', Mt 7:29; it corrects by 1752 to 'Nazarene', Mt 2:23, but also adopts the 'American' reading in Gal 2:2, Col 3:8 and 2 Pet 1:15; the misprint in Ac 14:16 is corrected, but unhappily not 'brought' in Mk 16:1; and Mk 8:6 and Heb 11:9 are not completed. A curious feature of all other current editions is the adoption of the false reading of 1750, which was correct in 1749 and again in 1752 and its dependents, in Rom 2:23, 'this uncircumcision' for 'his'. It is indeed praiseworthy that Dr Arendzen has 'his'.

31a Appendix—I Revisions of Challoner's Text—Since this commentary uses the Rheims-Douay-Challoner text, our concern is mainly with that text as various editions have presented it. Mention should, however, be made of two recent texts of the NT published in America, which set out to be revisions of Challoner. The first is that of Fr Carey in 1935. He expressly says that it is not a new version, but merely a text corrected 'where the existing English seems obviously wrong or meaningless'. A partial list of such corrections is given in the preface. The basic text is the usual 'American text', and not, as stated on the title page, that of 1752, and the revision of it is not nearly as extensive as was b Challoner's own in that year. The other work, A revision of the Challoner-Rheims Version, is a much more far-reaching venture: the Confraternity Edition of the NT of 1941. This is for practical purposes a new version, for although a distinct flavour of the original and the form 'thou' are retained, the diction and syntax have been modernized throughout and all archaic grammar ('goeth' etc.) has disappeared. The latest editions of the Vulgate are taken into account, 31b as well as modern editions of the Greek for purposes of comparison, and the notes often allude to the Greek text when it diverges.

II Independent Catholic Versions—The first Catholic c text independent of Rheims was the NT of Dr Nary of Dublin, 1719, translated from the Vulgate. Dr Witham's revision of Rheims, 1730, has already been mentioned. In 1836 we have the first translation from the Greek: Dr Lingard's version of the Gospels, published as 'by a Catholic'. In 1849 Dr Kenrick, then Bishop of Philadelphia, published the Gospels translated from the Vulgate, 'being a revision of the Rhemish translation', independent therefore of Challoner. In 1851 he published the rest of the NT, and in 1860-1 the three volumes of the OT, as a revision of Douay. In 1898 Fr Aloysius Spencer, O.P., brought out in America a new translation of the Gospels from the Latin, and in 1901 from the Greek. His complete NT from the Greek did not appear until 1937 (long after his death in 1913), and it has been many times reprinted (latest 1946). The Westminster Version, under the general editorship of Fr Cuthbert Lattey, S.J., assisted at first by Fr J. Keating, S.J., is a translation of the Bible from the original tongues. The NT was begun in 1913 and finished in 1935, appearing in fascicules, and a fine four-volume edition appeared in 1921-36, and in 1948 an edition in one volume with abridged notes. The OT was begun in 1934 and is still in production, the latest volume being Fr Lattey's Daniel in 1949. The Confraternity Edition of the OT, translating from the Hebrew into entirely modern English, began with Genesis in 1948. Lastly we have the great work of Mgr Knox, who made a completely new translation from the Vulgate, publishing the NT in 1945 (after a 'trial edition' in 1944) and the OT in two volumes in 1949.

THE LITERARY CHARACTERISTICS OF THE BIBLE

By D. J. LEAHY

32a Bibliography—A. Bea, S.J., De Scripturae S. Inspiratione, Rome 1935², 101-14; J. Chaine, art. The OT—Semitism in P. Lagrange and the Scriptures, Milwaukee 1946; Le Livre de la Genèse, Paris 1949; J. Coppens, Les Harmonies des Deux Testaments, Tournai-Paris 1949; A. Durand, S.J., art. Inerrance Biblique DAFC 2, 767-74; A. Fernández, S.J., art. De Interpretatione in Institutiones Biblicae, 1, Rome 1937; *J. Hempel, The Contents of the Literature in Record and Revelation, Oxford 1938; H. Höpfl, art. Critique Biblique, DBVS, 2, 202-12; F. von Hummelauer, S.J., Exegetisches zur Inspirationsfrage, BS 9 (1904) 58-73; *Sir F. G. Kenyon, The Bible and Modern Criticism, London, 1948; J. M. Lagrange O.P., Historical Criticism and the OT, London 1905; art. L'Inspiration et les Exigences de la Critique RB 5 (1896) 510-18; J. Levie, S.J., L'Encyclique sur les Etudes Bibliques NRT 68 (1946) 648-70; 766-98; *R. G. Moulton, The Literary Study of the Bible, London 1899²; Pius XII Divino afflante Spiritu §§ 36-50; Pont. Biblical Comm., Letter to Cardinal Suhard, AAS (1948) 45-8, CR 29 (1948) 423 ff.; HPR 48 (1948) 572 ff.; Scripture 3 (1948) 65 ff.; F. Prat, S.J., art. Progrès et Tradition en Exégèse in ER 93 (1902) 289 ff., 610 ff.; A. Robert, art. Historique (Genre) DBVS 4, 7-23; A. Robert and A. Tricot, Initiation Biblique, Paris 1948³, ch VI; P. Synave and P. Benoit, O.P., La Prophétie (esp. Appendix II, 293-376) Paris 1947; P. Vincent O.P., La Théorie des Genres Littéraires, Paris 1934.

b Description—The Bible is a library. It has, it is true, an historical direction, but this is not so evident in the OT apart from the NT. We shall here concentrate on the OT, and at once observe that we do not read all the books of this library in the same way. The literary form of a book denotes that external pattern of writing which is regulated by custom in a certain epoch and region. At the same time it indicates the meaning of what the author has written; for he chooses the pattern, e.g. of pure fiction (a parable) because he wants to reach his readers' imagination and will rather than instruct them on pure history. Like styles in architecture, the literary forms are expressions of a certain culture and period. It is claimed that Christianity made the Gothic style possible, and the Baroque is generally regarded as an expression of the Counter-Reformation, of 'the spirit of conquest which is the characteristic of that epoch, manifested both on the battle-field (cf. Lepanto) and in the field of the apostolate and of mystical devotion', J. Duhr, S.J., Le sens religieux dans l'architecture chrétienne, NRT 69 (1947) 707. The Bible is sometimes described as a series of letters from God to man; but they are addressed to men of a definite time and place, and they are couched in man-made language which can change its meaning in the course of time.

c The subject of the Literary Forms of the Bible has been studied carefully during the last sixty years. When critics declare that biblical judgements are contradicted by facts, historical or scientific, or when they point to alleged serious divergencies in the Bible, one of the keys which the student (cf. Inspiration and Inerrancy §§ 34-8) will use to open the way to a solution is that in different Books there are different literary forms, and forms different from those in use today. 'The literary form that the writer chooses 32c indicates the character of his work; it enables us to discover (a) the precise aspect of the object which he has in mind, (b) his fuller or less agreement with the statements he sets down, (c) whether he intends or does not intend to present what he writes as true teaching. The literary form of a work, then, is like the key to opening up the book's standpoint and interpretation', Synave and Benoit, 367. These remarks reflect the words of Pius XII, DAS 38.

Everybody is agreed that the Bible contains various d literary forms, such as History, Poetry, Prophecy and Wisdom. Inside these forms there is ample scope for the individuality of each writer to express itself (cf. §§ 610-15). They are evident from even a cursory reading of the OT, and are not a subjective subterfuge for finding a way out of difficulties. 'Holy Scripture is the unchangeable word of God to which man must bend himself, and not something which he can bend to his own personal ideas', J. Daniélou, Les Divers Sens de l'Ecriture, ETL 24 (1948) 120 (cf. Pesch, De Inspiratione (Freiburg im Breisgau 1925) n. 520). To claim that a book or passage has an unusual literary form, one must be able to produce evidence from the text or context; in short, to produce cogent reasons (cf. Prov. Deus, EB, 97).

The Literary Form of History—The facts narrated e in the OT are not a tangle of incidents without purpose or direction. 'It must be emphasized that this Jewish and Christian attitude to Scripture does not . . . mean their treating of the OT merely as if it were a kind of Old Moore's Almanac. It means rather that they saw world history and God's purpose side by side, and were convinced that the two were connected', *T. W. Manson, The Argument from Prophecy, JTS 46 (1945) 129. The OT is the record of events controlled by God's Providence and directed to a definite end, viz. to Christ and his reign (cf. 1 Cor 15:25; Col 1:16; Eph 1:10; Apoc 22:13). Though the writers of the OT historical books may not have perceived the full significance of the events they were inspired to record, they were well aware that history was under God's control. The unity of the Pentateuch, for example, is based on the belief that 'there exists a divine unchangeable plan continually developing despite all obstacles, the goal of which is the creation of the people of Israel as a theocratic nation, with Palestine as home, and the law of Moses as charter', Initiation Biblique, 82. Not one of the sacred writers wanted to chronicle merely secular events without reference to God or religion (cf. J. Bonsirven, S.J., Exégèse Rabbinique et Exégèse Paulinienne, Paris 1939, 350 f.; G. Courtade, S.J., Le Sens de l'Histoire dans l'Ecriture, RSR 36 (1949) 136 ff.). Though the teaching of historical fact and truth is not the only characteristic of the OT, it is its chief feature. Consequently, it is of the greatest importance to identify the kind of history the writers intended to present.

Pope Pius XII invites the interpreter to try to discern f the literary forms used by the sacred writers, especially in history, DAS 38-42. The invitation marks a striking development in the history of interpretation. After the publication of Prov. Deus by Leo XIII in 1893 the question of the day was whether one could discern several kinds of literary forms in g He suggested three possibilities: (a) the sacred writer used history only as a literary dress to clothe some message of dogmatic or moral import. The persons and situations would then be merely the fruit of the writer's imagination, and the whole work could be labelled Edifying History. Tob, it is suggested, would be an example; for it was not written to make formal assertions about persons and events, but to present Tobias as a model of ancient Jewish virtues. (b) History Proper, where the writer intends to write an official history. It is clear that the objective reality of the persons and facts reported must here be the writer's chief concern, 3 and 4 Kg would be an example. (c) Primitive History, which is intermediary between the two preceding, op. cit. 202. The early chapters of the Bible do not set out a complete history. But 'it was of importance to show by a continuous chain of evidence the unity of the history of salvation', 206. In view of this end the Bible 'is taken up with tangible things, with discoveries which are still known; it relates their origin and progress and leaves them in a hazy light, which has no outward semblance of actual history. If the personality of Lamech seems to stand out against this background, it is only in an elegy. Could the author have told us more clearly that there exists no history of these periods?' ibid.

321 the historical books of the Bible. In 1902 Père Lagrange, O.P., gave six conferences to the Catholic Institute at Toulouse, soon afterwards published in the book whose English translation is entitled Historical Criticism and the OT.

h By 1904 F. von Hummelauer had developed these ideas into a system of eight categories. (a) Fable, in its etymological sense of something spoken about. It is not necessarily fictitious. There are two such fables in the OT, Jg 9:8-15; 4 Kg 14:9. They are used merely to illustrate. (b) Parable prescinds from historical fact and is used only as an envelope to deliver religious truth. (c) Epic History adorns some historical event with fanciful details aimed at arresting the reader's attention, e.g. the poetical description of the Plagues of Egypt, Wis 16-17. (d) Religious History selects or adapts situations and discourses in accordance with a religious goal. The writer gives the facts but does not record details with the care of a scientific historian. (e) Ancient History, like that of the ancient Greeks and Romans, sets out to record facts, but without critical work on the sources. For all the ancient peoples, history was an art; for us it is a science. (f) Popular Traditions, where an historical core is enveloped by fabulous additions. The narratives of Gen 1-11 seem to belong to this class, the word tôl' dôt at the head of each part being a reference to the ancient popular traditions. Their value as history depends on the assertion of the inspired writer or the Church's tradition. Nobody today holds that the word tôl' dôt indicates a special literary form. In Gen it occurs regularly merely to introduce a summary of the history of certain families or tribes and their descendants (cf. Bea 113). (g) Free Narrative gives 'idealized history', i.e. real history mixed with fiction, e.g. Tob, Jdt, Est. It is closer to epic history than is Popular Tradition; it adds fictitious ornament to real history. (h) Haggadic Midrash is a biblical narrative developed with great freedom to inculcate a moral truth. It resembles our historical novel. Perhaps Jdt is in this way an elaboration of some ancient story. True the word occurs in 2 Par 13:22; 24:27, but it is unlikely that it there denotes a literary form peculiar to the Jews, where objective truth is twisted to suit some ethical purpose. The Rabbinical use of Midrash appears only after the time of Christ (cf. SB Einleitung in Talmud u. Midrasch, 1925⁴, 195; Bea 113).

i These eight forms were suggested as eight different ways of extracting the objective truth from the narratives of the OT. At first they were warmly welcomed. They seemed to provide a ready reply to Rationalists 321 who were protesting against the historical value of many narratives in the OT. Enthusiasm for these eight categories began to wane as men asked whether readers of the Bible could be left with the impression that historical narratives were only more or less true.

The fundamental error of the suggested catalogue was twofold. First, the author thought out these peculiar literary forms (not identified in other ancient histories), and then suggested that the basis of distinction one from another was the more or less distance from objective fact. The remark of J. Goettsberger holds good for at least many passages, 'That the narratives were not historical was a conclusion drawn not from some literary form discovered elsewhere; rather it was because the narratives were considered to be unhistorical that the conclusion was drawn that they must belong to some peculiar literary forms. It is difficult to avoid in this matter the objection of a vicious circle', BZ 3 (1905) 241.

In 1903 the Pontifical Biblical Commission, § 52j, stated that it is not legitimate to assert that narratives are historical only in appearance, or form, unless there are solid grounds for so interpreting them. This, of course, is a law of sound interpretation of any writings. Many people saw that the inerrancy of the Bible was called into question by the wild use of the principle of literary forms. Indeed, a certain reaction against the use of the principle at all set in; cf. L. Billot, S.J., De Inspiratione S. Scripturae (Romae 1906² 143). But Rome had spoken not to condemn all use of the principle, but simply by arousing respect for the inerrancy of the Bible to declare that the questions of interpretation were not yet solved. What the Pontifical Biblical Commission wanted was the right use of the principle of literary forms.

In 1920 Pope Benedict XV published his encyclical Spiritus Paraclitis. The principle of literary forms in history was accepted almost explicitly, but again with warnings against abuses, interpreters who too lightly adopt the hypothesis of implicit quotations or of narrative historical in appearance only, or who would use literary forms which compromise the truth of the Bible, Dz 2188; EB 474. This acceptance of principle was made fully explicit by the encyclical Div. affl. Spir. of Pope Pius XII: 'A knowledge and careful appreciation of ancient modes of expression and literary forms and styles will provide a solution to many of the objections made against the truth and historical accuracy of Holy Writ', 42.

Since the days of Hummelauer the realization had grown that one could not regard a passage in a narrative as half historical merely because one could think out some literary form which had only that amount of historical truth in focus. The literary form of history is one, not a collection. At the same time it could be selective in the facts, incomplete, and have many manners of presenting the facts which are not like those we use today. The right use of the principle of literary forms is based on the distinction between objective facts and the manner of presenting them, between message and envelope. Semitic writers did not use the synthetic style of the Romans; they reconstructed events in pieces, developing the narrative in concentric circles around a central nucleus. They kept repeating the central theme in order to add to the circumstances already alluded to, or omitted details already described but now considered irrelevant for the particular purpose they were pursuing. The early chapters of Gen are an example of this. They often prefer to group matters together in a logical, rather than a chronological, order; they are content with quoting the sense, rather than the very words, of previous speakers or writers. Similar procedure can be identified in other ancient writings, but readers did not thereby accuse the authors of mixing error with truth.

Sometimes the literary form can be ascertained from the text itself. For example, Gen 1, where the account 32k of the Creation is found to be arranged carefully in an artificial literary scheme, allied by the parallelism it employs to poetry rather than to historical record. The six days have opening and closing formulae which correspond, and the whole scheme divides into two symmetrical halves of three days and three days, each day of the first three being exactly parallel with the corresponding day of the second half. But it is not always easy to discern those features which mark off one form from another. If we are to read parables or allegories in the course of a book of narrative history, we need to have some indication either from the introduction (as in the Gospel and Prophetic Books), or from the nature of the argument, or, as we have seen in Gen 1, from the manner in which the narrative is set forth. And sometimes comparative study of other ancient modes of expression can guide us to identify a particular literary form in the Bible. 'Well understood, the principle can be light for interpreters; badly understood, it can be the occasion for all sorts of fantasies and guesses. Doubtless, this disturbing alternative is the reason why there was so much delay on the part of ecclesiastical authority in the clear assertion of the principle, and even today in this, the outstanding page of the encyclical (Div. affl. Spir.) there is, probably by design, a certain obscurity. . . . We have to conclude, it seems, that while clearly approving the principle of distinguishing literary forms, the encyclical does not intend to give interpreters a free hand to decide how widely the principle may be applied. The task remains for Catholic interpreters to work out for themselves a way so true and exact that it will not have to be laid down all over again later', J. Levie, 787-8.

l We may give the name Primitive History to the literary form employed in the first eleven chapters of Gen. They describe the origins of the human race and of the chosen people up to the call of Abraham. 'The events narrated in these two chapters, Gen. 10-11, have a place outside of known history. Languages are evidently not confused and multiplied from one day to the next; comparative philology proves that variations in dialects are made slowly and constantly. Likewise the census of the peoples in the ethnographic table is limited to the Near East. The longevity of the patriarchs is contradicted by the teaching of palaeontology. . . . This entire period prior to Abraham is thus described with a mentality belonging to a period far later than the events recorded', J. M. Vosté, O.P., art. The Pontifical Biblical Commission on the Pentateuch, HPR 48 (1948) 568. Perhaps the best commentary on the words of DAS and at the same time the best explanation of what is meant by the literary form, Primitive History, is to be read in the letter sent to Cardinal Suhard, for which see § 531.

m A. Bea, S.J., in La Civiltà Cattolica (17 Apr. 1948) 122, has pointed out that the modern sciences of palaeontology, prehistory, archaeology and anthropology have presented so many serious difficulties against the ancient literal interpretation of the first eleven chapters of Gen, that it is no longer possible simply to keep the exegesis of our forefathers. If interpreters were to close their eyes to these facts, they would be seriously disloyal to the commission entrusted to them by Divine Providence for the good of the Church.

Job in so far as it is history stands in a class by itself. The hero was an historical person; such at least is the impression gained from the prologue and epilogue (both written in prose). But the body of the book is poetical; it is a didactic work about the problem of the just man under affliction. From the standpoint of its historical literary form we use here the term of P. Lagrange, Edifying History.

33a The Literary Form of the Law—The Pentateuch, and particularly the Books of Lev and Deut, indicated for an Israelite the way to obey the Covenant and to become holy. In the way the laws are presented we observe that they 'are not set out methodically;

several are repeated; some are related to a new 33a historical context and their binding force is more or less adapted. These details indicate that Israel's legislation was closely bound to the life of the nation and to the Semitic world in general, and that consequently it evolved to a certain degree, the precise limit of which it is hard to determine', A. Robert, Initiation Biblique, 164.

In Deut the writer aims at giving his reader intellectual conviction and resolute determination to carry out the prescriptions about worshipping God and living in his presence. Threats are comparatively few. But in Lev the laws are presented against a background of solemn warnings. In both works, and throughout the Pentateuch, the basic historical theological truth that the Israelites are bound by a Covenant with God, influences the manner of presentation of the laws. That characteristic serves to identify a particular literary form which can be called Legal.

The other books of the OT can from the point of view of literary forms be classed as follows: Lyrical Poetry (Pss; portions of the Prophets, e.g. Is, Jer, and poems elsewhere); Dramatic Poetry (Cant); Prophecy (Is, Jer, Ez, the Twelve Minor Prophets); Apocalypse (Dan); Wisdom Literature (Prov, Eccl, Eccles, Wis).

All these Books (with the exception of certain passages) were written in verse, and are cast in a poetical mould (the two are not the same; for poetry can be expressed in prose; cf. Moulton 76). The Hebrew poet was accorded a licence. He was not tied to the ordinary meanings of words or to the use of regular grammar. He could make comparatively free use of rhetoric, metaphor and anthropomorphisms when describing God, all of which would have a different sense in straight historical narrative. Thus, in interpreting, e.g. the Imprecatory Psalms, we must allow for their lyrical character, for the oriental exaggeration used in invective, and in this way reach the mind of the writer, whose basic teaching is that God is just, that the enemies of his people are his enemies, and that they must be crushed by his almighty power. The rest is secondary, ornamental.

The verses in Biblical poetry are based not on the numbering of the syllables, but on a symmetry of clauses in a verse, which since the time of *R. Lowth (De Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum, Oxford 1753) has come to be called Parallelism, for which see § 313e. Several rules for correct interpretation can be deduced from this fact of parallelism (cf. § 313f).

Sometimes, close attention to symmetry will reveal the author's plan of a book and its chapters, together with misplacements and additions by perhaps other writers; cf. P. Gachter, S.J., Semitic Literary Forms in the Apocalypse and their Import in Theol. Studies 8 (1947).

In Dramatic Poetry action predominates and the author effaces his own personality in order to let his readers hear and see the characters taking part in the incident. The meaning of the writer has to be learned from the purpose of the book. It would be absurd to identify expressions and propositions taken at random from Shakespeare's characters with those of the author; it would be equally absurd to take what Baldad the Suhite has to say in Job as the teaching of the author, as the teaching of God. The writer's contention there is to reject the theory of retribution expounded by the three friends, and he leaves the problem unsolved. Moreover, in a drama the author is not writing as an historian; he is allowed to invent characters, and mix fiction with fact.

Prophecy—The Hebrew prophet (Nāḥī) had the function to preach, and at times to foretell, what God revealed. He spoke under a special, divine, influence, like inspiration, but intended for the spoken, rather than the written word. Though foretelling was only a subordinate part of his office, it was important; for one of the ways by which he could establish his 33e credentials was by pointing to the fulfilment of his predictions.

The prophets preached to men living in a certain place and time, and they used a language that would arrest, as well as inform, the minds of their audiences. Most of the prophecies were oral, though Jon, Dan 1-6, Is 36-39, Ez 40-47 are literary works. In the main, however, the prophecies belong to the literary form given to oratory, a form close to poetry (cf. A. Condamin, S.J., DAFC, 4 416 ff.). When we read what the prophet foretells we have to distinguish his message from the envelope. The latter is truly inspired as envelope, but its purpose is only to contain, protect and deliver the message; it is determined by the conditions of the prophet's environment. When the fulfilment is reached, the envelope may be discarded (cf. A. Fernández, S.J., N. 64, Scholion 3).

f This distinction enables us to understand why secondary features were not fulfilled to the letter, e.g. the material and national restoration associated with the coming of the Messiah in certain prophecies (Is 8:8 ff.; 11:1 ff.). We, living in the time of the fulfilment, can see that the material hopes were secondary features—part of the envelope. It was only slowly, through the teaching of the Holy Spirit, that the Apostles themselves came to understand how completely Christ had fulfilled the ancient predictions (cf. Ac 1:6). Of course, not all the OT prophecies contained these secondary features about a temporal prosperity (e.g. Is 2:2-5; 9:1-6, and the Servant Oracles). The distinction holds 'nothing to alarm the student of Apologetics. On the contrary, he can win thereby a great advantage when confronting those who object the "prophecy after the event" theory. In fact, whilst the prophet was foretelling with certainty some future important event, he could suggest certain attendant circumstances as probable—in order to give his description life and concrete flavour. But it is obvious that if he were writing only after the event, he would have omitted every detail that did not correspond exactly with the details of the fulfilment. A prophecy about the fall of Babylon, uttered after 539, would be careful to avoid presenting the city as a deserted ruin', A. Condamin, S.J., DAFC 4 419. There is sound historical evidence showing that when Cyrus conquered Babylon in 539 B.C., he did not destroy the city. The lesson we learn is that Isaias, 13; 47, and Jeremias, 50; 51, preached two primary facts: the fall of the Dynasty then in power in Babylon and the end of the Jewish captivity. The exact manner of the fall was secondary, part of the envelope inspired by God to give an arresting exposition of the certain primary facts (cf. Ez 9:1-10:8).

g A feature which sometimes causes difficulty for interpreters is the compenetration of time in the prophet's perspective, especially in apocalyptic passages. In history, chronological or logical order is demanded; in prophecy this may be disregarded. For example, the term, the Day of the Lord in Is, Jer, Joel may have for its immediate subject some particular calamity regarded as God's chastisement, but along with this the prophet may combine characteristics of the Last Day (cf. R. Hull, S.J., Compenetration in Prophecy in Medieval Theories of the Papacy, London, 1934; C. Lattey, Prophecy, CTS, 1943).

h Apocalypse means 'removal of a veil', i.e. a vision of the future. More precisely this literary form denotes eschatological events described in a didactic poem, the form of which is a series of revelations, represented dramatically and by symbols. When the voice of prophecy ceased in Israel this form of literature became common and continued until the 2nd cent. A.D. Its main purpose was to console and strengthen those who were called upon to witness to their faith in times of trial.

The apocryphal books written in this form when its appeal was greatest (from the 2nd cent. B.C. to the 2nd cent. A.D.) reveal a stereotyped general pattern. In the first part of his book the writer 'foretells' events which have already been realized; in the second part he expresses his hopes for the future in the light of events attendant on the Day of the Lord. Moreover, he uses conventional symbols as the vehicle of his thought, first to arouse his readers' curiosity, and secondly because he wants to conceal his teaching from hostile Gentiles.

This literary form is a special class of prophecy. i Like the prophets the apocalyptists were oral teachers as well as writers; preachers who claimed that they wrote not only under the influence of inspiration but in ecstasy (cf. *W. O. E. Oesterley, The Jews and Judaism during the Greek Period, London 1941, 71). Daniel, among the Canonical Books, is acknowledged by all to be in some sense or other an apocalypse (cf. C. Lattey, S.J., The Book of Daniel, Dublin 1948, XXIII), and Apoc has obvious relations, though St John's theme and manner of presentation are not rigidly circumscribed by any borrowed pattern (cf. § 962 ff.).

The first appearances of apocalyptic literature were early (Deut 28:60-68) but it was in the period preceding and following the Exile that it became frequent in canonical literature (cf. Is 11:11-16; 34-35; Ps 47; Prov 1:20-23; Job 18:5 ff.; Ez; Jl; Zach; Mal). 'From the literary standpoint apocalyptic is artificial, cold, pedantic, moving with stereotyped catchwords, encompassed by subtlety and exaggerations, and consequently by the claim that it is trying to translate into human language the highest and most obscure facts', A. Robert, Initiation Biblique, 187.

It would be a mistake to interpret an apocalyptic work as though the writer used historical narrative. It is possible that the writer used fiction, but 'there need have been no deceit on his part, either of himself or of his readers. Such works as apocalypses were not written for the common people, who would not be at all likely to read them, but for such as could appreciate their special conventions', C. Lattey, S.J., op. cit., XXVII (cf. P. Gaechter in § 33c).

The Literary Forms of the NT can very broadly j be grouped into three, the Historical, or Documentary (the Gospels and Ac), the Epistles (St Paul's and the Catholic epistles) and Apocalypse. The fourth Gospel is still a Gospel; how it is included under the historical literary form can be read § 776 ff. Similarly the historicity of the other NT works is treated in the special introductions and in the general essays, §§ 60 ff., 610 ff., 661 ff.

We may mention here the theory of Form Criticism. k The name was borrowed from specialists in medieval German literature who classified and dated popular stories according to their contents and manner of presentation. Applied to the Synoptic Gospels the theory is really a development of Source Criticism. By 1919 non-Catholic critics had established to their own satisfaction the priority of Mk. But then they decided that literary criticism does not take us back far enough; they wished to identify the material which Mk used. To meet this need the theory of Form Criticism was suggested by certain German scholars, and it is becoming increasingly popular in England. Cf. *M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums, 1919, Eng. tr. From Tradition to Gospel, 1935; *F. J. Badcock, Form Criticism, ET 53 (1941) 16 ff.; R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der Synoptischen Tradition, 1931²; F. M. Braun, O.P. Où en est le Problème de Jésus? (Paris 1932) 215-65; J. J. Collins, S.J., Form Criticism and the Synoptic Gospels in Theological Studies (USA) Sept. 1941; S. E. Donlon, S.J., The Form Critics, The Gospel and St Paul, CBQ 6 (1944) 159-79; 306-25; *F. V. Filson, Books on the Message in Journal of Bible and Religion 10 (1942) 93-7 (a good bibliography); E. Florit, La Storia delle Forme nei Vangeli, Bi 14 (1933) 212-48; L. de Grandmaison, S.J., Jésus-Christ 1, 42 ff., London 1934²; *R. H. Lightfoot, Form Criticism and Gospel Study, ET 53 (1941) 51 ff.; *E. S. Redlich, Form Criticism, its Value and Limitations, London 1939; *K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der

LITERARY CHARACTERISTICS OF THE BIBLE

33k Geschichte Jesu, Berlin 1919; *V. Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition, London 1932.

l The Form Critics set themselves a twofold task. First they untie the strings with which the Evangelists are said to have bound together the individual stories of tradition. In other words, they set on one side the grouping, the chronology, the arrangement, the motives behind the writing of each passage. Then they classify the stories left over into forms. This is the essential characteristic of the whole theory. The Form Critics do not always agree on the labels to be attached to the forms, but the following represent those suggested by *Dibelius and *Bultmann: Apophthegms (practically the same as Dibelius's Paradigms), short illustrative stories of an event designed to fit the motive behind the writing. They are of three kinds, polemical, didactical, biographical. Then there are Tales, stories told for their own sake; Miracle stories; Legends; Myths; Sayings; Commentaries.

m The second step is 'to relate the several stories to the life of the Church which cherished and preserved them, and made use of them to convey its message to the world', Lightfoot. In other words, behind our Gospels lies the growth of the forms, the origins of which are to be discovered in the life of the early Christian community. 'The authors of the Gospels . . . are not "authors" in the literary sense, but collectors', Dibelius, 60. R. Bultmann, an extreme Form Critic, declares 'We can know almost nothing concerning the early life and personality of Jesus, since the early Christian sources show no interest in either, are moreover fragmentary and often legendary' (Jesus, 1934², American trans. Jesus and the Word, VIII-IX).

n There is both truth and error in the theories of the Form Critics. Certain observations therefore suggest themselves:—

(i) Their insistence on the importance of oral tradition is a corrective to the Two-Document Theory of the composition of the Synoptic Gospels (cf. § 610 ff.);

(ii) It is true that these Gospels 'inaugurate and form by themselves a new type in the field of doctrinal and apologetical biography; a type which nothing else resembles, even among works which are equally intended to make known and to appraise a religious founder', Grandmaison, 52 f. We may agree that they are not highly polished literary efforts, but simple, incomplete presentations of the Good Tidings, 'less apologies than epiphanies', ibid.

But the fact that a story is told in popular manner, devoid of literary artifice, is no reason for saying it cannot be a true history of fact. There are popular stories which are fictitious; there are also popular accounts of events by eyewitnesses. But the difference between the two is striking. The effacement of the Gospel-writers, their sober narrative even about awe-inspiring miracles, strike a marked contrast with, e.g. the apocryphal gospels.

The authors of the apocryphal Gospels 'do not speak with the voices of Paul or of John, or with the quiet simplicity of the three first Gospels', *M. R. James, The Apocryphal New Testament, xii.

(iii) Thus when it is said that the Gospels were written to portray the Christian belief in and worship of Christ as Lord, we may agree that they do indeed have such a religious goal, the portrayal of Christ as Messiah, true God and true man, but that the sober character of the narrative points to its being a record of objective historical fact, as different as possible from the apocryphal writings of the second century.

(iv) Moreover, bearing in mind the dates of composition, is it reasonable to hold that a Christ-legend could have developed so soon? Some generations ago, Rationalists, regarding the Gospels as unhistorical, rightly reasoned that a considerable length of time must be allowed for such a legend to take shape, and dated the Gospels in the second century. Today, it is no longer possible to maintain such late dates and serious scholars would allow a first century date for all four. Yet the Form Critics, while not disputing the dates, refuse to allow the historical character of the narrative. In short, they ask us to believe that in the space of thirty or forty years, at the end of which thousands of people who had seen Christ were still alive, fictitious accounts of his life and work were composed, widely circulated and accepted as fact. It was precisely to avoid such awkward witnesses that the older Rationalists proposed a second-century date (cf. § 609).

(v) We may classify the Gospel incidents, but 'Let us only remark that in judging a system which insists on classification by form, any considerable amount of formless matter possessing characteristics of several "forms" should raise definite uneasiness in our minds', Donlon, 164.

(vi) The Form Critics have a strange notion of the early Christian community. Fr. Donlon has culled the following characteristics from the works of the leading exponents: 'The early Christian communities were (1) eschatological in thought and outlook, (2) uncontrolled and democratic, (3) in search of laws of living in the words and deeds of Jesus, (4) creative, (5) autonomous'.

This list will serve to indicate how far the mentality of the Form Critics is from that of the primitive Christians who formed the Body of Christ, which is his Church, Eph 1:23 (cf. article CHRISTIANITY IN APOSTOLIC TIMES).

33n

THE INSPIRATION AND INERRANCY OF HOLY SCRIPTURE

By J. H. CREHAN, S.J.

34a Bibliography—Richard Fitzralph, De erroribus Armenorum (Paris 1512) lib. 1 cap. 1–6; Sixtus of Siena, Bibliotheca sacra (Frankfurt 1575) 672–8; Lessius, Responsio ad censuram (in Schneemann, Controvers. de divina gratia, Freiburg 1881); J.-B. Franzelin, De divina traditione et scriptura (Rome 1882²); M.-J. Lagrange, L'inspiration et les exigences de la critique, RB 5 (1896) 485–518; C. Pesch, S.J., De sacrae scripturae inspiratione (Freiburg 1906 and suppl. 1926); H. Höpfl, O.S.B., Tractatus de inspiratione (Rome 1929²); J. Bainvel, S.J., De scriptura sacra (Paris 1910); R. Cornely and A. Merk, S.J., Compendium introductionis (CSS, Paris 1927²); A. Bea, S.J., De sacrae scripturae inspiratione (Rome 1935²); H. Lusscau et M. Collomb, Manuel d'Etudes bibliques, vol. 1 (Paris 1936); E. Dorsch, S.J., Institutiones theologiae fundamentalis, vol. 3 (Innsbruck 1927²); S. Tromp, S.J., De sacrae scripturae inspiratione (Rome 1945²); E. Mangenot, Inspiration (DTC); A. Durand, S.J., Inerrance (DAFC); G. Courtade, S.J., Inspiration (DBV[S]); F. Prat, S.J., La bible et l'histoire (Paris 1908²); J. Calès, S.J., Le Père Fernand Prat (Paris 1942); Various, L'œuvre exégétique et historique du R. P. Lagrange (Paris 1935); F. E. Gigot, Biblical lectures (New York 1901); J. Healy, Papers and Addresses (Dublin 1909); J. Arendzen, Inspiration (with Abp Downey, in The Religion of the Scriptures, Cambridge 1921²); F. Fabbri, La condiscendenza divina nell'ispirazione biblica Bi 14 (1933) 330–47; J. Duggan, S.J., Num sententia Cardinalis Newman defendi possit? VD 18 (1938) 219–24; K. Smyth, S.J., The Criterion of NT Inspiration CBQ 2 (1940) 229–44; A. Bea, S.J., Deus auctor Scripturae in Angelicum 20 (1943) 16–31; *W. Sanday, Inspiration (London 1893); *P. Thompson and *H. Symonds, The inspiration and inerrancy of the Bible (London 1939); *G. Bentley, The resurrection of the Bible (London 1940); *C. H. Dodd, The authority of the Bible (London 1928); H. Dutouquet, S.J., La Psychologie de l'inspiration ER 85 (1900) 158–71; H. Pope, O.P., The Scholastic view of Inspiration ITQ 6 (1911) 275–98; J. MacRory, The Church and the Biblical Question ITQ 1 (1906) 15–34; H. Lusscau, Essai sur la nature de l'inspiration (Paris 1930) with defence of same, Bi 13 (1932) 28–48; J. Garvin, The morality of the Hebrews (in The Old Testament, Cambridge summer school 1938). L. Billot, S.J., De Inspiratione Sacrae Scripturae (Rome 1906²); P. Synave and P. Benoit, O.P., Appendix on Inspiration and Inerrancy in S. Thomas d'Aquin: Somme théologique: La Prophétie (Paris 1947) 293–353. The encyclical Divino afflante of Pius XII is cited according to the official English translation: Stand by the Bible, 1944, which has paragraph numbers inserted.

b Introductory—In modern parlance an inspired statement is one which is probably untrue but which has been given out by some official source in the hope that it will be believed. This degradation of the word 'inspiration' makes it necessary to state at once in general terms what Catholics understand by the inspiration of the Bible. The inspired books of the Bible are not merely the sacred books of Christianity, nor books which all generations of Christians have found to be redolent of God (whether because they found that their contents appealed to what was best in man or for any other reason), but these books have God for their author. Thus God is considered by Catholics to have used the agency of men to produce books which he wished to have written, with such contents as he wished them to have. The difference will be noted at once of this view from modern Anglican ideas according to which it can be said that the writers of the inspired books are felt by us to have a quality sometimes more easy to recognize than to define, which makes what they wrote of unique and permanent religious value. The Catholic theology of inspiration will now be considered historically, according as it has developed, and thereafter some general account of the truth of the Bible and its freedom from error will be given.

Jewish Ideas on Inspiration—The Pentateuch was commonly held by Jews to have come from God entire (TB San. 93a). Even Deut 34:5–12 was thought by some to have been dictated by Moses in prevision of his death, though generally (TB. Baba Bathra 14b) it was held that Josue wrote these verses. The prophets were thought to have undergone less complete control than Moses in their utterance, while the hagiographers were credited with a mere assistance from God. Certain books however were singled out from among the 'writings' as being under the care of more favoured individuals. Thus Moses was credited with the writing of Job whether that means the composition or the copying of the work (TB. Bab. B 15a). Philo considered Scripture to have been written by men in ecstasy. It was 'a god-indwelt possession and madness' (Q. div. rer. her. 249–58). The prophet 'uttereth nothing of his own, but entirely what belongs to another who prompts him the while'. Some think that Philo has contaminated Jewish ideas with Platonic thought here (cf. § 414e), but there is nothing in what he says that could not be matched from the OT. Philo has no trace of the Greek theory (visible in Plutarch, de def. orac. 438a) that oracular speech was due to a fortunate conjunction of mephitic vapours, activated by the sun, with a person of the right temperament. 'The wise man', Philo says, 'is a resonant instrument, struck and beaten by the unseen hand of God'. This inspiration was extended by him to the translators of LXX, in the well-known story of its origin which he recounts (Vit. Mos 2:37). The Targum, too, had its share of inspiration, for (TB Meg 3a) Jonathan ben Uzziel (disciple of Hillel) was said to have composed the Targum of the prophets with aid from Agg, Zach, and Mal, who cannot possibly have been regarded as his contemporaries. When it was finished, a voice from heaven asked: Who has revealed my secrets? Josephus, interpreting Jewish beliefs for a pagan world, says (contr. Ap 1:8) that it is natural for all Jews from their youth up to look on the Bible as God's word, to cling to it and even to die for it.

Philo does use Plato's word ἐμπνοα for 'inspiration' and speaks of prophets as θεόληπτοι or θεοφόρητοι, but apart from coining new words, what else could he have done? It is perhaps significant that, when Christian sources are reached, a new term does appear. The Scriptures are θεόπνευστα (2 Tim 3:15), being thus called by a term which is unparalleled in earlier Greek writing. It is not used by LXX nor by Philo, and the one other usage cited as from a 1st cent. writer (Plutarch, de plac. phil. 904f.) turns out to be from a work of the middle of the 2nd cent. which is printed with Plutarch's works.

34e The OT itself represents Moses as writing his canticle at God's dictation, Deut 31:19: 'Now therefore write you this canticle . . . and this song may be unto me for a testimony amongst the children of Israel'. For other commands to write, see § 413c. David lays claim to inspiration in 2 Kg 23:2: 'The spirit of the Lord hath spoken by me, and his word by my tongue.' In Mal 4:4 (3:24 LXX) the whole law is ascribed to God: 'Remember the law of Moses my servant which I commanded him in Horeb'. The text in Isaias, which is often used to show that he regarded his work as the book of Yahweh, Is 34:16, can no longer be taken to mean so much as that; but the guarantee given by God to the prophet, Is 59:21, that his words shall not perish, though it does not mention writing, is perhaps an indication of belief in an inspired book. Jeremias is more clear, when he says: 'Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremias all the words of the Lord which he spoke to him, upon the roll of a book', Jer 36:4. The evidence for the divine control of prophets in their utterance is given in §§ 410d and 414c-d. The foundation for the later Jewish theory of degrees of inspiration is in Num 12:6: 'If there be among you a prophet of the Lord, I will appear to him in a vision, or I will speak to him in a dream. But it is not so with my servant Moses . . . for I speak to him mouth to mouth and plainly; and not by riddles and figures. He hath seen the Lord'. No Christian writer took up this idea of degrees of inspiration before Theodore of Mopsuestia (PG 66, 697), who probably derived it from Jewish sources. The natural consequence of the divine inspiration of a prophet is that God sees to it that what has been foretold by his prophet comes to pass (cf. Jer 1:11; 28:15; 29:9). This is one way in which the inerrancy of Scripture comes to the notice of the Jews, and as they regarded most of the books in their canon as being prophetic (for Moses was the greatest prophet, the psalmist was the royal prophet and even the Books of Kings were called prophetic), it may be that from such a guarantee of the truth of prophecy the general truth of Scripture was supposed.

35a NT Evidence for the Fact of Inspiration—The Apostles reaffirm the idea that the Scriptures are inspired. St Paul, 2 Tim 3:16, says: 'All Scripture, inspired of God, is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice'. (Here the qualification 'inspired of God' is quite clearly meant to apply to every Scripture. Paul cannot have thought of a class of Scripture-writings which were not inspired. Whether he meant to include in Scripture any NT books such as Mt, must remain an open question.) St Peter, 2 Pet 1:21, agrees: 'Prophecy came not by the will of man at any time: but men spoke on the part of God, inspired by the Holy Ghost'. This is an echo of his sermon in Ac 3:21: 'God hath spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets from the beginning of the world'. Mk 12:36 (which is also Peter's preaching) makes clear—as Mt and Lk do not at that place—that David was inspired by the Holy Spirit. It is in keeping with this emphasis on prophecy that Apoc gives fuller details of God's action upon man in the writing of a sacred book (cf. Apoc 1:17; 2:1-12; 14:13; 22:6). Apart from Apoc, no NT book makes open claim to be inspired, though Peter, 2 Pet 3:16, makes such a claim for 'the epistles of our dearest brother Paul', when he says: 'The unlearned and unstable wrest these epistles, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction'. This verse is much challenged by those who have pre-conceived ideas about the inspiration of the NT, but if the rest of the epistle be authentic (cf. § 952b) there is no reason to refuse credence to this one verse.

b It can be sufficiently demonstrated, even from our Lord's own words by themselves, that the earliest Christians regarded the Bible as inspired. 'You search the Scriptures, for you think in them to have life everlasting', Jn 5:39. Paul's words: 'Well did the Holy Ghost speak to our fathers by Isaias the prophet', spoken to the Jewish elders at Rome, Ac 28:25, show that the doctrine of inspiration was common ground for himself and his gainsayers. The property of freedom from error is also ascribed to the Bible: 'He called them gods to whom the word of God was spoken; and the Scripture cannot be broken', Jn 10:34 (cf. 1:45; Ac 1:20; Mt 5:18).

The Evidence of Tradition for Inspiration—It has never been the practice of Catholic theologians to prove the inspiration of Scripture from the Bible alone. The logical shortcomings of such a method are so great as to make necessary the use of external testimony from the tradition of the Church. Of individual writers in the earliest age Pope Clement I may be cited as having in his letter to the Corinthians shown that he regarded Paul's letters to Corinth as inspired: 'In truth it was by the Spirit that he sent you a letter about himself and Kephas and Apollos', 1 Clem 47:3. Harnack questioned whether Clement conceived Paul's gift of inspiration to be different from his gifts as Apostle, but the point is idle, since the early Church so often takes 'prophets and apostles' as the equivalent of OT and NT. The Epistle of Barnabas, 4:14, quotes Mt 22:14 with the words: 'As it is written', a formula usual with Scripture citation, and as the same unknown writer clearly regards the OT as inspired, 1:7, one might perhaps conclude that he regarded Mt as equally inspired. The nature of his argument precludes him from a direct examination of the gospels. The passage in Ignatius (ad Phil. 8:2), where he seems to be arguing with those who asked for scriptural proof of Christianity, is too ambiguous to be used here, but in Smyr. 5:1 he gives a clear sign that for him prophets, law, and 'gospel' are on the same footing. (Whether gospel here means the written book or the spoken kerygma matters little, for if Peter's preaching is held to be inspired, a faithful written record such as Mark's would also be held to be inspired.) Magn. 8:2 shows that Ignatius regarded the prophets as inspired with a view to their preaching of Christ who was to come. The a fortiori that therefore the Apostles would also be regarded by him as inspired for the same purpose seems warranted. St Polycarp (ep. ad Phil. 7:1) declares that he who shall be found to have twisted the oracles of the Lord to his own fancy and to have denied both resurrection and judgement is the first-born of Satan. This strong condemnation of tampering with at least some of the NT Scriptures, written c. A.D. 115 by a disciple of John, shows that he certainly subscribed to their sacred and inspired character (cf. Apoc 22:18-19). That Polycarp deals with NT and not OT Scriptures may be concluded from the following points: the use of κρίσις, the fact that, Jn 5:22, all judgement is given to the Son and that the denial of it would therefore involve altering NT texts, while the evidence for the resurrection, whether of Christ or of all men, is primarily in the NT also. Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. pref.) echoes the phrase in a NT context. Denis of Corinth (flor. 170) re-echoes Polycarp, for he writes to Pope Soter (in Euseb. HE 4:23) that it is small wonder that the apostles of the devil tamper with his (Denis's) letters, seeing that they dare to do as much with the Scriptures of the Lord.

St Justin—The old man to whom (Dial. Tryph 3-7) St Justin ascribes his conversion says: 'There were long ago men more ancient than any of the philosophers now in repute, men who were happy, upright, and beloved of God, who spoke by the divine Spirit and gave oracles of the future which are now coming to pass. These men are called prophets. They alone saw the truth and proclaimed it to men, not practising any restriction, not made shamefaced nor swayed by boastfulness, but proclaiming that and that alone which they heard and saw, being filled with Holy Spirit. Their writings are still extant'. This clearly shows that Christians of the time accepted all the OT as inspired, for the emphasis here placed on prophecy does not exclude from the scope of inspiration the law and the 'writings'. How Justin regarded the NT may be seen later in the same work (82). Here he has mentioned that 'John, one of the Apostles of Christ, 35a prophesied in a vision given to him', and he continues: 'Amongst us even now there are prophetic graces, whence you [the Jews] ought to realize that those ancient gifts that were among you have been transferred to us. Just as in the times of the holy prophets among you false prophets arose, even so amongst us now [the ideal date of the dialogue is 132] there are many false teachers'. This equation of prophets and Apostles is again made by Justin (75) where he argues from Is 6:8: 'Here I am, send me', that it was proper for the real prophets of God to be Apostles, i.e. 'men sent' (cf. also Dial 110).

f Marcion and the Manichees—Marcion's attack on the Scriptures (c 150) led to some further argument on the equal inspiration of OT and NT. Tertullian (Adv. Mar. 4:22) disputes Marcion's explanation of the Transfiguration. It was not true, as Marcion said, that: 'Hear ye him' meant that Moses and Elias were not to be heard. If the two were alongside Christ as rejected figures, they would have been in rags and on the ground, not glorious and in friendly converse with Jesus, the one of them the initiator veteris testamenti, the other the consummator novi. Cf. also Marcion's omission of Lk 11:49-51, which tells its own tale.

Though Marcion had dealt roughly with the Scriptures, it was the rise of the Manichees which put the Church very strictly upon the defensive in this question of inspiration. The Acta Archelai (written before 350) show Mani on trial, proclaiming that Satan was responsible for the OT (Acta Arch. 15:10 = CB 16:24), and that the doctrine of Christ was renewed from day to day, since the Paraclete was said to receive of Christ's and to show it to Christians (cf. Jn 16:14). That Mani himself claimed to be the Paraclete is said by Titus of Bostra (Adv. Manich. 3 p. = PG 18, 1209), writing about 363: 'The gospels and the rest of the NT, Mani says, were given as lesson from the good principle, and he asserts that not even these are quite free from the element that is contrary to God. Thus he takes upon himself the correction of the Scriptures, and on this account he dares to suppose that he is the Holy Ghost, excising much of the Scriptures and leaving only a little, i.e. what seems to look forward to a harmony with the products of his own native wit'. Alexander of Lycopolis, an early opponent of the Manichees, writing c 300 (cf. JTS 39 [1938] 347) says: 'They use their own old and new scriptures, setting them up as inspired, and produce their own opinions as conclusions from them', De Plac. Man. 5 = PG 18, 417.

g This clear acceptance, by Manichee and Christian, of the idea that genuine Scripture is inspired by the Holy Ghost, needs little emphasis. The addition of the words 'Who spoke by the prophets' to the creed of Nicaea which expressed belief in the Holy Ghost is an obvious reply to the spread of Manichaean views that the devil had inspired the OT. This addition is known to Cyril of Jerusalem (in his Catecheses, preached 348-50) and to Epiphanius (in the Ancoratus, of 374) in a period when the Manichees were growing in importance. Further evidence of Mani's view on this can be obtained from hymn 223 in the newly discovered Coptic papyrus, as also from Augustine (contr. Ep. Fund. 5 and 8 = CSEL 25:200-201). The Montanists differed from the Manichees. They were content to restore Christianity, as they said, while the Manichees ventured to reconstruct it. Tertullian in his Montanist days gives an indication of their attitude to the Scriptures. He is arguing against marriage, using 1 Cor 7, and he says: 'Olim sanctitati huic destinabamur. Nihil novi paracletus inducit. Quod praemonuit, definit', De Monog. 3 = PL 2, 983. The Spirit is quite clearly thought of as inspiring Paul no less than the prophetesses of Montanus.

h Irenaeus (c 120-202) is the father of Christian theology and in his writings the work of the Holy Spirit in producing the Scriptures is fully attested. In a passage dealing with parables (Adv. Haer. 2:41, 1, Harvey) he says: 'If we cannot find explanations of all things which require investigation in the Scriptures, let us not seek for a second god beyond the One who is, for that would be the height of impiety. We ought to leave such things to God who is after all our maker, and most justly to bear in mind that the Scriptures are perfect, being spoken by the Word of God and by his Spirit, while we, as lesser beings, and indeed as the least of all, in comparison with the Word of God and with his Spirit, in that proportion fall short of the understanding of God's mysteries'. (On the idea of Irenaeus that Word and Spirit are the two hands of God in creation of the world and of the Scriptures, cf. Armitage Robinson's introduction to Irenaeus, the Apostolic Preaching, p 51.) This Demonstration of the apostolic preaching (ibid. ch 49) declares: 'It is not David who speaks nor anyone of the prophets in his own person; for it is not a man who speaks the prophecies, but the Spirit of God, assimilating and likening himself to the persons represented, speaks in the prophets, and utters the words, sometimes from Christ and sometimes from the Father'. Athenagoras (177), in putting the same doctrine before the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Commodus (Legat. 9 = TU 4, 2 [1891] p 10), adopts the comparison of the player and the musical instrument which occurs in Philo: 'The words of the prophets guarantee our reasoning . . . for they, while the reasoning power within them was at a stand, under the motion of the divine Spirit, spoke forth what was being wrought in them, the Spirit working with them, as it were a piper who breathed into his pipe'. (The prophets mentioned are 'Moses, Isaias, Jeremias, and the rest'.) Theophilus of Antioch, a contemporary of Athenagoras, and like him an apologist, writes to Autolycus (2:9 = PG 6, 1064): 'The men of God were spirit-borne and became prophets; being breathed upon by God himself and made wise, they were taught of God, holy and just. Thus they were deemed fit to receive the name of the instruments of God, and were enabled to hold the wisdom of God by means of which they spoke about the creation of the world and all else. . . . And there were not one or two of them but many, and all spoke in harmony and accord with each other of those things which happened before their time, or during their time, and also of what is now coming to pass in our days'. Later (3:12 = PG 6, 1137) Theophilus declares that the NT is on the same level as the OT for inspiration: 'The statements of the prophets about justice and those of the gospels are found to be in harmony because their authors were all spirit-borne and spoke by the Spirit of God'.

The Official Teaching of the Catholic Church—In 36a early creeds and Councils the Church is more concerned with the equal status of OT and NT and with the divine authorship of both than with theories of inspiration as such. The further elaboration of the idea was left to the theologians. Thus the creed of Toledo (Dz 28) of A.D. 400 anathematizes those who say there is one god of the OT and another of the NT. In 1053 St Leo IX requires Peter of Antioch (Dz 348) to profess the same faith in one divine author of OT and NT. The Waldensians are summoned in the same terms (Dz 421, cf. 426: Omne quod legitur . . .). Michael Palaeologus at the Council of Lyons in 1274 encounters the same article (Dz 464). Lest anyone think (with Abbot Ford in his articles in The Tablet for 1905) that this talk of OT and NT envisaged merely the dispensations and not the books, it is made clear by the letter of Clement VI in 1351 to the Catholicos of Armenia (Dz 570r) that the books are meant: 'We ask if you believed and now believe that the NT and OT in all the books which the authority of the Roman Church has handed down to us contain unquestionable truth throughout'. It should be apparent from what is said above about the Manichees that it was always a question of books, and sometimes of the dispensations as well, but never of the dispensations alone. The Council of Florence in its decree for the Jacobites, (Dz 706) does but emphasize this when it declares that there is one God of the OT and NT, gives a list of the canonical books and then proceeds to anathematize

INSPIRATION AND INERRANCY OF HOLY SCRIPTURE

36a the Manichean view of the different gods of OT and NT. Trent and the Vatican (Dz 783 and 1787) are in this matter the echo of Florence.

b The Elaborations of the Theologians—St Thomas Aquinas did not discuss inspiration as such at any length. He devoted some questiones of his Summa (2a-2ae, 171-74) to a short treatise on prophecy while discussing the charismata. He there distinguishes inspiratio, which is needed for the raising of the mind above the disturbance of the passions and the onset of external cares, from revelatio, which puts the prophet in possession of divine truths. He is willing to admit that a prophet is sometimes instructed in these truths not by express revelation but by 'some subtle instinct' which he may not recognize as a divine prompting. Richard Fitzralph (Archbishop of Armagh c 1356) in his dialogue with John the Armenian shows true critical ability when he begins his work by a discussion of the truth of Scripture and lays it down that the Holy Spirit is the auctor primarius of Scripture, while the human writer is auctor immediatus. But in general the Middle Ages took their Scripture for granted. After the Council of Trent a theory of 'subsequent inspiration' began to be advanced for controversial ends. By this it was maintained that the approval of the Holy Ghost or of the Church, given after the event to a book which a man had written without any divine assistance, was sufficient to make a book inspired. In 1566 Sixtus of Siena, while defending the canonicity of 2 Mac, argued that its subsequent inspiration would be enough to make him accept the book although he dared not say whether it was by a sacred or a profane author in the first instance. Lessius in 1585 at Louvain gave out the same view in his lectures, with one modification. His enemies, some of them disciples of Baius, produced this proposition, which Lessius owned to be his: 'A book such as 2 Mac, written by human industry without the aid of the Holy Spirit, may afterwards, if the Holy Spirit give testimony that it contains nothing false, be ranked as holy Scripture'. Great heat was generated by the discussion of this and of several other propositions at Louvain and at Douai. Bellarmine did not like it but thought it tolerable. Lessius in his defence withdrew the reference to 2 Mac, and put his view forward as an hypothetical case. What the Vatican Council later came to deny (Dz 1787) was that it was the Church's approval that could make a book inspired. Lessius's theory was expressly excluded from the scope of the decree by speeches of the relatores, Mgrs. Simor and Gasser, Mansi 51:47 and 283. Moreover Leo XIII was later to set aside this view by his teaching in Providentissimus Deus. It can be seen that in controversy with a Protestant it was tempting for a Catholic to envisage the idea that the Church not merely guarded the canon of Scripture but actually gave the book its inspired character. This latter view, upheld by Jahn of Vienna and Abbot Haneberg of Munich in the 19th cent., was condemned by the Vatican Council, which added a positive statement that it was because they had God for their (principal) author and as such were given to the Church that the books of the Bible were to be regarded as inspired. This was enough to show the difference between the Church's doctrine and all subjective criteria of inspiration.

d Lessius also rejected verbal inspiration (in its naïve form, which amounts to a theory of divine ventriloquism) and Bellarmine supported him. Cartwright, the Anglican critic of the Rheims translators, held verbal inspiration even to the exclusion of all textual corruption: 'Seeing the Scripture wholly both for matter and words is inspired of God, it must follow that the same words wherein the OT and NT were written and indited by the hand of God do remaine'. The Swiss formula consensus (1675) held that all vowel-points and accents were due to inspiration and that no barbarisms of language could occur in biblical Greek or Hebrew. Bañez (in tam. q. 1, art 8, conc 2a) held this view, and the Vatican Council, Mansi 51:47, refrained from pronouncing on the dispute between him and Lessius. 36d

Modern Deepening of the Concept of Inspiration—Leo XIII in 1893, in this as in much else completing the work of the Vatican Council, taught that inspiration included the arousing of the human author to write by the action of the Holy Spirit, and the assistance given by the Spirit in the work of composition, so that those things only and wholly which he wished should be written down. All this was seen to be involved in the concept of the divine authorship of the Scriptures, a concept which was familiar to the tradition of the Church (Dz 1952, repeated in Dz 2186). Certainly that tradition abounds in evidence that the human authors were regarded as (musical) instruments in the hands of God.

The modern Thomist theory of Inspiration is based upon the idea of an instrumental cause (though the latest Thomist to expound it [Benoit, 303] says that this notion of instrument must be taken in a wide and not a strict sense) and was originally formulated by Lagrange and Billot. An instrument is said to have no action at all except as moved or applied by some higher agent. Thus the biblical authors must be set in motion by God to produce even that effect which is within their natural powers. An inspired writer can indeed convey a message by his own power, but he can only convey a divine message as God's instrument, transmitting that power, which is communicated to him as a light illuminating his mind, to judge what to say and how to say it, and moving his will to write. It is not that God and man contribute each his own share to the inspired book; there is not in the effect produced anything that belongs to the one cause and not to the other: the whole is due to each, but in different senses. Billot's extreme tidiness of mind made him insist that Inspiration was everywhere in Scripture the same. The knowledge of what was to be written about might come by revelation or by natural investigation (divinely assisted) of the human author, but neither of these belonged to Inspiration. This was essentially a divine motion of the intellect under whose stress the human mind judged with divine clarity and certitude of what God wanted written, along with the necessary verbal expression, and then set in motion the task of writing these down. Thus for the old naïve verbal Inspiration was now substituted a 'total' Inspiration whereby God was the total author (and not merely principal) of the book while man was to be regarded as the total author in his degree. [Some contemporary Thomists, however, deny that this doctrine of a 'total inspiration' is a novelty, and claim that it has always been part of Thomist teaching.—Ed.] God was thought (Billot, 56) to sway the man's will in exactly the same way as when, on the theory of physical premotion (or predetermination), he gave him an efficacious actual grace. To the present writer and to others (Dorsch, 115, Lusseau Bi 13 [1932] 48) this view seems an oversimplification of the mystery. St Thomas distinguishes (1a-2ae, 111, 4c and ad 4) charismata, which are for the benefit of others, from graces which are only for our personal sanctification, and one would not expect their mechanism to be the same. Then the view that a man is the total author (albeit subordinate) of all that is in Scripture seems to the present writer to have been modified by the teaching of Divino afflante (par 31) that the spiritual significance of Scripture is due to God alone. David said: 'Thou wilt not give thy holy one to see corruption' (Ps 15:10, cf. Dz 2133, 2272); the words refer to Christ's resurrection, but David hardly can be regarded as the author of that spiritual sense, which is God's very own.

The idea of instrumental cause does apply to Inspiration, but as Pope Pius XII explains (Divino afflante, par. 37): 'Catholic theologians, following the teaching of the holy fathers and especially of the Angelic and Common Doctor [St Thomas] have investigated and explained the nature and effects of divine inspiration better and more fully than was the custom in past 36h centuries. Starting from the principle that the sacred writer is the organon, or instrument, of the Holy Spirit, and a living and rational instrument, they rightly observe that under the influence of the divine motion he uses his own faculties and powers in such a way that from the book which is the fruit of his labour all may easily learn the distinctive genius and individual characteristics and features of each author'. St Thomas adumbrates this idea (Comm. in ep. Hebr 1:1) where he asks himself why it is said that God spoke in the prophets and not through the prophets, seeing that after all they were his instruments. He answers finally that this was done to exclude the error of those who say that the prophets did not understand what they said, and he quotes Agg 1:3 and 1 Cor 14:32. A mere instrument would be unintelligent and passive in the hands of God, but in the co-authorship of the Scriptures God acts in and through the human author, not merely through him, as through an instrument.

I The Divine Condescension—This development of the doctrine of inspiration which has come in the present day has allowed place to the idea that in spite of the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, or rather because of it, when it is rightly understood, a Catholic can expect to find in the different books of the Bible a difference of style and of literary genre which some theologians in Modernist times strictly refused to allow. (Thus that Wis 7:5-10; 8:14-15 and 9:7-10 should imply that Solomon wrote the book does not mean that the Holy Ghost is partner in a lie, but that he is allowing the human author to use the device of pseudepigraphy, on which cf. § 92b.) This divine condescension or συγκατάβασις (the Greek Fathers had a word for it) is accepted by such a judgement as that of Jerome (on Jer 6:1 = CSEL 59:368) that Jeremias writes like a man of poor education though he is most profound in the majesty of his thoughts. It is also the idea implied by the Muratori fragment (DAC s.v.) which says that though the gospels have different starting-points, this makes no difference to the faith of Catholics, seeing that all things in all of them are declared by one and the same Spirit. Denis of Alexandria (Feltoe, Dionysius of Alexandria [Cambridge 1904] 234) also echoes this: 'What the Holy Spirit imparted severally to the evangelists puts together the complete character of our Saviour from the utterance of each'. The principle that, where an event is recorded twice, an indication is given us that more than one source is being used by a compiler, may be valid for western historical documents, but has no application in the East. 'To express what they had in their minds the ancients of the East did not always use the same forms and expressions as we use today. They used those which were current among the people of their own time and place, and what these were the exegete cannot determine a priori, but only from a careful study of oriental literature' (Pius XII, Divino afflante, par. 39). See further §§ 41a-h, 46h.

J There is one great limitation to be set upon the operation of the divine condescension in its allowing the human author his head; it must always be without formal error (see § 37a on Inerrancy). This limitation leads Pius XII to point a comparison (found in Rabanus Maurus, PL 108, 248) between the Incarnate Word and the written word of God. 'Just as the substantial Word of God became like to men in all things, sin excepted, Heb 4:15, so the words of God, expressed in human language, became in all things like to human speech, error excepted' (Divino afflante, par. 41). This is certainly a principle of liberation for speculative theology, which in Modernist times faced an impasse. Some then said that all was divine in the Scriptures (just as the Monophysites had said that all was divine in Christ), and would not admit any literary genres but the historical, nor any concession to the humanity of the writer, not a literary device, not a mixed metaphor, not an uncouth word. Others by a 'vivisection' divided the Scriptures into divine ideas and human words, just as the Nestorians had divided Christ into two persons. The first group, making no allowance for the human work of the evangelist, heightened the difficulties of the exegete, already serious in days when the new discoveries of the remote past seemed to be telling against the truth of the Scriptures. The second, or Nestorian, group assumed that God could convey to a human mind ideas without imagery, a supposition which psychologists have not yet fully justified. Today all are encouraged to use the analogy of faith and to find new light on the mystery of Inspiration—for it is a mystery—by comparing it with the Incarnation. The acts of Christ on earth were some of them wholly divine, some merely human, and others mixed. Now with the human and mixed acts, the Divinity shared in the operation, while in such purely divine acts of the Word as creation the humanity did not share. Similarly in the production of the Scriptures, the literal sense (that which is expressed by the words themselves) was intended by God and by the human author, but there is sometimes to be found (cf. § 39k) a spiritual significance whose presence the human author did not even suspect. 'God alone was able to know this spiritual significance, and he alone could reveal it to us' (Divino afflante, par. 31). Thus while it is true that all in the Scriptures is from God, it is not true that all is from the human author.

The Psychology of Inspiration—God works through the human writer in producing the Scriptures as through his instrument (just as John Damascene can speak of the humanity of Christ being the instrument of the Divinity), but as the instrument is human, God works in him too, in his mind and will (just as St Paul can say, 2 Cor 5:19: God was in Christ). The union of God and the writer is not hypostatic, for that is the greatest of all unions and is reserved to Christ, but somewhere not far below this mystery of hypostatic union comes the mystery of God's dealing with his evangelist. Analogies with mystical experience might help more in explaining it than speculation whether God illuminates the intellectus agens or only the intellectus possibilis. Undoubtedly modern interest in the psychology of authorship sets questionings astir about the psychology of Inspiration; but if Inspiration is one of those mysteries which cannot be fully understood even when revealed to us (and to the present writer it seems so), then progress in psychological reconstruction must be slow.

St Thomas in his treatment of the degrees of prophecy (2a-2ae 173, 3c) and in his statement (2a-2ae 174, 2 ad 3) that writers of the Hagiographa had usually only that aid of divine illumination which enabled them to know things naturally knowable but at present out of their ken, considers Inspiration to be not always the same. Here again the analogy with mystical experience will hold, and clearly the psychological account of one writer (such as John in Apoc) who was aware that he was being inspired must be different from that of one (such as the writer of 2 Mac) who was not. Theologians agree that the aid given to an inspired writer is greater than that enjoyed by a General Council—which yet does publish infallible decrees—and that a Council again has aid superior in kind to that given to each of the Fathers of the Church, who yet were left not without aid seeing that their united witness gives the true sense of Scripture and of Tradition.

When it is admitted that an inspired writer may have used a secretary (cf. §§ 52c, 48b) it seems more reasonable to confine inspiration to the author (Paul or Moses) and to regard the secretary as uninspired. (If the secretary is the instrument of the author and the author is the instrument of God, one is well on the way to an infinite regress.) Some theologians consider the secretary as inspired too (cf. Bea, 66), but the principle invoked, that all who are intelligently concerned in the production of the inspired book are themselves inspired, would seem to include, if not the slaves who prepared the papyrus, at least an intelligent copying-slave. The use of a secretary may have been wider than is often 37c recognized. Jerome (Ep. 120:11 = CSEL 55:508) asking why Paul was unhappy, 2 Cor 7:5-6, until Titus came to him, remarks that Titus was Paul's interpreter, and that Paul was sad, because he lacked at the moment that pipe or instrument of his preaching by which he used to sing to the Lord. He adds that Peter used secretaries too, and that the difference between the style and phrasing of 1 Pet and 2 Pet was due thereto.

The language of 2 Mac 2:24-32; 15:38-40, which shows the human author reflecting on his labours of composition, their difficulty, purpose, and method, is not really incompatible with the doctrine of inspiration. While God often gave the prophets their theme by direct revelation, so that they were aware they dealt with God, this was not at all necessary. God could with equal reason move a man to make an epitome of Jason's history, could guide him to take only what was true in it and could by condescension allow him to give vent to the weariness of the compiler who was unaware that he walked with God.

1 The Extent of Inspiration—A theory first put out by Dr H. Holden, an English priest, in 1658 (The Analysis of Divine Faith, 61), limited the scope of inspiration. Holden said: 'The special and divine assistance which is given to the author of every such book as the Church receives for the Word of God doth only extend itself to those things which are doctrinal, or at least have some near or necessary relation unto them. But in those things which are written by the bye, or have reference to something else not concerning religion, I conceive the author had only such a divine assistance as other holy and saintly authors have'. Manning (Temporal Mission of the Holy Ghost [1865] 147-50) defended Holden as orthodox but muddled. Newman revived the theory of obiter dicta being uninspired (The Nineteenth Century, Feb. 1884): 'Obiter dictum means, as I understand it, a phrase or sentence which, whether a statement of literal fact or not, is not from the circumstances binding upon our faith. . . . There does not seem to be any serious difficulty in admitting that they are found in Scripture. The Church has taught us in two councils that the divine inspiration of Scripture is to be assigned especially rebus fidei et morum'. This seems to be a plain confusion between what Trent and the Vatican had said about Vg's safety in faith and morals with what was said about inspiration. Dr Healy of Maynooth (later Archbishop of Tuam) attacked this view and Newman defended himself. After this, and in part too because of this, Leo XIII in 1893 wrote (Dz 1950): 'The plan of those is not to be tolerated who, to rid themselves of these difficulties [of apparent error in the Bible] make no scruple to allow that divine inspiration reaches to matters of faith and morals and no farther'.

Diverging opinions are held by theologians on the inspiration of versions. Some of the Fathers shared Philo's view that LXX was inspired. On individual books such as 1 Mac and Mt, where the Hebrew original is lost, views have been expressed which range from affirmation (Lagrange, Introd. to Mt, p xxxiv) through qualified caution (Tromp, 103, who says that it is a pious belief that the Greek of Mt is inspired) to denial (Bea, 67) that versions are inspired as such, though they may be so equivalently, by being faithful renderings of an inspired text. (For further details cf. 226a-b.)

2 Inerrancy—Truth and error in the Bible belong to statements, assertions and insinuations, but not to commands, advice, wishes or regrets. The claims made in the Scriptures themselves to freedom from error have been noticed above. The direct proof from tradition that the Church has ever regarded the Scriptures as free from error is simple. It is the application of the principle to individual texts which has provoked so much debate. The Fathers are quite overwhelming in their declarations of the principle. Routh (Rel. Sac. 1848², vol. 5, pp 335-53) collected a great list of passages, most of which can still be used. An attitude of awe and reverence before the Scriptures is already 37b present in Polycarp who writes (Ad Phil. 3): 'It is not possible for anyone like myself to company with the wisdom of the blessed and renowned Paul . . . who wrote to you'. The care that the Spirit showed to keep corrupters of doctrine from the Scriptures is marked by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer 3:17, 1 H): 'The Holy Spirit, foreseeing that there would be corrupters, guarded against their deceptions and declared in Matthew "Now the manner of Christ's birth was thus"'. Theophilus of Antioch is sure that Law, prophets and gospels will all be found to agree, because all are spoken by the one Spirit (Ad Autol. 3:12 = PG 6, 1137), while Origen (In Jn 6:34 = CB 10:143) declares the principle formally: 'The evangelists neither lied nor made any mistake'. (That Origen should elsewhere (In Mt 27:9 = CB 38:249) ascribe the naming of Jeremiah for Zachary to an error scripturae probably means that he saw in it a mistake of the copyist of the MS. The Greek of Origen is here lacking.) How completely the idea of inerrancy held sway may be seen from the Computus de Pascha (CSEL 3, iii, p 258) which dates from A.D. 243: 'From Josue to Samuel, according to the speech of St Paul, Ac 13:20, who was taught by the Spirit of God, there were completed 450 years'. Bishops such as Crescens of Ciria and Leucius of Theveste declare the Scriptures to be deificae and call those heretics blasphemers who dismember the holy and adorable Scriptures with deceitful words (Sent. Episc. ap. Cyprian, CSEL 3, 1:441 and 448), while Novatian (De Trin. 30 = PL 3, 948) says that it can never be by fault of the heavenly Scriptures (which never deceive us) that we should seem to give scandal, but only by the proud errors of men who are bent on being heretics. St Augustine's principle, which has guided western exegetes for many centuries, was thus expressed: 'If I come upon anything in the Scripture which seems contrary to the truth, I shall not hesitate to consider that it is no more than a faulty reading of the manuscript, or a failure of the translator to hit off what his text declared, or that I have not succeeded in understanding the passage' (Ep. 82:1 = CSEL 34, 2:354). This principle is quoted with approval by Leo XIII (Dz 1952), for the Church has ever upheld the patristic tradition of biblical inerrancy. Benedict XV in 1920 summed up the tradition thus: 'The teaching of St Jerome is strikingly confirmed by what our predecessor Leo XIII declared to be the unbroken and ancient faith of the Church about the absolute immunity of the Scriptures from error of every kind'. Having cited the decrees of Florence and Trent which were confirmed at the Vatican, he adds: 'It makes no difference at all that the Holy Ghost should have taken men to be as it were his tools in writing, as if forsooth the men who were inspired, but not the divine author, might let fall some error. Not so, for he himself so stirred and roused them by his supernatural power to write, and was so present to them in their writing that they conceived correctly, and were minded to write faithfully, and expressed fittingly with unfailing truth, all those things and those only which he bade them write'.

3 Difficulties from Science and History—Leo XIII dealt with the commonest 19th cent. objection to inerrancy, that it set the truth of the Bible in opposition to the truth of physical science. 'No error whatever exists in those cases in which the sacred writer, when treating of physical matters, followed sensible appearances (St Thomas, 1a q 70, art 1 ad 3), expressing himself either metaphorically or in the common manner of speaking current at the time, and current now also in many matters of daily experience, even amongst the most learned men. The sacred writers—or more properly the Holy Ghost who spoke through them—did not intend to teach men these matters (namely, the inner constitution of visible things) which are in no way profitable to salvation' (Dz 1947 quoted Divino afflante, par 5). An instance might be the passage in 3 Kg 7:23 and the value of π which is there implied.

37g For the application of this principle to Galileo's case, see § 232i.

Pope Leo went on to indicate that this principle might well be used to deal with difficulties from cognate sciences, and especially from history. His words were the subject of many misunderstandings, and it is only now that these have been finally cleared up by the teaching of Divino afflante (cf. § 38a) on the importance of ascertaining the purpose of the scriptural writer (especially as shown in his choice of literary genre) before accusing him of errors. More recently the letter of the Biblical Commission of Jan 16, 1948, to Cardinal Suhard (cf. § 53k-m) applies this principle vigorously to the first eleven chapters of Gen. By reaction against the inconsistencies of documentary hypotheses—the Commission notes—some scholars are now, on critical and historical grounds alone, moved to see in the ill-fitting nature of the parts of the Pentateuch not so much a difference of documentary sources as an effect of the peculiarities of literary procedure, thought and expression in the ancient East. Catholic writers are invited to study these problems with patience, with charity to others and with an open mind.

Origen listed certain historical facts (In Philem., PG 14, 1306) in Gen which must be believed; Jerome copied his list (In Philem., PL 26, 609), and it passed into tradition. The Biblical Commission used it in a decree of 1909 (Dz 2123), which is still in force, but the spirit of which has been changed by the new emphasis on wider research, an emphasis which could not have been contemplated in Modernist times. Now that the flight from the sources is ending in other departments of ancient history, and there is a return to a sane Herodotus and a real Homer, the danger of excesses in biblical criticism on the part of Catholic scholars is obviously lessened. (On the accuracy of OT dates and numbers cf. § 226c.)

h The Use of Sources by Inspired Writers—Another attempt to meet charges of error in Scripture was the theory of implicit citations, advanced by P. Prat and others in 1902-1907 (cf. § 225e). All ancient authors quoted freely and plagiarism was no offence; might it not then be that the sacred writers when they seemed to be in error were really quoting from some profane author for whom they did not vouch, but whose words they did not display as a quotation. The scope of such a theory might be judged by a glance at 2 Mac 2:14, 24. If the author of Mac synthesized five books of Jason, might not the errors be put down to Jason? The Biblical Commission did not condemn the theory, but urged restraint in its use (cf. § 52i). Benedict XV renewed this verdict (Dz 2188). The principle has been used by Catholics to account for some apparent discrepancies between texts (as 2 Kg 24:9 and 1 Par 21:5; also 2 Mac 1:11-17 and 2 Mac 9:1-29; 1 Mac 6:1-16). If Clement of Alexandria meant that the genealogies of Christ were written before the gospels of Mt and Lk, then discrepancies in the genealogies could be explained on this principle too (CB 17, 197). A somewhat larger question of applying this principle is raised by the letter of the Biblical Commission to Cardinal Suhard (cf. § 53k-m). Recalling an earlier decision on the Pentateuch (Dz 1999), it states that no one can now call in question the use by Moses of earlier written documents and oral traditions—though these are not acknowledged by him in the text. What was Moses inspired to do in his selection or rejection of passages from earlier sources? If he is thought to have made them his own and gone surety for their accuracy, then he must be held to have put them forward as true. If however he reports them as what was told to him, and does not vouch for them, then no question of the freedom from error of such citations could arise. The answer to this question depends on the view taken of the literary genre of the first eleven chapters of Gen, where most difficulties occur. Of these the Commission remarks that one can neither simply affirm nor deny that they are history without applying to them the standards of a literary genre which does not fit them.

They are not history in a classical or a modern sense, but the peoples of the Orient do seem to have had a special way of their own of recounting salient historical events which should be the subject of much patient and erudite investigation (cf. § 225c). It is open to no one, then, to say roundly that there is error in these chapters, but what the human author there seeks to affirm is not always clear, owing to our ignorance of his conventions.

Literary Genres and Inerrancy—Benedict XV (Dz 2188) spoke somewhat severely of scholars who too readily had recourse to literary genres incompatible with the full truth of the word of God. With due regard to this necessary warning, Pius XII (Divino afflante, par 39), no longer needing to check the vagaries of Catholic scholars, encourages the study of literary forms: 'It is absolutely necessary for the interpreter to go back in spirit to those remote centuries of the East, making proper use of the help afforded by history, archaeology, ethnology and other sciences, in order to discover what literary forms the writers of that early age intended to use and did in fact employ'. The coming of the Ras Shamra documents, the Lachish letters, the love-songs of Chester Beatty papyrus 1 (Bi 13 [1932] 209-27) and others, makes such research worth while. In the time of Benedict XV it would have been very much less possible to conduct such investigations and yet to avoid arbitrary conclusions. Pius XII notes that historians of the East (such as Eduard Meyer, Ges. des Alter. [1910] 1:227) allow that the people of Israel enjoyed a unique pre-eminence in historical writing among the ancient nations of the East. He urges (ibid. par 42) that use be made of this aid not only in exegesis but also in vindicating the immunity of the Scriptures from error. (Certain Catholics had allowed its first usefulness but condemned its use in the problem of inerrancy.) The Pope continues: The Catholic exegete must ask himself how far the form of expression or literary idiom employed by the sacred writer may contribute to the true and genuine interpretation; and he may be sure that this part of his task cannot be neglected without great detriment to Catholic exegesis. For . . . in many cases in which the sacred authors are accused of some historical inaccuracy or of the inexact recording of some events, it is found to be a question of nothing more than those customary and characteristic forms of expression or styles of narrative which were current in human intercourse among the ancients, and which were in fact quite legitimately and commonly employed. A just impartiality therefore demands that when these are found in the word of God, which is expressed in human language for men's sake, they should be no more stigmatized as error than when similar expressions are employed in daily usage. Thus a knowledge and careful appreciation of ancient modes of expression and literary forms and styles will provide a solution to many of the objections made against the truth and historical accuracy of Holy Writ. (For examples of the application of this principle, cf. §§ 226i, 877b, 961b-c.) The various genres which are to be found in Scripture are listed in the article on Literary Characteristics of the Bible, §§ 32-3. Here it may suffice to ask if the principle of inerrancy rules out any genre as incompatible with truth. It may be said at once that aetiological writing, such as the Fasti of Ovid, where the poet undertakes to give the reason (aitia) of some ritual practice by telling a legend of its origin, would be repugnant to the idea of inerrancy. Among the Jewish Midrashim, some were so far fictional as to use the names and known acts of scriptural characters to form the basis of imaginary narratives. The so-called Biblical Antiquities of Philo and the Pirke of R. Eliezer present enlargements upon the well-known themes of Scripture, some of them aetiological in style. Now it would certainly seem contrary to the idea of inspiration that the word of God should admit two contradictory versions of the same event, as may be found in these apocrypha. On the other hand the Jewish fondness for 38b telling a story by degrees in the course of two or more rehearsals must not be considered to be annihilated by the fact of inspiration. An obvious example is the treatment of Paul's conversion in Ac, while in the OT many parallel narratives in Kgs or 1 and 2 Par can be similarly explained (e.g. 1 Kg 21:8-9 with 1 Kg 22:9-14 and 2 Kg 3:9). For fiction in the OT see §§ 301a-f, 310k-l.

INSPIRATION AND INERRANCY OF HOLY SCRIPTURE

c The Truth of Implications in Scripture—Not only what the human writer states but also what he implies must be taken as true (cf. § 52e). This conclusion was not drawn by those who thought that Paul might have erred where he speaks in such a way as to imply (apparently) the nearness of Christ's second coming (cf. §§ 670-1, 914-5). They made a distinction, too fine to last, between the veritas hominis (which was not guaranteed) and the veritas scriptoris, which was. This theory was applied to such texts as 1 Thess 4:15. P. Prat had another way of dealing with the matter, a way which is set forth in his Life (Appendix II, pp 162-9, published from his papers by P. Calès). Prat notes how in some five epistles Paul has two passages, the one expressing expectancy of the second coming, the other envisaging the possibility of his death before it happens. (The list is: 1 Thess 4:15 and 5:10; 1 Cor 15:52 and 6:14; 2 Cor 5:3-4 and 5:1; Rom 13:11-12 and 14:7-8; Phil 3:21 and 1:20.) That Paul should thus express his ignorance of the date of the second coming by apparently opposed but in reality complementary texts is natural in a Jew. Semites had no half-tones in their register of vision, as Lawrence noted. They saw things as black and white where we see them as grey. Their thoughts were at ease only in extremes. To such minds approximation to a statement by opposed implications was not unnatural.

d Moral Errors—Inerrancy implies in Scripture an absence of immoral teaching, and it is therefore necessary to give some lines of explanation by which difficulties against the moral teaching of the Bible (the OT mainly) can be met. Stories of sin and crime can be related in the Bible, as in any book, without making it for that to be esteemed a bad book. The adultery of David is as relevant to history as that of Henry VIII. That the idolatry of Israel, the bride of Yahweh, should be described in terms of harlotry is not surprising, especially when it is remembered how often idolatry involved sacred prostitution at pagan temples. Sometimes commands may be given, such as the command to despoil the Egyptians (Ex 3:22; 11:2; 12:35-36), which at first sight seem to be immoral, but (as here) can be explained on moral grounds. The Israelites were entitled to some compensation for their labours in Egypt and God, as lord of all creation, could certainly tell them to take it where he willed. For the command to Osee to marry a wife of fornications, see § 514c-f.

Another common source of difficulty is caused by the presence of glosses by later (uninspired) hands at certain points of the text. These are betrayed by their absence from some of the MSS or versions of the text, or from early patristic quotations of the passage. When Judith goes on her mission to the camp of Holofernes, the DV (at Jdt 10:4) makes God increase her beauty, but LXX merely says that she was exceedingly beautiful. Jerome remarks on the varietas vitiosissima of the MSS he had before him, and it is safe to say that God's action is inserted as a defence of Judith's conduct by some partisan.

Sometimes the faulty translation of a word will give rise to a doubt on the morality of an act. Thus in 1 Kg 15:33 Agag is said (DV) to have been hewed in pieces which looks like sadism. But the Hebrew word so rendered is never used elsewhere at all. LXX might be translated 'put to the sword', and it is only with the Targum that the idea of intensive action comes in.

That God should have inspired even the writing down of the Jewish code of law may seem strange, but it is to be remembered that some of the laws are conditional, not absolute. If they have slaves, thus must they deal with them. If they are bent on putting away their wives, let it be overtly and for good (cf. Deut 24:1-4 and commentary). This is not perfect law but at least a deterrent to hasty action. A comparison of the Mosaic law with that of Hammurabi or with the Assyrian laws (cf. Condamin in DAFC 1, 360-7, and Driver and Miles, The Assyrian Laws, 1935) shows much advantage on the side of Moses for mildness and religious sanction. M. Cuq has tried to make out a case for Babylonian superiority (Etudes sur le droit bab., 1929, p 35) but he is driven to using such texts as Ex 20:5; 34:7 as if they were Hebrew laws, when such blood feud is expressly forbidden by Deut 24:16. The Jews were still in a state of minority. That God should choose to leave them so, while providing the means of escape to higher ideals, is really his business and not ours.

THE INTERPRETATION OF HOLY SCRIPTURE

By R. C. FULLER

39a Bibliography—Encyclical Letters: Leo XIII, Pro v. Deus (1893) EB 66-119, Eng. tr. in Douay Bible (London 1914); Benedict XV, Spiritus Paraclitus, AAS 12 (1920) 385-422, EB 457-509; Pius XII, Divino afflante Spiritu, AAS 35 (1943) 297-325, Eng. tr. C. T. S. London (quoted here).

Dictionary Articles: P. Cruveilhier, Herméneutique sacrée, DBVS 3, 1482-1524; Vaganay, Histoire de l'Interprétation, DBVS 4, 561-646; H. Höpfl, Critique Biblique, DBVS 175-240; A. Durand, Critique Biblique, DAFC 1, 760-819; Exégèse, ibid 1811-41; Mangenot & Rivière, Interprétation de l'Écriture, DTC 7, 2290-2343.

Manuals: Traité d'Herméneutique Sacrée, in H. Lussseau-M. Collomb, Manuel d'Études Bibliques, 1, 485-573, Paris 1936; A. Vaccari, De Interpretatione, in Institutiones Biblicae, 1, 317-69; A. Fernandez, Hermeneutica, ibid 1, 371-509, Rome 1937; J. Renic, Herméneutique, in Manuel d'Écriture Sainte, 1, 204-94; Cornely-Merk, Compendium Introductionis in SS Libros, De Interpretatione SS 233-300, Paris 1927; L'Interprétation, in Robert-Tricot, Initiation Biblique, 399-475, Paris 1948.

Monographs and Articles: F. Patrizi, Institutio de interpretatione Bibliorum, Rome 1876; J. Corluy, L'Interprétation de la Sainte Écriture, 1885; H. Höpfl, Tractatus de inspiratione SS et compendium hermeneuticæ Biblicæ catholicæ, Rome 1923; L'Œuvre exégétique et historique du R. P. Lagrange O.P., Paris 1935; L. Bouyer, Liturgie et exégèse spirituelle in La Maison Dieu 7 (1946) 27; R. Bierberg, Does Sacred Scripture have a Sensus Plenior? CBQ 10 (1948) 182-95; J. Coppens, Les Harmonies des Deux Testaments, Tournai 1949; J. Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri, Études sur les origines de la typologie biblique, Paris 1950; La Typologie d'Isaac dans le christianisme primitif, Bi (1947) 363-406; Les divers sens de l'Écriture dans la tradition chrétienne primitive, ETL 24 (1948) 119; Déluge, Bapême, Jugement, in Dieu Vivant, 8 (1947) 97-112; H. de Lubac, Introd. to Origène, Homélies sur la Genèse (Sources Chrétiennes, 7) Paris 1943; Introd. to Origène, Hom. sur l'Exode (Sources Chr. 16) Paris 1947; J. Gribomont, Le lien des deux Testaments selon la théologie de St Thomas, Notes sur le sens spirituel et implicite des Saintes Écritures, ETL 22 (1946) 70-89; *A. G. Hebert, The Throne of David, 1941; The Authority of the Old Testament, 1947 (cf. review of this book by Daniélou in Dieu Vivant, No. 11, 109 f.); De Vine, The Consequent Sense, CBQ 2 (1940) 145-55; R. Kehoe, The Scriptures as Word of God, Eastern Churches Quarterly, Suppl. no. 1947 Tradition and Scripture, 71-8; A. Vaccari, La θεωπία nella scuola esgetica di Antiochia, Bi 1 (1920) 3-36. M.-J. Lagrange, L'Inspiration et les exigences de la critique, RB 5 (1896) 498-578; L'Interprétation de la sainte Écriture, RB 9 (1900) 135-42; I. Guidi, L'Historiographie chez les Sémites, RB 3 (1906), New Series, 509-19; *H. H. Rowley, The Authority of the Bible, Birmingham 1950; A. Duhaile, Le sens spirituel de l'Écriture, Revue Sc. Phil. Théol. 31 (1947) 41-72; St Thomas d'Aquin, Somme Théologique, La Prophétie, Fr. tr. by P. Synave and P. Benoit, Paris 1947; L. Cerfaux, J. Coppens, J. Gribomont, Problèmes et Méthode d'Exégèse Théologique, Louvain 1950; J. Bonsirven, Exégèse rabbinique et exégèse paulinienne, Paris 1939.

For the teaching of St Thomas, the reader may consult the various references given in the course of the article.

Introduction—'How can I understand (the Scriptures)', said the eunuch of Queen Candace, 'unless some man show me?', Ac 8:31. The Bible consists of a collection of books, written over a long period of years by authors of widely different characters. All lived many centuries ago and in countries remote from us. We cannot therefore expect to understand their writings without preliminary study. No one would claim to understand, say, Virgil without a knowledge of his times; but the books of the OT are all older than Virgil and those of the NT are almost contemporary. Far more important, however, than their human origin is the fact that these books have God for their Author and form a source of divine revelation. The interpreter will naturally look to the Church, guardian of that revelation, for guidance in discerning the various meanings in Scripture and drawing God's teaching therefrom. This does not imply, of course, that the Church is always ready with a definite interpretation of every text. Far from it. As will be seen later, § 42b, the Church pronounces on the meaning of a text only when it concerns matters of faith and morals, and even here she frequently gives no more than negative guidance, namely by warning against erroneous views, or by enabling us to ensure that the interpretation is in harmony with the general truths of faith. Where such negative guidance alone is given Catholics have often held, and hold, divergent views, just as there are also different schools of thought in theology. In other matters which do not concern faith or morals the Catholic is free to choose any interpretation which does not conflict with the inerrancy of Scripture (cf. §§ 37e-38e). The view chosen will naturally depend on the state of knowledge at the time. Until fairly recently, for example, it was commonly supposed that Gen 1 taught that the work of creation took place in six days (in the strict sense). Modern science has shown that this view is not tenable and many alternative views have been put forward. Any one of these might be the true one, but the Church has no direct authority to decide the matter, 'In those things which do not come under the obligation of faith the saints were at liberty to hold divergent opinions just as we ourselves are', Prov. Deus. EB 107.

THE SENSES OF SCRIPTURE

1. Literal Sense:

- (a) Nature
- (b) Kinds of Literal Sense
- (c) Every Part of Scripture has a literal sense
- (d) The Literal Sense is One
- (e) The Plenary Sense

2. Spiritual Sense:

- (a) Existence and Nature
- (b) Kinds of Spiritual Sense
- (c) Extent
- (d) Is the spiritual sense always Christological?
- (e) Probative force

3. Accommodation of Scripture

1. General principles :
 - (a) Background
 - (b) Writer
 - (c) Book
 - (d) Vocabulary
2. Special principles :
 - (a) Inerrancy
 - (b) Church's Authority to interpret
 - (c) Analogy of Faith
 - (d) Harmony between the Testaments

Conclusion

THE SENSES OF SCRIPTURE

In the composition of the books of Scripture God used men as his instruments (cf. § 36). These writers went through exactly the same process as would any other writer and they convey their meaning in the same way. But there is a difference. Since they were God's instruments, their meaning was also God's meaning. They could not write down anything not intended by him. 'The things which he ordered, and those only, they . . . expressed in apt words and with infallible truth', EB 110. When we speak of the sense of Scripture we mean what God intended to convey by or through his written word. This may indeed involve more than the human author was conscious of. The Scriptures may have more than one meaning. The literal sense of Scripture is that which arises directly from the text and is intended by the inspired writer. There is also frequently in Scripture another sense which we call the spiritual sense (cf. § 40). This is a meaning authoritatively revealed by God to man. It is not however, strictly speaking, the meaning of the words. As St Thomas Aquinas says 'the things signified by the words (literal sense) may also signify other things (spiritual sense)'. This brings us at once to the central fact of the connection between the two Testaments, Old and New. The Old is a preparation for and foreshadows the New (cf. § 40g). It is a preparation not only in the theological but also in the historical order. Both must be kept in view. There is no sure road to the elucidation of the spiritual sense of Scripture save through the literal sense. There exists a tendency today to interpret the OT more from the standpoint of the Gospel than has hitherto been the case. It is a reaction to the somewhat exclusive preoccupation with the historical method which has been a feature of biblical exegesis during the past century, a preoccupation which can easily make one lose sight of the religious teaching of the Bible. There are of course dangers in the other direction (cf. § 39i). Sound exegesis will on the one hand take full account of the spiritual teaching of the Bible and yet at the same time require a solid foundation on the literal sense of Scripture for any spiritual meanings brought out. An investigation of the literal sense, keeping in view the unity of the Testaments and their common Divine Authorship, gives rise to the further question as to the existence of what is known as the Plenary Sense or Sensus Plenior. This is in effect an extension of the literal sense, for its existence is held by those who maintain that God may imply more in the words of Scripture than the human author is conscious of—a hidden meaning in fact which is revealed only later, whether by more explicit prophecy or by the fulfilment of it in events. This sense is also spiritual—but it differs from the spiritual sense referred to above in that it inheres in the words themselves and not in what is signified by those words, see § 40a.

g The Literal Sense :

(a) Nature—What we are seeking is the meaning which the writer intended to convey by the words he set down. A word taken by itself can evidently have many meanings, but in a given context it can have only one if the writer is keeping to the rules of language—otherwise there would be ambiguity. 'The Word was made Flesh' (Jn 1:14), describes the mystery of the Incarnation. 'Word' and 'flesh' can by themselves mean many things, but in this text 'word' means the Son of God and 'flesh' means the human nature assumed by him, as we may gather from the passage and indeed the Gospel as a whole.

(b) Kinds of Literal Sense—In the phrase already quoted, 'the Word was made Flesh' we have seen that the sense is: 'the Son of God became man'. This is the explicit sense. The phrase necessarily implies that Christ had a human soul, for without a soul a nature is not human. Other implications of this kind may be discerned. These implicit meanings are not different senses of Scripture for they are contained within the meaning of the terms used and do not go beyond the limits of the literal sense. For the same reason they are not to be regarded as separate literal senses.

A large number of truths may be described as deductions from the text rather than implications of it. Thus in Rom 1:21 St Paul rebukes the Gentiles because though they knew God they did not glorify him. But unless they were capable of morally good acts St Paul's rebuke would be unjust. We may therefore conclude that not all acts of unbelievers are necessarily sinful. This conclusion is certain but it cannot be said to be the inspired meaning of Scripture. It depends for its weight on the validity of the reasoning and is thus a theological conclusion. Such a conclusion is sometimes called the Consequent Sense—but it seems better not to use this term as it is not an inspired sense of Scripture. From the example given it is easy to see that there is an important difference between an implicit sense and a theological conclusion: the former is the inspired sense of Scripture, but the latter is not. The actual identification of each in practice however is often difficult and opinions will differ in many cases.

The sacred writer, like any other writer, used words, sometimes in their ordinary sense, sometimes in their metaphorical sense. We usually call the former the literal sense, when dealing with writings other than Sacred Scripture. The sentence 'He sat at his host's right hand' is to be taken literally, but 'Christ sits at the right hand of God the Father Almighty' should be understood in a metaphorical sense. Thus we normally take 'literal' and 'metaphorical' as mutually exclusive. Indeed the definition of 'metaphor' is: 'Application of name or descriptive term to an object to which it is not literally applicable'. But in interpreting Scripture we use these terms in a somewhat different way. We apply the term 'literal' to the sense of Scripture intended by the sacred writer, whether the words are to be taken in the proper or ordinary sense (without metaphor) or metaphorically. Thus 'literal' and 'metaphorical' of common parlance are both included under the literal sense of Scripture. This difference of usage is made necessary by the fact that Scripture is different from other writings. Scripture differs because it is written by God and has a variety of meanings. Since there are often spiritual meanings besides the meaning which inheres directly in the words, it is necessary to distinguish one from another. Naturally the name 'literal' is given to the meaning of the text as such. In the case of merely human writing this is, with certain rare exceptions, the only meaning. Hence there is no need to give it a special name, and the adjective 'literal' may thus be reserved to describe words in their original, as distinct from their derived or metaphorical sense. In any given context the word will have one or the other, but not both simultaneously. In Scriptural terminology, however, the former is called the literal proper and the latter the literal improper sense.

In the historical parts of the Bible the narrative is written largely without metaphor (literal proper sense). In the poetical books, on the other hand, imagery of all kinds abounds. The Psalms which contain some of the finest Hebrew poetry are full of words used in the metaphorical sense (literal improper), e.g. 'Thou art my 39h hiding-place and my shield', Ps 119:114 (RV). But the authors of the historical books too used metaphor, in a way that would not be adopted by modern western historians, for example, certain features of the Garden of Eden; though opinions may differ as to which are metaphorical. (For the 'plenary sense', see § 39k below.)

1 (c) Every Part of Scripture has a Literal Sense—Since the sacred writers composed their books in the same way as any other author there appears to be no reason to except any part of the text from the law that every passage has its own literal sense. In the early ages of Christianity some writers of the school of Alexandria, e.g. Origen, endeavouring to draw the fullest spiritual doctrine from the OT tended to do this in independence of the literal sense of the text and appeared at times even to deny the existence of the latter altogether. In modern times there has been a similar tendency. Such views have never been in accord with the tradition of the Church. Indeed in 1943 there appeared an able defence of Origen's exegetical views by H. de Lubac in which he attempts to show that the great Alexandrian has been misunderstood (hom. sur la Genèse). Origen's intense devotion to Christ, argues de Lubac, made him seek a spiritual and evangelical meaning in all Scripture. But he always admitted its historical character. If he said there were some purely spiritual episodes from which one cannot derive any literal sense, he probably meant only that one should take the passage as figurative or metaphorical. He confused the spiritual with the figurative. Or again, when Origen said that certain Bible episodes were not histories, what he meant was—they really happened, but if they had only their literal historical meaning there would be no sufficient reason for their happening at all, and we should be obliged to say that they never happened. In other words many events of the OT took place chiefly because they were intended by God to prefigure some mystery of the NT, op. cit. 51. Such are in brief the general lines of de Lubac's vindication.

1 (d) The Literal Sense is one—A passage of Scripture (apart from the few which have been authoritatively interpreted by the Church) may be understood by different readers in different ways. Thus a text may have several possible meanings. 'The mighty' spoken of in Is 49:24 are variously understood to be either the Babylonians or evil spirits. Again, many theological conclusions may be drawn from one text of Scripture, but they are not the inspired sense of the divine Author, though they may, of course, be truths revealed by God through Sacred Tradition, (cf. § 39f). But what we are here considering is whether one text of Scripture may have more than one inspired and certain literal meaning. Though the Fathers and Church writers are divided on the point it would seem to follow necessarily from the nature of inspiration that the literal sense can be only one. The sacred writer expresses himself in human fashion. To use words which in their context are capable of more than one literal meaning is to be ambiguous—and this, so far from conveying God's teaching, would only serve to obscure it. It is true that there are texts in the OT which are given different senses when quoted in the NT. Thus, according to many exegetes, Ps 2:7 is interpreted of the Resurrection in Ac 13:33 and of Our Lord's Divinity in Heb 1:5. But there is no need to assume that it is the literal sense which is being given in each case. Sometimes it is the spiritual sense which is being expounded, sometimes it is no more than an accommodation of the text, (cf. § 40j). Some writers, while admitting the unity of the literal sense, have nevertheless suggested that, at least in the poetical parts of the Bible, there may be varying shades of meaning according to the richness of content of the words and their associative background.

It might seem at first sight that to suppose the existence of the plenary sense (cf. § 39k) is to imply the multiplicity of the literal sense. This is not so however, for, as will be seen, the plenary sense is not a new and separate sense but rather an extension of the literal sense. What we are excluding are separate and independent senses which imply equivocation; but it is freely recognized that the Holy Spirit may go beyond the explicit thought of the human writer and, so far from obscuring it, add new depths and clarifications, Coppens, 54.

(e) The Plenary Sense or Sensus Plenior—Does God at times intend a deeper or more abundant sense than that derivable from the text alone? Many passages in the Bible suggest that this sense does exist. The prophets foretold one or other aspect of the Messias and his kingdom. No single prophet had before his eyes the whole picture. The view of the whole was possible only to later generations who had both prophecies and fulfilment before them. The literal sense of Gen 3:15 is of a struggle between mankind and Satan. The development of prophecy led men to see that it was in fact the Messias who would be victorious and this view was of course confirmed by the coming of Christ. It is the same God who both causes prophecy and effects its fulfilment. This would seem to be an example of the plenary sense—a sense of which the writer was not conscious. Let it be said at once that the concept of the plenary sense is still in process of elucidation and is far from being universally accepted. Yet the idea is surely very reasonable. We must remember that the OT with its very imperfect modes of expression is describing for us the sublime mysteries of the New; that in fact the prophet had to use contemporary ways of thought and expression for he was, after all, speaking primarily for his contemporaries rather than for those later generations who saw his words fulfilled. Why should it surprise us if God put into his words a meaning which only later revelations would bring out? The words of Leo XIII have their relevance here: 'In addition to the usual reasons which make ancient writings difficult to understand there are some which are peculiar to the Bible. For the language of the Sacred Books is employed to express, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, many things which are beyond the power and scope of the reason of man—that is to say, divine mysteries and many other things contained in them. There is sometimes in such passages a wealth of meaning more abundant and more profound than the letter of the text or the laws of interpretation seem to indicate', Proc. Deus EB 93.

Some have thought of the OT as a collection of separate pieces which, when finally fitted together, give us a picture of the New. Others, with a greater sense of historical development, realize that the OT is a record of a living and growing revelation. At each stage of the evolution we see the same features, the same religious themes, becoming steadily clearer until the Saviour comes. This means that at no stage of the process may we expect perfection until the NT is reached; and we should accordingly be on our guard against the tendency to extract from the OT as clear, vivid and detailed a picture of Christ and his kingdom as we can obtain from the pages of the NT (cf. Cullmann, Christ et le Temps, Neuchâtel 1947).

There are those who say that the 'eyes of faith' are needed to see this plenary sense: that only the believer has the vision to grasp the unity and collective significance of the two Testaments on which the plenary sense depends. But this needs qualification. It cannot be too often stressed that this sense is not something distinct from and independent of the literal sense. It is rather a deepening of that same literal sense. Thus one who applies the ordinary rules and principles of interpretation is on the right path to the elucidation of the plenary sense, though the interpreter who is also a believer has an advantage and is in a better condition to grasp the full connection between Old and New Testaments.

But if the sacred writer is ignorant of such a sense or at least only very dimly aware of it, how can it be said to be an extension of the literal sense, which by definition is intended by the human author? To answer

INTERPRETATION OF HOLY SCRIPTURE

39m this, we must, with Coppens, distinguish between the mind of the sacred writer and that of the prophet. In so far as he is a sacred writer, the author must necessarily share in the sense which God communicates to the reader through the text. But the sacred writer is also sometimes a prophet, and it is in these conditions that the text of St Thomas concerning the mind of the prophet fully applies, ST IIa-IIae, 173, 4, 'Because the mind of the prophet is a defective instrument . . . even true prophets do not know all that the Holy Ghost intends in the things seen, said or done by them'. It is in fact not only not required, it is even excluded that he should know all (Coppens 47), though it is possible that at times the prophet has an imperfect awareness of this plenary sense (cf. Gribomont 71).

It may be objected finally that such a sense implies an abuse of language, for the sacred writer's words are being made to mean several things. But, as Coppens points out, words and phrases are not wooden or merely mechanical. They have a certain elasticity. They have a margin of meaning which may or may not be drawn on in a particular case. The degree of meaning given to a word in a particular instance depends on the capacity, experience, emotions and knowledge of the user. The word has a wider meaning than that given to it at any particular time. This is more true of Hebrew than of our western languages. Hebrew idiom is dynamic not static. It need not therefore be a matter for surprise that the meaning attached to a phrase by the prophet uttering it does not exhaust the meaning attached to it by God and that the deeper meaning should become known to us only by degrees.

40a The Spiritual (Typological or Mystical) Sense :

(a) Existence and Nature—In Jn 19:33 it is related how the soldiers refrained from breaking the legs of our Lord because he was already dead. Jn adds (19:36), 'These things were done that the Scripture might be fulfilled : You shall not break a bone of him', Ex 12:46. But the passage quoted apparently refers only to the paschal lamb eaten by the Israelites at the time of the Exodus. How can it be said to have been fulfilled in Christ? Only on the supposition that there is another sense besides the literal. It is a meaning which, as will be apparent, arises directly, not from the words but from what is signified by the words. As the sacrifice of the lamb and the sprinkling of its blood saved the Israelites from the avenging angel, so Christ, by the shedding of his Blood on Calvary, saved mankind from a yet more terrible doom. Almighty God has thus willed that the persons, things and events described should often signify other persons, things and events. The former are called types and the latter antitypes. St Thomas puts this succinctly : 'In Sacra Scripture manifestatur veritas dupliciter. Uno modo secundum quod res significantur per verba, et in hoc consistit sensus literalis : alio modo secundum quod res sunt figurae aliarum rerum, et in hoc consistit sensus spiritualis', Quaest. Quodlib. VII, xiv, in corp. Cf. ibid. xv, 'resp. dicendum'. The sacred writer in fact has nothing to do with the production of the spiritual sense. It is put there by God and the human writer is unconscious of it. It is discovered only later.

b The full significance of the spiritual sense has not always been kept in sight. The NT writers were deeply impressed with a sense of the unity of the Testaments, the Old foreshadowing the New. St Paul's words referring to the Exodus are of moment in this connection : 'Now these things happened to them in figure and they are written for our correction', 1 Cor 10:11. The truth is that the OT is full of types of various kinds, prefiguring the mysteries of the New Covenant. 'Christ is the Second Adam, head of redeemed humanity, Rom 5:12 ff.; 1 Cor 15:21 ff., the new Noah, father of the rescued race who rise from the baptismal waters, 1 Pet 3:20 ff.; 2 Pet 2:5. He is the prophet like to Moses, Deut 18:15, 18; Ac 3:22, who speaks to his people from the mountain and feeds them with heavenly manna, grace and truth coming through him as the Law came through Moses', Jn 1:17, 45; 40b 6:14, 32; (cf. § 642a).

It is precisely this unity of the Testaments which, in the opinion of certain modern writers, gives life to the OT and relevance to us today, 'the glory shines from Christ, but it shines back into the whole of Scripture, making it one glorious body, full of the Holy Spirit. Thus it is that the spiritual sense of Scripture is established', R. Kehoe. op. cit. The fulfilment of OT in NT is, moreover, as Père Bouyer has noted, brought about largely by means of symbols. This fact has been scarcely noticed in modern times, in consequence of a very understandable reaction against the excesses of patristic and medieval interpretation, but also because of a certain unconscious rationalism, involving a fear of indulging in unfounded symbolism. But the liturgy which we use day by day is full of symbols, testifying that the OT is not a dead word buried in the past, but a living word addressed to man today. This is largely the usage of the Fathers too, and indeed of the early Christians as a whole. It was in the light of the NT that they looked at the Old and drew on its rich symbolism for their spiritual life in a way that we do not—and from which perhaps we have something to learn.

Some early writers, e.g. of the Alexandrian school (see § 39i) went too far; and some medieval writers likewise seem to have put no limits to the wealth of imagery which they professed to see in the OT. They appear indeed to have found the whole cycle of Christian doctrine mirrored and prefigured in the pages of the OT. Père de Vaux has spoken of 'cette floraison d'allégories . . . qui peuvent aider la piété personnelle, mais qui sont artificielles et ne nous font pas pénétrer dans l'intelligence vraie de la Parole de Dieu', RB 57 (1950) 141. Though this judgement may appear to some to do less than justice to the medievals, there can scarcely be any doubt that it was their exaggerations which chiefly led to the neglect of typological exegesis in later ages.

(b) Kinds of Spiritual Sense—There is no precise limit to the variety of ways in which the OT can prefigure the NT and the life to come. As Père Daniélou has said in a remarkable article (Les Divers Sens . . .) it does not really matter what the number of ways is. What does matter is that one should not force texts into artificial moulds and thus exclude some aspect of their meaning and doctrine. Nevertheless, some division of senses is essential for the sake of clarity and it is possible to make use of a terminology in this matter which has achieved a large measure of agreement. In spite of all that has been written on the subject since the time of St Thomas Aquinas, it may be doubted whether any substantial improvement on the division and terminology adopted by him has been made. Since they are still in common use we propose to outline them here, always bearing in mind that no clear-cut division of this kind could do full justice to all the shades of meaning in the Scriptures.

Considering first the manner of expression we may say that the spiritual sense is metaphorical if the literal sense on which it is based is metaphorical. In Ps 117:22 the people of Israel are described under the metaphor of a corner stone. In Mt 21:42 Christ applies this to himself—of course in the metaphorical sense also. On the other hand the Brazen Serpent, Num 21:6-9, is a signal instance of God's mercy described without metaphor, and consequently in Jn 3:14 it is applied to Christ on the Cross also in the proper sense. With regard to the subject matter: truth, says St Thomas, may be conveyed to us through Scripture with a view to (1) right belief, or (2) right conduct. If to right conduct, then it is the moral or topological sense (τρόπος : a way of life). If to right belief, we must again distinguish : the Church is midway between the Jewish Synagogue and the Church triumphant. Hence there are types in the OT which prefigure the Church on earth and this sense we call the allegorical sense. Again there are types in both OT and NT which foreshadow the Church triumphant in heaven, and this sense we call f The following are examples of the above senses. The Paschal Lamb, Brazen Serpent and Corner Stone are familiar instances of the allegorical (also called the typical) sense. Others are the sacrifice of Isaac, a type of Christ's death ; the crossing of the Red Sea, a type of the freeing of mankind from the bondage of sin by Baptism. All these are fulfilled in the NT. For the anagogical sense we may cite St Paul's mention of Jerusalem as a type of the heavenly city which is our mother, Gal 4:26. The moral sense is conveyed to us in Wis 16:28 whence we learn that the manna which had to be collected before the sun rose, Ex 16, contains the lesson that we should rise early to praise and thank God, the author of all good.

40e the anagogical sense (ἀναγωγή : I lead or raise up) ; cf. Quaest. Quodlib. VII, xv, in corp.

It is not to be supposed that these senses are always found singly. Sometimes indeed, all three are found together. Thus the entry of the Hebrews into the Promised Land not only foreshadowed the entry of the Gentiles into the Church (allegorical sense) and the admittance of the elect into heaven (anagogical sense), but also teaches us the necessity of faith and the misery of unbelief (moral sense), Heb 4:1-11. Hence though the literal sense is one and the spiritual sense is always based on it, yet several spiritual senses may co-exist and be based on the one literal sense.

g (c) Extent of the Spiritual Sense—All are agreed that the OT as a whole prefigures the NT. We have already seen that some of the Fathers and early Church writers went further than this and interpreted everything in the OT, even every phrase and word, as typifying the NT. This means that they understood the spiritual sense as not merely based on the things, persons and events but overflowing, so to speak, into the text itself. While there may well be some basis for this principle, there can be none for the attempt to interpret everything and every phrase in a spiritual sense, for this would seem to imply that the private reader's judgement was equal to that of the Church. While therefore the OT as a whole prefigures the NT, and there are a number of types of great richness which are shown to be such by Scripture itself directly, the existence of other types and figures must be carefully investigated (cf. § 42g). Some deny the existence of types in the NT. They argue that the spiritual sense is inseparable from the time of preparation ; that it implies development and incompleteness, in so far as a type always falls short of the truth it prefigures. But the NT contains the fullness of revelation : nothing can surpass in value the Person of Christ, the Passion, Resurrection and Ascension. So Patrizi, op. cit. 203, 225. There is some truth in this. The fullness of revelation in the NT does seem to make it unlikely that there will be many types of future mysteries found therein. But surely no one would maintain that all the truths of revelation have already been unfolded to the full ? We have to admit that there are truths which still contain much mystery for us, especially perhaps that of the Church, the Kingdom of God, which passes from its earthly status to that of the Jerusalem which is above, Gal 4:26. This is the anagogical sense, see § 40e. 'Ipsa nova lex est figura futurae gloriae', ST I, i, 10.

h (d) In what way is the Spiritual Sense Christological ? Père Daniélou has recently argued that the spiritual sense is christological in the widest sense of the term ; (Les Divers Sens). It always refers to the historical Christ, to Christ in the mysteries of his life, in the sacraments and in the church—lastly to Christ at his second coming and in his eternal kingdom. The typifying of Christ in the mysteries of his life, such as his death and Resurrection, is the category in which we must place the great types of the OT, such as the Paschal Lamb, the Brazen Serpent. This kind of typological exegesis is, in the opinion of Père Daniélou, the most important. Indeed he further maintains that we cannot even know Christ properly unless we are acquainted with the OT, for he is constantly described in the NT as also in the Liturgy, in terms of the Old. There is, further, another group of types referring to the sacramental life of Christ's mystical Body, the Church. St John's Gospel is the one which enlarges on this sacramental exegesis. We need only think of the multiplication of the loaves (typifying the Eucharist) or the discourses with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman (foreshadowing Baptism) which are to be seen in their turn against the background of the Exodus with its great 'sacraments' : the paschal lamb, the manna, the living water. Lastly there is eschatological exegesis : types in OT and NT foreshadowing events to occur at Christ's second coming. Thus the imagery of the Exodus is applied to these events in Apoc ; it also refers to the sacraments, elsewhere in the NT. Again, the Flood which in 1 Pet 3:20 is quoted as a type of Baptism is also brought in as foreshadowing the Last Judgement (cf. Daniélou, Déluge, Bapême, Jugement).

Père Daniélou's study of patristic exegesis is illuminating in that it brings out the full significance of the symbolism of the OT. We may agree that it is centred on Christ. Yet the author seems to go too far in trying to reduce all the spiritual senses to a common christological interpretation. One may reasonably ask how the moral sense fits into this scheme ? It is true that Christ actively participates by his presence and by his grace in the spiritual life of the Christian and that the life of the true Christian is a faithful reflection of the life of Christ. But is this sufficient reason for asserting that here too, as in the other senses, Christ is the precise formal object of the typology ? (cf. Coppens, 88).

i (e) Probative Force of the Spiritual Sense—St Thomas appears to deny all probative force to the spiritual sense. He speaks of the literal sense 'from which alone an argument can be drawn' ST I, 1, 10 ad 1. Elsewhere he refers to the difficulties in the way of using the spiritual sense, and hence, he says, it cannot be used in argument, Quaest. Quodlib. VII, 14 ad 4. He reminds us that we are not thereby deprived of any of the teaching of the Scripture, because there is nothing in the spiritual sense which is not also contained in the literal sense, ST, loc. cit. But since the NT writers used this sense to demonstrate truths we cannot doubt that it is a legitimate usage (cf. Bonsirven). St Paul by relating the story of Sara, and Agar, Gal 4, proves that the works of the Law do not of themselves effect justification. He is clearly referring to the spiritual sense of the passage to prove his point. If there were no spiritual sense there would be no proof. Moreover the fact that the spiritual sense is that of the Holy Ghost is sufficient to show that it must be of the highest value as a proof from authority. It goes without saying that it will be of value in argument only to those who are ready to accept that authority. St Paul could rightly use it to teach truths to his Galatian converts, but he did not use such arguments when addressing the pagan Athenians, Ac 17. It is not from any lack of authority in itself but because of the difficulty of always identifying it with certainty that the need arises for using the spiritual sense sparingly. Is, for example, St Paul's quotation of Deut 25:4 in 1 Cor 9:9, an indication of a spiritual sense or is it merely an accommodation ? Only if it is the former could it be a proof of his statement. If the latter, it would merely be a form of illustration. In so far therefore as the sense can be ascertained, to that extent may it be used in argument. Certainly the use of the OT by NT writers is often loose. Many of the texts which seem at first sight to give the spiritual sense contain in fact no more than an accommodation of the OT. There is no simple criterion which would enable us to distinguish the two rapidly and without difficulty whenever desired. It may seem strange that the meaning of the Holy Ghost is so often hard to discover. But this problem is not confined to the spiritual sense of Scripture.

j Accommodation of the Text of Scripture—(a) A likeness may often be noticed between a Scripture text and 40] a subject with which it has no strict connexion. One might say of St Francis of Assisi that he 'was a man sent by God', Jn 1:6. The Gospel text of course refers to St John the Baptist. To apply it to St Francis is to adapt the text to a subject which God did not intend to signify by those words. Since this adaptation is not intended by God it is not a sense of Scripture at all. It is an accommodation of the text. We should avoid speaking of it as an accommodated sense, because this might lead to its being mistaken for a genuine sense of Scripture. Accommodation may be made in various ways. The idea contained in the text may be really applicable, as in the example given above. Many other instances are found in the Liturgy: e.g. Eccles 44:17, which refers to Noah, is applied in the Breviary to any Confessor-Bishop. This is sometimes called accommodation by extension. On the other hand there may be no likeness of idea in the accommodation. Thus, in the Introit of the Mass within the octave of Christmas, Wis 18:14-15a is quoted to describe the Incarnation. The genuine sense of the passage however is a salutary reminder of God's avenging justice shown by the tenth plague of Egypt—as may be seen by the context of the quotation. In the application there is merely a verbal suitability. This is known as accommodation by allusion.

(b) Since authority uses both forms of accommodation there can be no doubt that it is a legitimate usage. But where there is genuine accommodation there can be no question of real proof of that to which the text is applied. Thus Eccles 24:24 which refers to the Divine Wisdom may be applied to the Blessed Virgin as Universal Mediatrix of Graces, but it is not in any sense a proof of that doctrine.

k This application of Scripture may be easily abused. Preachers should use it sparingly to impress moral and dogmatic truths on their hearers. 'The faithful, and particularly those who are learned in both sacred and profane sciences, want to know what God himself means to say to us in the Scriptures rather than what some eloquent speaker or writer is expounding with a dexterous use of the words of the Bible', DAS, 32-33. Hence: (1) An accommodation should never be put forward as the genuine sense of Scripture. (2) There should be some likeness to or analogy with the original text. The application should never contradict the literal sense. (3) An accommodation should not be put forward as proof of doctrine. (4) Scripture texts should not be applied to secular subjects. This caution against a too free use of accommodation must not be construed as a restriction on the right of the preacher to draw moral lessons from the text of Scripture. Such lessons drawn by legitimate argument from Scripture are inexhaustible. But these are quite distinct from this accommodation of Scripture texts. In the former case we have genuine deductions from the words of Scripture—in the latter, merely a loose form of illustration.

PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION

41a The Scriptures may be regarded simply as ancient documents or as God's inspired word committed to his Church. There are thus two sets of principles, general and special, to be applied in their interpretation. Since God is the author of both the natural and the supernatural there can never be any real opposition between these sets of principles. Nor can we arrive at a true understanding of the Scriptures by a use of the former without the latter. At the same time whatever may be the spiritual meanings in any particular passage, the literal sense is always to be elucidated first as the correct basis for any further exegesis (cf. DAS, 28).

b General Principles:

(a) The Background—The utility and even necessity of an adequate knowledge of the historical and cultural background of the Bible in the ancient Near East is amply demonstrated in §§ 76-81. Thus a knowledge of later Jewish history before Christ is necessary for an understanding of the parable of the Good Samaritan: to understand the problem of St Paul's journeys through Galatia (cf. Ac 16:6) involves a knowledge of the Roman provinces of that time.

(b) The Writer—The Scriptures were written before the rise of exact scientific and historical methods. We must not therefore expect the precision of statement characteristic of modern text-books. Again the writers were Orientals with their own modes of expression. Normally they prefer the concrete to the abstract, and they clothe their ideas in metaphor and imagery well suited to their vivid imagination (cf. § 39h). In genealogies, the Oriental is intent on the line of descent but is less concerned with the individuals in that line. Not infrequently names in the direct line are omitted and the words 'beget' and 'son' are used where a gap of perhaps several generations exists, e.g. see on Mt 1:8. This genealogy incidentally illustrates the tendency among the Semites to prefer round or symbolical numbers, see on Mt 1:17. One may recall also the frequent recurrence in the OT of the numbers seven and forty. Pharaoh dreamed of seven fat and seven lean kine. The Lord said to Moses that if Israel would obey him, their enemies would perish, 'One way shall they come out against thee, and seven ways shall they flee before thee', Deut 28:7. The number seven was sacred among the Jews and entered into their religious rites, cf. the seven-branched candle-stick. Arising out of this religious significance was its symbolism of perfection and hence it came to indicate the whole of a thing. Multiples of seven were used in the same way. On the number forty, see § 124f. A curious feature of Semitic genealogies is the way in which races, tribes and towns are frequently personified and included in the list. In Gen 10:13 all the names are in the plural. Misraim, for example, means Egypt (lit. the two Masors). Many other instances are to be found in this genealogy.

Each writer has also his own particular circumstances and temperament and these are frequently mirrored in his work. The high degree of culture possessed by the prophet Isaiah is clear from the elegance of his style. The shepherd Amos is naturally more rustic in expression, and the imagery of the countryside fills his pages. The burning zeal of St Paul may be contrasted with the calmer, though no less apostolic spirit of St John.

(c) The Book—'It is absolutely necessary for the interpreter to go back in spirit to those remote centuries of the past, and make proper use of the aids afforded by history, archaeology, ethnology and other sciences, in order to discover what literary forms the writers of that early age intended to use and did in fact employ', DAS 39. Thus Pope Pius XII goes so far as to say that it is not merely desirable but absolutely necessary for the interpreter to possess this knowledge. These literary forms are discussed §§ 45, 46h. One must ascertain, e.g. whether the book in question is poetical or historical. In the OT, poetry is found, not only in the strictly poetical books, but also in the historical and prophetic. The imagery is not to be interpreted as if it were sober prose, 'Judah is a lion's whelp: to the prey my son, thou art gone up. Resting thou hast couched as a lion, and as a lioness who shall rouse him?' Gen 49:9. In the historical books one should not exclude the possibility of there being a certain dramatic element. Thus certain of the speeches in the Bible, e.g. that of Judah, Gen 44, may well be set down, not word for word as they were spoken, but in a way calculated to have the greatest effect on the readers. Set speeches like this are a familiar literary device, cf. Pericles' funeral oration in the History of Thucydides II, 35-46. In the NT one would naturally look for more exactness, but even here portions of different discourses are put together into one, cf. the Sermon on the Mount.

The prophetic books too have a character of their own. In prophecy the essentials, which are fulfilled, 41e are to be distinguished from the accessory details which are not fulfilled and which are inserted only for the sake of the literary form. When spiritual truths are described in material terms this is inevitable. Some of the prophecies of the Restoration are of this kind, e.g. in Is 40 ff. Again when two events are foretold together the details of one are to be distinguished from those of the other, so far as possible. This is often difficult. Thus in Is 40 ff. it is not easy always to distinguish what refers only to the Return from Exile from what refers only to the foundation of the Church. Some parts of course refer to both. In unfulfilled prophecy much remains obscure, e.g. concerning the end of the world, the nature of Antichrist, and the mysterious prophecy in 2 Thess 2:6. It is apparently God's intention that many details shall be understood only when they have come to pass (cf. Jn 2:22).

The occasion and purpose of the book will have their part to play in determining its meaning. Thus the loose sequence of laws interspersed with historical matter in the Pentateuch is the result of the conditions in which Israel lived at the time of the Exodus and subsequently in the land of Promise. These conditions would also account for many differences in terminology. Thus the circumstances of their origin have to be borne in mind when interpreting the laws. The sacred writers kept in view those for whom they wrote. Both Mt and Mk use Jewish terms, but Mk writing for Gentiles adds a Greek translation (e.g. 5:41), or an explanation (e.g. 7:3). Mt, writing for Jews, makes statements which seem hard on Gentiles (e.g. 6:7; 15:26), while Lk is careful to avoid anything which might hurt their feelings.

f (d) Vocabulary, Context and Parallel Passages—The etymological meaning of words frequently differs from the meaning in actual use. Thus Arcopagus (Hill of Ares) was originally the name of a hill in Athens. Then because the supreme Council of Athens had met there in early times the name was applied to the Council wherever it met, Ac 17:19. Again, the meaning of words changes from age to age. The mistake has often been made of interpreting the language of the NT as if it were classical Greek of the 5th cent. B.C. Modern discoveries of papyrus in Greek of the time of Christ have gone far to rectify such misconceptions. A knowledge of the original languages is evidently necessary for an accurate study of the Bible. No one, says Pope Pius XII, can hope to be regarded seriously as an interpreter of Scripture, who is ignorant of those languages, DAS 20. Besides the original Hebrew, Greek and Aramaic, other languages such as Syriac, Arabic and Accadian contribute valuable aid to the elucidation of the text.

g The context too has its part to play in fixing the meaning of a passage. In Num 13:28 'a land flowing with milk and honey' is evidently according to the context a prosperous land. But in Is 7:15 'he shall eat butter and honey' seems from the context to indicate hardship. The meaning of the phrase in 7:22 will be determined by its meaning in 7:15; for the same word or words in the same context should, generally speaking, be interpreted in the same way. In a broader sense the whole book may be regarded as the context, and it should be read as a whole if a thorough understanding of a passage is desired. With due limitations there is much truth in the saying that the best interpreter of the Bible is the Bible itself. Too often a text or passage is examined as though it were isolated from the whole. The Sunday epistles and Gospels sometimes suffer this fate and in consequence are not always well understood. The epistles of St Paul, perhaps more than most other parts of the Bible, need to be read right through as whole letters in order to get the greatest benefit from them.

h Parallel passages, looked up in a concordance, are frequently of great help in elucidating a text. The word almah occurs in Is 7:14 (MT). In the other texts where it is found it seems to indicate an unmarried maiden. Though the word does not expressly indicate virginity it would naturally be presumed; hence virginity would be included in the meaning of 41h Is 7:14. It may be noted also that in Is 7:14 both the LXX and Vg translate as 'virgin'. Parallel accounts of the same event can often throw much light on a text. Thus the faith of the bearers of the paralysed man in Mt 9:2 is explained in Mk 2:1-12, which describes how they made a hole in the roof of the house where Christ was and let down the sick man to his feet. In comparing parallel passages in the OT one must remember that it is the record of a developing revelation which reached its fullness in Christ. It is true that later prophecies throw much light on earlier ones, but it is necessary to resist the tendency to read more recent doctrines into the older statements. A study of the doctrine of the Divine Wisdom, for example, in Job, Prov, Eccles and Wis would seem to show that only in the last named book does its personal character begin to appear. The full and definitive revelation was made at the time of the Incarnation. The parallelism of Hebrew poetry (cf. 313e-f) must also be taken into account in interpretation. Thus the 'sons of God' in Ps 88:7 are angels and not men, as is seen from the reference to clouds in the first part of the verse.

Special Principles—Far more important than its value as ancient literature is the divine origin of Scripture. It follows that mere intelligence and hard work are not enough to discover its meaning. 'Wisdom will not enter a malicious soul nor dwell in a body subject to sins', Wis 1:4. It is innocence of heart and the practice of virtue, which must come first. The obscurity of Scripture indeed is a direct test of our humility and patience (cf. DAS 47, Imitation of Christ, I, 5). To acquire such dispositions we need to pray. As St Augustine says of those who study the Scriptures 'Orent ut intelligent', De Doct. Christ., III, 37. These Special Principles of Interpretation are of particular significance in ascertaining the spiritual sense of Scripture, which, as has been said, we can discover only through the sources of Revelation.

(a) The first consequence of the fact of Inspiration is that the Scriptures are without any formal error (cf. § 37e).

(b) Since Scripture is a source of Revelation, the Church is the guardian and interpreter thereof and has authority to determine its meaning in all matters of faith and morals. This was defined by the Council of Trent (EB 47; Dz 786) and further explained by the Vatican Council (EB 63; Dz 1788). There are of course many other matters contained in the Bible, such as details of archaeology, geography and the like. Inspiration excludes formal error from these, but the Church has no authority to define their meaning except in so far as they have a connexion with doctrine. Thus the Church has, for example, no views on the vexed question of the chronology of the books of Kings. But in secular matters which affect truths of faith and morals the Church might condemn an erroneous view. Thus Evolution has a bearing on the doctrine of Original Sin, and an evolutionary theory which conflicted with that truth would be condemned by the Church. As regards the manner of interpretation, the Church sometimes defines infallibly the meaning of a text, e.g. Jn 3:5 (Dz 858) on the use of water in Baptism; or condemns, a false interpretation, e.g. Deut 6:5, Mt 22:37 (Dz 1076). Again, Scripture texts are incorporated into dogmatic decrees in proof or illustration of particular doctrines. Gen 3:15 appears in the Bull Ineffabilis Deus defining the Immaculate Conception. Infallibility however applies only to the dogma defined and not to any particular argument adduced in support of it; hence the interpretation of Gen 3:15, though of great weight, is not infallible by reason of its inclusion in this decree (cf. Durand, art. Exégèse DTC 1838). The number of texts infallibly interpreted by the Church is small: for further examples see Mangenot-Rivière, art. cit. 2317-9. It has been estimated indeed that the total of such texts is under twenty, though there are of course many others indirectly determined c Besides the solemn and infallible definitions of the Church there are many other interpretations of texts in the decrees of Councils, Commissions and Congregations which, though not infallible, enjoy high authority. In particular there are the Replies of the Biblical Commission designed to guide the Catholic along paths of prudent exegesis. In general it may be said that the Commission holds that the traditional interpretation should be adhered to unless and until, in some particular case and without prejudice to faith and morals, it has been shown that it is more reasonable to maintain some other view. This means therefore that acceptance of the Commission's conclusions does not preclude further investigation of the matter (cf. § 47c).

42b (cf. Corluy, 426; Durand art. cit. 1838). It should also be observed that an infallible interpretation of a text does not necessarily exhaust its full meaning.

d The Council of Trent (EB 47; Dz 786) speaks of the unanimous consent of the Fathers as a norm of interpretation. This has always been the tradition of the Church. When the Fathers interpret a text pertaining to faith and morals in one and the same way they are of the highest authority 'because their unanimity clearly shows that such an interpretation has come down from the Apostles as a matter of Catholic Faith', PD, EB 96, Dz 1944. Moral unanimity is sufficient, i.e. if a good number of Fathers in widely different parts of the Church, or of different ages agree on a point and no Father contradicts their teaching. Again the view must be given as certain and not as merely possible or probable. Lastly the doctrine must be put forward as revealed truth. Evidently these conditions are not often fulfilled simultaneously. The number of texts determined by the consent of the Fathers is even smaller than that of the texts determined by the decrees of the Church. We cite a few examples: the virginal conception of Christ, Is 7:14; the Passion of Christ, Is 53; existence of Purgatory, 2 Mac 12:43 (cf. Mangenot-Rivière, art. cit. 2328-30. For a discussion of the authority of commentators, see ibid. 2331.)

But even when there is not unanimity, a doctrine taught by many Fathers will be treated with the respect due to men of eminent theological learning and holiness. In matters other than those of faith and morals the Fathers have no special authority and their views are to be judged in the light of their arguments. Even if they all held, for example, that the world was made in six days of twenty-four hours we would not be bound to accept that view under authority because it is not a matter of faith and morals. When all is said, a large field is left to the interpreter. Very few texts have in fact been authoritatively determined and 'there consequently remain many important matters in the explanation of which the sagacity and ingenuity of Catholic interpreters can and should be freely exercised', DAS 49.

e (c) The interpreter's guide in those parts not authoritatively determined, should be the faith which he professes and the harmony between its parts. No interpretation of a text can be adopted which conflicts with any point of revealed truth, 'for seeing that the same God is author of both the Sacred Books and the doctrine committed to the Church, it is clearly impossible that any teaching can by legitimate means be extracted from the former which shall in any respects be at variance with the latter', PD, EB 94, Dz 1943. This norm of interpretation is called the analogy of faith (Rom 12:6), cf. Dz 2023. Pope Leo XIII here reminds us that besides the Written Word there is an unwritten Tradition of doctrine revealed by God. Indeed the books of the NT were not written in the first instance to impart the faith of Christ to infidels, but to instruct believers. The first readers of those books must therefore have been careful not to draw any meaning from them which would be at variance with the faith they had already been taught. Thus, Mt 19:9 cannot be interpreted as sanctioning divorce since this is explicitly forbidden a few lines higher up; Col 1:24 cannot mean that Christ's sufferings were not adequate, since it is clear from many passages in the NT as well as Tradition that they were superabundant, e.g. Rom 5, Heb 7 ff.

(d) Positively, the interpreter will take as his guide the general harmony existing between the Testaments which arises from their common divine origin. The plenary sense depends entirely on this underlying unity (cf. § 39d, k-m).

This unity of the Testaments has perhaps an even greater part to play in the discerning of the spiritual or typological sense (cf. 40a-c). For this sense, as Coppens observes, is simply the result of God operating in history. He it is who establishes outside the sacred writer's consciousness the mysterious but real harmonies between the Testaments. Since he alone put such meanings there, only he could reveal them to us. He discloses them to us in the ways outlined above. As already stated, comparatively few types have been solidly established in these ways. May we not look for more?

There are certain groups of types in the OT. For example, the events of the Exodus, the conquest of Canaan. Are there further details to be interpreted of events in the NT? If this be easily granted in principle, it is more difficult to decide what criteria are to guide the interpreter here. The recognized sources must of course be scanned—the books of the NT, the writings of the Fathers, the declarations of the Church. The NT writers however need supplementing, for in the first place there are different kinds of typology to be found there (e.g. Matthaean, Johannine, Pauline) and in the second place it is often uncertain whether it is a question of a genuine typological sense or simply of an accommodation (cf. § 40i). Of patristic typology, while no doubt much must be discarded in the light of modern knowledge, nevertheless it may be used as a fruitful source of knowledge and vivid presentation of Biblical teaching. Within the framework of a recognized group of types, it is possible to proceed from the general to the particular, making use not only of patristic interpretation, but also of literary and historical principles. From a judicious combination of these, it may be hoped that the result will be a balanced one. On the one hand it is probable that many types familiar to us will ultimately disappear. On the other hand, new types may emerge. At the least there may well be a change of emphasis, some types emerging into prominence—others fading into the background.

Conclusion—From what has been said and from a general consideration of God's purpose, it will be seen that the interpreter should aim above all at expounding the doctrinal content of Scripture. Matters of history, geography and the like have their importance 'but commentators must have as their chief object to show what is the theological doctrine concerning faith and morals of each book and text, so that their commentary may not only assist teachers of theology in expounding the dogmas of faith but also be useful to priests in their work of explaining Christian doctrine to the people and help all the faithful to lead a holy and Christian life', DAS 29. This high ideal should be a constant stimulus to greater efforts in spite of the difficulties that remain. The number of problems solved is a pledge of further successful solutions while we remember that there may always be difficulties that escape our efforts to solve them.

The great freedom left to the interpreter should induce him to treat the views of others with tolerance. The attitude of mind which instinctively regards with suspicion an interpretation merely because it is new should be avoided. 'This true freedom of the sons of God, loyally maintaining the doctrine of the Church, and at the same time gratefully accepting as a gift from God and exploiting every contribution that profane knowledge may afford, must be vindicated and upheld by the zeal of all, for it is the condition and source of any real success, of any solid progress in Catholic science', DAS 49.

HIGHER CRITICISM

With Special Reference to the Old Testament

By R. A. DYSON AND R. A. F. MACKENZIE, S.J.

43a Bibliography—A. Bea, 'Der heutige Stand der Pentateuchfrage', Bi 16 (1935) 175-200; id., 'Il Problema del Pentateuco e della Storia Primordiale', Civ Catt 99 (1948) 116-27; J. Coppens, L'histoire critique de l'Ancien Testament, Bruges, 1942, Eng. trans. The Old Testament and the Critics, Paterson, 1942; P. Crèveilhier, 'Herméneutique sacrée', DBV (S) III, 1482-524; H. Hoepfl, 'Critique Biblique', DBV (S) II, 175-240; M.-J. Lagrange, 'L'authenticité mosaïque de la Genèse et la théorie des documents', RB 47 (1938) 163-83; V. Laridon, 'Novae encyclicae biblicae doctrina de generibus literariis', Coll Brug 42 (1946) 97-105; 127-34; A. Lemonnyer, 'Théorie des Apparences historiques', DBV (S) I, 588-96; A. Robert, 'Genre Historique', DBV (S) IV, 7-23; A. Robert-A. Tricot, Initiation Biblique, Paris, 1949; A. Vaccari, VD 17 (1937) 371-3; R. de Vaux, 'Les patriarches hébreux et les découvertes modernes', RB 53 (1946) 321-48; *W. Baumgartner, 'Wellhausen und der heutige Stand der alttestamentlichen Wissenschaft', Th Rs N.F. 2 (1930) 287-307; *O. Eissfeldt, 'Die literarkritische Arbeit am A. T. in den letzten 12 Jahren', Th Rs N.F. 10 (1938) 255-91; *H. H. Rowley, The Re-Discovery of the Old Testament (London, 1945) 24-58.

- b Kinds of Criticism—Criticism may be defined as the art of distinguishing, in a literary work, what is genuine from what is false, what is authentic (due to the original author) from what is additional, and evaluating the whole in terms of literary and other relevant standards. It is commonly distinguished into textual criticism, literary, i.e. 'higher' criticism, and historical criticism, this last being understood in a broad sense, since its nature varies greatly according to the kind of matter dealt with—historical, theological, legal, etc.
- c Of this art textual criticism is a fundamental branch. It is chiefly exercised on material transmitted through a manuscript tradition (as opposed to printed work in which it finds little scope). Its task is to eliminate accidental corruptions of the text (usually copyists' errors) and establish the ipsissima verba, in their original order, of the author or final editor. Given that text, as nearly as it can be established, 'higher' or literary criticism then has the task of determining its origin and mode of composition, i.e. the author or authors, the materials used and to what extent they were recast, what kind of work the author intended to write, etc. After this analysis the third type of criticism (often grouped with the second as 'higher') judges the value and significance of the work, its importance in history, and synthesizes the information that may be drawn from it.
- d Criticism and Exegesis—As applied to the OT, textual and literary criticism are not essentially different from the same arts practised on profane literature (with one important qualification to be mentioned below). The third type of criticism, however, should be not only historical and sociological, but also theological, not merely compiling the religious history of Israel or describing its social development, but systematically analyzing the doctrine of the sacred books on God and religion, i.e. producing a biblical theology. Finally, given the divine character of the sacred text, all these critical arts must be handmaids to exegesis, i.e. the exposition of the meaning of the text, to which all biblical studies tend. 43d

We may note here that criticism is not the same as exegesis, although in practice, to some extent at least, criticism always accompanies exegesis; more exactly, criticism leaves off where exegesis begins. The latter discipline has the task of expounding the divine message, and it is this which makes Scripture in the concrete 'profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice', 2 Tim 3:16; it has its own rules which can only be a negative guide to the critic who approaches the material on a lower level, and from the human side. The confusion of criticism with exegesis may lead to a double error: the misconception of those who complain that biblical criticism is 'irreverent' in treating the Bible as a human work, or disappointing because it contributes little to edification; and the opposite error of deifying criticism and, for example, of producing commentaries in which the divine teaching in a given book is passed over in silence and only its human aspects considered. Both these attitudes mistake the true function of biblical studies, which is, to serve and assist exegesis; and it is precisely because modern criticism has made available such admirable new techniques for a deeper understanding of God's Word, that the Church encourages its development.

To the extent that it enters into even the simplest exegesis, biblical criticism has been practised in the Church from the beginning; but 'higher' criticism, with its refined scientific methods, is chiefly a 19th cent. development. Hence we pass over the long and fruitful history of the Fathers of the Church, of the Schoolmen, of the post-Tridentine exegesis; and the first name to be mentioned, as that of a critic in the modern sense of the word, is that of Richard Simon (1638-1712), the French Oratorian, justly called 'the father of biblical criticism'. He saw and formulated the major problems that have occupied criticism since his day, and boldly applied scientific methods for their solution. As a pioneer, it was inevitable that some of his solutions should be weak, and others too radical (his works were put on the Index); yet the 'orthodox' exegetes (notably Bossuet) who so vigorously condemned, not his errors alone, but his whole critical approach, had no idea of the importance of the work he was trying to do. In any event he founded no school, and further Catholic work on these lines was discouraged. The result was that the critical analysis of the Bible, when it came, was entirely non-Catholic—indeed anti-Catholic—and vastly more irresponsible and destructive than it need have been. Nearly the whole 19th cent. passed before Catholic exegetes took up the challenge seriously and began to demonstrate that 'criticism' is not fatally destructive of Christian tradition—rather that the tools of criticism rightly used are a precious aid to the understanding and explaining of the Word of God. But Catholic scholarship in this matter has not yet made up for its late start.

Space forbids a review of the history of the higher criticism of the OT in the 19th cent., but the most famous name may be taken as summing up its tendencies and its findings. J. Wellhausen (1844-1918) taking up and developing earlier work, especially on the composition of the Pentateuch, set forth (1876 ff.) an elaborate reconstruction of the literary history of the 44a 44a OT and the cultural and literary history of the Israelites, which until the end of World War I was the accepted framework for all non-Catholic study of the OT, and even today, though increasingly discarded, in part or in whole, has not been replaced by any synthesis of corresponding amplitude.

b Wellhausen Presuppositions—Wellhausen began his work with certain philosophical presuppositions which governed the whole of his thought. Schematically (and at the risk of over-simplification) we may reduce them to four: (1) exclusion of the supernatural, i.e. of any direct intervention of the deity in human history; (2) the evolutionary scheme of unilinear progress in religious thought from animism or polydemonism through polytheism and henotheism to monotheism. He considered the fully developed religion of Israel to be latent in its earlier stages, spirit and law gradually replacing nature, all this development following strictly Hegelian dialectic: thesis (the preprophetic stage), antithesis (the prophetic reaction), synthesis (the monistic stage); (3) the presumption that Hebrew historiography is not to be relied on; and (4) a conception of Israel living among its neighbours in splendid isolation. The first of these presuppositions needs no comment here, beyond pointing out the fact that it is scientifically unprovable, and, as an aprioristic contradiction of the viewpoint of almost every page of the OT, is hardly a good starting point for a sympathetic study of it. As for the second, Ethnology, Archaeology and the Philosophy of History have combined to declare such subjective reconstruction of Israelite religious history absolutely untenable. This reconstruction, however, naturally led to the third point, Wellhausen's scepticism about the truth of the picture given by Israelite writers of the people's early history. It was buttressed by the belief that writing was unknown to the Israelites of Moses' time. The fourth point was a curious carrying over from an earlier generation of OT scholars, which knew of no other source of world history, before the Greek period, than the OT. And this, even on scientific (as distinct from philosophic) grounds, was a grave defect in Wellhausen's method. Already in his time, Assyrian and Egyptian historical sources were beginning to be available, and in 1896 Winckler published the Amarna letters; but even in the later editions of his work Wellhausen neglected to take this matter into account. Albright says of Wellhausen that 'he neglected the new material from the ancient Orient with a disdain as arrogant as it was complete', JBL 59 (1940) 92. He conceived Israelite culture practically as a closed system, untouched by outside influences almost until the period of the Exile. And since supra-human influences were likewise excluded, the religion of the 6th cent. B.C. had to be shown as the term of an 'immanent', self-explaining evolution from the presumed primitive cult of prehistoric origin.

d Wellhausen Sources of Pentateuch—Such were the principles which governed the investigation, but Wellhausen did not have to start from a tabula rasa. Much had already been accomplished. Four sources of the Pentateuch had already been distinguished: the 'Yahwist' (J) and 'Elohist' (E), i.e. two historical accounts of Hebrew origins, the latter including the Book of the Covenant; the 'Deuteronomist' (D) comprising chiefly the law code of Deuteronomy; and the 'Priestly Code' (P) containing mainly the legislation of Leviticus and Numbers (also Gen 1). Graf, in 1866, had given this theory almost its definitive form, in particular contending (after Reuss) that P, the document that served as the framework into which the others were inserted, was not the earliest, but the latest of all, a production of the Exile. Wellhausen, having minutely worked out the analysis of the documents, proposed the following chronology. J, the most 'primitive' in style, was a history composed in Judah c 850-750 B.C. It contained an account (beginning in Gen 2:4) of human origins, of the patriarchs, of Israel down to the conquest of Canaan. E, of the 8th cent. (before 721), was a product of the Northern Kingdom, a history covering the period from the call of Abraham to the Conquest. D, the law book, had been written shortly before it was 'found' in the temple in 621 B.C. It contained the law code of Deut 12-26 and other fragments. J and E were woven into a united account (JE), containing naturally a certain amount of duplication, sometime between 721 and 621. Next, an editor of the Deuteronomistic school revised JE and combined it with D, during or perhaps shortly before the Exile (586 B.C.). Finally, P was composed during the Exile, under the influence of Ezekiel, and into this new and rather theoretical legal work the already composite JED was inserted, probably by Esdras. Before 400 B.C. the Pentateuch, as we now know it, had reached its final form.

Supposed Religious Evolution of Israel—As with the earlier critics, it was not literary criticism alone that led Wellhausen to come to these conclusions. Historical and literary criticism reacted on each other, both under the necessity of finding a solution consistent with his philosophic principles. The final effect of this emended order and late dating of the documents was the following reconstruction of Israelite religion. Presumably it began, as all primitive religion was supposed to begin, with animism, fetishism, or totemism; but the earliest stage, of which considerable traces existed in the literature (in J), was polydemonism, the haphazard worship of a number of jinns and demons. This was the 'religion of the desert' practised by the ancient 'Hebrew' people, the common ancestor of Israelites, Moabites, Edomites, etc. (the only use Wellhausen made of the comparative method was in drawing on the cults of the pre-Islamic Arab Beduin to illustrate this supposed stage of Israelite religion). By the 13th cent. B.C. it was passing into real polytheism. It was the great political genius of Moses that welded several of these tribes into unity by binding them to the worship and service of a single deity, Yahweh. Their monolatrous Yahweh religion was not ethical, the Ten Commandments being a much later invention. This stage lasted through the Conquest and the period of the Judges, and began to be superseded only with the appearance of the prophets.

The next and decisive step was taken, in fact, by the writing prophets, from Amos on (c 760 B.C.). They introduced morality into the idea of religion, presented Yahweh no longer as the god of armies, but as the god of justice, and insisted that he required of his people not ritual but righteousness—obedience rather than sacrifice. J was composed under the first dawning of this idea, E under its mature influence. The prophets and Deuteronomists rapidly developed this theology as the political collapse of their people drew nearer, and religion reached its peak in the great affliction of the Exile. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and, most of all, Deutero-Isaiah were the great personalities that took the final steps from a god of justice to a god of love, almighty and supreme—the one god of monotheism.

The Law, far from being the foundation of the national religion, was the product of it. Like other Semites, the Israelites originally were accustomed to submit cases for arbitration to the priests at a sanctuary where a body of traditional solutions and rules would exist; but a written code was produced only under the stimulus of the ethical concept of the deity. P, the work of priestly scholars pining in exile for the glories of their lost temple and its ritual, was a retrojection into Moses' time of the cult they knew, combined with an exact programme of law for the future. But in their zeal they overshot the mark, and after the Exile, religion declined into a more and more formal and exterior religious observance, as far removed from the fervent and interior religion of the prophets as the earlier ritual observance—with this exception, that the strictest monotheism was scrupulously observed.

Triumph and Challenge of Wellhausen Synthesis—Thus by a radical rearrangement, in the presumed 44b chronological order, of the material of the Pentateuch, and on the theory that its authors had presented as ancient history a great deal of their own experience—and even of their own invention—a strikingly consistent and plausible account could be given of Israelite history—in particular of the growth of monotheism—without admitting divine revelation or upsetting the process of evolution. Why Israel, rather than any other Semitic people, entered upon this monotheistic development, was left unexplained; but after all, something had to be left for future critics to work on.

1 The conclusions concerning the rest of the OT are of less importance for a history of the critical movement, being corollaries from the foregoing. Briefly, the older prophetic writings were thought to have undergone extensive editing and revision, especially in post-Exilic times; originally they comprised only preachings on the justice of Yahweh, and prophecies of punishment for Israel's iniquity. Hence all eschatological, Messianic, and consolatory sections (and, of course, accurate prophecies) must date at the earliest from the Exile. The Psalter was judged to be post-Exilic and much of it was dated as late as the Maccabees.

J Wellhausen had a real genius for synthesis and exposition. His reconstruction had a triumph rarely won by scientific theories, and rapidly became—indeed it still remains—the 'classic' interpretation of OT history and literature. With minor reservations, it may be said that the great majority of non-Catholic OT critics speedily adopted it. It was readily welcomed in England where the philosophical temper of the age was powerfully influenced by the work of John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer, through whom the positivism of Comte passed into the history of religion and related fields. Thus it posed a challenge to Catholic scholarship that could not be evaded forever, nor dismissed as so much 'rationalism' and 'impiety'. The work was by no means merely negative; a vast number of facts and some very real problems had been uncovered, for which older exegesis naturally had no explanation. Rationalistic criticism had given one, but it involved the negation of supernatural values and divine inspiration in the OT. Catholic exegetes had to better.

45a Slow Catholic Reaction against Wellhausen—The two outstanding champions of Catholic tradition against Wellhausen were the German Jesuit Cornely and the French Abbé Vigouroux. The former drew attention to many details, especially in the Pentateuch, that told for the traditional date, but remained unexplained and inexplicable on the critical hypothesis. The latter called on the newly discovered Assyrian and Egyptian sources to illustrate how the cultural background of the Mosaic writings perfectly suited the 2nd millennium B.C., but could not be brought down into the first. Yet their works had not much to offer in the way of a positive solution of the problems; they were negative and defensive in character and tone; they might reassure the uneasy, they would never convert the erring. What was needed was a more progressive and positive approach, beginning with an attempt to distinguish what was possibly or probably true from what was false.

b For Wellhausen had succeeded in firmly uniting, in the minds of Catholics and non-Catholics alike, two things that should properly have been distinguished: the literary analysis and the historical criticism. The conclusions of the latter were undoubtedly to be rejected; but there might still be truth in the former. After all, the Mosaic authorship was not an article of faith, and St Jerome, for one, had thought it of small importance whether Moses or Esdras was called the author of the Pentateuch. [But cf. § 134b for another interpretation of Jerome's words.—Gen. Ed.] Catholic tradition certainly held Moses to be the author of the Law; but did that necessarily mean that he had written everything in the books that contained the Law? At least, in the light of the grave problems raised by the new criticism, the question might well bear examination.

Such was the attitude of a few of the younger Catholic scholars of the time, among whom the outstanding figure was M.-J. Lagrange, O.P. At a famous congress at Fribourg (Switzerland) in 1897 he introduced a careful distinction between the literary tradition (Moses the author of the books) and the historical tradition (Moses the author of the Law). The latter, he suggested, was the substantial datum and could well stand without the former. He admitted the distinction of four documents in their main lines. In Gen he considered E as prior to Moses who availed himself of it. It was Moses who inspired the composition of J, tracing the broad outlines and ultimately giving it his approval. It was Moses also who gave the Israelites their law which, however, continued to be added to and developed in his spirit in the following centuries.

Effect of Modernist Crisis—Other exegetes, such as d Prat, Durand and von Hummelauer, showed a similar readiness to recognize post-Mosaic literary strata in the Pentateuch, while stressing the major role played by Moses as the fountain-head. But before they had done much work along these lines, the Modernist crisis developed, and, for a time, Catholic OT biblical studies came to a standstill. The chief battle-ground of the Modernists was the NT, but their complete surrender to the most radical doctrines of 'higher criticism' naturally involved the acceptance, in general, of Wellhausenism; hence stringent measures of defence were adopted by the Church authorities, and for some years anything that savoured of 'novelty' in exegesis became suspect. Prat and Lagrange were directed into NT studies and the very term 'higher criticism' became synonymous with 'rationalistic criticism' (EB 276). The activity of the Pontifical Biblical Commission e (cf. § 47b) dates from this period, and has been of extreme importance in guiding all subsequent Catholic tradition. Its 'responses' were drafted with great prudence and moderation; and since the motives of each decision were carefully listed, the possibility was never excluded that a change in the evidence might, later, occasion a change in the conclusion. In short, the burst of activity that had marked the last decade of Leo XIII's pontificate (1892-1902) was succeeded by twenty years of less sensational work, which, though it might seem to have been merely 'marking time', was really a necessary preparation for solid and well-tested progress.

Disintegration of the Wellhausen Hypothesis—f Meanwhile, a vast change was coming over non-Catholic criticism. The Wellhausen theory, which had seemed at one moment to be, in its main lines, a definitive solution of 'the critical problem', came to be called in question more and more. In the first decade of the 20th cent. the Pan-Babylonian school of Winckler and Jeremias claimed that Israelite culture and religion were nothing but a large-scale borrowing from the Babylonians. The absurd exaggerations of this theory prevented it from ever finding wide acceptance; but it did at least make a breach in the magic circle of supposed Israelite 'isolation'. Then, the lengths to which some of Wellhausen's successors carried their analysis of the text, sometimes confidently dividing up a single verse among various authors and 'redactors', produced a reaction of healthy scepticism concerning the too arbitrary criteria adopted. Further, ethnologists and anthropologists questioned the soundness of the principle that every religion must necessarily have evolved from some 'primitive' form of animism to a 'higher' form of belief; for evidence was accumulating that tended to show that polytheism, polydemonism, etc., were corruptions from a widespread 'primitive' monotheism. But the greatest single factor in undermining the Wellhausen structure was undoubtedly archaeology or the 'witness of the stones'.

The article on 'Archaeology and the Bible', §§ 76-81, g gives an account of the main discoveries which have a bearing on the Bible and its interpretation. Here we need only sum up its findings. Thanks to excavations conducted in Egypt, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, 45g Syria, and Palestine itself, and to an intense scientific study by hundreds of scholars of the material thus uncovered, two thousand years of history and dozens of nations and cultures have been brought to the light of day. The history of civilization now begins in the early 4th millennium B.C., and written documents are at hand from the late 3rd onwards. In the early 2nd millennium, before the Israelites existed as a people, when their patriarchal ancestors wandered about the pasture-lands of central Palestine, the Near East knew a flourishing and already ancient civilization, in which Egyptians, Hittites, Hurrians and Babylonians contended for dominance or balance of power. Israel was a late comer on the stage of history, taking advantage of a temporary lassitude among the great powers to establish itself in a corner which was also a crossroads of international relations. So far from being self-sufficient in culture, it borrowed from its neighbours and predecessors language, customs, arts and crafts—everything, in short, except its religion. And this strongly imitative and derivative character of Israelite culture in general throws the unique character of Israel's religion into still stronger relief. From these considerations a fact emerges as beyond dispute, namely, that the environment of the early Hebrews was culturally much more advanced than supposed by Wellhausen and his school and that the influence of these environmental factors upon them was more significant than factors drawn from the Beduin Arabs. So much for the myth of Israel's 'isolation'.

h Here it is worth noting that the older evolutionary idea has held on longest in England. It is surprising to read under the date of 1930 in Oesterley-Robinson's Hebrew Religion, 14: 'These then are the three stages of belief (animatism—animism—polytheism) through which all races pass before they reach a higher form of religion; and the Hebrew race was no exception as the evidence from the Old Testament shows'; or the statement by H. Wheeler Robinson in T. W. Manson's A Companion to the Bible (1946) 287 f.: 'From retrospective evidence of the Old Testament supplemented by what is known of Beduin Arabs in ancient and modern times, we can form a picture of this nomadic background . . . This type of religion is specially linked with natural objects concerning the life or welfare of the clan or tribe, namely, springs, trees, rocks, sun, moon and stars, together with flocks, herds and the wild creatures of the desert'. A much truer viewpoint is that expressed by S. H. Hooke in the same book, 273: 'Modern research has shifted the emphasis formerly laid on the importance of the study of pre-Islamic Arab religion and social organization as the main source of light on the early religion of the Hebrews . . . It is equally true that when the first wave of Hebrew settlement, represented by the Abraham saga, entered Canaan, the original nomad element had already been largely transformed by the influence of Mesopotamian culture'. It is then rather against the background of the religious culture of the Fertile Crescent in the early 2nd millennium B.C. that we are to set the religion of the early Hebrews than in a pattern of the cult of trees, stones and sacred springs; cf. also G. E. Wright, BA 10 (1947) 19 f., and W. F. Albright, JBL 65 (1946) 206.

i American Leadership in OT Studies—In recent years leadership in archaeological studies has passed to American scholars, of whom the most influential at present is W. F. Albright. He and his pupils have already defined the main outlines of a new synthesis of Israel's history, resting on a much broader factual basis than Wellhausen's and far more easily reconcilable with Christian tradition. Of the Wellhausen reconstruction of Israel's religious history G. E. Wright affirms that it is 'a vast over-simplification. In its circular reasoning, in its exclusive attention to the extreme simplification of the historical process along uni-lateral evolutionary lines, in its abnormal preoccupation with what is 'primitive' and 'advanced' according to an a priori scale of ethical judgements (under the guise of 'objectivity'), and in its inevitable naïveté regarding the conceptual life of the ancient world, it has been shown, and will be increasingly proved, to be utterly inadequate as a final interpretation of the religious data which the Old Testament presents' ('The Present State of Biblical Archaeology' in The Study of the Bible Today and Tomorrow, H. R. Willoughby [1947] 95). With regard to Yahweh: 'In our earliest, preprophetic sources . . . he is no personification of nature. He transcends nature and is nature's God' (ibid., 92).

Literary Genres—Literary criticism has developed a new approach. Abundant materials are now available, from newly recovered literature in half a dozen languages, for a comparative study of ancient Israelite writings; and they have made possible much sounder literary judgements, based on the recognition of literary genres unknown to our western tradition. This classification of genera litteraria (the unsatisfactory English phrase is 'literary forms') is perhaps the greatest step forward taken by exegesis in our time, and Divino afflante Spiritu deals at length with its importance (cf. § 46h-i). The 19th cent. critics, relying on their achievements in Hebrew philology, did not realize the equal importance of competence in Hebrew literary psychology; and there was a tendency to judge ancient Oriental writings almost as though they were the products of European culture and thought-patterns. Hence the arbitrary and extensive mutilations practised on OT books, on the presumption that only those sections could be genuine which the critic would have written had he been the author. Thus Duhm could reduce the 'authentic' sections of Jeremiah's prophecy to one-fifth of the present book! Today, however, the study of the different categories of literary composition, practised by OT authors, each characterized by its own purpose, its own way of handling material, its own style and forms of expression has shown the inadequacy of such an approach to the OT.

Another development is the rise, in non-Catholic circles, of the study of Gattungen or categories in the OT. A literary Gattung is a particular species of oral composition created by and for a certain situation and expressing certain more or less standard ideas, emotions or reflections. Examples are the song of triumph, the lament, the parable, the fable, the taunt-song, etc. All these constitute the raw material, so to speak, of a literature. They are folk-literature, learnt, repeated, modified, and handed down by tradition. They are born of the daily life of a people, and they change or disappear as those circumstances alter. Orally composed and orally preserved, they are comparatively brief; above all, they tend to be rhythmic and formalized. Each Gattung develops its own rhetorical scheme, its own introductory formula, often its own vocabulary and metrical structure. Once recognized, they furnish the surest criterion for identifying recurrences of the type.

The relation of Gattungsforschung or Form-Criticism to the Catholic study of genera litteraria is evidently close. Both techniques stress the significance of style, vocabulary and other formal elements, for the distinguishing of different classes of literary composition. They differ in that the genera are considered as norms of literary composition, followed by writers of books; while the Gattungen are primarily oral patterns adopted by the nameless authors of folk-literature. The application of 'Form-Criticism' is not new, for it was introduced by Gunkel in 1901, nor has it displaced literary analysis; but it points out the insufficiency of the latter, and is increasingly used as a technique to detect earlier strata in the OT books and to determine the initial function of Biblical material and of the situation in the life of the people that evoked it. Instead of seeking the latest stage of redaction, it traces out the earliest composition of the materials, and thereby, as it were incidentally, establishes a much higher antiquity for their origin than the Wellhausen school was disposed to allow. It is vastly more respectful of the texts, and is rewarded by a deeper understanding of the meaning and intention of the author.

45m The translation, too, of the law-codes of Israel's neighbours (Sumerian c 1850 B.C.; Babylonian c 1750 B.C.; Hittite c 1300 B.C.; Assyrian c 1100 B.C.) has given an impetus to a re-examination of the Pentateuchal laws. Jirku has shown that these laws are culturally more primitive even than the other known Oriental laws of earlier date. He and Alt recognize two principal types of law in Hebrew legislation: a 'casuistic type' ('If a man . . .'), usually secular in type and patterned after neighbouring codes; and an 'apodictic type' ('Thou shalt not . . .'), which is more religious in nature. They argue that the casuistic type goes back to the Sumerian law of the 3rd millennium and was taken over by the Hebrews from the Canaanites during the period of the Judges and the reign of Saul. The 'apodictic' type, however, cannot be paralleled outside Israel. Tradition traces such law to Moses, and Alt contends that nothing in these laws conflicts with conditions in Israel at the time of Moses. It is, we believe, a reasonable conclusion that the phrase 'Thou shalt not' was the direct outcome of Moses' religious experience, and that his consciousness of the new kind of legal obligation which he had to transmit to the people inspired this new formula, as the construction by which the human language could best convey the urgency and transcendence of Yahweh's will.

n Fresh Analysis of Sources—Finally, even the documentary hypothesis, foundation and starting-point for all critical study of the Pentateuch, has been examined afresh. O. Eissfeldt sums up recent critical trends as three-fold: that of those who assume 'an indifferent attitude' towards source analysis, or at least do not make it their primary aim, particularly A. Alt and his aetiological school; that of those who use the analytic method to split the sources further, such as R. Smend, O. Eissfeldt and R. Pfeiffer; and that of those who manifest 'an actual distrust of the analytic method', among whom he mentions A. Bea, B. Jacob and U. Cassuto. To what ultimate positions these new directions will lead it is impossible to say. Up to the present the results produced, with the exception of those coming from Form-Criticism, have been negative rather than positive, perhaps because of the fact that no one has produced a synthesis comparable to Wellhausen's. At all events they have not been accepted by the majority of critics. The differences of style, the consistent variations in vocabulary, the doublets and repetitions, all these are facts that remain and require an explanation. Scholars like A. Klosterman and B. D. Erdmans would solve these problems by the theory of 'supplementation' of an existing principal document; but the conception of supplementation is not far removed from the view that separate documents were used in the Pentateuch. In general, therefore, although classical Wellhausenism is no longer tenable, its basic scheme of four sources and their order of precedence continues to receive the endorsement of non-Catholic critics. In this sense, that it expresses a belief in multiple sources against the former concept of the unity of the Pentateuch, the documentary hypothesis still stands.

46a Growth of Catholic Critical Work—After World War I, when the alarm created by Modernism had spent itself, Catholic criticism knew a gradual revival. A place of honour belongs to the Revue Biblique, founded in 1893 by Fr. Lagrange, which had continued, 'through evil report and good report', to publish the solid, scholarly research that has given it so high a place among Catholic Biblical periodicals. Another French publication, edited by Fr. D'Alès, S.J., also had a certain pioneering importance—the Dictionnaire Apologétique de la Foi Catholique, issued in parts from 1911–28. Its articles on Biblical subjects, from the standpoint of the Christian apologist, were mostly admirable in their scientific competence and firmly Catholic spirit. The article 'Moïse et Josué', by J. Touzard (1919), was the first thorough examination of the Pentateuchal question by a Catholic since the decree of 1906; and though its conclusions were judged to be too radical, and the Holy Office declared that his theory 'cannot safely be taught'

('tuto tradi non potest'), still the relative mildness of this censure showed that the decree was not supposed to have put an end to all discussion. And, in fact, there followed a number of treatments of the question by such scholars as J. Nikel (1924), P. Heinisch (1930), A. Vaccari (1937), M.-J. Lagrange (1938) and J. Coppens (1942), which in various ways combined a Mosaic origin of the materials with later and successive literary redactions.

An interesting theory is proposed by Fr. Vaccari, b VD 17 (1937) 371–3. Basing himself upon the view of Kittel and Albright regarding a single original document behind J and E, he suggests that this document, of Mosaic authorship, entered the phase of double transmission in Judah and Ephraim, perhaps after the fall of Shiloh. In the course of the transmission variations appeared, coming in part from local sources. After a period of oral transmission the two recensions were fixed in writing toward the end of the 8th cent. (J) and at the beginning of the 7th (E). They were united in the time of Josias, the redactor making use now of one recension, now of the other; hence the difference in language and the divine names. At times both recensions were retained; hence the presence of some doublets. More rarely, as in the account of the flood, they were woven into one narration. In any event, whatever be the true explanation of the phenomena of the Pentateuch, there are many hopeful signs to indicate that Catholic and non-Catholic criticisms, as they progress, tend more and more towards a rapprochement.

Space forbids a detailed presentation of current c Catholic activities in the OT field. In France, there is the Revue Biblique; in the United States, The Catholic Biblical Quarterly; in England, Scripture; in Spain, Estudios Biblicos; in Italy, Biblica and Orientalia, published by the Pontifical Biblical Institute; in Germany, Biblische Zeitschrift and Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen, etc. Catholic commentaries on the OT are to be found in the collections 'Die Heilige Schrift des Alten Testaments', Bonn; 'Exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament', Münster; 'Echter Bibel', Würzburg; 'The Westminster Version', London; 'La Sacra Bibbia', Rome; and in the French Series 'Verbum Salutis', 'Etudes Bibliques' and 'Lectio Divina'. The Supplement to Vigouroux' Dictionnaire de la Bible offers some of the best work of Catholic scholarship. Today that scholarship is active in every area of OT study and the above list gives no idea of the voluminous production of advanced and highly technical studies. Yet it is only a beginning and much remains to be done, especially in the field of archaeology, linguistics and Biblical theology.

ERA OF MODERNISM ENDED—The great landmark in the modern history of Catholic Biblical criticism was the publication (Sept. 30, 1943) of the Encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu, and it was generally hailed as a sign that the era of Modernism was officially closed, that the line between what was dangerous in doctrine and what was not had been clearly drawn, and that now the 'true freedom of the sons of God' (to quote the Encyclical itself) had been restored to Catholic exegesis.

The Encyclical was prepared for, in a certain sense, by e an instructive incident in 1941, which attracted little notice at the time outside Italy. In that summer an anonymous Italian pamphlet was circulated to the Cardinals in Curia and the members of the Italian hierarchy, entitled 'A Grave Danger to the Church and to Souls: the Critico-Scientific System in the Study and Interpretation of Sacred Scripture, its Dangerous Tendencies and its Errors'. The author of this work condemns the scientific study of the Bible as so much 'rationalism, naturalism, modernism, scepticism and atheism'. The scientific spirit is 'a spirit of pride, of presumption, of shallowness'. Study of oriental languages is a mere show of learning, of questionable value; textual criticism brings the sacred text down to the level of merely human writings; to correct or criticize the text of the Vulgate is to reject the authority of the Church in proclaiming the Vulgate's authenticity. Rather, the Vulgate text is the f The circulation of the pamphlet brought a prompt and vigorous reaction from the Pontifical Biblical Commission. In a letter addressed to the Archbishops and Bishops of Italy, AAS (1941) 465-72, the ' obscurantist ' tone of the pamphlet was censured, its notion of the ' authenticity ' of the Vulgate corrected, the subjectivism of such allegorical interpretation strongly condemned, and, above all, the fundamental importance, for exegesis, of scientific criticism was forcefully —one might almost say indignantly—vindicated. Two years later these points, among others, were stressed and developed in the stately language of the great Encyclical.

46e Bible, and no other need be taken into consideration ; in place of a pedantic exegesis of the literal sense, a meditative exegesis should be adopted ; all kinds of allegorical interpretations should be sought out, and these become the spiritual message of the Wisdom of God.

g Of the directives of Divino afflante Spiritu, which deserves the closest attention from every student or reader of the Bible, we mention here only those which concern our present subject. (References are to paragraph numbers in the translation by G. D. Smith, C.T.S., 1945.) In the first place there is a striking tribute to textual criticism (23) : ' It is true that a few decades ago this criticism was employed by many in a completely arbitrary manner, and frequently in such a way that one would have said that they were using it as a means of introducing their own preconceived opinions into the text. But today it has achieved such stability of principles that it has become an excellent instrument for producing a purer and more accurate edition of the Word of God ; and any abuse can now easily be detected '. Conscious of their human fallibility, probably few textual critics would venture to claim so much ; but it is reassuring to find it said for them by the highest authority.

h In the second place, prominence is given to the analysis of genera litteraria, ' literary forms ', as a key to the ' literal sense ' intended by the sacred authors. Fifty years ago this theory had a lukewarm reception in official circles, since it seemed at first a mere subterfuge to avoid having to take the Biblical narratives at their face value ; and von Hummelauer's Exegetisches zur Inspirationsfrage (1904), which imagined a large number of genera to which the narratives might be assigned, was undoubtedly arbitrary. Now the Encyclical very simply indicates the prime condition and safeguard of this investigation (39) : ' What these (literary forms) were, the exegete cannot determine a priori, but only from a careful study of ancient oriental literature '. Then it continues (40) : ' This study has been pursued during the past few decades with greater care and industry than formerly, and has made us better acquainted with the literary forms used in those ancient times . . . ' ; therefore (39) ' it is absolutely necessary for the interpreter to go back in spirit to those remote centuries of the East, and to make proper use of the aids afforded by history, archaeology, ethnology and other sciences, in order to discover what literary forms the writers of that early age intended to use, and did in fact employ '. And, not satisfied with laying down the general principle, the Encyclical proceeds to indicate how satisfactorily this method sheds light on the sacred author's meaning by obviating difficulties which have been raised only by an over-literal, ' Euro-peanized ', exegesis (42) ; ' In many cases in which the sacred authors are accused of some historical inaccuracy or of the inexact recording of some events, it is found to be a question of nothing more than those customary and characteristic forms of expression or styles of narrative which were current in human intercourse among the ancients, and which were in fact quite legitimately and commonly employed '. It is plain that this principle is of great importance in evaluating the ' historicity ' of such books as Tobias, Esther, Judith, or of the first eleven chapters of Genesis.

i Thirdly, while recognizing the due but subordinate place of spiritual or ' allegorical ' exegesis, the Holy Father speaks emphatically of the importance of Biblical 46j theology ; it is this, and not far-fetched allegories, which makes the reading of Scripture spiritually profitable to a Christian (29) : ' Commentators must have as their chief object to show what is the theological doctrine of each book and text in matters of faith and morals, so that their commentary may not only assist teachers of theology in expounding and corroborating the dogmas of faith, but also be useful to priests in their work of explaining Christian doctrine to the people, and help all the faithful to lead a holy and Christian life.'

k Conclusion : further Critical Research encouraged— Finally here is the golden passage which dispelled the suspicion and misguided opposition which had so long overhung the work of many eminent Catholic scholars (49 f.) : ' Let all other children of the Church bear in mind that the efforts of these valiant labourers in the vineyard of the Lord are to be judged not only with fairness and justice, but also with the greatest charity ; they must avoid that somewhat indiscreet zeal which considers everything new for that very reason a fit object for attack or suspicion. Let them remember above all that the rules and laws laid down by the Church are concerned with the doctrine of faith and morals ; and that among the many matters set forth in the legal, historical, sapiential and prophetic books of the Bible there are only a few whose sense has been declared by the authority of the Church, and that there are equally few concerning which the opinion of the Holy Fathers is unanimous. There consequently remain many matters, and important matters, in the exposition and explanation of which the sagacity and ingenuity of Catholic interpreters can and ought to be freely exercised. . . . This true freedom of the sons of God, loyally maintaining the doctrine of the Church, and at the same time gratefully accepting as a gift of God, and exploiting every contribution that secular knowledge may afford, must be vindicated and upheld by the zeal of all, for it is the condition and source of any real success, of any solid progress in Catholic science '.

l That this ' freedom ' is no dead letter was convincingly shown by the latest document to emanate from the Pontifical Biblical Commission, the letter to Cardinal Suhard of Paris (cf. § 53i-4). The occasion of the letter was a request addressed to the Commission for a clarification of the old decisions on the sources of the Pentateuch and the historicity of the first eleven chapters of Genesis. The Commission expresses its intention of favouring freedom of investigation, citing the text of the Encyclical given above. Of the sources of the Pentateuch it says : ' Nowadays no one any longer questions the existence of these sources or refuses to admit a progressive growth of the Mosaic laws caused by the social and religious conditions of later times—a development which appears also in the historical narratives '. However, since at present, ' even among non-Catholic exegetes there is great divergence of opinion concerning the nature and number of these documents, their distribution and their date ', the Commission prefers for the moment not to issue new decrees on these questions ; but it declares that the old decrees—on apparently historical narratives (cf. § 52j), on the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch (cf. § 48a-d), on the historicity of Gen 1-3 (cf. § 48e-l)—are to be liberally interpreted in the light of Pius XII's words on the liberty of the exegete, and that thus understood they will be seen to be ' by no means opposed to a further truly scientific study of these problems, in accordance with conclusions established in the last forty years '. Catholic scholars are formally invited to undertake this ' further study ', which will no doubt demonstrate in the Pentateuch ' the large contribution and profound influence of Moses as author and as legislator '. We think this last phrase is an indication of how ' Mosaic authenticity ' may now be understood. On the paragraph concerning Gen 1-11 (see § 53f), we quote the judgement of PEQ 81 (1949) 10 : ' It would be hard to state more explicitly the attitude of the best modern Old Testament scholarship towards the problems of the early chapters of Genesis '.

THE REPLIES OF THE BIBLICAL COMMISSION

Translated with Introductory Note

By E. F. SUTCLIFFE, S.J.

47a Bibliography—Père L. Méchineau, S.J., himself a Consultor of the Biblical Commission, published several works on the Replies of the Commission. The following had all been printed first in the Civiltà Cattolica. Gli Autori e il Tempo della Composizione dei Salmi secondo le Risposte della Commissione Biblica (Roma, 1911); Il Vangelo di S. Matteo . . . (Roma, 1912); I Vangeli di S. Marco e di S. Luca e la Questione Sinottica . . . (Roma, 1913); Gli Atti degli Apostoli e le Epistole Pastorali . . . (Roma, 1914); L'Epistola agli Ebrei . . . (Roma, 1917); La Parousia nelle Epistole di S. Paolo e degli altri Apostoli . . . (Roma, 1921). See also Louis Pirot, Les Actes des Apôtres et la Commission Biblique, Paris, 1919; Evangelium et Commission Biblique in DBV(S) II, 1218-1297, on the Reply concerning the Epistle to the Hebrews, ibid. III, 1409-1440, and in collaboration with P. Cruveilhier on that about Genesis, ibid. 590-613. On implicit quotations see DBVS II 51-55 by A. Lemonnyer.

b History and Purpose of the Commission—The Biblical Commission, the official title of which, as commonly used, is 'Pontificia Commissio de Re Biblica', was established by Pope Leo XIII when he issued the Apostolic Letter Vigilantiæ of 30 Oct. 1902 (EB nn. 130 ff.). In this document the function of the Commission is stated to be to procure by all means within its power 'that Holy Writ should everywhere among us receive that more elaborate treatment which the times require and be preserved intact not only from any breath of error but also from all rash opinions'. The work of the Commission in securing the attainment of the first of the aims here put before it has been lightened by the creation of the Pontifical Biblical Institute. This was established by the Apostolic Letter Vinea Electa, dated 7 May 1909 (EB nn. 293 ff.). In pursuance of the second aim the Commission has issued positive and negative norms in its various decrees. The immense reverence due to the Bible as the Word of God demands unceasing vigilance in the pastors of the Church into whose keeping the Sacred Scriptures are entrusted, as it must be protected not only from erroneous interpretation but also from the disrespect and danger involved in rash suggestions put forward without solid ground and without regard to the mind of the Church and the analogy of the Faith. This watchful care is the more necessary, as Pope Leo wrote in his Letter Vigilantiæ, on account of 'the religious obscurity in which Holy Writ is involved'. 'This obscurity,' he adds, 'cannot at times be dissipated by the laws of hermeneutics, but requires the guidance and teaching which God has given in the Church'. In the replies of the Biblical Commission we recognize, therefore, the love of the Church for Holy Scripture, and its wisdom in safeguarding by every means within its power the sacred treasure committed to its charge.

c The Authority of the Replies of the Biblical Commission—On this subject we have the explicit teaching of Pope Pius X in the Motu Proprio Præstantia Scripturæ, 18 Nov. 1907 (ASS 40 [1907] 724 ff.; EB nn. 278 f.; Dz 2113 f.): 'We now declare and expressly enjoin that all without exception are bound by an obligation of conscience to submit to the decisions of the Pontifical Biblical Commission, whether already issued or to be issued hereafter, exactly as to the decrees of the Sacred Congregations which are on matters of doctrine and approved by the Pope; nor can anyone who by word or writing attacks the said decrees avoid the note both of disobedience and of rashness or be therefore without grave fault'. In the Motu Proprio Illibatæ custodiendæ of Pius X issued on 29 June 1910, the position of the words 'on matters of doctrine' was altered so that the text runs 'to submit to the decisions of the Pontifical Biblical Commission on matters of doctrine [ad doctrinam pertinentibus]' . . . exactly as to the decrees of the Sacred Congregations approved by the Pope' (AAS 2 [1910] 470; EB 349). It is also to be noted that the word 'submit' in this text is taken from the Letter Tuas libenter of Pius IX to the Archbishop of Munich, 21 Dec. 1863: 'It does not suffice for wise Catholics to accept and revere the aforesaid dogmas of the Church, but it is further their duty to submit to the decisions on matters of doctrine issued by the Papal Congregations' (Dz. 1684; EB 281).

It is the teaching of most theologians that this submission involves an internal assent. This cannot, however, be given in the spirit of divine faith, as the decrees of the Commission are not infallible, infallibility being a personal prerogative of the Holy Father which cannot be delegated. The assent is religious and is based on the very high authority entrusted by the Vicar of Christ to the Commission. In our daily lives we frequently give an internal assent to statements made to us by persons whom we know to be in a position to speak with knowledge on the subject in question, although we are of course aware that their utterances are anything but infallible. Theologians further recognize that as the decrees are not to be accepted with the assent that is due to matters defined as of faith, the case is not impossible in which some competent person may be conscientiously convinced that he has solid and satisfactory reasons for doubt. In such a case, they hold, assent may be legitimately withheld. The obligation of due respect, of avoiding scandal, of abstention from any form of attack on the decrees would remain. For a fuller discussion see e.g. C. Pesch, S.J., Compendium Theologiæ Dogmaticæ (1926³) 241 f.; Lucien Choupin, S.J., Valeur des Décisions Doctrinales et Disciplinaires du Saint-Siège (Paris, 1913²), 82-94, 453-457. On p 84 Père Choupin writes as follows: 'By such decisions the Holy See wishes to provide for the safety of doctrine, to forestall dangers of the faith being perverted, rather than to pronounce a judgement directly on the absolute truth or falsehood of the proposition itself. . . . The meaning of a doctrinal decision issued by the supreme teaching authority but none the less not guaranteed by the gift of infallibility is this: Given the circumstances, the state of knowledge, it is prudent and safe to regard this proposition as true, in conformity to Holy Scripture . . . etc. Or, it is prudent and safe to regard this proposition as erroneous, rash, contrary to Holy Scripture, etc.' (author's italics). See also the article Commission Biblique by L. Pirot in DBV(S) 2 (1934) 103-113.

Other theologians keep closer to the actual wording adopted by Pius X. Thus the Abbé P. Cruveilhier writes as follows: 'The submission demanded by the Pope is obedience of the mind and will consisting at least "in not opposing by word or writing the decisions of the Biblical Commission". In other words it is

REPLIES OF THE BIBLICAL COMMISSION

47e formally forbidden to a Catholic exegete publicly to oppose the decisions of the Biblical Commission. The fact that this prohibition is directed against public manifestations hostile to the mind of the Commission makes it certain that some liberty is left to the exegete at least in regard to some decisions. If no one of them is without relation to the Faith, some concern dogma only more or less indirectly', DBVS III (1938) 1520.

f In the letter by which he entrusted to the Benedictine Order the task of revising the text of the Vulgate Cardinal Rampolla, then President of the Biblical Commission, recalled that among the duties entrusted to the Commission was that of 'providing Catholic teaching with wise and safe norms' (EB 178). And the introductory phrase to the Reply concerning implicit quotations speaks of giving 'a directive norm' to students of Scripture. Is there a contradiction implied in calling a norm at one and the same time directive and obligatory? Clearly there would be if the norm were intended as nothing more than advice which could be followed or not at will; but there is none when the directive norm is intended to have binding force, is given with authority delegated by the Pope, and receives his sanction (cf. P. Castillon in NRT (1907) 245n).

g The Interpretation of the Replies—It must be borne in mind that the Replies are juridical documents and are intended to be interpreted as such. The wording is carefully chosen to convey a definite meaning and this meaning the interpretation should neither extend nor restrict. For instance the first question about the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch does not ask simply whether Moses was the author of the Pentateuch. It asks whether the arguments that have been adduced against the Mosaic authorship when pitted against all the evidence for that authorship justify the statement that Moses was not the author. As the answer is in the negative, the direction here given amounts to this that no known arguments avail to disprove the Mosaic authorship. It would be against the mind of the authors of this Reply to say that the Biblical Commission taught positively that Moses wrote the Pentateuch. This does not mean that the Commission (or for that matter the present writer) wishes to suggest the slightest doubt about the Mosaic authorship. The fact only emphasizes the extreme care with which these directions have been drawn up and the equal care that should be used in their interpretation (cf. §§ 45e, 46m).

h It is important, further, to remember that the Replies are not all of the same character. Pope Leo XIII in his Apostolic Letters Vigilantiae by which he instituted the Commission laid it down as part of its duty to exercise a proper control over the chief matters debated among Catholics and to bring both the guidance of its judgement and the weight of its authority to bear with a view to deciding them. This, the Pope adds, will give the Holy See suitable occasion 'for declaring what must be inviolably held by Catholics, what should be reserved for further investigation, and what should be left to the judgement of each one' (EB 137). Several of the Replies treat only of what may be 'prudently' affirmed or denied.

i The Form of the Replies—The Replies are couched in the form of question and answer. This form is due to the fact that among the duties entrusted to the Commission is that of 'giving replies when consulted and asked its opinion' (EB 138), and also to the existing practice of the Roman Congregations. Actually the only published Replies addressed explicitly to an individual inquirer are those in § 53a and i-m. The rest have been addressed to the Church at large. Questions drawn up by the Commission itself are analogous to the inspired questions addressed to Cabinet Ministers in the House of Commons.

j Note on the Following Translation—The decrees are gathered here for the convenience of reference. With the same purpose in view the order given is not the chronological order of their appearance but that of the books of the Bible in the Vulgate and Douay Version, so far as this is possible. The translator has not felt 47j free to attempt to present the decrees in a form altogether corresponding to the character of our own language. This would have helped the cause of clarity, but there does not appear to be justification for breaking up the long sentences of juridical documents.

On the Mosaic Authorship of the Pentateuch, June 27, 1906 (ASS 39 [1906-07] 377 f.; EB 174 ff.; Dz 1997 ff.): 48a

I: Are the arguments gathered by critics to impugn the Mosaic authorship of the sacred books designated by the name of the Pentateuch of such weight in spite of the cumulative evidence of many passages of both Testaments, the unbroken unanimity of the Jewish people, and furthermore of the constant tradition of the Church besides the internal indications furnished by the text itself, as to justify the statement that these books are not of Mosaic authorship but were put together from sources mostly of post-Mosaic date? Answer: In the negative.

II: Does the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch b necessarily imply a production of the whole work of such a character as to impose the belief that each and every word was written by Moses' own hand or was by him dictated to secretaries; or is it a legitimate hypothesis that he conceived the work himself under the guidance of divine inspiration and then entrusted the writing of it to one or more persons, with the understanding that they reproduced his thoughts with fidelity and neither wrote nor omitted anything contrary to his will, and that finally the work composed after this fashion was approved by Moses, its principal and inspired author, and was published under his name? Answer: In the negative to the first and in the affirmative to the second part.

III: Without prejudice to the Mosaic authorship of c the Pentateuch, may it be granted that in the composition of his work Moses used sources, written documents namely or oral traditions, from which in accordance with the special aim he entertained and under the guidance of divine inspiration he borrowed material and inserted it in his work either word for word or in substance, either abbreviated or amplified? Answer: In the affirmative.

IV: Subject to the Mosaic authorship and the integrity of the Pentateuch being substantially safeguarded, may it be admitted that in the protracted course of centuries certain modifications befell it, such as: additions made after the death of Moses by an inspired writer, or glosses and explanations inserted in the text, certain words and forms changed from archaic into more recent speech, finally incorrect readings due to the fault of scribes which may be the subject of inquiry and judgement according to the laws of textual criticism? Answer: In the affirmative, saving the judgement of the Church.

NOTE: see the later declaration on this subject, § 53i-k.

Concerning the Historical Character of the First Three e Chapters of Genesis, June 30, 1909 (AAS I [1909] 567 ff.; EB 332 ff.; Dz 2121 ff.).

I: Do the various exegetical systems excogitated and defended under the guise of science to exclude the literal historical sense of the first three chapters of Genesis rest on a solid foundation? Answer: In the negative.

II: Notwithstanding the historical character and f form of Genesis, the special connection of the first three chapters with one another and with the following chapters, the manifold testimonies of the Scriptures both of the Old and of the New Testaments, the almost unanimous opinion of the holy Fathers and the traditional view which the people of Israel also has handed on and the Church has always held, may it be taught that: the aforesaid three chapters of Genesis contain not accounts of actual events, accounts, that is, which correspond to objective reality and historical truth, but either fables derived from the mythologies and

REPLIES OF THE BIBLICAL COMMISSION

48f cosmogonies of ancient peoples and accommodated by the sacred writer to monotheistic doctrine after the expurgation of any polytheistic error; or allegories and symbols without any foundation in objective reality proposed under the form of history to inculcate religious and philosophical truths; or finally legends in part historical and in part fictitious freely composed with a view to instruction and edification? Answer: In the negative to both parts.

g III: In particular may the literal historical sense be called in doubt in the case of facts narrated in the same chapters which touch the foundations of the Christian religion: as are, among others, the creation of all things by God in the beginning of time; the special creation of man; the formation of the first woman from the first man; the unity of the human race; the original felicity of our first parents in the state of justice, integrity, and immortality; the command given by God to man to test his obedience; the transgression of the divine command at the instigation of the devil under the form of a serpent; the degradation of our first parents from that primeval state of innocence; and the promise of a future Redeemer? Answer: In the negative.

h IV: In the interpretation of those passages in these chapters which the Fathers and Doctors understood in different manners without proposing anything certain and definite, is it lawful, without prejudice to the judgement of the Church and with attention to the analogy of faith, to follow and defend the opinion that commends itself to each one? Answer: In the affirmative.

i V: Must each and every word and phrase occurring in the aforesaid chapters always and necessarily be understood in its literal sense, so that it is never lawful to deviate from it, even when it appears obvious that the diction is employed in an applied sense, either metaphorical or anthropomorphical, and either reason forbids the retention or necessity imposes the abandonment of the literal sense? Answer: In the negative. [The last clause from 'either reason' is from St Augustine, De Gen. ad litt. Lib. VIII cap. 7, n. 13, EFS.]

j VI: Provided that the literal and historical sense is presupposed, may certain passages in the same chapters, in the light of the example of the holy Fathers and of the Church itself, be wisely and profitably interpreted in an allegorical and prophetic sense? Answer: In the affirmative.

k VII: As it was not the mind of the sacred author in the composition of the first chapter of Genesis to give scientific teaching about the internal constitution of visible things and the entire order of creation, but rather to communicate to his people a popular notion in accord with the current speech of the time and suited to the understanding and capacity of men, must the exactness of scientific language be always meticulously sought for in the interpretation of these matters? Answer: In the negative.

l VIII: In the designation and distinction of the six days mentioned in the first chapter of Genesis may the word Yôm (day) be taken either in the literal sense for the natural day or in an applied sense for a certain space of time, and may this question be the subject of free discussion among exegetes? Answer: In the affirmative.

NOTE: See also the later declaration on this subject, § 539-Im.

49a Concerning the Authors and Date of the Psalms, May 1, 1910 (AAS II [1910] 354 f.; EB 340 ff.; Dz 2129 ff.):

I: Have the titles Psalms of David, Hymns of David, Book of the Psalms of David, Davidic Psalter, employed in ancient collections and in the Councils themselves to designate the book of 150 psalms of the Old Testament; and also the opinion of a number of Fathers and Doctors, who held that all the psalms of the Psalter without exception were to be ascribed to David alone, such weight that David should be held to be the only author of the whole Psalter? Answer: In the negative.

II: Does the agreement of the Hebrew text Greek Alexandrine text and other ancient give ground for a valid argument that the tit psalms prefixed to the Hebrew text are more authentic than the Septuagint version; and consequently, if not from the very authors of the psalms, at least derive from an ancient Jewish tradition? Answer: In the affirmative.

III: Can the aforesaid titles of the psalms, witnesses of Jewish tradition, be prudently called in doubt when there is no serious reason against their being genuine? Answer: In the negative.

IV: In view of the not infrequent testimonies of sacred Scripture to the natural talent, helped by a special gift of the Holy Ghost, which David had for the composition of religious songs, of his arrangements for the liturgical chant of the psalms, of the attribution of psalms to him both in the Old Testament and in the New as well as in the superscriptions prefixed of old to the psalms; in view, moreover, of the agreement of the Jews, of the Fathers and Doctors of the Church, can it be prudently denied that David was the principal author of the songs of the Psalter, or on the contrary, affirmed that only a few songs are to be assigned to the royal psalmist? Answer: In the negative to both parts.

V: In particular is it right to deny the Davidic origin of those psalms which are explicitly cited under David's name in the Old or New Testament, among which are to be mentioned more especially psalm 2 Quare fremuerunt gentes; psalm 15 Conserve me, Domine; psalm 17 Diligam te, Domine, fortitudo mea; psalm 31 Beati quorum remissae sunt iniquitates; psalm 68 Salvum me fac, Deus; psalm 109 Dixit Dominus Domino meo? Answer: In the negative.

VI: May the opinion of those be admitted who hold that among the psalms of the Psalter there are some, either of David's or of other authors, which on account of liturgical and musical reasons, the negligence of scribes, or other causes unknown have been divided into several or united into one; also that there are other psalms, like the Miserere mei, Deus, which for the purpose of being better adapted to historical circumstances or solemnities of the Jewish people, were subjected to some slight rehandling or modification by the omission or addition of one or two verses, without prejudice however to the inspiration of the whole sacred text? Answer: In the affirmative to both parts.

VII: Is it possible to maintain as probable the opinion of those more recent writers who, relying on purely internal indications or an incorrect interpretation of the sacred text, have attempted to show that not a few psalms were composed after the times of Esdras and Nehemias and even in the Maccabean age? Answer: In the negative.

VIII: On the authority of the manifold witness of the sacred books of the New Testament and the unanimous agreement of the Fathers in harmony with the acknowledgement of Jewish writers, is it necessary to admit a number of prophetic and Messianic psalms, which foretold the future Saviour's coming, kingdom, priesthood, passion, death, and resurrection; and consequently is it necessary to reject altogether the opinion of those who pervert the prophetic and Messianic character of the psalms and limit these oracles about Christ merely to the foretelling of the future lot of the chosen people? Answer: In the affirmative to both parts.

Concerning the Character and Author of the Book of Isaias, June 29, 1908 (ASS 41 [1908] 613 f.; EB 287 ff.; Dz 2115 ff.):

I: May it be taught that the predictions read in the Book of Isaias—and throughout the Scriptures—are not predictions properly so called, but either narrations put together after the event, or, if anything has to be acknowledged as foretold before the event, that the prophet foretold it not in accordance with a supernatural revelation of God who foreknows future events, but by conjectures formed felicitously and shrewdly by natural sharpness of mind on the basis of previous experience? Answer: In the negative.

49j II : Can the opinion that Isaias and the other prophets did not put forth predictions except about events that were to happen in the immediate future or after no long space of time, be reconciled with the predictions, in particular Messianic and eschatological, certainly put forth by the same prophets concerning the distant future, and also with the common opinion of the holy Fathers who unanimously assert that the prophets also made prophecies that were to be fulfilled after many centuries? Answer : In the negative.

k III : May it be admitted that the prophets, not only as correctors of human depravity and preachers of the divine word for the benefit of their hearers, but also as foretellers of future events, must consistently have addressed, not future, but present contemporary hearers in such a manner that they could be clearly understood by them; and that in consequence the second part of the Book of Isaias (chapters 40-66), in which the prophet addresses and consoles, not the Jewish contemporaries of Isaias, but as if living among them, the Jews mourning in the Babylonian exile, could not have Isaias, long since dead, for its author, but must be ascribed to some unknown prophet living among the exiles? Answer : In the negative.

l IV : Should the philological argument drawn from language and style to impugn identity of authorship throughout the Book of Isaias be deemed of such force as to compel a man of sound judgement with competent knowledge of Hebrew and of the art of criticism to recognize several authors in the same book? Answer : In the negative.

m V : Do there exist arguments which even when taken together avail to demonstrate that the Book of Isaias must be attributed not to Isaias himself alone, but to two or even several authors? Answer : In the negative.

50a Concerning the Author, the Date, and the Historical Truth of the Gospel according to Matthew, June 19, 1911 (AAS 3 [1911] 294 ff.; EB 401 ff.; Dz 2148 ff.). I : Having regard to the universal and unwavering agreement of the Church ever since the first centuries, an agreement clearly attested by the express witness of the Fathers, by the titles of the Gospel manuscripts, the most ancient versions of the sacred books and the lists handed on by the holy Fathers, by ecclesiastical writers, by Popes and Councils, and finally by the liturgical use of the Church in the East and in the West, may and should it be affirmed as certain that Matthew, the Apostle of Christ, was in fact the author of the Gospel current under his name? Answer : In the affirmative.

b II : Should the verdict of tradition be considered to give adequate support to the statement that Matthew wrote before the other Evangelists and wrote the first Gospel in the native language then used by the Jews of Palestine for whom the work was intended? Answer : In the affirmative to both parts.

c III : Can the composition of this original text be postponed till after the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, so that the prophecies it contains about that destruction were written after the event; or should the oft-quoted text of Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. Lib. 3, cap. 1, n. 2), of uncertain and controverted interpretation, be considered to have such weight as to impose the rejection of the opinion more in harmony with tradition according to which the composition of the Gospel was completed even before the arrival of Paul in Rome? Answer : In the negative to both parts.

[In some editions of St Irenaeus this text is given in n. 1.]

d IV : Can even probable arguments be given in support of that opinion of certain recent writers according to which Matthew did not write a Gospel properly and strictly so-called, such as has been handed down to us, but merely a collection of the sayings or discourses of Christ which were drawn on by another anonymous author, whom they make the editor of the Gospel itself? Answer : In the negative.

e V : Can the fact that all the Fathers and ecclesiastical writers and even the Church itself from its very cradle have used as canonical only the Greek text of the Gospel known under the name of Matthew, not even those being excepted who explicitly taught that the Apostle Matthew wrote in his native tongue, provide certain proof that the Greek Gospel is identical in substance with the Gospel written by that Apostle in his native tongue? Answer : In the affirmative.

VI : Do the facts that the aim of the author of the first Gospel is chiefly dogmatic and apologetic, namely, to prove to the Jews that Jesus was the Messiah foretold by the prophets and born of the lineage of David, and that moreover in the arrangement of the facts and discourses which he narrates and reports, he does not always follow chronological order, justify the deduction that they ought not to be accepted as true? Or may it also be affirmed that the accounts of the deeds and discourses of Christ, which are read in that Gospel, underwent a certain alteration and adaptation under the influence of the prophecies of the Old Testament and the more mature condition of the Church and are consequently not in conformity with historical truth? Answer : In the negative to both parts.

VII : In particular ought it to be held that there is no solid foundation to the opinions of those who call in doubt the historical authenticity of the first two chapters, in which an account is given of the genealogy and infancy of Christ, as also of certain passages of great dogmatic importance, such as are those which concern the primacy of Peter (16, 17-19), the form of baptism entrusted to the Apostles together with the mission of preaching everywhere (28, 19 f.), the Apostles' profession of faith in the divinity of Christ (14, 33), and other similar matters which are found in a special form in Matthew? Answer : In the affirmative.

Concerning the Authors, Dates, and Historical Truth of the Gospels according to Mark and Luke, June 26, 1912 (AAS 4 [1912] 463 ff.; EB 408 ff.; Dz 2155 ff.).

I : Does the clear verdict of tradition showing extraordinary unanimity from the beginnings of the Church and confirmed by manifold evidence, namely the explicit attestations of the holy Fathers and ecclesiastical writers, the quotations and allusions occurring in their writings, the use made by ancient heretics, the versions of the books of the New Testament, almost all the manuscripts including the most ancient, and also internal reasons drawn from the text of the sacred books impose the definite affirmation that Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, and Luke, the doctor, the assistant (adiutorem) and companion of Paul, were really the authors of the Gospels that are attributed to them respectively? Answer : In the affirmative.

[AAS and EB print adiutorem, Dz auditorum.]

II : Are the reasons by which certain critics strive to prove that the last twelve verses of the Gospel of Mark (16, 9-20) were not written by Mark himself but were added by another hand, of such a character as to justify the statement that they are not to be accepted as inspired and canonical? Or do they prove at least that Mark was not the author of the said verses? Answer : In the negative to both parts.

III : Similarly is it lawful to doubt the inspiration and canonicity of Luke's accounts of the infancy of Christ (chapters 1 and 2); or of the apparition of the Angel strengthening Jesus and the sweat of blood (22, 43 f.)? Or can it at any rate be shown by solid reasons—a view preferred by ancient heretics and favoured also by certain modern critics—that the said accounts do not belong to the genuine Gospel of Luke? Answer : In the negative to both parts.

IV : Can and should those very few and altogether exceptional documents in which the Canticle Magnificat is attributed not to our Blessed Lady but to Elizabeth, in any way prevail against the unanimous testimony of almost all manuscripts both of the original Greek text and of the versions, and against the interpretation which is clearly demanded no less by the context than by the mind of our Lady herself and the constant tradition of the Church? Answer : In the negative.

REPLIES OF THE BIBLICAL COMMISSION

501 V : As regards the chronological order of the Gospels is it right to depart from the opinion supported by the very ancient and constant testimony of tradition, which avers that after Matthew, who before all the others wrote his Gospel in his native tongue, Mark was the second in order, and Luke the third to write? Or on the other hand is opposition to be found between this opinion and that which asserts the second and third Gospels to have been written before the Greek version of the first Gospel? Answer : In the negative to both parts.

m VI : Is it lawful to postpone the date of composition of the Gospels of Mark and Luke till after the destruction of the city of Jerusalem? Or, on the ground that our Lord's prophecy concerning the destruction of that city appears more detailed in Luke, can it be maintained that his Gospel at least was written after the siege had begun? Answer : In the negative to both parts.

n VII : Should it be affirmed that the Gospel of Luke preceded the Acts of the Apostles; and as this book, written by the same Luke (Acts 1, 1 f.), was finished at the close of the Apostle's imprisonment at Rome (Acts 28, 30 f.), that his Gospel was not composed after this time? Answer : In the affirmative.

o VIII : In view both of the witness of tradition and the internal evidence concerning the sources used by each Evangelist in writing his Gospel, is it prudent to doubt the opinion that Mark wrote in accordance with the preaching of Peter and Luke in accordance with that of Paul, and also that these Evangelists had, besides, other trustworthy sources, whether oral or written? Answer : In the negative.

p IX : Do the words and deeds which are reported by Mark accurately and almost in verbal agreement with Peter's preaching, and are faithfully set forth by Luke who had 'diligently attained to all things from the beginning' through the help of entirely trustworthy witnesses 'who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word' (Luke 1, 2 f.) rightly claim for themselves as historical that entire belief that the Church has always placed in them? Or on the contrary ought the same facts and deeds to be regarded as in part at least destitute of historical truth, either on the ground that the writers were not eye-witnesses or that in the case of both Evangelists defects of order and disagreement in the succession of events are not seldom detected, or that, as they came on the scene and wrote rather late, they could not help recording ideas foreign to the mind of Christ and the Apostles or events already more or less distorted by popular imagination, or finally, that they indulged in preconceived dogmatic ideas, each one in accordance with his own aim? Answer : In the affirmative to the first part, in the negative to the second.

51a On the Synoptic Problem or the Mutual Relations of the First Three Gospels, June 26, 1912 (AAS 4 [1912] 465; EB 117 f.; Dz 2164 ff.).

I : Provided all is safeguarded that according to previous decisions must be safeguarded, especially concerning the authenticity and integrity of the three Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, the substantial identity of the Greek Gospel of Matthew with its original text, and the chronological order in which they were written, in order to explain their mutual similarities and dissimilarities, is it lawful for exegetes, given the many different and contradictory opinions proposed by writers, to discuss the question freely and to have recourse to the hypotheses of tradition, whether written or oral, or also of the dependence of one Gospel on another or on others that preceded it? Answer : In the affirmative.

b II : Ought those to be considered faithful to the above prescriptions, who without the support of any traditional evidence or historical argument readily embrace what is commonly called 'the two-document hypothesis', the purpose of which is to explain the composition of the Greek Gospel of Matthew and the Gospel of Luke chiefly by their dependence on the Gospel of Mark and a so-called collection of the discourses of our Lord; and are they consequently free to advocate it? Answer : In the negative to both parts. Concerning the Author and Historical Truth of the Fourth Gospel, May 29, 1907 (ASS 40 [1907] 383 f.; EB 180 ff.; Dz 2110).

I : Does the constant, universal, and solemn tradition of the Church dating back to the second century and witnessed to principally : (a) by the holy Fathers, by ecclesiastical writers, and even by heretics, whose testimonies and allusions must have been derived from the disciples or first successors of the Apostles and so be linked with the very origin of the book; (b) by the name of the author of the fourth Gospel having been at all times and places in the canon and lists of the sacred books; (c) by the most ancient manuscripts of those books and the various versions; (d) by public liturgical use in the whole world from the very beginnings of the Church; prove that John the Apostle and no other is to be acknowledged as the author of the fourth Gospel, and that by an historical argument so firmly established (without reference to theological considerations) that the reasons adduced by critics to the contrary in no way weaken this tradition? Answer : In the affirmative.

II : Should, further, internal reasons derived from the text of the fourth Gospel considered by itself, from the witness of the writer and the manifest relationship of the Gospel itself to the first Epistle of John the Apostle, be judged to confirm the tradition that unhesitatingly attributes the fourth Gospel to the same Apostle? And can the difficulties which arise from a comparison of the same Gospel with the other three, in view of the differences of time, aim, and hearers, for whom or against whom the author wrote, be given reasonable solutions, as has been done by the holy Fathers and Catholic exegetes in various works? Answer : In the affirmative to both parts.

III : Notwithstanding the practice which has flourished consistently in the whole Church from the earliest times, of arguing from the fourth Gospel as from a strictly historical document, and in consideration no less of the special character of the same Gospel and the manifest intention of the author to illustrate and vindicate the divinity of Christ from the very acts and discourses of our Lord, may it be said that the facts narrated in the fourth Gospel were invented wholly or in part, as allegories or doctrinal symbols and that the discourses of our Lord are not properly and truly the discourses of our Lord himself but the theological compositions of the writer though placed in the mouth of our Lord? Answer : In the negative.

Concerning the Author, the Date, and the Historical Truth of the Acts of the Apostles, June 12, 1913 (AAS 5 [1913] 291 f.; EB 419 ff.; Dz 2166 ff.).

I : In view especially of the tradition of the whole Church dating back to the earliest ecclesiastical writers, and in consideration of the internal characteristics of the book of Acts whether considered in itself or in its relation to the third Gospel, and especially of the mutual affinity and connection of both prologues (Luke 1, 1-4; Acts 1, 1 f.), should it be held as certain that the volume with the title Actus Apostolorum or Πράξεις Ἀποστόλων had the Evangelist Luke for its author? Answer : In the affirmative.

II : Can critical reasons derived from language and style, from the character of the narrative, and from the unity of aim and teaching, demonstrate that the Acts of the Apostles should be attributed to only one author; and that consequently there is no foundation at all for the opinion of recent writers according to which Luke was not the only author of the book but different authors are recognized in the said book? Answer : In the affirmative to both parts.

III : In particular, do those sections, so noticeable in the Acts, in which the use of the third person is abandoned and the first person plural introduced (We-passages), weaken the unity of composition and the authenticity; or, historically and philosophically considered, should they rather be said to confirm it?

REPLIES OF THE BIBLICAL COMMISSION

51h Answer : In the negative to the first part ; in the affirmative to the second.

l IV : Does the fact that the book hardly mentions the two years of Paul's first imprisonment at Rome and ends abruptly, warrant the inference that the author wrote a second but lost work or intended to write one, and consequently can the date of the composition of the Acts be postponed till long after the said captivity ? Or rather is it legitimately and rightly to be maintained that Luke finished the book towards the close of the first imprisonment of the Apostle Paul at Rome ? Answer : In the negative to the first part ; in the affirmative to the second.

j V : If consideration be given both to the frequent and easy intercourse that without doubt Luke had with the first and chief founders of the Church in Palestine and with Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, whom he helped in his preaching of the Gospel and accompanied on his journeys, and to his habitual industry and diligence in seeking witnesses and in personal observation of events, and finally to the frequently obvious and remarkable agreement of the Acts with Paul's own Epistles and with the more exact historical records, should it be held for certain that Luke had at his disposal entirely trustworthy sources and used them carefully, honestly, and faithfully, so that he rightly claims for himself full authority as an historian ? Answer : In the affirmative.

k VI : Are the difficulties commonly raised both from the supernatural facts narrated by Luke, and from the report of certain discourses, which on account of their brevity are thought to be invented and adapted to circumstances, and from certain passages in at least apparent disagreement with history, whether profane or biblical, and finally from certain narrations in apparent conflict either with the author of Acts himself or with other sacred authors, of such a nature as to throw doubt on or at least in some measure to diminish the historical authority of Acts ? Answer : In the negative.

l Concerning the Author, the Integrity, and the Date of the Pastoral Epistles of St Paul, June 12, 1913 (AAS 5 [1913] 292 f. ; EB 425 ff. ; EB 425 ff. ; Dz 2172 ff.).

I : In view of the tradition of the Church universally and firmly maintained from the beginning, as is witnessed in many ways by ancient ecclesiastical records, should it be held as certain that the Pastoral Epistles, the two, namely, to Timothy and another to Titus, notwithstanding the effrontery of certain heretics, who without giving any reason expunged them from the number of Pauline Epistles as being opposed to their tenets, were written by the Apostle Paul himself and were always listed among the genuine and canonical Epistles ? Answer : In the affirmative.

m II : Can the so-called fragmentary hypothesis introduced and propounded in different ways by certain recent critics, who without any plausible reason and even at variance among themselves, maintain that the Pastoral Epistles were put together by unknown authors at a later date out of fragments of the Epistles or out of lost Pauline Epistles with notable additions, cause even any slight weakening of the clear and unshaken testimony of tradition ? Answer : In the negative.

n III : Do the difficulties commonly alleged on many grounds, either on account of the style and language of the author, or of the errors, especially of the Gnostics, described as already then current, or of the presupposition that the ecclesiastical hierarchy was in an already developed state, and other similar arguments to the contrary, in any way weaken the opinion that holds the genuineness of the Pastoral Epistles to be established and certain ? Answer : In the negative.

o IV : As the opinion that the Apostle Paul was twice imprisoned at Rome should be considered certain on account no less of historical reasons than of ecclesiastical tradition in harmony with the testimonies of the holy Fathers both in East and West, and also on account of the evidence readily available both in the abrupt conclusion of the Acts and in the Pauline Epistles written at Rome and especially in the second to Timothy ; can it be safely stated that the Pastoral Epistles were written in the interval between the liberation of the Apostle from the first imprisonment and his death ? Answer : In the affirmative.

Concerning the Author and Manner of Composition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, June 24, 1914 (AAS 6 [1914] 417 f. ; EB 429 ff. ; Dz 2176 ff.).

I : Are the doubts about the divine inspiration and Pauline origin of the Epistle to the Hebrews which influenced certain minds in the West in the first centuries, chiefly because of its abuse by heretics, of such importance that, bearing in mind the unbroken, unanimous, and unwavering affirmation of the eastern Fathers supported after the fourth century by the entire assent of the whole western Church, due weight also being given to the acts of the Popes and sacred Councils, especially that of Trent, and to the constant usage of the universal Church, it is lawful to hesitate about reckoning it definitively not only among the canonical Epistles—which has been defined as a matter of faith—but also among the genuine Epistles of the Apostle Paul ? Answer : In the negative.

II : Can the arguments commonly based either on the unusual absence of Paul's name and the omission of the customary introduction and salutation in the Epistle to the Hebrews—or on the purity of its Greek, the elegance and perfection of its diction and style—or on the character of its quotations and arguments from the Old Testament—or on certain differences alleged to exist between the doctrine of this and the other Pauline Epistles, in any way invalidate its Pauline origin ? Or rather do the perfect unanimity in teaching and thought, the resemblance of the admonitions and exhortations, and the agreement in phrase and even in words pointed out also by some non-Catholics, which are seen to exist between it and the other writings of the Apostle of the Gentiles, clearly indicate and confirm the same Pauline origin ? Answer : In the negative to the first part ; in the affirmative to the second.

III : Should the Apostle Paul be considered the author of this Epistle after such manner that he must necessarily be said, not only to have conceived and expressed it all under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, but also to have given it the form that it actually has ? Answer : In the negative, saving the further judgement of the Church.

Concerning the Parousia or Second Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ in the Epistles of the Apostle St Paul, June 18, 1915 (AAS 7 [1915] 357 f. ; EB 432 ff. ; Dz 2179 ff.).

I : In order to meet the difficulties occurring in the Epistles of St Paul and other Apostles in passages which treat of the ' Parousia ', as it is called, or second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, is it allowed to a Catholic exegete to assert that, though the Apostles under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost teach nothing erroneous, they none the less express their own human opinions which may rest on error or misconception ? Answer : In the negative.

II : In view of the correct concept of the apostolic office and the undoubted fidelity of St Paul to the teaching of the Master ; in view also of the Catholic doctrine concerning the inspiration and inerrancy of Holy Scripture according to which whatever a sacred Writer asserts, declares, suggests, should be held to be asserted, declared, suggested by the Holy Ghost ; and after a careful examination on their own merits of the passages in the Epistles of St Paul which are in complete harmony with our Lord's own manner of speaking, should it be asserted that the Apostle Paul said nothing whatever in his writings which is not in complete harmony with that ignorance of the time of the Parousia which Christ himself proclaimed to belong to men ? Answer : In the affirmative.

III : After consideration of the Greek phrase ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες οἱ περιλειπόμενοι ; and after careful examination of the exposition of the Fathers, above all of St John Chrysostom, who was completely at home both in his native language and in the Pauline Epistles, is it lawful to reject as far-fetched and destitute of any solid foundation the interpretation traditional in the Catholic schools (and retained even by the Reformers of the sixteenth century) that explains the words of St Paul in 1 Thessalonians 4, 15-17, without in any way involving the assertion that the Parousia was so near that the Apostle counted himself and his readers among the faithful who will be left alive and go to meet Christ? Answer: In the negative.

g Concerning the False Interpretation of Two Biblical Texts, July 1, 1933 (AAS 25 [1933] 344); Dz 2272-3. I: Is it right for a Catholic, especially after the authentic interpretation given by the Princes of the Apostles (Acts 2, 24-33; 13, 35-37) to interpret the words of Psalm 15, 10 f.: 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, nor wilt thou give thy holy one to see corruption. Thou hast made known to me the ways of life', as if the sacred author did not speak of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ? Answer: In the negative.

h II: Is it licit to assert that the words of Jesus Christ, which are read in St Matthew 16, 26: 'What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his own soul?' and similarly those in St Luke 9, 25: 'What is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world and lose himself and cast away himself?' in the literal sense do not regard the eternal salvation of the soul, but only man's temporal life, notwithstanding the tenor of the words themselves and their context besides the unanimous interpretation of Catholics? Answer: In the negative.

i On Implicit Quotations in Holy Scripture, Feb. 13, 1905 (ASS 37 [1904-05] 666; EB 153; Dz 1979).

To secure a directive norm for students of Holy Scripture the following question was proposed to the Pontifical Biblical Commission, namely:

To solve difficulties occurring in certain texts of Holy Scripture that appear to relate historical facts, may a Catholic exegete assert that the passage in question is a tacit or implicit quotation of a document written by a non-inspired author, all of whose assertions the inspired author does not mean to approve or make his own, and that these assertions cannot therefore be held immune from error?

Answer: In the negative, except in a case where without prejudice to the mind and judgement of the Church it is proved by solid arguments: (1) that the sacred Writer does in fact cite the sayings or documents of another, and (2) neither approves nor makes the same his own, so that he is legitimately regarded as not speaking in his own name.

j On Narratives Historical only in Appearance in Books of Holy Scripture Historical in Form, June 23, 1905 (ASS 38 [1905-06] 124 f.; EB 154; Dz 1980):

Is it possible to admit as a principle of sound exegesis that books of sacred Scripture which are regarded as historical, at times do not relate, either wholly or in part, history properly so-called and objectively true, but present only the appearance of history with the purpose of expressing some meaning differing from the strictly literal or historical sense of the words?

Answer: In the negative, except in a case neither easily nor rashly to be admitted, in which, the mind of the Church not being contrary and without prejudice to its judgement, it is proved by solid arguments that the sacred Writer intended not to recount true history, properly so-called, but under the guise and form of history to set forth a parable, an allegory, or some meaning distinct from the strictly literal or historical signification of the words.

NOTE: See further on this matter § 53i-j.

k Concerning the Addition of Variant Readings in Editions of the Vulgate Version of the Old and New Testament, Nov. 17, 1921 (AAS 14 [1922] 27; EB 509).

In the Preface to the Reader of the Clementine edition of the Vulgate version of the Sacred Scriptures it is said:

'Further in this edition there is nothing not canonical . . . no parallel passages in the margin (the addition of which in that position is not prohibited in the future), no notes, no variant readings, finally no prefaces. . . . But as the Apostolic See does not condemn the industry of those who have inserted in other editions parallel passages, variant readings, the prefaces of St Jerome, and similar matter, so neither does it forbid that with the use of different type such helps should be added in the future for the advantage and utility of students in this same Vatican edition; with the exception, however, that variant readings may not be noted in the margin of the text'.

But as some are of opinion that these last words forbid the addition of variant readings not only in the margin at the side but also at the foot of the text, the question has been put to the Pontifical Biblical Commission: Is it lawful in editions of the Vulgate version both of the New and the Old Testaments to add variant readings and other similar helps for students at the foot of the text?

After examination of the matter, the Pontifical Biblical Commission replied: In the affirmative.

Concerning the Use of Translations of Holy Scripture in Churches, April 30, 1934 (AAS 26 [1934] 315).

The following question was proposed by his Excellency the Bishop of S'Hertogenbosch [otherwise called Bois-le-Duc] in the name also of their Excellencies the other Bishops of the ecclesiastical province of Holland:

Can it be allowed to read to the people in Church the liturgical passages of the Epistles and Gospels in a translation not from 'the ancient Vulgate Latin version', but from the original texts whether Greek or Hebrew?

The Pontifical Biblical Commission decided that the following answer should be given: In the negative; a translation should be publicly read to the Faithful made from the text approved by the Church for the sacred liturgy.

Concerning Translations of Holy Scripture in Modern Languages, Aug. 22, 1943 (AAS 35 [1943] 270, CR 23 [1943] 524).

To answer a question proposed to it concerning the use and authority of biblical translations in modern languages, especially those made from the original texts, and to give further clarification to its decree Concerning the Use of Translations of Holy Scripture in Churches of April 30, 1934, the Pontifical Biblical Commission has considered it opportune to publish and commend the following norms:

Since Pope Leo XIII, of happy memory, in the Encyclical Providentissimus Deus (Acta Leonis XIII, Vol. 13, p 342; EB 91), for the more intimate knowledge and more fruitful explanation of the divine word recommended the use of the original texts of the Bible; and since that recommendation, which clearly was not made for the exclusive advantage of exegetes and theologians, has seemed and seems almost to advise that the same texts, of course under the vigilant care of the competent ecclesiastical authorities, should be translated in accordance with the approved principles of sacred and indeed of profane science into the vernacular languages known to the mass of the people;

Since, moreover, it is from the Vulgate translation, which alone and exclusively among the Latin versions then in circulation the oecumenical Council of Trent declared authoritative (Conc. Trid., sess. IV, decr. De editione et usu Ss. Librorum; EB 46) that the biblical passages in the liturgical books of the Latin Church to be read publicly at the holy Sacrifice of the Mass and the Divine Office have for the most part been taken; presupposing the observance of whatever should be observed:

1° Translations of Holy Scripture in modern languages whether made from the Vulgate or from the original texts, provided they have been published with the per-

REPLIES OF THE BIBLICAL COMMISSION

53d mission of the competent ecclesiastical authority in accordance with canon 1391, may be duly used and read by the faithful for their private devotion; moreover, if any translation, after a diligent examination both of the text and of the notes by men eminent in biblical and theological knowledge, is found to be more faithful and suitable, it may, if so desired, be especially recommended by the Bishops, either individually or in provincial or national meetings, to the faithful committed to their care.

2° The vernacular translation of the biblical passages which priests celebrating Mass are to read to the people, as custom or occasion demands, after the reading of the liturgical text, should, in accordance with the reply of the Pontifical Biblical Commission (Acta Ap. Sedis, 1934, p. 315), agree with the Latin liturgical text, though it remains permissible, if judged expedient, to give suitable explanation of the said translation by the help of the original text or of another clearer translation.

e N.B. G. M. Vosté, O. P., Secretary of the Biblical Commission, in Bi 27 (1946) 319 n. 2 writes of this last paragraph: "Thus in fact will be read a version of the original text critically established. The scope and obligation, therefore, of the decree . . . of 30 April 1934 [here § 534] should not be unduly pressed. . . . Finally . . . the Holy Father has authorized all who are obliged to recite the Breviary, to use for the Psalter "whether in private or in public" a new version made from the original texts (Motu Proprio In cotidianis precibus, AAS 1945, 65-7)".

f Concerning the Work of R. D. Frederic Schmidtke entitled 'Die Einwanderung Israels in Kanaan' Feb. 27, 1934 (AAS 26 [1934] 130 f.).

As the question has been addressed to this Pontifical Biblical Commission what is to be thought of the work entitled Die Einwanderung Israels in Kanaan, published at Breslau in the year 1933 by R. D. Frederic Schmidtke, it has decided that the following answer should be given:

R. D. Frederic Schmidtke, Professor Extraordinary of the Old Testament in the Theological Faculty of the University of Breslau in the volume mentioned above: in his treatment of the Pentateuch follows the opinions of rationalistic criticism to the complete neglect of the decree of the Pontifical Biblical Commission of June 27, 1906;

g moreover, in the history of the Old Testament, without any attention to the decree of the same Pontifical Biblical Commission of June 23, 1905, he introduces a type of literature consisting of popular traditions mingling falsehood with truth; contrary to the clear evidence of the sacred books he makes, among others, the assertions that the stories about the Patriarchs, at least in large part, give the history, not of individual men, but of tribes; that Jacob was not the son of Isaac, but represents some Aramean tribe; that the whole people of Israel did not enter Egypt but a part only, in particular the tribe of Joseph; also, doing violence to the sacred text, he explains many miracles of the Old Testament as purely natural events.

h The author, consequently, at least implicitly, denies the dogma of biblical inspiration and inerrancy; he entirely neglects the norms of Catholic hermeneutics; he contradicts the Catholic doctrine most clearly set forth in the Encyclicals Providentissimus Deus of Leo XIII and Spiritus Paraclitus of Benedict XV.

Hence the aforesaid work deserves reprobation on various grounds and should be kept out of Catholic schools.

The Pontifical Commission, moreover, takes this occasion to warn Catholic commentators to obey with due reverence the dogmatic Constitution of the Vatican Council, renewing the Decree of the sacred Council of Trent, by which it was solemnly ordained "that in matters of faith and morals, appertaining to the building up of Christian doctrine, that is to be held as the true sense of sacred Scripture which was, and is, held by our holy mother the Church, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the holy Scriptures, and therefore no one may interpret holy Scripture contrary to this sense or also against the unanimous consent of the Fathers'.

N.B. In a final paragraph here omitted the Commission recalls to the minds of all the faithful what is the authority of the Biblical Commission quoting the words of Pius X given above, § 47c.

Letter to Cardinal Suhard [on the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, and on the historical character of Gen 1-11] (AAS 40 [1948] 45-8).

"The Holy Father graciously entrusted to the Pontifical Biblical Commission the examination of two questions recently submitted to His Holiness concerning the sources of the Pentateuch and the historicity of the first eleven chapters of Genesis. . . . As the result of their deliberations His Holiness designed to approve the following reply . . . on 16 January 1948.

"The Pontifical Biblical Commission . . . desires . . . to promote biblical studies by assuring to them the most complete liberty within the limits of the traditional teaching of the Church. This liberty has been proclaimed in explicit terms by the present Pope in his Encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu: "The Catholic exegete . . . ought not by any manner of means to debar himself from taking in hand, and that repeatedly, the difficult questions which have found no solution up to the present time . . . in an attempt to find a well-founded explanation in perfect harmony with the doctrine of the Church, in particular with that of biblical inerrancy, and at the same time capable of fully satisfying the certain conclusions of the secular sciences. The labours of these worthy workers in the vineyard of the Lord deserve to be judged not only with equity and justice, but with perfect charity; and this is a point which all others sons of the Church should bear in mind. It is their duty to avoid that most imprudent zeal which considers it an obligation to attack or suspect whatever is new", AAS (1943) 319.

"If this recommendation of the Pope's is borne in mind in the interpretation of the three official replies given formerly by the Biblical Commission in connection with the above-mentioned questions, namely June 23, 1905, on narratives in the historical books of Holy Scripture which have only the appearance of history (EB 154), June 27, 1906, on the Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch (EB 174-7), and June 30, 1909, on the historical character of the first three chapters of Genesis (EB 332-9), it will be agreed that these replies are in no way a hindrance to further truly scientific examination of these problems in accordance with the results acquired in these last forty years. . . .

"As regards the composition of the Pentateuch, in the above-mentioned decree of June 27, 1906, the Biblical Commission recognized already that it could be affirmed that Moses "in order to compose his work made use of written documents or of oral traditions" and that post-Mosaic modifications and additions could also be admitted (EB 176-7). No one today doubts the existence of these sources or rejects a gradual increase of Mosaic laws due to the social and religious conditions of later times, a process manifest also in the historical narratives. However, even among non-Catholic exegetes very diverse opinions are held today concerning the character and the number of these documents, their names and dates. There are even authors in different countries, who for purely critical and historical reasons quite unconnected with any religious purpose resolutely reject the theories most in favour up to the present, and seek the explanation of certain editorial peculiarities of the Pentateuch, not so much in the alleged diversity of documents as in the special psychology, the peculiar mental and literary processes of the ancient Orientals which are better known today, or again in the different literary forms which are required by the diversity of subject-matter. Hence we invite Catholic scholars to study these problems with an open mind in the light of sane

REPLIES OF THE BIBLICAL COMMISSION

53k criticism and of the results of other sciences which have their part in these matters, and such study will without doubt establish the large share and the profound influence of Moses as author and as legislator.

1 'The question of the literary forms of the first eleven chapters of Genesis is far more obscure and complex. These literary forms do not correspond to any of our classical categories and cannot be judged in the light of the Greco-Latin or modern literary types. It is therefore impossible to deny or to affirm their historicity as a whole without unduly applying to them norms of a literary type under which they cannot be classed. If it is agreed not to see in these chapters history in the classical and modern sense, it must be admitted also that known scientific facts do not allow a positive solution of all the problems which they present. The first duty in this matter incumbent on scientific exegesis consists in the careful study of all the problems literary, scientific, historical, cultural, and religious connected with these chapters; in the next place is required a close examination of the literary methods of the ancient oriental peoples, their psychology, their manner of expressing themselves and even their notion of historical truth; the requisite, in a word, is to assemble without pre-formed judgements all the material of the palaeontological and historical, epigraphical and literary sciences.

It is only in this way that there is hope of attaining a 53 l clearer view of the true nature of certain narratives in the first chapters of Genesis. To declare a priori that these narratives do not contain history in the modern sense of the word might easily be understood to mean that they do not contain history in any sense, whereas they relate in simple and figurative language, adapted to the understanding of mankind at a lower stage of development, the fundamental truths underlying the divine scheme of salvation, as well as a popular description of the origins of the human race and of the chosen people. In the meantime it is necessary to practise patience which is part of prudence and the wisdom of life. This also is inculcated by the Holy Father in the Encyclical already quoted: "No one", he says, "should be surprised that all the difficulties have not yet been clarified or solved. . . . But that is no reason for losing courage or forgetting that in the branches of human study it cannot be otherwise than in nature, where beginnings grow little by little, where the produce of the soil is not gathered except after prolonged labour. . . . There is ground, therefore, for hoping that (these difficulties) which today appear most complicated and arduous, will eventually, thanks to constant effort, admit of complete clarification" (AAS [1943] 318 . . . 16 Jan. 1948'. m b Unique Situation—The Israelites were a people with a mission. They were the depositaries of revealed religion, and alone among all the nations of the ancient world they knew and worshipped the true God. The strip of territory on the western edge of the Asiatic continent which, by divine command, they made their homeland, was admirably suited to the fulfilment of their destiny, for its physical and geographical conditions made it both a stronghold easy to defend and a bridge between two continents. 'Thus saith the Lord God: This is Jerusalem. I have set her in the midst of the nations and the countries round about her' (Ez 5:5). The comparative isolation of the land should have kept its inhabitants immune from idolatry; and since it was a thoroughfare between many peoples, it was surely in the designs of God that by this means these nations should become acquainted with the hope of Israel.

THE PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND

By DOM E. GRAF

54a Bibliography—F. M. Abel, O.P., Géographie de la Palestine, 2 vol., Paris, I 1933¹, II 1938; idem, Les Guides Bleus : Syrie, Palestine, Paris, 1932. L. Szczepanski, S.J., Geographia Historica Palestinae Antiquae, Romae 1928²; Mgr Legendre, The Cradle of the Bible (Engl. transl.), London 1929; *G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, London, 1935³; idem, Historical Atlas of the Holy Land, London, 1936⁴; *G. E. Wright and F. V. Filson, The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible, London, 1947⁵ (up-to-date, but not as full as Smith's). The two volumes of Abel's Géographie treat both the physical and the political geography of the Holy Land. The work is indispensable to the student of the Bible. The Guide is the most up-to-date work of the kind, and is the fruit of the author's long years of study and travel in Palestine.

c Palestine—The name by which the land of Israel is generally known was given by the Greeks whose first contacts were with the Philistines on the sea coast. Palestine is literally Philistine land. It has long designated the land on both sides of the Jordan between the sea and the desert. Very recently, however, the name was politically restricted to the territory west of the Jordan and Eastern Palestine was called Transjordan.

d Cisjordanic Palestine is bounded on the north by the western bend of the river Litas (Litāni), now called Nahr el-Qāsimiye, which separates it from Mt Lebanon, and the Beqa' plain between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, on the west by the Mediterranean, on the east by the Jordan valley and the Dead Sea, and on the south by the Beersheba depression. Political Palestine restricts the northern limit in favour of Syria to a line running from the Ladder of Tyre to Lake Huleh, but extends the southern as far as Raphia on the west and the Gulf of 'Akaba on the east. The area is about 6,000 sq. m., e.g. less than that of Wales (7,446 sq. m.). The well-known biblical expression 'from Dan to Beersheba' indicates the N and S. limits and stands for a length of about 180 m. The breadth varies from 70 m. at the latitude of Beersheba to 25 m. between the Bay of Acre and the Lake of Galilee.

e Transjordanic Palestine extends geographically from Mt Hermon in the N. to the Gulf of 'Akaba in the

S., and from the Jordan and 'Arābah valleys in the W. to the desert in the E. Its area is about 4,000 sq. m. and its length about 250 m. The breadth varies with the encroachment of the desert from about 60 m. in the Haurān region to a narrow mountain range in Edom.

The Physical Configuration of the land is remarkable, and, indeed, unique, as the result of tremendous upheavals and fissures of the earth's crust in pre-historic times. The outstanding feature is the deep central valley running from north to south, from the base of Mt Hermon to the Gulf of 'Akaba. The northern part of the valley is divided into two roughly equal strips by the Jordan, which runs in a deep trench many feet below the level of the plain. On the east, the Jordan valley is bounded by the mountains of Moab, Galaad and Bashan, and on the west by the Judaean, Samaritan and Galilean hills. West of that central range, the coastal plain runs north and south. In the south, however, a considerable tract of foothills, the Shephēlah, separates the plain from the mountain range. It will be convenient to describe these several features of the country separately.

The coastal plain is the continuation of a level strip which begins at the apex of the Gulf of Alexandretta and runs south in an almost straight line as far as the Wadi-el-Arish, where it bends to the west in the direction of the Nile delta. Its width varies considerably, in fact at the famous Ladder of Tyre the coastal road has had to be cut out of the mountain side. At Haifa, where the spur of Carmel juts out to seaward, the plain is only a few hundred yards wide, but from this point it broadens steadily, and at the latitude of Jaffa has a width of 20 m. This southern section of the coastal plain was known as the plain of Sharon (DV Saron, cf. Ac 9:35), whose beauty is described, or hinted at, in Is 35:2, 33:9. Underground water lies at no great depth, viz. at about 13 metres, in soft limestone, but as well-sinking is a costly undertaking with primitive tools, groups of families, or a whole community, may share the expense of drilling, and jointly own a well, as in OT days (cf. Jn 4:5, 6). The modern Jewish settlers do it cheaply with artesian borings.

The coastal belt south of Jaffa was occupied by the Philistines. The ruins of once famous cities still bear witness to the power of a people with whom Israel warred almost continuously, but whom it never entirely conquered. The territory south of Philistia and the Wilderness of Judaea was known as the Negeb (South, lit. dry land). Tells and ruins show that it was not always the arid steppe it is now. Beersheba (DV, Bersabee), the southernmost town of Palestine, is also the most important inhabited place of a district populated chiefly by nomads who rear their flocks on the grazing grounds scattered here and there between vast stretches of sand and stone.

The maritime plain is intersected by a number of wadis—river beds—most of them dry during the greater part of the year, but raging torrents after the heavy rainfalls of the winter. The chief rivers are, in the north, the Litas, which runs along the northern boundary of Palestine, and the Kishon (Cison), which, after meandering through the plain of Esdraelon which it drains, enters the sea at the foot of Mt Carmel. The 541 Kishon is a perennial stream only for a fraction of its course, but after rain, like all other Palestinian water-courses, it quickly swells to a considerable size. This was evidently the case on the occasion so vividly described in the song of Debbora (Jg 5:21).

j The principal river of the plain of Sharon is the Nahr el Auja, which rises at Ras-el-Ain (Antipatris) and enters the sea north of Jaffa. The head water of this river is now pumped up to Jerusalem, to supplement the scanty supply of the Holy City.

The most striking feature of the Palestinian coastline is the absence of indentations of any depth. With the exception of the Bay of Acre, no inlets break the long monotonous line, and the only good harbour is at Haifa (not mentioned in the Bible)—the roadstead at Jaffa can scarcely be described as a harbour. The absence of good harbours in their restricted coastline may have been a contributory cause of the Hebrews' lack of interest in the Mediterranean. Solomon however and later kings kept a fleet in the Gulf of 'Akaba for Red Sea trade.

55a The Shephalah—This was a region of foothills, lit. lowland, which separated the mountains of Judah from the Philistine plain. It was fertile and contained many important cities. It was also a battleground where the men of Judah could meet the Philistines on fairly equal terms without encountering the war-chariots which made the plains inaccessible. Here north of Socho was the Vale of the Terebinth (Elah) where David slew Goliath.

b Esdraelon—The central mountain range of Palestine is broken by the historic plain of Esdraelon, which forms an irregular triangle of which the angles are Tabor, Carmel and Jenin (Engannim, Jos 15:34). In the Bible the plain is called 'The plain of Megiddo' (Biq'ath Megiddo), and the 'Valley of Jezreel' ('Emeq Yizre'el), Megiddo and Jezreel being its most important cities. Esdraelon is the Hellenized form of Jezreel and only occurs in the deuterocanonical books. The plain measures about 16 m. from N. to S. and a little over 20 from E. to W. (if we include the gap of Kishon which connects it with the plain of Acre). At its highest it lies some 260 ft above the Mediterranean. Its undulating surface is extremely fertile. It has been the theatre of many battles from the time when Gideon fought the Midianites and Saul the Philistines, up to the war of 1914-18. In the springtime the plain looks like a living carpet as the fields of growing wheat, studded with myriads of red anemones—the 'lilies of the field' of the Gospel—and other flowers of vivid hue, sway in the breeze: the sight is as enchanting as it is ephemeral. Today the land is being intensively cultivated by Jewish settlers.

c Mountains—The central range—the country's spinal column—is a prolongation of Lebanon running south in a continuous line all the way down to the Sinai peninsula. The mountains of Upper Galilee, as far south as the Lake of Galilee, rise to over 3,000 ft—the Jebel Jarmuk is nearly 4,000 ft. In Lower Galilee the range fans out into a number of lesser ridges, varying in height from 500 to 1,850 ft. Mount Tabor is unique. The site of the Transfiguration, according to a tradition dating at least from the 4th cent., is completely isolated from the surrounding hills and, like a mighty dome, rises solitary and majestic to a height of 1,843 ft. Its isolation conveys an impression of even greater height. Its flanks are clothed with large patches of brushwood and thickets of dwarf oaks, and from the oblong plateau on its summit the eye ranges over a large tract of Galilee, as far as Carmel and the silver line of the sea in the west, and in the east the blue waters of the Lake of Galilee, the Jordan Valley, and on the far N. horizon snow-capped Hermon. The north-western spur of Carmel, though only 550 ft above sea level, is most impressive by reason of its abruptness. The spur heads a range 17 m. long, with peaks of from 1,500 to 1,700 ft; its southern section slopes down and gradually merges into the Samaritan range. Some of the mountains of this and the Judaean 55c range rise to over 2,000 ft—Garizim and Hebal to 2,849 and 3,077 respectively. The former is the mountain referred to by the woman of Samaria (Jn 4:20). Verdant Garizim and cactus-clad Hebal were the scene of the strange religious service described in Jos 8:30 ff.

Jerusalem stands on two mountains of 2,400 and 2,450 d ft respectively. The Tyropean Valley, now almost completely filled in with the rubble of the centuries, separated the western mountain from the eastern. The position of the unique spring Gihon determined the site of the ancient Jebusite stronghold on the southern projection of the eastern mountain. The city when captured by David formed a point of contact between Judah and the northern tribes, and became the natural capital of the united kingdom. Farther south, beyond Bethlehem and on the edge of the Judaean desert, Hebron, David's previous capital, one of the world's oldest cities and the burial place of Abraham, stands on a plateau 3,040 ft above the Mediterranean.

East and south of Jerusalem, as far as the Ghor (i.e. e the Jordan valley), the Dead Sea and Beersheba, there stretches a wild, mountainous region intersected by deep gorges, with hardly any perennial streams, and known as the Desert of Judah. This region has never been cultivated and cannot be reclaimed. From time immemorial it has been the home of robbers and outlaws or the refuge of the oppressed. David and his followers took to it in order to escape from Saul. In the Christian era it became a favourite retreat for monks and hermits, and Greek Orthodox monasteries still remind the pilgrim of a religious past whose glory is not wholly departed.

The Jordan—Of all the Palestinian watercourses, the f Jordan is the most important. Even as it traverses the whole length of the land, so may it be said to flow through the whole of Israel's history.

It has three sources of which the Hasbani, the most northerly, supplies an eighth, the Banyas, springing from the foot of Hermon at Caesarea Philippi, a fourth, and the Leddān, rising at Tell el-Qādi, the ancient Dan, five-eighths of its waters. These streams unite a few miles north of Lake Huleh. A unique feature of the Jordan is that most of its course runs several hundred feet below sea-level. At Banyas the stream is 1,000 ft above that level; at Lake Huleh it is a couple of feet above, one foot at summer level; at its exit from the Sea of Galilee it has dropped to 680 ft below, and when it finally mingles with the waters of the Dead Sea it has fallen to 1,291 ft below the Mediterranean. The deep valley (Ghor) through which the river winds its sinuous yet rapid course was an inland sea in diluvial times. The actual bed of the stream lies in a trench (Zor), many feet deep, which it has dug for itself out of the soft, calcareous soil of the Ghor. Here and there its banks rise as perpendicular cliffs from 20 to 100 ft or more; elsewhere it winds itself round the bases of lofty knolls eroded by rain and storm, thrown together in wild confusion and looking like so many ruined forts and castles—the whole scene resembling a lunar landscape. There are not a few shallows where the stream may be forded. Below the confluence of the Jabbok and the Jordan, at a spot still marked by the remains of the Roman bridge of Dāmiye, there is one such ford believed to have been the scene of the massacre of the Ephraimites (Jg 12:5, 6). From this point onwards the valley becomes wild and uncultivated and the water loses its clearness. In the spring, when the snows of Hermon melt and its own affluents are in spate, the Jordan overflows its banks; the flood water may then spread over one or two miles. The distance from the southern end of the Lake of Galilee to the northern shore of the Dead Sea is less than 60 m. as the crow flies, but so numerous are the river's windings that its actual course covers some 200 m. Unlike the Nile and other famous rivers, the Jordan is not, g 55g and never has been, a link between cities and peoples ; on the contrary it is, and always has been, a line of cleavage. Towns and villages have never mirrored themselves in its water, nor has it carried the trade of nations, for its many rapids render navigation impossible—even a swim in the swift flowing stream is not without risk. Both banks are lined with trees—tamarisks, eucalyptuses, poplars. Nightingales sing in the thickets in which boars, hyenas and jackals lurk even today ; kingfishers and other birds of bright plumage may be seen darting in and out of the bushes. Its tributaries—The Yarmuk and the Jabbok are important affluents on its eastern bank ; the Galud, believed to be the scene of the event recorded in Jg 7:4, 6, and the Wadi-el-Fara are perennial affluents on its right bank, as is the Wadi Kelt (identified by some with the brook Carith of 3 Kg 17:3), which flows through a deep, narrow fissure in the mountains.

h The Lake of Galilee—This lovely fresh-water lake was once part of the diluvial sea which covered the whole Jordan valley. The Hebrews called it Kinnereth, by reason of its harplike shape. It is $12\frac{1}{2}$ m. long, $7\frac{1}{2}$ m. wide at its broadest ; its greatest depth is 126 ft and it lies 683 ft below the Mediterranean. Its waters teem with fish—twenty-two different species have been found—but only a few fishing-boats now ply on the lake. It is a safe conclusion, in view of the isolation of the valley and the oriental character which is averse to change, that the modern fisherfolk use the same methods as those once followed by Peter and Andrew and the sons of Zebedee. For centuries the shores of the lake have been desolate, especially on the eastern side, but broken columns and capitals, and mounds of dressed stones on the beaches and in the water, remind the visitor of the many pleasant little towns which centuries ago stood beside its clear waters. Of late the plain of Gennesareth on its NW shore has regained some of its pristine beauty and fertility. In this steaming valley every kind of cereal grows readily, and the vine, the olive tree and the date-palm also yield a rich harvest. Storms, which are both sudden and violent, are caused by currents of cold air rushing down from Mt Hermon. When these meet the hot air of the sub-tropical valley, they lash the quiet waters into fury. Almost more than anywhere else in Palestine the Christian visitor here feels himself close to the Master whose eyes rested on these hills, whose feet walked on these waves, who spoke his inspiring parables and wrought countless miracles amid this enchanting scenery.

56a The Dead Sea is another relic of the diluvial sea. Its length is 47 m., its greatest breadth $9\frac{1}{2}$ m., the total area nearly 340 square miles, and since it lies nearly 1,300 ft below sea level, it has no outlet whatever. On the east a peninsula called the Lisân (Tongue) stretches half across the width of the sea. The greatest depths are found north of the Lisân, viz. 1,300 ft ; south of the Lisân the depth decreases rapidly. Some 6,000,000 tons of fresh water pour daily into this strange sea both from the Jordan and from a number of streams, winter torrents for the most part, but some of them perennial, such as the Wadi el-Môjib (the Arnon) which rushes down from the mountains of Moab between perpendicular walls of rock. For all that, the level of the Dead Sea varies but slightly, owing to the extraordinary evaporation which also accounts, in part, for the unusual mineral content of the water—23.4%—compared with approx. 4% in the ocean. Common table salt constitutes the largest part of this mineral content, the rest being magnesium chloride, calcium chloride, etc. Recently this chemical wealth has been systematically exploited, and the hundreds of workers thus employed have brought new life into a desolate region which in the summer, on account of the tremendous heat, makes great demands on human endurance. In the Bible the Dead Sea is called 'the Salt Sea'. The epithet 'dead' does not imply that its waters are motionless, but that no organic life can maintain itself in them. Fish coming down from the Jordan or the Arnon die within seconds of 56a entering these unpleasant waters.

Transjordanic Palestine—The various districts are b most conveniently grouped under the OT names : Bashan, Galaad, Moab and Edom. Bashan extended from Hermon to the river Yarmuk which enters the Jordan south of Lake Galilee, Galaad from the Yarmuk to the Wady Hesbân, another affluent of the Jordan near its mouth, Moab east of the Dead Sea from Wady Hesbân to Wady Heša and Edom between Wady Heša and the Gulf of 'Akaba. Galaad is divided into two fairly equal parts by the river Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerka). Northern Galaad was originally part of Og's kingdom of Bashan. Moab is similarly divided by the river Arnon (Seil el-Môjib). Northern Moab was part of Sehon's kingdom, then Israelitic territory and finally was conquered by Mesa and united with Southern Moab in the 9th cent. B.C. Neither Edom nor Southern Moab nor the small Ammonite kingdom east of Southern Galaad was ever inhabited by Israelites.

Bashan is a land of extinct volcanoes, fertile in the western districts of Gölân and en-Nukra, where the lava is decomposed, but stony and barren in the eastern tract of el-Lejâ, lit. the refuge (of robbers). South of this is the Haurân, now called the Mountain of the Druses, with wooded slopes and a peak 6,000 ft high. The mountains of Gölân do not reach 4,000 ft. Bashan was famous for its cattle. Eastern Bashan was also called Argob.

Galaad, also famous for flocks and herds, is an elevated e table-land, somewhat irregular on the western side where the symmetry is broken by steep valleys and lofty mountains reaching 4,000 ft. Northern Galaad now called 'Ajlûn was thickly wooded in OT times. Southern Galaad and Northern Moab are again united as in Sehon's time by a common name el-Belqa.

Moab like Galaad is a table-land, less elevated in the north (over 2,000 ft) than in the south (over 3,000 ft). It was famous for its wines, which were exported far and wide (Is 16:7-10). Southern Moab is now called Kerak. Its chief cities were 'Ar (er-Rabba) and Qir (el-Kerak).

Edom is a region of mountains reaching 5,000 ft and intersected by valleys whose waters either perish in the eastern desert or reach the Dead Sea and the Gulf of 'Akaba by the 'Arâbah valley. Its capital Sela' (Gk Petra), in the south is 'the rose-red city half as old as time'. Fênân in the north, famous for its copper mines, figures in the march to Canaan and in the Annals of the Martyrs.

Climate—Broadly speaking the climate of Palestine is a that of all Mediterranean countries, hot, dry summers, wet but mild winters, though in the Jordan valley it is tropical ; in the maritime plain, though the heat is habitually tempered by cooling breezes, the atmosphere is moist and enervating. On the other hand in the hill country the heat is always bearable. At sunset there is a considerable drop in temperature and a cold night may succeed a day of torrid heat. On most days the country is swept by strong westerly winds which usually begin to blow about midday. This phenomenon is due to the fact that the limestone hills of the interior are more susceptible to heat and cold than the sea coast. The rush of the cold air into the region of the hot air is thus landwards by day and seawards by night. Deut 11:10-25 supplies us with an excellent picture of climatic conditions in the Holy Land. Moses warned the Israelites that 'the land which thou goest in to possess is not like the land of Egypt . . . where when the seed is sown waters are brought in to water it after the manner of gardens ; but it is a land of hills and plains, expecting rain from heaven. And the Lord God doth always visit it . . . he will give to your land the early rain and the latter rain, that you may gather in your corn and your wine, and your oil, and your hay out of the fields. . . .'

Roughly speaking there are only two seasons, the hot

56e and the cold, or the dry and the rainy season. The rainy season, or winter, begins in November with the fall of the early rain, but the coming of these first winter downpours is by no means regular and may be delayed until the early days of December and even later. Rain is invariably heralded by a few days of strong wind and a considerable drop in the temperature. 'The early rain' (Deut 11:14; Jer 5:24), which may be spread over a few days or even a week, is the signal for ploughing and sowing. Rainy days occur, of course, all through the winter months. 'The latter rain' may be expected in April: its failure spells disaster, for these last downpours of the rainy season assure 'the fullness of the yearly harvest' (Jer ibid.). As Palestine has always suffered from a shortage of water, necessity long ago taught the inhabitants to collect the precious rainfall. Large cisterns and smaller waterholes may be found all over the country; the latter are mostly bottle-shaped cavities scooped out of the rock, the narrow neck being covered with a stone, often of a considerable weight and not easy to remove (cf. Gen 29:2, 8, 10). In this way water retains its freshness for a long time (Jer 6:7). The lack of rain is in some measure compensated for by the heavy dews of the night. All through the summer months, on cloudless nights the ground may be as wet as after a shower. This heavy dew suffices to bring to maturity the spring-sown grain, the grapes and other fruits. The Bible teems with allusions to this remarkable phenomenon, which was regarded as a symbol of God's goodness towards the dwellers in the Promised Land, whereas its failure was deemed a sign of displeasure; in his lament for Saul and Jonathan, David could think of no heavier curse upon Gelboe, the scene of their death, than that 'neither dew nor rain' should come upon it (2 Kg 1:21).

f Fauna—There are 595 species of vertebrates; the species of invertebrates cannot be calculated. Sheep and goats are the chief domestic animals, the former being remarkable for their long, glossy fleece, slender legs and fleshy tail. The black-haired goats provide the inhabitants with milk, and their hair provides the material from which the bedouins make their tents (Cant 1:4). Horses, mules and cows are of poor quality; camels and donkeys still play their time-honoured role of beasts of burden. As for wild beasts: jackals, hyenas, foxes and wild boars are found in the Jordan valley and in the hilly districts; packs of pariah dogs are also met with, but the numbers of these unofficial scavengers have been greatly reduced. In ancient times, before Palestine was stripped of its forests, lions (Jg 14:3; 1 Kg 13:14), leopards (Jer 5:6), bears (4 Kg 2:24) and other wild animals were not uncommon. Snakes, both poisonous and harmless, scorpions, poisonous centipedes and spiders may be found everywhere, also lizards, some of considerable size, and the ubiquitous gecko is not unwelcome even in the houses since he helps to keep down the plague of house flies. The bird population is both indigenous and migratory. Among the migrants is the stork; in the spring huge swarms of these birds may be seen on the wing westward bound—it is a popular bird because of the war it makes on the locust whose depredations are greatly dreaded. There are also various species of vultures. Sparrows are very common.

g The flora of Palestine varies with the climate of the different regions. In the Jordan valley vegetation is tropical whereas in the maritime plain it resembles that of Mediterranean countries. Time was when the land was well wooded, but the cutting down of timber started centuries ago and no forests remain, with the result that wind and rain have washed away the good earth from the flanks of the hills which now stand gaunt and bare except where terraces have been laboriously rebuilt to contain the soil. Since the 1914-18 war a vigorous policy of afforestation has been pursued both by the government and by the Jewish settlers, and large copes of pines and cypresses are becoming a pleasing feature of a one-time desolate landscape. In the plain of Sharon vast orange groves make a beautiful sight, both in the spring when the trees are in flower, and in the autumn when the golden fruit glitters in its millions against a background of dark green foliage. Oranges and bananas are also grown in the plains of Jericho, but the bananas, though sweet, have neither the size nor the golden colour of the Jamaican and other varieties. Olive trees can be seen everywhere, but the Palestinian olive is of small size. Melons, figs and apricots abound, and the cultivation of the vine is rapidly becoming one of the country's major industries. The grape ripens according to climate: in the plain of Sharon this may be by the end of June or in the early days of July, whilst in the hill country the vintage only begins in August.

Roads—In OT times, when there was but little h vehicular traffic and goods were carried on the backs of beasts of burden, and travellers journeyed on foot or rode on donkeys or mules, the roads were merely rough tracks, although the great international trade routes between Egypt and Mesopotamia, between South Arabia and the Mediterranean passed through Palestine. It was only after the Jewish revolt of A.D. 66-70 that the Romans created a network of good roads with a view to the control of the country. Few of those enumerated in Eusebius' Onomasticon were in existence in the lifetime of our Lord. West of the Jordan there were three main roads, one running along the coast from Sidon to Gaza. At Tyre a branch road started eastward, in the direction of Caesarea Philippi, running across Galilee; farther south, at Caesarea of Palestine, another road also led east, as far as Gabaa of Saul, where it joined the main road to Jerusalem. A section of this road, now but a rough track, may still be seen at Tell-el-Fül, where it joins the modern road from Jerusalem to Haifa. Another road, starting at Damascus and crossing the Jordan south of the Lake of Galilee, passed through Scythopolis—the ancient Bethshan and modern Beisan—Nablus, Sichar, Bethel, Jerusalem and Hebron and thence to Gaza. Yet another road led from Beisan through the Jordan valley to Jericho, where it turned westwards towards Jerusalem. Some of the milestones which once marked the distances on these roads may be seen in the Palestine Museum at Jerusalem.

These then are

'those holy fields
Over whose acres walked those blessed feet
Which fourteen hundred years ago were nailed
For our advantage on the bitter cross.'

(Henry IV, Pt I, Act I, Sc. i.)

THE POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND

By E. POWER, S.J.

57a Bibliography—As in the preceding article and especially Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, Vol. 2.

N.B.—The bracketed name after the Biblical name in the text is the modern Arabic name of the place in question.

By way of introduction to the political geography of the land of Israel we shall first indicate the limits of the territory promised by God to the descendants of Abraham and give some account of its ancient names and early inhabitants.

b The Promised Land—The western boundary of the land of promise was the Mediterranean, the eastern the Jordan valley and the Dead Sea. Transjordan was not included. Its southern limit ran SW from the southern end of the Dead Sea through the desert of Sin to Qadeš, sixty miles south of Beersheba, and thence WNW to the River of Egypt (Wady el-'Ariš) and the Mediterranean. The northern limit is disputed and two views find support in the texts. The more probable of these makes Mt Lebanon, separated from Galilee by the Nahr el-Qāsimiye, and the Beqa' plain north of Merg 'Ayyūn the northern boundary. This view is supported by the earliest texts and still more by the fact that no more northerly territory was assigned to any tribe. The other view includes all Lebanon and the Beqa' in the promised land. This limit, ideal rather than historical, is suggested by David's northern conquests. Ezechiel who supports it locates Dan in the extreme north, though that tribe only migrated northwards in the Judges' period and then settled south of the Beqa'. The Israelites occupied all the Promised Land except much of the sea coast held by the Philistines in the south and by the Phoenicians in the north.

c Ancient Names—The early Babylonians had no distinctive name for Palestine but included it with Syria in Amurru, 'Westland'. The later Assyrians named its political divisions Omri-land (the Northern Kingdom), Judah and Philistia. They also called Syria and Palestine the Land of the Hittites—an instructive example of oriental nomenclature. The Egyptians called both Syria and Palestine Reton and Hor. Originally Reton indicated a city state in Southern Palestine identified with Lydda since Egyptian r represents Semitic r and l. Upper Reton (= Palestine) was subsequently distinguished from Lower Reton (= the Syrian hinterland). The coast land of Phoenicia and perhaps also of Palestine was called Zahi. Hor or Huru, equated with the biblical Hor which designates the ancient inhabitants of Edom, was formerly understood to mean cave-dwellers but is now more commonly regarded as the Egyptian equivalent of Hurrites. This northern people seems to have ruled Palestine and Syria for three centuries before the conquest of Thutmosis III in the early 15th cent. B.C. The name Canaan appears first in the el-Amarna Tablets of the 14th cent. B.C. It designated originally Phoenicia and Palestine, and there are traces of this wider sense in Phoenician inscriptions and in the OT. In the Bible, however, it more commonly indicates Cisjordanic Palestine.

d Early Inhabitants—At the time of the Hebrew invasion the land was inhabited mostly by Semites: Canaanites and Amorrrhaeans. The former invaded Palestine

c 3000 B.C., the latter in the 19th cent. B.C. The names are sometimes used indiscriminately in the OT, sometimes with the difference that the Canaanites dwelt in the plains, the Amorrrhaeans in the hilly country. The Hyksos invasion in the 18th cent. B.C. brought northern peoples into Palestine, certainly Hurrites and probably also Hittites. These two peoples were racially connected as both had an Aryan aristocracy. As Hurrites had disappeared in OT times while Hittites still survived, it is possible that both peoples are called Hittites. It is in and about Hebron, fortified by the Hyksos invaders, that Hittites are mentioned in Abraham's time. A third northern race, the Philistines, were one of the sea peoples pressed southwards towards the close of the 13th cent. B.C. Their origin is obscure as their undoubted connection with Crete may be political rather than racial. The other names of ancient inhabitants mentioned in the OT either indicate clans or subdivisions of these peoples or have no racial significance. The Pherezites were probably Hurrites, otherwise attested near Jerusalem. The Hevites are considered by some Amorrrhaeans. Others regard Hevite as a scribal error for Hittite or Hurrite. The Jebusites of Jerusalem were probably Amorrrhaeans. The Rephaim, shades of the dead or giants, are associated with regions containing megalithic monuments. The 'Anakim, long necks, were giants of Hebron and Philistia.

Tribal Organization—The Hebrews found Canaan divided into numerous independent city states under native rulers only nominally subject to Egypt. Josue divided the land, still largely unconquered, into territories, assigned by lot to the different tribes and ruled by tribal chiefs usually called elders. These territories and the more important cities are here briefly indicated. In the identifications Tell means mound, Kh(irbet) ruin.

All Southern Palestine between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea was allotted to Judah in whose territory Simeon received cities. The southern boundary was that of the Promised Land previously indicated. The northern boundary, separating Judah from Benjamin in the east and Dan in the west, ran from the northern end of the Dead Sea to Nahr Rubin near 'Eqron on the coast. The line is somewhat irregular. It bends south from Adummim near the modern Khan Khatrūr to 'Ain Rogel south of Jerusalem, then north to Qiryath-yearim, then south to Bethšemeš and then north to the sea-coast. Cities: (a) in the Shephelah: 'Eglon (Tell el-Hesi), Lakish (Tell ed-Duwēr), Maresha (Tell Sandahannah) southern forts, Adullam ('Idelmiye), Socho (Kh. 'Abbād near Kh. Šuweike) associated with David, 'Azeqa (Tell Zakariye) and Libna (Tell es-Safiye) northern forts, and Qiryath-yearim (Tell el-Azhar) abode of the Ark and point of contact of Judah, Dan and Benjamin; (b) in the central mountain range: Qiryath-Sepher = Debir (Tell Beit-Mirsim) city of Othniel, Qiryath-Arba' = Hebron (el-Khalil the friend of God, Abraham), Beth Šūr or Bethsura (Beit Šūr) important stronghold, Bethlehem = Ephrat (Beit Lahm) city of David. The five unconquered Philistine cities, Gaza, Ascalon, Ashdod, 'Eqron on or near the coast and Gath in the interior were in Judaeen territory. Cities of Simeon in Southern Judah: Šiqlag (Tell el-Khuweilfe),

POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND

57a En Rimmon (Umm er-Rammāmin), Sharuhen (Tell el-Fara') a Hyksos stronghold, Beersheba (Es-Seba') and Sefat renamed Horma (Tell es-Seb'?).

1 The tribes of Dan in the west and Benjamin in the east separated Judah from Ephraim. The line of demarcation between them ran from Judaean Qirvath-yearim in the south to Ephraimite Lower Bethoron in the north. As Ephraimites lived with Canaanites in Gezer, it is doubtful whether Dan ever reached the coast or occupied Jaffa. In his diminished portion Dan was so oppressed by Philistines and Amorrrhaeans that six hundred Danite warriors migrated northwards in the Judges' period seeking a new home at Laiš, renamed Dan (Tell el-Qādi), in the fertile valley containing the principal source of the Jordan. Cities: = Bethšemēš (er-Rumeile) was a Danite city on the Judaean border. Nearby were Sor'a (Šar'a) and Eshtaol (Eshu') familiar from the history of Samson. In the north were Gibbeṭōn (Tell el-Melāt?) and Aialon (Yālo).

Benjamin, younger son of Rachel, was usually reckoned with the House of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasses, who occupied all Central Palestine. The northern boundary passed south of Lower Bethoron and Bethel through the desert of Bethel to Deir Diwān and thence to Gebel Qarantal and the Jordan, leaving Jericho to Ephraim. Jerusalem, then occupying the southern part of the eastern hill, was allotted to Benjamin but was held by the Jebusites until David took it and made it his capital. In western Benjamin were Upper Bethoron (Beit 'Ūr el-fōqā), Gibe'on (el-Gib), Kephira (Tell Kefire). North of Jerusalem were Gib'a (Tell el-Fūl) Saul's capital and the Gib'a of Benjamin, Rama (er-Rām), Mišpeh (Tell en-Nasbe) and Be'erōth (el-Bire). More easterly were Geba' (Geba') and Mikhmas (Mukhmas) facing each other across the Wady Suwēnit. Nob, an ancient sanctuary, was on Mt Scopus.

g The boundary between Ephraim and Manasses had its centre at Machmethath (el-Makhna just south of Shechem). On the east it inclined southwards to Ta'nath Šilo (Ta'na el-fōqā) and thence ran almost due south to Jericho and the Jordan. On the west it ran first south to Tappuah, then nearly due west along the Wady Qāna to the river 'Aūgā and the sea. In the centre of Ephraim were Šilo (Kh. Seilūn), ancient sanctuary, and Timnathserah (Kh. Tibne), city of Josue, in the south Lower Bethoron (Beit 'Ūr et-tahta), Bethel (Beitin) sanctuary of the Northern Kingdom, Yešana (Burg el-Isaneh), Jericho (Erihā) and Gilgal (Kh. el-Etele SE. of Jericho), first camp and headquarters of Josue.

The northern boundary of Manasses is indicated by the line of Canaanite strongholds from the Jordan to the coast Bethān (Beisān), Yible'am (Bel'ame), Ta'anakh (Ta'anak), Megiddo (Tell el-Mutesellim), and Dōr (El-Burg near Tanṭūra). The western Jordan valley east of Ephraim seems also to have belonged to Manasses. Cities in the south: Shechem (el-Balāṭa), important trading centre, Samaria (Sebastiye, NW. of Nablūs), Omri's capital, Tirša (near Tappuah, perhaps Gemma'in), Jeroboam's capital, Pir'athōn (Far'ata), Šartān commanding the Jordan ford ed-Damiye; in the north: Dōtain (Tell Dōtān), Tebes (Tūbas) and Abel-Mehola (Gör).

h To Issachar was allotted the rich but insecure plain of Esdraelon. The boundaries are only indicated by the cities mentioned of which Hapharaim (el-Fariye) is the most westerly, Kesulloth = Kisloth Thabor (Iksal) and Dāberat (Deburiye), west of Mt Thabor, the most northerly. In the eastern section between Wady Birē and Wady Maleh we find Manassites at 'Ophra (et-Taiyibe) in the Judges' period. Cities: Engannim (Genin), Yizra'el (Zer'in) and Qedeš (Tell Abu Qedeis SE. of Megiddo) in the south, Šunam (Soleim) and 'Endor ('Endūr) more central.

Zabulon occupied the centre of Southern Galilee between Asher on the west and Nephtali on the east and north. The boundary starting from Yoqne'am (Tell Qaimūn) runs first NNE. then due north to a little above Qabul, turns east to Huqqoq (Yaqūq) in the latitude of Capharnaum, then south to Mt Thabor where it joins Issachar. Cities: Sarid or Šadid (Tell es-Šadūd), Šime'on or Šemerōn (Es-Semuniye), Bethleḥem (Beit Lahm) and Ḥannaton (Tell el-Bedeiwiye).

Asher's portion, bounded by Nephtali, Zabulon, Issachar and Manasses, lay along the coast from the Nahr el-Qāšimiye to Šihor Libnath (Wady Zerka), south of Dor. The Tyrians, however, retained their territory in the north and received moreover from Solomon twenty cities in the region of Qabul. Cities from north to south: Ahlab = Mehebel (Kh. el-Mahalib, NE. of Tyre), Qana (el-Qane), Qabul (Qabūl) in the interior, Akzib (ez-Zib) and 'Akkō (Acre) on the coast, Harōšeth (near Hariṭiye, perhaps Tell 'Amar), Sisera's capital, and Ḥelkath (el-Harbag?) near Carmel.

Nephtali possessed all Eastern Galilee from the Nahr el-Qāšimiye and the Beqa' to Wady Birē. The line of demarcation from Asher ran almost due north from the NW. extremity of Zabulon. Cities: Qedeš (Qades) NW. and Hašor (Tell el-Qēdah) SW. of Lake Huleh, Merom (Meiron) and Beth 'Anath (Ba'ne) more to the west, Kinnereth (el-'Oreime) and Hammath by Lake Gennesareth, and in the south Heleph ('Arbata near Mt Thabor), Adami ha-Negeb (Damiye), Yabneel (Yemma) and Laqqum (Kh. el-Manšūra).

Transjordan was divided by Moses before the conquest of Canaan between Ruben, Gad and half of Manasses. Ruben had disappeared in David's time. His territory, inhabited by Gadites, was added to Moab by Meša c 850 B.C. It lay between the Arnon (Wady Mōgib) and the Wady Ḥesbān, between the desert and the Dead Sea. Cities: Dibōn (Dibān), Qariathaim (el-Kureyyāt), 'Aṭārōth ('Aṭārūs), Nebō (en-Nebā), Mēdabā (Mādabā), Ḥesbōn (Ḥesbān), El'ālē (el-'Al) and Mepha'at (Neif'a).

Gad received the region between Ruben and the Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerka), between Ammon and the Jordan, i.e. Southern Gil'ad. Cities in the Jordan valley: Beth-Haram (Tell er-Rame) Beth-Nimra (near Tell Nimrin), Sukkoth (Tell el-Akhsās) and Saphon (Tell Sa'idiye); in the interior: Penuel (Tulūl ed-dahab) on the Jabbok, Mišpeh (Kh. Gil'ad?), Ya'zer (Kh. Gazzir) and Yogbēha (Agbeihāt).

The Manassites in North Transjordan were left the Aramaeans of Gešur and Beth-Ma'aka undisturbed but spread over a considerable territory in eastern Bashan and Northern Gil'ad. Cities: Mahanaim (Kh. Maḥne), Jabeš-Gil'ad (on the Wady Yābis), Ramoth Gil'ad (Ḥoṣn 'Aglūn) and Edre'i (Der'a), Og's capital, in North Gil'ad; Gōlān (Saḥem el-Gōlān) and 'Aštarōth Qarnaim (Tell 'Astara) north of the Yarmuk, Bošora (Bušra es-Šām) and Salcha (Salkhad) in the Hauran.

David's Kingdom—The census narrated in 2 Kg 25:5-8 reveals to us the boundaries of the land inhabited by Israelites in the reign of David, practically identical with the region divided among the tribes. The census officials starting at Aroer on the Arnon passed through Gad, Jazer, Gilead, the land under Hermon and Dan, thence around the confines of Sidon and Tyre through the cities of the Canaanites and Hevites to the Negeb and Beersheba. Hermon is an easy correction, suggested by the context, of the unintelligible MT Hodši. Some read with Lucian for 'under Hodši' of the Hittites Qadeš (on the Orontes), but subject peoples were excluded from this census. The nations subject to David were the Philistines in the SW, the Edomites in the SE., the Moabites and Ammonites in the east, and in the NE. the Aramaean city states of Ma'aka and Gešur in the Golan, Reḥob in the southern Beqa', Tob (?), Damascus, Šōbah in the region of Homs, Anti-Lebanon and the northern Beqa'. As David was allied with Hiram of Tyre and Thou of Hamath, his kingdom was bounded by Tyre b The Separate Kingdoms—Solomon's oppression of the northern tribes was the chief cause of the schism which produced two separate kingdoms: Judah in the south and Israel, also called Ephraim, in the north. According to the texts Judah had one, Israel ten tribes. The numbers are verified if we understand tribes as separate tribal territories of which Ruben, Simeon and Levi had none and Manasses had two. Though Benjamin and Dan are reckoned with the northern tribes, much of their territories by force of circumstances was incorporated in Judah. The line of demarcation between the two kingdoms varied somewhat at different periods but originally and usually ran from the mouth of the Jordan south of Jericho, through the Wady Kelt and the Wady Suwēnit between Geba and Mikhmas, north of Rama and Gibeon, through the Wady Selmān north of Ayalon, and south of Gezer to the Nahr Rubin and the sea. Judah moreover had Edom and Israel Moab as vassal states.

POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND

57k and the Lebanon but included the Beqa', Anti-Lebanon and Damascus and reached the Orontes valley where Qadeš, Riblah and Šadūd mark the northern limit.

58a Administrative Divisions of Solomon—These divisions, made in view of taxation from which Judah was exempted, were: (1) The Mountain of Ephraim. (2) The ancient territory of Dan from Bethšemeš to Beth-Hanan (Beit 'Anan near el-Qubeibe). (3) Southern Sharon. (4) Northern Sharon from Wady Zerka to Carmel. (5) Cisjordanic Manasses including Megiddo, Taanach, Bethšan and the Jordan valley to Šartan. (6) Northern Transjordanic Manasses including Bashan and Argob. (7) Central Transjordanic Manasses. (8) Nephtali. (9) Asher and Zābulon. (10) Issachar. (11) Benjamin. (12) Gad (LXXB), Galaad (MT).

c Assyrian Administration—The Assyrians, after deporting the principal inhabitants and installing foreigners in their place, established provinces under provincial governors in the countries which they added to their empire. Tiglathpileser III in 733 B.C. detached three such provinces from the Northern Kingdom: Gal'aza (Gilead), Du'uru (Dor or Sharon from the Nahr el-'Auga to Acre) and Magidu (Megiddo or Esdraelon with Zābulon and Nephtali). Subsequently Sargon II established the provinces of Samerina (Samaria or Ephraim and Manasses) in 721 and Ashdudu (Ashdod adjoining Du'uru in the north and controlling all Philistia) in 711. Judah was neither colonized nor made a province by the Babylonians but fell under the jurisdiction of the governor of Samaria. Many western cities had been given to Ashdudu by Sennacherib.

d Palestine under the Persians—The exiles returned to a much diminished Judah, surrounded by hostile peoples: in the north the Samaritans who claimed jurisdiction over them, in the east the Ammonites who had reached the Jordan, in the south the Arabians or Edomites who occupied most of their territory and in the west the Philistines or Azotians of the province of Ashdod. Their most southerly cities were Bethlehem and Netōpha (3 m. farther south), their most northerly Jericho, Bethel and the four cities of the Gibeonite confederacy. When Darius I divided the empire into satrapies, Judah became a province of the satrapy of Abar-Nahara, the lands beyond the river (Euphrates), under a pēha or provincial governor, but was not fully sui iuris until the time of Nehemias. Her southern boundary then extended to Zanoah (Kh. Zanuḥ) and Qeila (Kh. Qilā) in the Shephelah, Beth Šur and Thecuā in the hilly country. Under the Persians the Phoenicians occupied all Sharon. Esdraelon belonged to the Samaritans who probably shared Galilee with the Phoenicians.

e Palestine under the Greeks—When the conquests of Alexander were finally divided between the Seleucids and the Lagids the Jews found themselves under the mild rule of the latter. Coelestria, however, which then included all Syria and Palestine south of the Orontes valley except the Phoenician coast land, was claimed by the Seleucids and finally conquered by Antiochus III in 198 B.C. The Jews thus became subject to the Seleucids. Satrap and satrapy were now superseded by Stratēgos and Stratēgia. The Stratēgia of Abar-Nahara contained in the north two Syrian regions, Seleucia and Coelestria, and in the south Galaaditis (Northern Transjordania), Samaritis (Samaria and part of Galilee), Judaea, Idumaea (from Beth-Šur southwards), Paralia (the sea-coast from Ptolemais = Acre to the Egyptian frontier), Phoenicia. The Nabataeans spread northwards from Edom to Moab and Southern Galaad. City states were founded, the beginnings of the later Decapolis. Jonathan, the last of the Maccabees, extended considerably the northern boundary of Judah by annexing the Samaritan districts attached to Lydda, Ramathaim (Rentis), Aphairema (et-Taiyibe) and Acrabatta ('Aqrabe, 9 m. SE. of Nablūs). The ephemeral conquests of the later Hasmonaean monarchs ended in internal dissensions and Roman intervention.

Palestine and Transjordania in NT Times—When Christ was born nearly all the ancient land of Israel was a vassal kingdom of the Roman Empire ruled by Herod the Great. Northern Galilee, however, and the sea-coast as far as Dor belonged to the Phoenicians and Eastern Gilead to the city states of the Decapolis and the Nabataeans. After Herod's death (4 B.C.) his kingdom was divided between his three sons: Archelaus, ethnarch of Idumaea, Judaea and Samaria until A.D. 6, Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilaea and Peraea until A.D. 39, and Philip, tetrarch of Northern Transjordania and Ulatha-Paneas until A.D. 34. King Herod Agrippa I, grandson of Herod the Great, ruled over the tetrarchy of Philip from A.D. 37, that of Herod Antipas from A.D. 39, and the ethnarchy of Archelaus (governed by a Roman Procurator A.D. 6–41) from 41 until his death in A.D. 44. Idumaea, Judaea, Samaria, Galilaea and Peraea were then administered by a Roman Procurator subject to the governor of Syria until the Jewish revolt (A.D. 44–66), and after its suppression became the Roman province of Judaea (A.D. 70–135). The tetrarchy of Philip was directly attached to the province of Syria during all this period except A.D. 50–85 when it was ruled by King Herod Agrippa II. The following description of the regional divisions applies equally to kingdom and province.

Idumaea—Edomites, pressed westwards and northwards by the Nabataeans gave this region its name. At this period they had adopted the Jewish religion and institutions. Their southern boundary ran from a little above the end of the Dead Sea by Beersheba and Gaza to the Mediterranean. The northern limit is only vaguely determined by the location of Azotus (Esdūd), Bethgabis later Eleutheropolis (Beit Gibrin) and Engaddi in Judaea, but of Ascalon, Beth-Šur and Masada (es-Sebbe) in Idumaea. Gaza is the only city mentioned in the NT.

Judaea—The name designates originally and strictly the land of post-exilic Judah between Idumaea and Samaria, but is used more widely to indicate Judaea and Idumaea, the kingdom of Herod and the Roman province. Its line of demarcation from Samaria, roughly from the Nahr el-'Auga above Jaffa to the Jordan above the Jabbok, lay north of Antipatris (Rās el-'Ain), Anuath Borcaeus ('Ain Berkīt), Acrabatta ('Akrabe) and Corae (Karāwa). In Herod's time it was divided into eleven toparchies: Oreine (Montana, the Jerusalem district), Idumaea, Herodium (Fureidis near Thecuā), Engaddi, Jericho, Pella (Beit-Nettif), Emmaus, later Nicopolis ('Amwās), Lydda, Thamna (Tibne), Gophna (Gifne) and Acrabatta. Cities: Antipatris, Arimathaea (Rentis), Azotus, Bethania (el-'Azariyye), Bethlehem, Bethphag (Kefr et-Tur), Emmaus (Qubeibe, 'Amwās?), Ephraim (et-Taiyibe), Jericho, Jerusalem, Joppe (Yāfā), Lydda, Rama, Siloam (Kefr-Silwān).

Samaria—We exclude Esdraelon which may have

POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND

58h belonged to Samaria or Galilaea or been divided between them, Carmel which was Phoenician and Scythopolis (Beisān) part of the Decapolis. The northern boundary ran from the Wady Zerka above Caesarea by Jenin and Mt Gelboe to Wady Mālih and the Jordan. The Samaritans were hated and despised by the Jews as racially distinct and religiously unorthodox. Cities : Samaria, rebuilt by Herod and called Sebaste (Şebastīyye), Turris Stratonis, 8 m. S. of Dor, also rebuilt by Herod and called Caesarea, the capital and residence of the Procurator, Shechem (Balāṭa) and Sychar (village or suburb east of Shechem). Galilaea—The boundary on the Phoenician frontier ran from the northern end of Lake Huleh or Semachonitis south of Cedeš and north of Gishcala (el-Giṣ) to Baca (el-Buke'a), then southwards east of Qābūl to Gaba (Sheikh Abreik). The Scythopolis territory was south of Mt Moreh (ed-Daḥi) and the Sahel el-Aḥma. First Sepphoris (Saffūriya, 5 m. NNW. of Nazareth), then Tiberias (Ṭabariyya) was the capital. Galilaea included a narrow strip of land on the east side of the lake. Cities : Bethsaida (et-Tell and Kh. el-'Arag north of Lake Galilee), Cana (Kh. Qana, 9 m. N. of Nazareth), Capharnaum (Tell Hūm), Corozain (Kerāziye), Magdala (Megdel), Naim (Nein, 2 m. S. of Tabor), Nazareth (en-Nāṣire), Tiberias. Peraea—The name is derived from the Greek πέραν beyond (the Jordan). Peraea with Galilee was ruled by Herod Antipas in Gospel times. It was a long narrow strip of land extending to Machaerus east of the Dead Sea (Mkāwer) where the Baptist was imprisoned and beheaded, and bounded by Pella (Fāḥil), refuge of the Christians of Jerusalem (A.D. 66), in the north, Gerasa and Philadelphia ('Ammān) in the east, 58h and the Nabataean kingdom in the south-east and south. Its capital was Gadara (Tell Gadūr in South Gilcad). The way from Galilee to Jerusalem passed through it. No cities are mentioned in the NT.

Ituraea and Trachonitis—The Ituracans were Arabs who settled in NE. Palestine and South Syria in the 6th–5th cent. B.C. Lk 3:1 refers only to Palestinian Ituraea north of Lake Huleh consisting of Ulaṭha ('arḍ el-Ḥule) and Paneas (Banyās). Trachonitis is the stony region of the Legā but designates all the tetrarchy of Philip in Philo and Josephus, all except Ituraea in Lk, viz. Gaulanitis (Gōlān), most of the ancient Bashan, Batanea (en-Nuqra), a fertile region SE. of Gōlān, Trachonitis and Auranitis, the mountain of the Druses and the land watered by it.

Decapolis—These ten cities with their territories were autonomous states attached to the province of Syria. Two were isolated, Canatha in northern Auranitis and Damascus. The others were contiguous and occupied the region called Decapolis in the Gospels. They were Scythopolis in Cisjordan, Pella directly opposite in Transjordan, Hippos (Qala'at el-Ḥoṣn) in SW. Gaulanitis, Gadara (Mukeis) in NW. Gilcad, Abila (Tell Abil) east and Dion (Tell el-Aṣari) farther east of Gadara, Gerasa (Geraš) SE. of Pella and Philadelphia ('Ammān). The Decapolis thus included ancient Gilcad (except Peraea) and territories west and north of it. The coastal cities south of Joppe had a similar regime 4 B.C.–A.D. 41, but were incorporated in Judaea after the death of Herod Agrippa I in A.D. 44. These Hellenistic city states were a counterpoise to Jewish nationalism.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

(to 130 B.C.)

By E. POWER, S.J.

59a Bibliography—Only recent and important works are indicated. Ricciotti (English tr. in preparation) is particularly recommended.

General History—*L. Albrecht, Die Geschichte des Volkes Israel, Gotha, 1926; *L. Browne, The Story of the Jews from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, London, 1926; *H. Gressmann, *E. Ebeling, *H. Ranke, *N. Rodokanakis, Altorientalische Texte zum AT, Berlin, 1926; *E. Montet, Histoire du peuple d'Israël, Paris, 1926; *N. H. Baynes, Israel among the Nations, London, 1927; *I. M. Price, The Dramatic Story of OT History, New York, 1927; L. C. Fillion, Histoire d'Israël peuple de Dieu, Paris, 1927-28; *G. A. Barton, A History of the Hebrew People, New York, 1930; L. Desnoyers, Histoire du peuple hébreu (Judges to Solomon), Paris, 1930; F. Feldmann, Geschichte der Offenbarung des AT bis zum Exil, Bonn, 1930; *A. Lods, Israël des origines au milieu du VIII^e siècle, Paris, 1930 (Tr. by S. H. Hooke, London, 1932); *A. Bentzen, Israels Historie, Copenhagen, 1931; *A. Jirku, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, Leipzig, 1931; *A. T. Olmstead, History of Palestine and Syria, New York, 1931; *R. Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, Stuttgart, I 1932, II 1925, III 1927-29; *T. H. Robinson and *W. O. E. Oesterley, A History of Israel, Oxford, 1932; *J. Hempel, AT und Geschichte, Guetersloh, 1932; A. Pohl, Historia populi Israelis inde a divisione regni usque ad exilium, Roma, 1933; G. Ricciotti, Storia d'Israele, Torino, 1932-34; L. Dennefeld, Histoire d'Israël et de l'ancien Orient, Paris, 1935; *E. Sellin, Geschichte des isr.-jud. Volkes, Leipzig, I 1935, II 1932; *E. Auerbach, Wüste und Gelobtes Land, Berlin, 1932-36; J. Coppens, Pour mieux comprendre et mieux enseigner l'histoire sainte de l'AT, Paris, 1936; *T. G. Platten, The Odyssey of Israel, London, 1936; A. Allgeier, Biblische Zeitgeschichte in den Grundlinien dargestellt, Freiburg, 1937; J. Keulers, Bijbelsche Geschiedenis, Roermond, 1938; *H. W. Robinson (and others), Record and Revelation, Oxford, 1938; Pelt-Hennequin, Histoire de l'Ancien Testament, Paris, 1939; b D. Rops, Histoire Sainte, Paris, 1943. Patriarchal Period—*K. Gallie, Die Erwaehlungs-traditionen Israels, Giessen, 1927; R. de Vaux, 'La Palestine et la Transjordanie au deuxième millénaire et les origines des Israélites', ZATW 15 (1938) 225-38; P. Dhorme, 'Abraham dans le cadre de l'histoire', RB 37 (1928) 367-85, 481-511; 40 (1931) 364-74, 503-18; *C. L. Woolley, Abraham—Recent Discoveries and Hebrew Origins, London, 1936; R. de Vaux, 'Les patriarches hébreux et les découvertes modernes', RB 53 (1946) 321-48, 55 (1948) 321-47, 56 (1949) 5-36. Egyptian, Desert, Conquest, and Judges Periods—Cf. bibliographies to Comm. on Exodus, Josue and Judges. United Monarchy—*W. W. Cannon, 'The Reign of Saul', Theology 25 (1932, 2) 326-35; L. Pirot, 'David', DBVS 2 (1932) 287-330; R. de Vaux, 'Titres et fonctionnaires égyptiens à la cour de David et de Salomon', RB 48 (1939) 394-405. Divided Monarchy—*J. Begrich, Die Chronologie der Könige von Israel und Juda, Tuebingen, 1929; H. Haensler, 'Die biblische chronologie des 8. Jahrhunderts v. Christ', Bi 10 (1929) 257-74, 377-93; 11 (1930) 63-80; P. Lemaire, 'Crise et effondrement de la monarchie davidique', RB 45 (1936) 161-83; *W. W. Cannon, 'Israel and Moab', Theology 20 (1930, 1) 184-96, 249-61; *O. Eissfeldt, 'Israelitisch-philistacische Grenzverschiebungen von David bis auf die Assyrrerzeit', ZDPV 66 (1943) 115-28; R. de Vaux, 'Le schisme religieux de Jeroboam I', Angelicum 20 (1943) 77-81; *H. Parzen, 'The Prophets and the Omri Dynasty', HTR 33 (1940) 69-96; R. de Vaux, 'La chronologie de Hazaël et de Benhadad III rois de Damas', RB 43 (1934) 512-18; *L. Honor, Sennacherib's Invasion of Palestine, New York, 1926. Exile Period—A. Bea, 'Koenig Jojachin in Keilschrifturkunden', Bi 23 (1942) 76-82; D. Sidersky, 'L'onomastique hébraïque des tablettes de Nippur', Rev. Et. Juiv. 87 (1929, 1) 177-99. Persian Period—R. de Vaux, 'Les décrets de Cyrus et de Darius sur la reconstruction du Temple', RB 46 (1937) 29-37; J. Touzard, 'Les Juifs au temps de la période persane', RB 24 (1915) 59-133; *A. C. Welch, Post-Exilic Judaism, Edinburgh, 1935; J. Gabriel, Zorobabel, Wien, 1927; *H. H. Schaefer, Esra der Schreiber, Tuebingen, 1934; A. Van Hoonacker, 'La succession chronologique Néhémie-Esdras', RB 32 (1932) 481-94; 33 (1924) 33-64; *M. Gaster, The Samaritans, Oxford, 1926. Greek Period—*E. R. Bevan, 'Syria and the Jews', CAH 8 (1930) ch 16; F. M. Abel, 'Antiochus Epiphanes', Vivre et Penser 1 (1941) 231-54; *A. Causse, Les dispersés d'Israël, Paris, 1929.

Introductory—The history of Israel begins with the call of Abraham to the worship of the one true God and the revelations made to him which foretold the destiny of his race. His descendants, God's chosen people, should inhabit the land of Canaan and in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed. These fundamental facts cannot be ignored as they are the key to the correct interpretation of the sacred records. The inspired writers are chiefly concerned with setting forth the designs of God in his dealings with his chosen people and tracing the accomplishment of these designs in their history. They omit as irrelevant to their purpose much that we should like to know and often ignore the secondary causes and the concatenation of the events which they record. It is the task of the historian to supply as far as possible these omissions and to explain when necessary the circumstances, the sequence and the natural causes of the events. In this short sketch of the history of Israel many details and incidents of minor importance must be omitted. For these and for fuller information on other matters the reader is referred to the commentaries. The Patriarchal Period—The children of Israel were descended through Jacob and Isaac from Abraham, the son of Terah (Thare). Abraham first appears as a native of the Sumerian city of Ur in southern Babylonia. His name and the names of his clansmen, recorded in the sacred text, are Semitic and can be paralleled in the Babylonian records of the early second millennium. He belonged therefore to a branch of the Semites, nomadic peoples whose original home was Arabia and who migrated in considerable numbers about this period into the adjoining settled regions. Many writers attach Abraham, the Hebrew, to the Habiru immigrants since Hebrew and Habiru may be philologically akin and 'Eber (Heber), from whom Hebrew seems to be derived, was the common ancestor of Israelites and Arabs, Gen 10:25 f. Others prefer to associate him with the Aramaeans and Chaldaeans who however only appear in the texts under these names several centuries later. Abraham's ancestors were polytheists, Jos 24:2; Jud 5:8, and very probably like most Semite nomads had a particular veneration for the Moon-god, the Babylonian Sin, who was the tutelary deity of Ur. The city moreover enjoyed great prosperity and ruled over all southern and central Mesopotamia at the close of the third millennium B.C. when Semites mingled with Sumerians in its streets. But it subsequently fell on evil days especially when its inhabitants were massacred by Sin-Muballit, the predecessor of Hammurabi. As Abraham was very probably a contemporary of Hammurabi the approach of this calamity to Ur may have been a factor in the migration of his clan to Harran. This city was a colony and, from the religious point of view, a replica of Ur, having the same tutelary deities, Sin and his consort, Ningal. It would thus be a natural place of refuge for fugitives from the mother-city. Its name, which means 'way', signalized its importance as the meeting-place of the two great routes to Syria from the south and east. It lay in the centre of the region circumscribed by the Euphrates and the Chabor, later called Aram Naharaim.

Though Abraham received the first intimations of his mission in Ur it was in Harran that he was ordered by God to migrate to Canaan, Gen 12:1-5; Ac 7:2-4. We have an approximate indication of the date of this event in the synchronism of Gen 14:1. Abraham was in Canaan during the reign of Amraphel king of Senaar, the region which had Babylon for its capital, Gen 14:2, 9, and contained also the cities of Uruk (Arach) in southern and Agade (Akkad) in northern Babylonia, Gen 10:10. The only Babylonian monarch whose name resembles Amraphel is Hammurabi, also written Hammurapi. The Hebrew reproduction of the Babylonian name is sufficiently exact, except in the addition of a letter l, which is variously explained and does not materially affect the identification. The stratification of the finds made at Räs-Shamra, confirmed by other recent discoveries, places the reign of Hammurabi after the close of the twelfth Egyptian dynasty which can be dated absolutely, by our knowledge of the position of the seventh year of Senusret III in the corresponding Sothic period (cf. § 118*e*), c. 1989-1776. Abraham may thus be assigned with much probability to the second half of the 18th cent. B.C. If however, with many recent historians, we reject the identification of Amraphel and Hammurabi, the patriarch's migration from Harran to Canaan may still be associated with the movement of nations from north to south in the early centuries of the second millennium B.C.

Canaan is the region between the Mediterranean and the Jordan extending from Lebanon in the north to the Egyptian desert in the south. It was scantily inhabited in the fourth millennium B.C. by a non-Semitic people, probably of northern origin, who dwelt in caves and valleys, practised agriculture and did not fortify their cities. Semites invaded the land early in the third millennium. They settled especially in the plains and on the coast, built walled cities and developed the civilization of the Early Bronze Age. These are the Canaanites of the OT, often distinguished as plain dwellers from the Amorhacans in the hilly regions. Both names are however also used indiscriminately for the earlier inhabitants of Canaan. We have ample information on the invasion of the Amorhacans in the 19th cent. B.C. from the Egyptian Proscription texts (cf. § 118*d*) and archaeological investigations. The texts reveal to us a people recently settled in Palestine, whose names proclaim their kinship with the contemporary Amorhacan invaders of Mesopotamia. Explorations in Transjordan show a change in the population from settlers to nomads at the same period. The invaders therefore overran Transjordan before they settled in Palestine. The earlier Proscription texts depict the nomadic invaders as still under tribal organization. The second collection, variously dated from a generation to a century later, manifests their political development into independent city states.

There are other indications that Egypt claimed and to some extent exercised a suzerainty over Palestine and Syria during the twelfth dynasty. The city of Megiddo, most important to the Egyptians as commanding the chief trade route to the north and not mentioned in the Proscription texts, had an Egyptian official resident. Another Egyptian official is attested at Ugarit in Syria. Canaan therefore at the period of Abraham's arrival was ruled by Amorhacans over whom Egypt claimed dominion. Egyptian interest was concentrated on the trade routes. The recent nomadic condition of the Amorhacans, still unchanged in Transjordan, forbids us to suppose that they had all become settled in Palestine. The city states had their territories but there remained considerable tracts of common land especially in the hill country at the disposal of nomads. Thus the Hebrew immigrants could lead there a nomadic or semi-nomadic life without being involved in political disturbances, except when, as in the case of Lot, they allied themselves with the city dwellers.

Recent discoveries have strikingly confirmed the reliability of the patriarchal traditions recorded in Genesis. The names and customs of the patriarchs are those of the ancient period in which they lived, not of the later period in which the records were written. Abram, of which Abraham seems to be a dialectical variant, appears in Babylonia, only in the early second millennium, written Abaamrama, Abarama, Abaamraam. The name is Akkadian, meaning 'love the father', if the second element is the verb ra'amu, 'love', but Amorhacan or west Semitic, meaning 'great as to the father' or 'well-born', if the second element is ram, 'be lofty'. Isaac and Jacob are apocoped theophoric names of which the complete forms are Yisaaq-el, 'may God smile' or 'be favourable', and Ya'qob-el, most probably 'may God protect'. This form of name is west Semitic, common among the Amorhacans, rare among the Canaanites. Isaac is not attested outside the Bible but Jacob was recently discovered as a personal name Ya-ah-qu-ab-el at Shagar Bazar in northern Mesopotamia in the 18th cent. It appears also as a Palestinian place name in a 15th cent. Egyptian text (cf. Jephthah and Jephthahel). Thus the patriarchal names are undoubtedly personal names, in use among people to whom the patriarchs were akin and at the period to which they belong, but not attested at the later date when the records were written. Similarly the customs of the patriarchs, when they differ from those of the later Hebrews, indicate the land of their origin. With regard to marriage, for instance, the ornaments given by Eliezer to Rebecca, Gen 24:47, the dowry implied by the claims of Rachel and Lia, Gen 31:14*f*, the gifts offered by Sichem to the father and brothers of Dina and the multiplication of the marriage price in atonement of his offence, Gen 34:12, are all in agreement with Babylonian law but are not attested in the law codes and later books of the OT.

The theory which makes the patriarchs not persons but peoples and interprets the events recorded as tribal movements, alliances and contests, ignores entirely the religious character of the narratives and becomes ridiculous when consistently applied. An individual ancestor can represent a tribe, but such a use of a personal name cannot be supposed without proof. Israel is regularly used to represent the Israelites, but Jacob rarely as an equivalent of Israel and Abraham and Isaac only once or twice in poetic parallelism with Israel. The sacred writer clearly regards the patriarchs as individuals and since his description of them agrees with their historical milieu they were also individuals in his sources.

The Egyptian Period—Shortly after Abraham's arrival in Canaan northern peoples called Hyksos by the Egyptians and consisting chiefly of Hurrites and Semites invaded Palestine. Their superior armament, especially their horses and chariots, enabled them to conquer the Palestinians and subsequently the Egyptians 60a over whom they ruled c 1730-1580 B.C. It was apparently before the end of this period that the Israelites migrated to Egypt. Their arrival after the expulsion of the Hyksos seems improbable. The Egyptians were by no means inhospitable to Asiatic nomads, as their monuments attest, but were then so exasperated against all Asiatics that they would scarcely have elevated Joseph to his high dignity or accorded his kinsmen a favourable reception. The Israelites were assigned a district in Lower Egypt suitable for the raising of flocks and herds and called Goshen (LXX Gesem) and the land of Ramesses. The former identification of Goshen with one of the 'nomes' in the Delta was based on a false reading of Gesem for Sesem. The land of Ramesses means the land adjoining the city of Ramesses, very probably Tanis. The prodigies of the Exodus occurred in the land of Tanis, (Ps 77:12, 43). Even if Ramesses be located at the rival site of Qantir about fifteen miles south of Tanis the land of Ramesses could still be the land of Tanis.

b After the expulsion of the Hyksos in the eighteenth dynasty Egypt reached the height of its power in the reign of Thutmose III (c 1485-1450 B.C.), the conqueror of Nubia, Palestine and Syria. From his fifteen Asiatic campaigns this Pharaoh undoubtedly brought back to Egypt many prisoners of war who became slaves and were employed in forced labours and military service. People called Aperu are mentioned in the Egyptian texts as thus employed during the whole period of Egyptian rule in Palestine and Syria (c 1500-1160 B.C.). It is natural to conclude that these were Asiatic slaves and to connect them with the Habiru of the Babylonian, Hittite, Ras-Shamra and Amarna texts. The connexion is suggested by the similarity of name, Asiatic origin, and social condition. The Israelites, known as Hebrews to foreigners, may have been akin to them. But they must not be identified with them since they were not slaves but alien residents. The forced labours to which slaves were subjected in Egypt were mostly building operations. The constructions of the Pharaohs of the eighteenth dynasty were, chiefly at least, in Upper Egypt where they resided. With these the Israelites in the Delta would have no concern. The situation was changed by Ramesses II (c 1298-1232) of the nineteenth dynasty who transferred the capital and royal residence from Thebes to the Delta and built especially, though not exclusively, in the region where he dwelt. He was the builder of Ramesses and Pithom, store cities commanding the two routes to Asia and natural bases of operation for his Asiatic campaigns. His close contact with the Israelites in the Delta made him realize their increase in number and his solicitude for the security of his empire made him regard them as a menace in the possible recurrence of an Asiatic invasion. By subjecting them to forced labours he hoped to diminish their numbers and break their spirit. From the peculiar circumstances of his reign we can easily understand the employment of the Israelites at the construction of Ramesses and Pithom, the record of the death of only one Pharaoh oppressor who had a very long reign and the residence of the Pharaoh in the immediate neighbourhood of the Israelites during the whole period of the oppression. It has been argued that earlier Pharaohs may also have built on the sites of Ramesses and Pithom and may have resided temporarily in the Delta. The first objection has considerable force. Ramesses II is known to have appropriated the labours of earlier Pharaohs and effaced their inscriptions from the monuments. The second scarcely takes sufficient account of the implications of the biblical narrative. On the whole the positive points of contact between the events recorded in Exodus and the historical situation of Egypt in the nineteenth dynasty are too strong to be ignored. They do not, however, justify an entirely definite conclusion. Archaeological discoveries in Transjordan and Palestine, more directly concerned with the date of the Israelite occupation of Canaan, must also be considered. 60c

The oppression of the Israelites by forced labours under Ramesses II was aggravated by his son and successor, Merneptah (1232-1224). It was in the first year of this Pharaoh's reign that the plagues and the exodus occurred. The cisterns dug for drinking water in the immediate neighbourhood of the Nile show that the river had not yet overflowed its banks at the time of the first plague towards the end of June. The institution of the Pasch fixes the tenth plague and the exodus about the beginning of the following April. All the plagues except the last were connected with natural phenomena which occur in Egypt. God's power over nature was thus attested in matters well known and of vital interest to the Egyptians. The miraculous character of the plagues was manifested by the abnormal intensity and effects of the phenomena and the preternatural determination of the time when they began and ended. If regarded merely as an exaggerated description of natural phenomena, they become ridiculous, since they cannot effect their avowed object of making the omnipotence of Yahweh known to the Egyptians. The tenth plague in particular defies all naturalistic explanations.

As the return to Sinai after the exodus had been foretold to Moses, Ex 3:12, the immediate destination of the Israelites in their flight was not Canaan but Sinai. They followed therefore, not the way of the Philistines along the coast of the Mediterranean to Canaan, but the way of the desert to the Red Sea and Sinai. Marching from Ramesses in a southeasterly direction they made their first recorded halt at Succoth. The word means 'tents', i.e. 'encampment'. Its identification with Theku, Tell el-Maskhuta in the Wadi Tumilat, is not philologically assured but suits the direction of the march. They then proceeded to Etham, the Egyptian fortress (hetem) on the edge of the desert at the northern end of the Bitter Lakes. From Etham they turned back into Egypt and finally encamped on the Egyptian side of the Red Sea. At this period the Red Sea undoubtedly communicated with the Bitter Lakes but scarcely covered the more northerly Serapeum. There is one indication in the text that the camp of the Israelites was on the regular Egyptian route to Sinai. It lay between Migdol (DV Magdal) and the Red Sea. Migdol is a Semitic word borrowed by the Egyptians and meaning 'fort'. Several texts mention a Migdol of Seti I, predecessor of Ramesses II, guarding the northern route to Asia. In one however a Migdol of Seti is located by the context on the southern frontier. This Migdol, guarding the route to Sinai, seems to have been the fort discovered at Tell Abu Hasa about 5 m. SW. of the Bitter Lakes. It contained a temple dedicated to Hathor, the tutelary goddess of the mines at Sinai. The inscriptions commemorate Seti I and Ramesses II. The route to Sinai seems therefore to have crossed the Red Sea by a ford south of the Bitter Lakes. We can thus understand why the drying up of the shallow waters of the ford is described in the text as effected by a strong continuous hot wind sent by Yahweh to facilitate the crossing.

The Desert Period—Our information on the wanderings of the Israelites during this period is practically restricted to their journeys from Egypt to Sinai, from Sinai to Cades and from Cades to the eastern border of Canaan. In their journey to Sinai they followed the ordinary Egyptian route to the mines in the north of the peninsula, branched off from it at Elim, proceeded southwards along the shore of the Red Sea and thence ascended by a lateral valley to the holy mountain in the south where God had appeared to Moses. After a stay of nearly a year at Sinai they marched NNE. to Cades about 60 m. south of Beersheba with the intention of invading Canaan from the south. Here the reports of a reconnoitring party so discouraged them that they planned to return to Egypt and revolted against Moses. Their punish-

- 61a ment was exclusion from the Promised Land and the consequent postponement of the invasion for a generation. Cades was the central point of their wanderings during the period which elapsed before the march to Canaan was resumed. The name is preserved in the modern diminutive form Qudeis. Three springs at some distance from one another provided a water supply and the desert was steppe land in which flocks could subsist. The final stage of the journey was determined by the decision to invade Canaan from the east and by the refusal of the kings of Edom and Moab to grant the Israelites a passage through their dominions. Edom at this period lay west of the Arabah valley and only later included the mountainous district to the east of it. The Israelites therefore marched south-east to Ezion-geber at the southern end of the Arabah and thence north along the valley to the southern confines of Moab, thus considerably lengthening their journey to avoid encroachment on Edomite territory. Moab originally included the whole region between the Dead Sea and the desert. At this period however the northern half and Southern Galaad were subject to the Amorhaean king, Sehon, and were almost entirely peopled by nomads. The Israelites therefore, after making the circuit of Moab on the south and east, requested from Sehon, a peaceful passage to the banks of the Jordan. His refusal resulted in the conquest of his kingdom in which Ruben and Gad immediately settled. Unlike the tribes who occupied Canaan they had to build their own cities, Num 33:34-38, in this previously unsettled district. Recent discoveries have confirmed the accuracy of the biblical account of Sehon's kingdom and nomad subjects. The only traces of settlement during the Late Bronze Age in the whole region occupied by Ruben and Gad have been found in the neighbourhood of Sehon's capital Heshbon. Extensive settlement in the Early Iron Age dates the arrival of the Israelites c 1200 B.C.
- 6 The desert period had for its object the preparation of the Israelites for the invasion of Canaan and still more their national and religious formation. The older generation, depressed and dispirited by slavery and unaccustomed to warfare, was replaced by a more vigorous race, hardened by the experience of desert life and trained to battle by encounters with desert tribes. The choice of Israel as God's first born among the nations was solemnly ratified by a special covenant between Yahweh and his chosen people amid the thunders of Sinai. Such a covenant would be incomplete and without practical value if unaccompanied by an account of the engagements of the contracting parties. The Israelites learned from the Decalogue, the Book of the Covenant and the ceremonial laws how they could become the holy people of Yahweh who would recompense their fidelity with special benevolence and constant assistance. As a stiff-necked people, prone to idolatry, they needed also a period of religious training in the desert before coming into close contact with Canaanite idol-worship. Six of the precepts of the Decalogue are found in more ancient Egyptian and Babylonian texts. Of the remaining four the prohibition of polytheism and the two prohibitions of evil desires show the incontestable religious and moral superiority of the Israelites over all other ancient peoples. The Sabbath observance is based on the ancient principle, exemplified also in the sacred character of first-fruits and first born, that a definite part of man's time must be denied to his own uses and dedicated to God in acknowledgement of his universal dominion. The application of this principle suggests a continuous division of time into seven-day periods, unknown to other ancient nations and first attested in Israel. There is thus nothing in the Decalogue at variance with its Mosaic origin.
- d The discovery in the last half-century of ancient Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian and Hittite codes or fragments of codes has refuted the charge of anachronism brought against the Mosaic code and contributed at the same time to its better understanding and more exact evaluation. It has much in common with the code of Hammurabi, as might be expected from the customs of the patriarchs and the diffusion of Babylonian institutions in the east. It is adapted however to a primitive people at a much lower stage of culture, but displays a more elevated morality especially in the consideration shown to slaves and solicitude for the weak and oppressed. There is no trace in the Mosaic code of the curious moral perversion by which the Babylonians sometimes punished the innocent for the sins of the guilty. It is often objected to the Mosaic origin of the Book of the Covenant that the agricultural legislation supposes the settlement in Canaan. It may be answered however that the Israelites had become familiar with agricultural labours in Egypt and that the legislator had chiefly in view, not the short stay in the desert, but the proximate settlement in Canaan.

The special care of God for his chosen people was particularly manifested by the miraculous provision or multiplication of manna without which they could not have survived for a generation. The arid region of their sojourn supports today at most 10,000 nomads and cannot have been much more productive in ancient times. That they were many times more numerous may be concluded from their remarkable increase during their long stay in Egypt, Ex 1, and their successful invasion of Canaan. They were too few however to occupy immediately the whole region, where Canaanites survived for at least two centuries to save the land from the evils of depopulation, Ex 23:29 f.; Deut 7:22. We must disregard therefore the 600,000 fighting men, suggested by a few misinterpreted or interpolated texts, but may accept the reckoning of the invading army at 40,000, Jos 4:13, which is confirmed by the 40,000 fighting men of Israel in Deborah's time, Jg 5:8. This text is particularly valuable as part of an ancient document contemporary with the events described. It takes no account of the southern tribes of Judah and Simeon and thus allows for a normal increase of the warriors in the interval between Josue and Deborah. The total population during the wanderings may thus be estimated as between 150,000 and 200,000. The description of the manna with which this multitude was nourished assimilates it to the sweet and nourishing substance exuded by insects which feed on the leaves of the tamarisk trees and called manna by the nomads of Sinai. This natural food is available however only in the months of June and July and in so small a quantity that the entire yearly product of the peninsula is about six cwt. God's provision for his people was more continuous and more abundant and lasted throughout the whole desert period, Jos 5:12. His choice of Israel for a most important mission is the only adequate explanation of so extraordinary a miracle.

The Conquest of Canaan—Canaan at this period was under Egyptian rule. That implied at most a regular payment of tribute by the Canaanite princes, but their subjection was often merely nominal unless enforced by military expeditions. Merneptah boasts of his capture of the rebel cities of Ascalon, Gezer and Yenoam and of his defeat of Israel in the fifth year of his reign (c 1228 B.C.). The reference to Israel is regarded by some historians as a proof of the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan before the reign of that Pharaoh. It may equally well indicate an encounter with Israelites in the desert between Egypt and Canaan or even with a group of Israelites who settled in Canaan before the main body. No subsequent Egyptian expedition to Asia is recorded before the eighth year of Rameses III who defeated and repulsed in that year (c 1193 B.C.) the land and sea forces of northern peoples driven southward by a European invasion of Asia Minor. These invaders were encamped in Syrian Amurru north of Qadesh and the combined land and sea battle was fought most probably on the Phoenician coast. Two of the five

HISTORY OF ISRAEL TO 130 B.C.

62a peoples mentioned, the Philistines and the Zakkara, had invaded Egypt by sea three years previously. Repulsed by Ramesses III they had settled then or earlier on the southern coast of Canaan, the Philistines in Philistia, the Zakkara at Dor in Sharon. Pottery discoveries at Tell el-Fara' place the Philistine settlement before 1240 B.C.

b The political condition of Canaan presented by the book of Josue is very similar to that depicted in the Amarna tablets during the invasion of the Habiri. The Canaanites formed a large number of independent city states. The larger cities sought to extend their dominions and preside over coalitions in which their less powerful neighbours were grouped. Jerusalem headed such a coalition against the invaders under Arti-Khepa at the earlier and Adoni-Sedek at the later period. The Egyptians pursued the same policy of non-interference. The invaders however followed different modes of procedure. The Habiri took service under native leaders and were equally active in Canaan and Syria. The Israelites fought alone and only in Canaan. The invasions are further distinguished by the fact that the native princes of a number of cities bear entirely different names in the book of Josue and the Amarna tablets.

c God had promised possession of Canaan unconditionally to the descendants of Abraham. His chosen people were thus assured of his all-powerful assistance and the victories in Jos as well as in Jg are attributed entirely to Yahweh. This assistance was particularly needed and miraculously manifested at the siege of Jericho in the beginning of the campaign (cf. § 230e, h). The army of Josue was unskilled in the assault of fortified cities but well adapted for battle in the open field. His strategy was dictated by these circumstances. He showed his military superiority by signal defeats of Canaanite coalitions in pitched battles and established himself solidly in the centre of the land making Shiloh his first capital. Cities were captured in these campaigns by surprise or by stratagem or when denuded of their defenders, but Josue's forces were not sufficient to garrison them. They were therefore sometimes reoccupied by the Canaanites when the Israelite army moved elsewhere and had to be re-captured in the second phase of the conquest. The reduction of the Canaanite strongholds and the occupation of their entire territory was left to the individual tribes in their allotted territories. It was a lengthy operation requiring increase in numbers and advance in military skill and not completed before the reign of Solomon. The hill country was first occupied as war chariots debarred access to the plain lands.

The biblical attestation of two phases in the conquest of Canaan is consistent in itself and to be expected if Josue had a fairly large army at his disposal. Those historians who number the invaders at a few thousands exclude the first phase as a later invention. They have then to explain how the Israelites, so few originally, filled the whole land in two centuries, instead of being absorbed in the mass of the Canaanites like the 14th cent. Habiri.

d The archaeological evidence for the date of the conquest is as follows. The sites of the important cities of Jericho and Hasor were occupied in the Late Bronze Age, but abandoned in the Early Iron Age. The date of Josue's capture of the cities is disputed, but the ban imposed on them is confirmed and their abandonment is definitely dated. The scriptural evidence, by associating the ban with the capture, dates the latter in the transition period from bronze to iron, c 1200 B.C. Excavations at Tell Beit-Mirsim (Debir) and Tell Duweir (Lachish), cities captured by the invading Israelites, manifest a change of inhabitants towards the close of the Late Bronze Age and a marked inferiority of culture in the newcomers who wrecked pagan sanctuaries on both sites. The date is determined by the pottery and still more precisely at Lachish by a hieroglyphic inscription on a bowl assigning it to the fourth year of some Pharaoh who cannot be earlier than Merneptah. The pottery which dates the destruction of Bethel, recorded in Jg 1:22, is more commonly assigned to the same period. Shiloh, the first capital of the Israelites, was sparsely inhabited in the Late Bronze Age, but was walled and populous in the Early Iron Age. These discoveries attest a new period in the history of Canaan inaugurated by the arrival of the Israelites after 1220 B.C. The date agrees with the corresponding dates of the Exodus and the settlement in Transjordan.

The Judges' Period—This period (c 1200–1050 B.C.) corresponds with the second phase of the conquest. The empires of the Hurrites and the Hittites no longer existed. Assyrian expansion had not yet begun. Egypt became decadent after the reign of Ramesses III (c 1200–1163). The campaigns of that Pharaoh in Syria did not bring him into contact with the Israelites, still in the hill country, since his route northwards passed through the plain lands. The special providence which guided the destinies of the chosen people thus enabled them to develop in numbers and strength without major interference. Their only enemies were the small nations who were their immediate neighbours. These were allowed to oppress them in punishment of their infidelities that they might repent and return to Yahweh, their all-powerful protector.

The dispersion of the various tribes to the districts allotted to them necessarily weakened the national unity. The nation became divided into groups with different interests and different problems. Judah, Simeon and Dan in the south had the Philistines in the plain and the Amorrrhaeans in the hill country to contend with. Jerusalem in the east, Gezer in the west and the intervening cities of the Hevite confederacy, Gabaon, Caphira, Beroth and Cariathiarim, separated them from their northern brethren. Ephraim, Manasses and Benjamin formed a compact block in the centre of the land. Their problems were the deforestation of northern Samaria and the extirpation of the Canaanites in the plain of Esdraelon. The northern tribes of Asher, Nephtali and Zabulon had Sidonians and Canaanites to subdue and were cut off from their brethren in the south by a long line of Canaanite fortresses, Bethsan, Yebleam, Megiddo, Taanach and Dor. The lot of Issachar in Esdraelon long remained Canaanite territory. The major and the minor judge of that tribe resided respectively in Ephraim and Manasses. The transjordanic tribes of Ruben, Gad and half Manasses had Moabites, Ammonites and nomads for their neighbours and even appear in conflict with their western brethren. The force of circumstances did not however entirely obliterate the consciousness of national unity. The northern and central groups combine against the Canaanites in the days of Deborah. All worship the same God, Yahweh, and are prepared to act together in matters of supreme religious importance like the war of the tribes against Benjamin. The great judges moreover appear in all four groups, Othniel and Samson in the south, Aod (Ehud) and Gedeon in the centre, Deborah and Barac in the north and Jephte in Transjordan.

The equation of the Hebrew šōpēt with its philological equivalent the Carthaginian suffet and the inference that the judges ruled over all Israel are erroneous. Only two judges, Deborah and Samuel, exercised authority outside the tribe or group to which they belonged and that in virtue of the prophetic charism with which they were endowed. Solicitude for the weak and the oppressed has been already noted as a distinctive characteristic of the Mosaic code. The chief function of a judge in Israel was to right the wrongs of the oppressed. Such is the judgement to be exercised by the future Messias (cf. Ps 71). Judge is thus the equivalent of deliverer. When the Israelites are oppressed by foreigners in punishment of their sins, and repenting appeal to Yahweh, he raises up a judge to deliver them. As the oppressors are different in the

62d

63a

b

c

63c different groups and the judge is always chosen from the oppressed group it follows that his mission and authority are restricted to that group. Oppressors and consequently judges may be contemporaneous, as the text insinuates in the case of the Ammonites and the Philistines. The sacred writer follows generally the chronological order of events, but the overlapping of the periods makes the lists of years recorded useless for chronological purposes.

d Lack of central authority and close contact with the idolatrous Canaanites had very injurious effects on the religion and morality of the Israelites during this period. The various oppressions and enslavements were the punishment of the abandonment of Yahweh and the worship of the local Baals and Ashterahs or Ashtartes. We need not suppose, however, that the Israelites totally rejected Yahweh, but they violated the first commandment by worshipping Canaanite divinities as well. Even in the central region where Ark and Tabernacle had been installed at Shiloh there was a sanctuary of Baal at Ophra and Israelites and Canaanites lived together at Sichem (Shechem) and probably worshipped in the same sanctuary a god called El-berith ('God of the covenant') by the former and Baal-berith ('Lord of the covenant') by the latter. The Danites set up a tribal sanctuary in the north-east of Palestine where descendants of Moses officiated as idolatrous priests. In Transjordan religious ignorance was so great that Jephthah considered himself obliged to offer a human sacrifice to Yahweh in fulfilment of a rash vow. Moral depravity is exemplified by the savagery of Abimelech, the amours of Samson and the gross violation of the rights of hospitality at Gaba. There is however another side to the picture, represented by the religious fervour and whole-hearted devotion to Yahweh manifest in the canticle of Deborah, the zeal of Gideon in the destruction of the sanctuary of Baal, the self-immolation of the blind Samson, the consultation of and recourse to Yahweh in national needs. It must be remembered too that the centralization of cult in force during the desert wandering was neither possible nor obligatory at this period as appears from Josue's erection of an altar at Sichem. Samuel, the last of the judges, sought to revive the relaxed religious spirit by organizing groups of religious enthusiasts at whose exercises he presided.

e The United Monarchy—The occupation of their lots by the various tribes when they had increased in number and in strength broke the barriers between the isolated groups and restored the national unity which had been temporarily disrupted. The southern group remained longest aloof and was only united with the main body when its special problem became a national problem. The Philistines were superior to the Israelites in military equipment and were thus enabled to hold Judah in subjection in the days of Samson. Later they extended their dominion over Benjamin and the plain of Esdraelon and became a menace to all Israel. This common danger consolidated the national unity and produced also a religious revival.

The Israelites were normally ruled in the Judges' period by the elders of the various tribes. Israel in Samuel's time was a theocracy ruled by God through his prophet. The reunited people, conscious of the need of centralized and stable authority, desired to be ruled by a king like the neighbouring nations. God ordered the reluctant Samuel to accede to their desire. The choice of Saul as the first king was probably motivated by the relative insignificance of his tribe. A monarch from the tribe of Judah would scarcely have been recognized by the haughty Ephraimites. David, the second king, ruled originally only over his own tribe of Judah with which Simeon was incorporated. His nobility of character and recognized capacity as a soldier and as a ruler secured him subsequently the voluntary adhesion of the northern tribes. His dynasty was established by the military successes and prosperity of his reign. The institution of the monarchy was a step towards the fulfilment of the second promise made to Abraham that 63b in his seed all the nations of the earth would be blessed. The future Messiah was to spring from the line of David and the eternity promised by God through the prophet Nathan to the Davidic dynasty was to be realized in his eternal reign.

f Saul was remarkable for personal bravery, simplicity of manners and military capacity. Unable to meet the better armed Philistines in open battle he harassed them with guerilla warfare and organized a national army for more decisive combats. He forced the Ammonites to raise the siege of Jabes Galaad and extirpated the Amalecites, the hereditary enemies of Israel in the south. His slaughter of the Gabaonites, protected by their treaty with Josue, was a crime subsequently punished by a famine and expiated by the execution of his descendants. But the two sins for which he was rejected by Yahweh were his offering of sacrifice when the delay of Samuel seemed to deprive him of a favourable opportunity of joining battle with the Philistines and his violation of the ban imposed on the Amalecites by sparing their king Agag and the best of their flocks and herds. His fits of melancholy and jealousy, his persecution of David, consultation of the witch of Endor, and defeat and death on Mt Gelboe cast a shadow on the last part of his reign. He left the Philistines in possession of the plain of Esdraelon, a greater menace than ever to Israel.

g David was the real founder of the monarchy. He had distinguished himself in his youth by his exploits against the Philistines and excited the jealousy of Saul who sought his life. He thus became leader of a band of outlaws in the desert of Judah, but was obliged to take refuge with Achish, the Philistine king of Gath, who gave him Siceleg (Ziklag) for his residence. After the death of Saul he established himself in Hebron as king of Judah. Saul's son, Ishbaal (MT Ishbosheth), supported by Abner, ruled over the northern tribes. The slaughter of Abner by Joab and the assassination of Ishbaal by two of his officers resulted in the voluntary acceptance of David's rule by the elders of the northern tribes.

h David (1012-972 B.C.) subdued all the neighbouring nations, except the Phoenicians who were his allies, and extended the kingdom of Israel to its furthest limits, from the Egyptian desert to Syrian Hamath and from the Arabian desert to the Mediterranean. His rule was similar in many respects to that of other oriental monarchs. He was the vicerent of Yahweh as other kings were assumed to be the vicereents of their tutelary deities. Like them he had a harem and contracted at least one political alliance by marriage with the daughter of the Aramaean king of Gesur. As the Hittite monarchs had Habiri in their bodyguard he had foreign mercenaries attached to his person, Cretans and Philistines under Benaiah and men of Gath under Ethai. He moved his capital from Hebron to a more central position in Jerusalem as the Assyrian kings moved theirs from Assur to Calah and Nineveh. His wars with neighbouring nations to extend his dominions and his alliance with Hiram of Tyre against a common enemy, the Philistines, are other points of resemblance. Solomon carried the likeness further and became a typical oriental monarch.

i The profoundly religious spirit of David is manifested in the Psalms and not least in his prompt and sincere repentance of his two great sins. He was punished by family troubles, so common in oriental monarchies, the slaughter of Amnon, the revolt and outrageous conduct of Absalom, the ambition of Adonias. He conceived the project, executed by Solomon, of a central sanctuary at Jerusalem and moved the ark of the covenant from Cariathiarim to the summit of Mt Moriah. Among his other projects of religious reform was a reorganization of the priests and Levites. His census of his people, regarded as an encroachment on the domain of Yahweh, was punished by a pestilence. There is no indication of pomp at his court. The court officials mentioned, a recorder, a scribe and a minister of public works, resemble those of the Pharaohs.

HISTORY OF ISRAEL TO 130 B.C.

63j The fame of the ancient kings of the East was measured by their buildings as well as by their victories. In Israel David was the warrior, Solomon the builder, at peace with his neighbours during his whole reign (971-931 B.C.). He maintained his father's alliance with Hiram of Tyre whose assistance was indispensable in his new ventures. The Phoenicians not only aided him in building and equipping a fleet for Red Sea trade, but also supplied him with cedar and cypress wood from Lebanon for his edifices at Jerusalem and artificers for their adornment. As money was scarce their services were requited with the cession of twenty Galilaean towns. Solomon like other Eastern monarchs traded by sea and land to meet the expenses and supply the materials of his building operations. Among his numerous wives was a daughter of the Pharaoh Siamon, whose dowry was the city of Gezer taken by her father from the Canaanites. Solomon garrisoned certain key cities for the defence of his realm and supplemented David's infantry with horses and chariots. Magnificent stables for his horses were recently unearthed at Megiddo.

The chief buildings erected at Jerusalem were the Mello, the temple and the palace. The Mello (lit. 'filling') filled up the depression on the west between Moriah and Jebus. The magnificent temple, where alone Yahweh henceforth manifested himself to his worshippers, was built on the summit of Mt Moriah. The royal palace was south of it. Both were enclosed in an outer court. The inner court contained the temple and the altar of holocausts. Canaanite slaves were insufficient for the building operations. Solomon unwisely exempted Judah when imposing taxation and forced labours on the northern tribes. Still more fatal to the future prosperity of his kingdom was his worship of the false deities of his foreign wives. His reign, begun so splendidly on the foundations laid by David, ended in disaster.

64a The Divided Monarchy—The revolt of the ten tribes was the divine chastisement of Solomon's worship of false gods. Its chief natural cause was the old animosity between north and south, revived and inflamed by partiality to Judah and harsh treatment of the northern tribes. There were also contributory causes. The disproportion between the splendour of Solomon's court and the economic resources of his kingdom increased the misery of the poorer classes and provoked social unrest. His cult of false gods alienated worshippers of Yahweh and his establishment of a central sanctuary at Jerusalem offended those who were attached to the local sanctuaries and profited from their popularity. The schism which followed Roboam's contemptuous refusal to modify his father's policy was a political and religious disaster inferior only to the subsequent loss of national existence. The strength of the chosen people was weakened by division and internecine warfare. Each kingdom suffered from foreign alliances of its rival, often dearly bought. Religion was debased in the north by exclusion from the national centre of Yahweh worship and the establishment of rival sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan where Yahweh was worshipped under the form of a bull.

The history of the two kingdoms is naturally divided into three periods, characterized respectively by hostility (931-885), alliance (885-841) and independent development (841-721). A relative chronology can be established from the lengths of the reigns of the various kings. Assyrian synchronisms make this chronology absolute and test its reliability. In the following table the kings of the sole kingdom of Judah and the contemporary monarchs of Damascus and Assyria have been included. It will be noted that the ninety years' period between the accession of Roboam (931) and the deaths of Ochozias of Judah and Joram of Israel (841) covers ninety-five years of six kings of Judah and ninety-eight years of nine kings of Israel. The apparent discrepancy is explained by the Hebrew custom of reckoning part of a year as a whole year and thus attributing the year of a king's death to him and to his successor. On the other hand the period of one hundred and thirty-four and a half years between the fall of Samaria (721 January) and the fall of Jerusalem (587 June) corresponds exactly with the sum of the years of the kings of Judah in the interval. It is clear that the Assyrian method of dating is adopted according to which a king's reign began on the New Year's day after his accession so that no year was counted twice. The intervening period of 120 years (841-721) is represented by 164 years in Judah and 144 in Israel. The chronological difficulties of this period have been admirably solved by Dom B. Haensler in his articles in Biblica 1929-30. The co-reigns of Azarias with Amasias, deposed after his disastrous defeat by Joas of Israel, and of Joatham and Achaz with Azarias, incapacitated by leprosy, being reckoned twice, account for the superfluous years of the kings of Judah. In the

64d

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF THE DIVIDED MONARCHY PERIOD

Judah		Israel		Assyria	Aram
Roboam (17)	931-915	Jeroboam (22)	931-910
Abia (3)	915-913	Nadab (2)	910-909
Asa (41)	913-873	Baasa (24)	909-886		Benhadad I
		Ela (2)	886-885
		Zambri (7 days)	885
		Omri (12)	885-874
Josaphat (25)	873-849	Achab (22)	874-853	Salmanasar III	859-824
		Ochozias (2)	853-852		Benhadad II
		Joram (12)	852-841
Joram (8)	849-842	Jehu (28)	841-814	Samsi-Adad V	824-810
Ochozias (1)	841	Joachaz (17)	814-798	Adadnirari III	810-782
Athalia (6)	841-836	Joas (16)	798-783		Benhadad III
Joas (40)	836-797	Jeroboam (41)	787-747	Salmanasar IV	782-772
Amasias (29)	797-769	Zacharias (1)	747	Assuridan III	772-753
Azarias (52)	785-734	Sellum (1 month)	746	Assurnirari V	753-745
Joatham (16)	757-742	Menaheh (10)	746-737	Tiglath-pileser III	745-727
		Phaceia (2)	737-736		Rasin
Achaz (16)	742-727	Phacee (20?)	736-732
		Osee (9)	730-722	Salmanasar V	727-721
Ezechias (29)	726-697			Sargon II	721-705
Manasses (55)	696-642			Sennacherib	705-681
Amon (2)	641-640			Asarhaddon	681-669
Josias (31)	639-609			Assurbanipal	669-626
Joachaz (3 mths)	609
Joakim (11)	608-598
Joachin (3 mths)	598
Sedecias (11)	597-587

64c Israelite list the length of Phacee's reign, obviously erroneous since he can only have reigned part of the time between Menahem's payment of tribute to Assyria in 738 and his own death in 732, is due to an interpolator who is also responsible for some incorrect synchronisms. Osee's reign is reckoned from his confirmation by Tiglath-pileser after payment of tribute. A co-reign of Jeroboam with Joas must be assumed if he reigned forty-one and not thirty-seven years (cf. §§ 123-5).

Judah had a much smaller and less fertile territory than Israel. She had the advantage of a stable dynasty, and was thus saved from the frequent revolutions which produced no less than ten dynasties in Israel. She was also less exposed than Israel to the attacks of powerful neighbours, the Aramaeans and the Assyrians.

• Hostility (931-885)—Jeroboam, an Ephraimite, had attracted Solomon's attention during the building of the Mello at Jerusalem and been appointed overseer of the Joseph tribes. Here he became the natural leader of the movement of revolt and had to flee to Egypt to escape the wrath of Solomon. After the latter's death he returned and became the first king of Israel. The schism may have inspired and certainly favoured the attempt made by the Pharaoh Sesac (Sheshonkh I), who had usurped the throne of Solomon's father-in-law Siamon, to restore Egyptian dominion in Palestine. He captured and sacked many cities, Jerusalem included, in Palestine and Transjordan and left a memorial of his conquests, recently discovered, in Megiddo. His death soon after however and the subsequent decadence of Egypt averted the threatened danger which Roboam forestalled by fortifying several important cities. Jeroboam fixed his capital at Sichem and also fortified Phaniel in Galaad against a possible Aramaean invasion. He was not successful in his wars with Judah and had to abandon to Roboam's son, Abia, the Ephraimite cities of Bethel, Jesana and Ephron. His dynasty terminated after the brief reign of his son, Nadab, slain in a military sedition. The usurper, Baasa, transferred his capital to a more northerly site at Thersa, still unidentified. He recovered the Ephraimite cities lost by Jeroboam and pressing southwards was fortifying Rama only six miles from Jerusalem when he was recalled to defend his northern territories invaded by the Aramaeans. Asa purchased with costly presents the aid of Benhadad I of Damascus against his rival, thus initiating a policy which was to prove fatal to both kingdoms. And yet Asa was the only pious monarch of this period. He solemnly renewed the covenant with Yahweh and abolished the worship of false gods and the practices of Canaanite cult which prevailed under his predecessors.

f Alliance (885-841)—When Zambri slew Baasa's son, Ela, at Thersa and usurped his throne, the army, then besieging Gibbethon, made their commander, Omri, king. Zambri perished after a seven days' reign but another pretender, Thebni, made a longer resistance. Thus Omri's chief exploits belong to the latter half of his reign. He built a new capital at Samaria, subdued the Moabites who had revolted after the death of Solomon and by a treaty with the Tyrians, from which he reaped great commercial advantages, inaugurated a system of alliances which made Israel materially prosperous but had disastrous religious effects on both kingdoms. He maintained peace with Judah but whether he or his successor made the alliance with that kingdom is uncertain. The alliances were cemented by marriages, Omri's son, Achab, espoused Jezabel, daughter of the king of Tyre, and Josaphat's son, Joram, wedded Athalia, daughter of Achab and Jezabel. The menace of Damascus, a very important trading centre which sought an outlet on the Mediterranean, was countered by these alliances. Judah was dependent on Israel during this whole period. She retained her autonomy and her northern boundary, fixed by Asa at Geba and Michmas, but her king and army had to accompany the northern monarchs in their military expeditions against the Aramaeans and the Moabites. Omri 64d was unsuccessful in his war with Benhadad I of Damascus to whom he surrendered many cities and granted trading posts in Samaria, his capital. His son, Achab, extended and adorned the royal residence at Samaria. Recent excavations have revealed to us the splendour of his 'ivory house' and the sumptuousness of his court. In the latter part of his reign he suffered much from Aramaean raids and was finally besieged in his capital by Benhadad II. Tardy repentance and divine aid turned defeat into victory. The cities lost by Omri were recovered and Israelite trading posts were set up in Damascus. The Assyrian menace now produced an alliance of all the smaller states against the dreaded invader Salmanasar III. Achab of Israel contributed 2,000 chariots and 10,000 foot-soldiers. The armies met at Karkar on the Orontes in 853. The Assyrian claimed victory but was checked in his advance. Later in the year war broke out again with Benhadad II who refused to give up Ramoth-Galaad. Achab besieged the city but was wounded by an arrow and died some hours later. Under his son and successor, Ochozias, Meia, king of Moab, revolted and annexed the Israelite territory between the Arnon and the Wady Hesban. An invasion of Moab from the south under Joram, brother of Ochozias and last of the Omrides, failed to recover the ancient lot of Ruben. The worship of Baal Melkart, promoted by Jezabel, largely replaced that of Yahweh during the reigns of the last three Omrides. Through the efforts of the great prophets, Elias and Eliseus, the national religion survived and finally prevailed when Jehu extirpated the Omrides and founded a new dynasty in 841.

Judah meanwhile prospered under Asa's son, h Josaphat, remarkable alike for religious zeal and civil reforms. He appointed catechists in the different cities to instruct his subjects in their religious duties, divided his kingdom into prefectures governed mostly by royal princes, built fortified cities and store cities, reorganized the standing army and established tribunals for the administration of justice in civil and religious matters. After quelling an Edomite revolt he built a fleet at Ezion-Geber to resume the profitable Red Sea trade. His one great error was his marriage with Athalia under whose evil influence his son, Joram, became a Baal worshipper. Joram's infidelity was punished by a successful Edomite revolt and devastating raids of Philistines and Arabs. His son Ochozias, also a Baal worshipper, was slain by Jehu when he visited the wounded Joram of Israel at Jezrael.

Independent Development (841-721)—Judah's progress during this period contrasts with the decline of Israel interrupted by the prosperous reign of Jeroboam II. Jehu became king of Israel by divine appointment but was alone responsible for the ferocious cruelty with which he enforced his mandate. On the abrupt termination of the alliances with Judah and Tyre he applied to the Assyrians for aid and paid tribute in his first year to Shalmaneser (Salmanasar) III. After two expeditions against Damascus in 841 and 838 the Assyrians retired from the scene. Jehu was thus exposed to the vengeance of Hazael who reduced Israel to subjection and misery during his reign and that of Joachaz. The saviour sent by God to the latter towards the close of his reign was apparently Adadnirari III who in 802 subdued and received tributes from Sidon, Tyre, Israel, Philistia, Edom and Damascus. The king of Damascus was still Hazael according to the sacred writer but is called by the Assyrian chronicler Mari, an Aramaean royal title meaning lord and given to Hazael himself in a recently discovered inscription. Israel revived after the death of Hazael (c. 797). Joas inflicted three defeats on Hazael's successor Benhadad III and expelled the Aramaeans from Cisjordan. Galaad was recovered by Jeroboam II under whom Israel reached its furthest limits and enjoyed peace and prosperity. This was a last divine favour and call to repentance.

- 65a The appeal was voiced by two great prophets, Amos and Osee, who, like Elias and Eliseus at an earlier period, preached a return to the pure worship of Yahweh towards the close of the reign of Jeroboam II.
- b The natural causes of the recovery of Israel were the exhaustion of Damascus and the cessation of Assyrian intervention in Palestine from 802 to 738. There was an Assyrian expedition against Damascus in 783 and three against Hadrach in 774, 765 and 755. Hadrach was finally captured in 738. The powerful Aramaean kingdom the chief cities of which were Hadrach and Hamat blocked the Assyrian advance. The rejection of the prophets' appeal sealed the fate of Israel. The history of its remaining kings is a record of palace revolutions, short reigns, and violent deaths. Menahem alone died a natural death after paying tribute to Tiglath-pileser in 738. Phacee, a usurper, and Rasin of Damascus plotted a revolt from Assyria and tried to force Achaz of Judah to join the league. His refusal led to the Syro-Ephraimitic war in 735. Achaz, rejecting the inspired counsel of Isaias, purchased Assyrian aid. Tiglath-pileser, also called Pul (Pulu) as king of Babylonia, invaded Palestine in 734, subdued Philistia and devastated Galilee, deporting about 4,000 of its inhabitants. Phacee was slain in a popular uprising and succeeded by a usurper, Osee, subsequently recognized by the Assyrians on payment of a large tribute. Galilee and Galaad now became Assyrian provinces. When Osee refused tribute, relying on Egyptian aid, Samaria was attacked by Shalmaneser V and taken after a three years' siege by his successor, Sargon II, in January 721.
- c In Judah after the death of Ochozias the queen mother Athalia usurped the throne, slew the males of the royal line and established official Baal worship in the holy city. Joas, the infant son of Ochozias, hidden in the temple by the wife of the high-priest Joiada, alone escaped the massacre. He became king and Athalia was slain when the country people and the priestly party organized a successful revolt in 836. He was a good king while Joiada lived and had the temple repaired from the contributions made by the people for that purpose which the priests had been appropriating. But instigated by the leading citizens who had previously supported Athalia he restored the pagan cult after the death of Joiada and silenced in blood the protests of the high-priest Zacharias. Defeated and wounded by Hazael of Damascus c. 798, he only saved his capital from destruction by paying an enormous ransom. He was slain soon afterwards in an uprising probably provoked by this disaster. His son and successor, Amasias, reconquered the Edomites and reopened the Red Sea trade. He was less fortunate in his encounter with Joas of Israel, occasioned probably by a boundary dispute. Defeated and captured at Beth-Shemesh he was brought prisoner to Jerusalem whose walls were partially demolished for the triumphal entry of the king of Israel. This disastrous defeat may have caused the military revolt from which he fled to Lachish where he was captured and slain. There are some indications that his death did not immediately follow his deposition.
- d His son and successor, Azarias, also called Ozias, was a capable ruler. He reorganized the army, repaired the fortifications of Jerusalem and other cities and promoted agriculture and viniculture. He subdued the Maonites who had seized Elath on the gulf of Akaba and thus interrupted the Red Sea trade, destroyed the Philistine cities of Gath, Jabne and Ashdod and subjugated some Arab tribes. When however he usurped the priestly function of offering incense and was struck with leprosy his son became regent. Joatham was a pious and successful monarch. He built the upper gate of the temple, increased the defences of his realm and reduced the Ammonites to tribute. Achaz, more exactly Joachaz, as we learn from an Assyrian tribute list, was perhaps the worst of the kings of Judah and gravely imperilled its national existence at a very critical period. He had no faith in Yahweh but sought to propitiate the gods of his dangerous neighbours, the Damascenes and the Assyrians, and offered a holocaust of his son to the Canaanite god, Moloch. Judah had recovered from previous dangers without prophetic intervention. Now however two great prophets, Isaias and Micheas, were sent to her aid. By their ministry and the piety of Ezechias religious and political disaster was temporarily averted.

Last Years of Judah (721-587)—Ezechias had inaugurated his reign by a great religious reform. He purified the temple, abolished all religious abuses, including the cult of Yahweh in the high places tolerated by his predecessors, and invited Ephraim and Manasses to a solemn celebration of the Pasch at Jerusalem. He also warred successfully against the Philistines and strengthened his capital by repairing the Mello and constructing an underground aqueduct by which the waters of Jerusalem's only spring, Gihon, were brought into the city. Other phases of his activity were the collection of the Proverbs of Solomon and the development of the musical accompaniment in the temple ritual. Judah as a vassal of Assyria was burdened with an annual tribute. The emergence of Egypt from a period of decadence revived hopes of independence in Ezechias. The embassy of the Babylonian king Merodach-Baladan in 713 to congratulate him on his recovery from a serious illness coincides remarkably with the revolt against Assyria then being plotted by Philistia, Moab and Edom. Ezechias was induced to take part in the rebellion but was saved from punishment by a timely submission when Philistia, the ringleader, was devastated by Sargon in 711. Judah played a leading part in the revolt of Phoenicia, Philistia, Judah, Ammon and Edom in 702 and suffered proportionately when Sennacherib invaded Palestine in 701. Forty-five cities were captured, some of which were transferred from Judah to Assyrian partisans in Philistia. Of their inhabitants 200,150 (probably a scribal error for 20,150) were deported. Jerusalem was closely invested. The retreat of his Egyptian allies left Ezechias without hope of human aid. He paid the heavy tribute demanded but refused to surrender his capital. The Assyrian chronicler, who does not record reverses, gives no explanation of the surprising retreat of Sennacherib at this juncture. From the Bible we learn of Yahweh's intervention and the destruction of the Assyrian host.

The pious Ezechias was succeeded by the impious Manasses in whose reign all the abominations of Assyrian cult flourished in Judah. This was to some extent a consequence of subjection to the Assyrians who imposed the worship of their gods on subject states. Manasses appears twice in the tribute lists of Asarhaddon. Towards the end of his long reign he participated in a wide-spread revolt organized by the king of Babylon in 652. He was defeated and brought in chains to Nineveh where he repented his abandonment of Yahweh. Assurbanipal, the only Assyrian monarch who boasts of clemency to vanquished foes, pardoned and released him and restored him to his kingdom. There is no Assyrian record of this event as we have no information on the last years of Assurbanipal's reign, but the rebel Egyptian prince, Nechao, was similarly pardoned and reinstated by the same monarch at an earlier period. The disintegration of the Assyrian empire had now begun. The Pharaoh, Psammetichus I (663-610), after proclaiming his independence in 655 had invaded Palestine and besieged Ashdod. Manasses, fearing an Egyptian attack, organized his army and strengthened the defences of his capital. His son, Amon, restored Assyrian cult but was slain by his servants after a short reign. The pious king Josias, only eight years old when he succeeded his father, abolished all religious abuses and restored the pure worship of Yahweh in Judah and Israel in the twelfth year of his reign. Six years later when the temple was being repaired the book of the law was discovered and read aloud to 66e the people. The discovery was followed by a renewal of the covenant with Yahweh and a very solemn celebration of the Pasch. After the fall of Nineveh in 612 the Assyrians under Assurballit continued the struggle at Harran. A large Egyptian army marched to their aid in 609. Josias opposed its passage at Megiddo but was defeated and slain. The prevalence of Yahweh in the personal names of the recently discovered Lachish Letters attests the reality of his religious reforms.

d Josias was succeeded by a younger son, Sellum (Shallum), who took the name Joachaz and pursued his father's policy. He reigned only three months, being deposed and taken prisoner to Egypt by Necho. Excluded from Mesopotamia by the Babylonians the Pharaoh had encamped at Riblah on the Orontes where he regulated the affairs and received the tribute of the western subject states. He made the eldest son of Josias, Eliakim, previously rejected by the people owing to his Egyptian sympathies, king of Judah and changed his name to Joakim. In the third year of Joakim (the fourth according to Hebrew reckoning, Sept. 606-605) the young Babylonian prince, Nabuchodonosor, defeated the Assyrians and their allies, at Carchemish on the Euphrates and pursued the Egyptians to the borders of Egypt whence he was recalled by the death of his father, Nabopolassar. The capture of Jerusalem in this expedition was the occasion of the first deportation in which Daniel and his three companions were included. A second deportation in 597, after Joachin, who reigned only three months, had succeeded his father, Joakim, was the punishment of a revolt instigated by the Pharaoh Necho. The king and his household, the nobles and the treasures of the temple were taken to Babylon, where records of the provisions supplied to Joachin and his fellow captives were recently discovered in the storerooms of the royal palace. Matthanias, son of Josias, now became king and assumed the name of Sedecias. This weak monarch was induced by the Egyptian party to reject the inspired counsels of Jeremiah and revolt against Nabuchodonosor, who captured Jerusalem after a two years' siege in June 587 and deported its inhabitants. Thus did Judah cease to exist through the impiety and folly of her kings and their refusal to hearken to the prophets sent to their aid.

• The Exile Period—The exiles from the Northern Kingdom have left no trace in history except in the case of a single family whose fortunes are recorded in the book of Tobias. Their attachment to the worship of Yahweh, weakened by idolatry, scarcely survived the long period of nearly two centuries between the fall of Samaria and the Restoration. Much more favourable was the situation of the exiles of Judah. Their expatriation lasted only half a century (587-537), but covers approximately seventy years when reckoned from the first deportation in 605. Their worship of Yahweh was purer and had deeper roots. It was revived temporarily at least by the reforms of Ezechias and Josias. The preaching of the great prophets Isaia, Micheas and Jeremiah might be unheeded during their lifetime but would be remembered later in the days of oppression and repentance. Another great prophet, Ezechiel, accompanied them into exile to keep alive their hope of restoration. Even the land of Judah seemed to await expectantly the return of its former inhabitants. Unlike Israel it had received no foreign colonists and had only to suffer the encroachments of the neighbouring nations, especially the Edomites.

f The Jews deported to southern Babylonia belonged chiefly to the upper classes of the urban population. Shepherds and agriculturists were left undisturbed since from them no political danger was feared. The exiles had much to suffer in the early days of their captivity, being employed as slaves in forced labours such as building cities, repairing canals and tilling the soil. Many of them lived together in settlements of which several are named in the Bible, but Tell Abib on the Kabaru canal (very probably the modern Shatt en-Nil) in the neighbourhood of the ancient Nippur was particularly important. The excavators of Nippur unearthed 700 contract tablets recording the extensive banking operations of the sons and grandsons of a certain Murashu in the second half of the 5th cent. B.C. Many names of Jews appear in these tablets, some distinctively Jewish, containing the divine name Yahweh, others Babylonian like the biblical Zorobabel and Mardochai. These Jews included possessors of land and house property and holders of important official posts. We have thus a confirmation of the scriptural attestation of Jewish prosperity in Babylonia, and an explanation of the fact that many rich Jews did not return with the exiles but showed at the same time their religious sympathy by large contributions for the settlement of their brethren and the reconstruction of the temple.

The sufferings of the exiles at the hands of their oppressors, recognized as the just punishment of their infidelity, produced a religious revival as in the days of the Judges. They surrendered themselves to the guidance of Ezechiel who reminded them that they would not be held responsible for the sins of their fathers and would be pardoned for their own if they truly repented. His idealistic picture of the future state, guarded by laws more rigid than the Torah, manifests the legalistic trend of the reform. The order of scribes, devoted to the study of the law, now first appears. The legal observances, especially circumcision and the sabbath, were strictly enforced. Thus did the exiles prepare themselves for the day when Persian deliverers would replace Babylonian oppressors.

The Restoration—The origin of the Persians, their rise to power and the character of their rule are discussed in § 122d-h. Cyrus the Great, the founder of their empire, was the instrument of Yahweh in the execution of his merciful designs for his chosen people. In conformity with his conciliatory policy and respect for the religion of his subjects, he authorized the Jewish exiles to return to Judah and rebuild their temple and restored to them the sacred vessels plundered by the Babylonians. The rescripts of the Persian monarchs, Cyrus, Darius I, Artaxerxes I and Artaxerxes II, in favour of the Jews are recorded in Aramaic, the international language of the period, in the books of Esdras-Nehemias. To these we must now add a rescript of Darius II to the Jews of Elephantine in 419, which prescribed and regulated the celebration of the feast of Azymes. This recently discovered document shows that the Persian monarchs interested themselves in the religious observances of their subjects and thus refutes the objection so frequently made to the authenticity of the biblical rescripts. The Persians may have been predisposed in favour of the Jews by the resemblance between the Jewish worship of Yahweh and their own spiritual and not idolatrous cult of Ahuramazda, the god of heaven. Darius I declares himself in the inscription of Behistun a sincere worshipper of Ahuramazda. Cambyces, his predecessor, spared the Jewish temple of Yahweh when he demolished all the Egyptian sanctuaries at Elephantine. There is no direct evidence however that Cyrus and Cambyces worshipped Ahuramazda.

The returning exiles left Babylonia in the spring of 537. b Their caravan consisted of 42,360 Jews, 7,337 slaves and a considerable number of horses, mules, camels and asses. The various clans and families on their arrival sought their ancient homes in the lots of Judah and Benjamin. They were led by Zorobabel, also called Sheshbazzar, who as pehah represented the Persian monarch, and Joshua (Vg Jesus) the high-priest, grandson of the high-priest, Seraia, who had been slain at Riblah by Nabuchodonosor. They were fully occupied during the six months which followed their return in re-establishing themselves in their ancient homes. Ruined houses were laboriously rebuilt and inhabited ones were purchased from their occupants. Many had no doubt to be satisfied with tents 67b and temporary shelters. In the seventh month they began the rebuilding of the temple with the erection of an altar on which sacrifices could be offered. Building materials, including cedars from Lebanon, were then collected and the foundations of the temple were laid. The fixed determination of the returned exiles to preserve the purity of their religion and their race was the chief cause of the difficulties which now almost overwhelmed them. Their exclusivism aroused the opposition and hostility of their neighbours and especially of the Samaritans. The mixed races of Samaria included the local god, Yahweh, in their Pantheon and probably regarded him as their principal deity. They offered their aid in the rebuilding of the temple and sought admission into the new community of Yahweh worshippers. The rejection of this offer made the Samaritans the bitterest enemies of the returned exiles. They sought by every means and especially by intrigues with the Persian officials to block all attempts at civil and religious restoration. As a result of this opposition and also through lack of resources and workers the exiles abandoned the rebuilding of the temple. The workers had to devote their immediate efforts to agriculture in order to provide the means of subsistence for themselves and their families. They then occupied themselves for fifteen years in building houses and improving their material conditions. Their religious enthusiasm had died away, but Yahweh, at length, raised up two prophets to revive it.

d In the second year of Darius (29 August 520) the prophet Aggeus reproached the people and their leaders with their lack of zeal for the house of God, and contrasted the ruins of the temple with the fine mansions of many citizens of Jerusalem. In a subsequent address he met the difficulty arising from lack of resources by declaring that the second temple would be rendered more glorious than the first by the presence of the Messias and by the rich gifts which would adorn it. The construction, of which the foundations had already been at least partially laid, was therefore resumed on the 21 September, and the builders were encouraged not only by Aggeus but by several addresses of another prophet Zacharias. The work was suspended for a brief period by Tattenai, the satrap of Abar-Nahara, the region beyond the Euphrates, who, instigated no doubt by the Samaritans, sent inspectors to Jerusalem. On being informed by the Jews of the authorization given by Cyrus the satrap referred the matter to Darius, who after inspecting the records not only authorized the Jews to rebuild their temple but ordered aid to be given them from the revenues of the satrapy and threatened with the direst penalties all who dared to oppose their project. The work of reconstruction was completed in March 515 and the pasch was celebrated, for the first time after the return, in the following month.

e Jerusalem was still an open city exposed to the attacks of hostile neighbours. Accusations made to the Persian monarchs, Xerxes and Artaxerxes I, against the Jews, imply in the first case and explicitly declare in the second that the walls of Jerusalem were being rebuilt. The fortification of the capital was interpreted as a preparation for revolt. We have no indication that Xerxes heeded the accusation. Artaxerxes however stopped the work and demolished the walls already erected. Nehemias at the Persian court in Susa received news of this calamity from Jews who arrived there in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I (446-445). He was an able and zealous Jewish layman, born in exile, who held the important office of cup-bearer to the Persian monarch, Artaxerxes I. His affliction on hearing of the demolition of the walls of Jerusalem was increased by tidings, brought by his brother Hanani, of various social and religious abuses rampant in the holy city and vainly denounced a little earlier by Malachi, the last of the prophets. Using his influence at court for the good of his people he obtained from the Persian monarch permission to fortify the Jewish capital, temporary leave of absence from court, and the office of pehah to superintend the constructions and effect the necessary reforms. The exclusivism of the Jews had yielded to the pressure of their neighbours and Geshem the Arabian, Sanballat the Horonite (from Horonaim), who was pehah of Samaria, and Tobias the Ammonite had free entry and influential partisans in the holy city. Nehemias therefore, to forestall opposition, concealed his project until he had examined by night the state of the walls three days after his arrival in the summer of 445 (less probably 444). He then revealed his mission and his plans to the people. The builders were divided into parties of which each was charged with the immediate construction of a determined section of the wall. As the materials used in the previous attempt were still available and the wall then erected had not been entirely demolished, the work was completed, despite armed opposition, in the comparatively short space of fifty-two days. The city, already sparsely populated, was considerably enlarged on the north side and fresh dwellers from the neighbouring towns and country had to be introduced and provided for. This task and the still more difficult work of reform occupied twelve years. The greatest difficulty was presented by mixed marriages especially in the sacerdotal caste. The relatively small number of women among the exiles and the Pentateuchal toleration of marriages with all foreigners except Canaanites, Deut 7:3, seemed to justify the practice. But the exclusion of Moabites and Ammonites from the community, Deut 23:3, the oracles of the prophets of the restoration, and the evil results of these alliances necessitated their abolition. The economic crisis resulting from the cupidity and rapacity of the rich and powerful was combated by Nehemias during the whole period of his rule. He succeeded in obtaining a promise from creditors to remit the debts with which many of the poor were burdened and, by renouncing the revenues of his office and relieving the needy from his private resources, gave his prosperous compatriots an outstanding example of the practice of charity. Every Jewish religious reform naturally included a renewal of the covenant with Yahweh. This took place on the 24 Tishri shortly after the completion of the walls, and was preceded by the public reading and explanation of the Torah during the earlier days of the month. The reader was the young priest and scribe, Esdras.

Some years later Nehemias again obtained leave of absence from Artaxerxes and returned to Jerusalem to resume the work of reform. On this occasion he had to enforce the observance of the Sabbath, remove from the court of the Temple the bank which Tobias the Ammonite had erected there through the complaisance of the high-priest, with whom he was allied by marriage, and insist on the ban on mixed marriages. One of the delinquents was a grandson of the high-priest Eliashib who had married a daughter of Sanballat and now fled to his father-in-law in Samaria. Other priests subsequently followed his example. To those outcasts are generally attributed the Samaritan copy of the Pentateuch and the erection of a temple of Yahweh on Mt Garizim in the year 324. The aged Esdras who led a large caravan of returning exiles from Babylonia to Palestine probably in the seventh year of Artaxerxes II (398) also dissolved many mixed marriages.

From profane sources we learn that the Jews were involved in the revolt of the western satraps against Artaxerxes III, and that some of them were in consequence deported to Hyrcania on the shores of the Caspian Sea. The repression of this revolt seems to form the background of the Judith narrative. Holofernes was a general and Bagoas a cup-bearer of Artaxerxes III.

The Greek Period—The Jews most probably submitted voluntarily to Alexander the Great and enjoyed the benevolent tolerance which marked his relations with subject peoples. In the division of his empire after the

- 68a wars of the Diadochoi Palestine fell to Egypt. The Jews had to pay tribute to the Ptolemies but lived according to their religious and national customs under the rule of their high-priests. They helped to colonize the new Egyptian capital, where they had a Jewish quarter and were granted citizenship and other special privileges. Alexandria thus became the centre of Jewish Hellenism, which progressed so rapidly that the translation of the sacred books into Greek was begun about the middle of the 3rd cent. When however Antiochus the Great completely defeated the Egyptians at Baniyas in 198 B.C. the Seleucids, who reigned at Antioch in Syria, secured possession of Palestine. The new political situation, unwelcome to the Jews, was rendered more difficult by the interference of the Ammonite Tobiards in their affairs. Our information about these merchant princes is derived from Josephus, the Zeno papyri, and the excavations made at their stronghold 'Arak el-Amir in southern Transjordan. They were undoubtedly descendants of the Ammonite Tobias, encountered by Nehemias, and pursued more successfully the same policy. Towards the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C. Joseph Tobias, in high favour with the Ptolemies, had married the daughter of the high-priest Onias II, established himself in the holy city and represented the Jews in all their dealings with Egypt. After the battle of Baniyas, Hyrcanus, son of Josephus, still supported the Egyptians from his stronghold in Transjordan. His brothers sided with the Seleucids and assumed the control of affairs in Jerusalem with the connivance of the high-priest, Simon II. Hyrcanus however intrigued with the Egyptian party in the city against his brothers and the Seleucids and found an ally in the next high-priest, Onias III, to whose care he committed a large sum of money deposited in the temple treasury. Seleucus IV was then in acute financial embarrassment owing to the crushing war indemnity imposed by the Romans after their victory at Magnesia in 190 B.C. Informed of the deposit of Hyrcanus and the other riches stored in the temple, he sent his minister Heliodorus to Jerusalem to seize the treasure for his own needs. The attempt was foiled by a supernatural intervention and soon afterwards the Tobiad brothers were expelled from Jerusalem. The city was thus controlled by the patriotic party when Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-163), a fanatical Hellenist, became king. He deposed Onias III who was subsequently assassinated at Antioch and himself appointed high-priests from his partisans, first Jason brother of Onias and then Menelaus a Benjaminite, to establish Hellenism in Judaea.
- 6 Dissatisfied with the results achieved by the Jerusalem Hellenists and regarding Jewish religion and national institutions as quite incompatible with Hellenism, Antiochus marched to Jerusalem in 167 after his campaign in Egypt had been interrupted by a Roman relo. He first plundered and profaned the temple, setting up in the Holy of Holies a statue of Olympian Jupiter, and then instituted a savage religious persecution continued after his departure by his general, Apollonius. Circumcision of infants, observance of the Sabbath, possession of the sacred books were punished with death. All were obliged under the same penalty to offer incense to the Greek gods and partake of the victims immolated to them. In this crisis, as in the days of Athalia, the country people upheld Yahwism.
- d The Maccabees, so called from Judas Maccabaeus their first great leader, were the five sons of Mathathias, member of a priestly family of Modin or Moditha, the modern Medive, about 8 m. E. of Lydda. Mathathias died after inaugurating the revolt and left it as a sacred inheritance to his sons. Their success in their heroic struggle under the leadership of Judas (165-160), Jonathan (160-143) and Simon (143-134) was due above all to their faith and the determination inspired by the justice and sacredness of their cause. The Syrians, at first, underestimated the strength of the movement and were later prevented by dynastic rivalries from employing all the forces of their empire to quell it.

Judas, after defeating three Syrian armies, obtained a truce from Lysias, regent of Antiochus Epiphanes, on conditions of mutual tolerance and liberty of cult. He then purified the temple, three years after its profanation, in December 164, fortified the temple area and the southern stronghold of Bethsur, campaigned in Idumaea, Transjordan and Galilee and besieged the Syrian garrison of the Acra, a fortress erected in Jerusalem on the southern or western hill opposite the temple. After being defeated however by Lysias, whom the Jerusalem Hellenists called to their aid in 163, he was besieged in the temple area and reduced to the last extremity when troubles at Antioch necessitating the immediate return of Lysias led to a renewal of the previous truce under the same conditions. Subsequently however Demetrius I, after defeating and slaying Lysias and the puppet king Antiochus V, sent two expeditions against Judas at the request of the Jerusalem Hellenists. The Jewish leader, victorious in the first encounter, was defeated and slain in the second owing to the desertion of his followers in 160.

Jonathan resorted to guerilla warfare until the death of the high-priest, Alcimus, and the return of the Syrian general, Bacchides, to Antioch in 159. He was strong enough to come to terms with Bacchides when he returned to Jerusalem in 157. He then made Michmas his headquarters and ignoring Jerusalem extended his rule over Judaea. The rival claimants of the throne of Syria in 153, Alexander Balas and Demetrius I, outbid each other in their offers to secure his support. He sided with Balas who confirmed his authority in Judaea and appointed him to the office of high-priest, vacant since the death of Alcimus. When Balas was slain in battle with the Egyptians, Jonathan allied himself with Demetrius II, son of Demetrius I, from whom he received additional territory in Samaria. Demetrius also promised to withdraw the Syrian garrisons from the Acra and Bethsur in return for aid in quelling a rising in Antioch, but subsequently refused to fulfil his promise. Jonathan therefore went over to his rival, Antiochus VI, son of Balas, besieged and captured Bethsur, isolated the Acra with a high wall and proceeded to restore the fortifications of Jerusalem. In the height of his success in 143 he was treacherously captured and subsequently slain by Tryphon, the general of Antiochus VI.

Simon, the last of the Maccabees, completed the fortification of Jerusalem and closely blockaded the Syrians in the Acra. He allied himself with Demetrius II when Tryphon slew his master, Antiochus, and proclaimed himself king. The concessions received from Demetrius were commemorated by the inauguration of a new era of independence, 142-141. The capture of Gezer in 141 secured communications with the seaport of Joppe. The Acra surrendered in the same year. The high-priesthood of Simon, a Syrian appointment, was confirmed by a decree of the people in 140. Like his predecessors he obtained from Rome in 139 diplomatic recognition but no military aid. He was now universally recognized as high-priest, general and ethnarch of the Jews. In 138 he supported Antiochus VII Sidetes in his campaign against Tryphon. He maintained his independence until his death in February 134 when he was treacherously slain at a banquet by his ambitious son-in-law, Ptolemy. But Simon's second son, John Hyrcanus, fortunately received warning in time to forestall his aggressors and to establish himself as head of the Hasmonaean house, and maintain its position.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

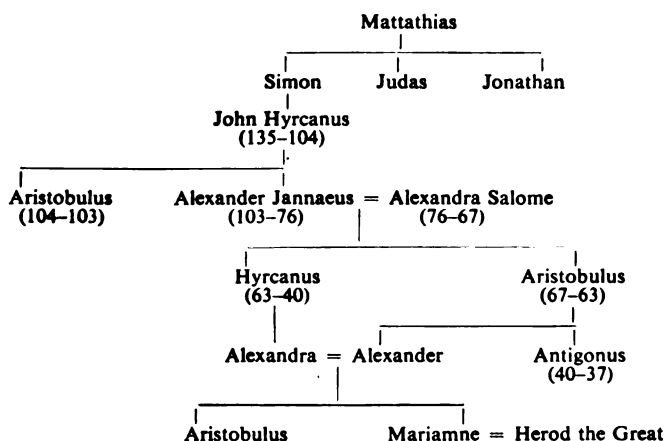

(130 B.C.—A.D. 70)

By T. CORBISHLEY, S.J.

69a

THE HASMONAEANS

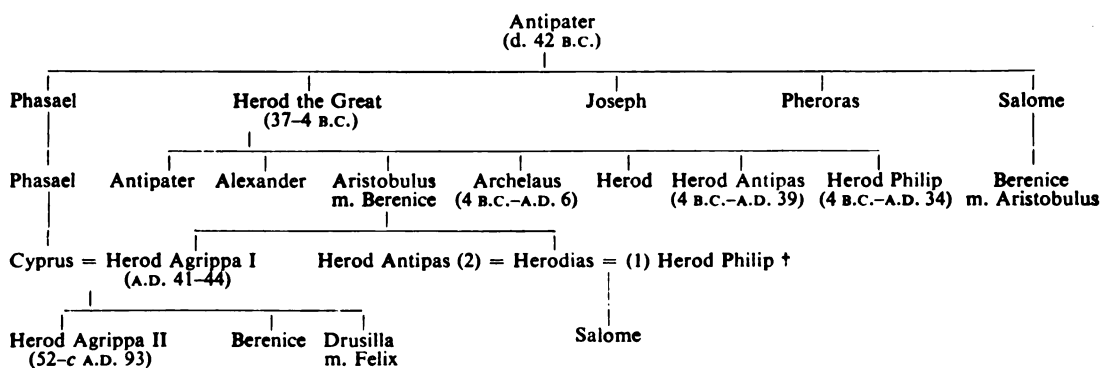

69a

b

THE HERODIANS

b

† According to Oesterley, op. cit., Additional Note K, The Family of Herod the Great (cf. also pp 389-90), Herodias first married Herod, another son of Herod the Great, and not Herod Philip, who however later married Herodias' daughter Salome.

(N.B.—These tables are not complete but contain all the names appearing in the accompanying text.)

HISTORY OF ISRAEL, 130 B.C.-A.D. 70

69c

RULERS OF PALESTINE

69c

	JUDAEA + IDUMAEA	SAMARIA	GALILEE + PERAEA	ITURAEA, etc.
B.C.
135		John Hyrcanus
104		Aristobulus I
103		Alexander Jannaeus
76		Alexandra Salome
67		Hyrcanus
67		Aristobulus II
63		Hyrcanus
40		Antigonus
37		Herod the Great
4	Archelaus		Herod Antipas	Herod Philip
A.D.
6	Coponius
11	Ambivius
14	Rufus
16	Valerius Gratus
27	Pontius Pilate
34				(To Syria)
37	Marcellus			Herod Agrippa I
	Marullus
39		Herod Agrippa I
41	Herod Agrippa I
44		Fadus
46		Tib. Julius Alexander
48		Cumanus
52		Felix		Herod Agrippa II
59		Festus
62		Albinus
64		Gessius Florus
66		Vespasian
69		Titus
70		Fall of Jerusalem

70a Bibliography—Ancient Authorities: Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, 13, 8–20, 11; Wars of the Jews, 1, 2–7, 11; Life. Tacitus, Histories, 5, 9–13; Annals, 2, 85; 12, 54. A full biography of modern authorities is to be found in Schürer (Eng. trans.) A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus-Christ (1880, etc.), brought up-to-date in CAH, vol 9, ch 9: vol 10, ch 11, ch 25. The following may be mentioned: M.-J. Lagrange, Le judaïsme avant Jésus-Christ, 1931; J. Pickl, Messias-könig Jesus (Eng. trans.: The Messiah, 1946); *A. H. M. Jones, The Herods of Judaea (1938); *W. Otto, Herodes in PW; T. Corbishley, The Chronology of the Reign of Herod the Great, JTS, vol 36; *W. O. E. Oesterley, A History of Israel, vol II, 1932.

The political changes that occurred in Palestine during this period are complicated, but the following main lines of treatment suggest themselves.

I	The Hasmonaeen dynasty	130–40 B.C.
II	Herod the Great	40–4 B.C.
III	Judaea under Archelaus and the Romans	4 B.C.–41 A.D.
IV	Galilee under Herod Antipas	4 B.C.–39 A.D.
V	Herod Agrippa I	37–44 A.D.
VI	Palestine under the Romans	44–66 A.D.
VII	The Rebellion	66–70 A.D.
VIII	The Jews of the Diaspora

b I The Hasmonaeans: 130–40 B.C.—At the end of the story of the Maccabees we are left with the impression that the great national uprising associated with the name of Judas Maccabaeus and the Hasmonaeen family (deriving its title from its founder Hashmon) had spent its force. John Hyrcanus had been compelled to pay tribute once more to Antiochus VII of Syria, and this would imply the end of the hard-won independence of the Jews. But with the death of Antiochus in 129, his kingdom began to break up. Ptolemy VII of Egypt fomented civil war in Syria and a succession of claimants fighting for the remnants of power in Antioch reduced the once great kingdom of the Seleucids to a condition of pathetic impotence. Small principalities were established in independence of the central authority and the Jews returned to complete autonomy. The bronze coinage of John Hyrcanus reappears, bearing a Hebrew legend: 'John the High-Priest and the Jewish Commonwealth', though the title of king does not yet occur. Not content with reasserting the independence of Judaea itself, John pushed forward the frontiers to the east, north and south. Beyond the Dead Sea, Madaba was annexed, whilst the power of Samaria was gradually worn down. The rival temple on Mt Gerizim was destroyed and later (108) the Greek city of Samaria was entirely obliterated, pits being dug so that water might undermine the foundations. The acquisition of Scythopolis (Beth-Shan), commanding the passage of the Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, paved the way for the annexation of Galilee itself. An event which was to be of unexpected significance was the conquest of Idumaea to the south. The inhabitants of the area were forcibly Judaized, being compelled to undergo circumcision, and it was from this half-Jewish, half-Gentile nation that the Herodian family sprang.

John Hyrcanus died in 104, being succeeded by his son Judah (or Aristobulus), under whom the annexation and Judaization of Galilee were completed. After a brief reign, he was succeeded by his brother Alexander Jannaeus (103–76), who assumed the title of King and extended the frontiers of Israel, until it became practically co-terminous with the old kingdom of David. Campaigning beyond the Jordan, where he annexed Gadara and Amathus, he then turned south-west and after a year's siege reduced Gaza on the Hellenized Philistine coast (96). But a later expedition beyond Gadara into Gaulanitis brought him into conflict with the Nabataean Arabs, a powerful tribe which had also wrested its independence from Syria. He suffered a d At his death, the throne was occupied by his widow Salome (76-67). Her first step was to secure her position at home by allying herself with the growing power of the Pharisees. This group, apparently the successors of those Chasidim who had proved such valuable fighters under Mattathias, 1 Mac 2:42, had been at loggerheads with both John Hyrcanus and Alexander Jannaeus. They represented the stricter and more nationalistic element and were growing in importance; over against them were the Hellenizing Sadducees, sceptical and worldly, including most of the priestly aristocracy. Salome, being a woman, could not hold the office of high-priest, so whilst she retained the royal title, her son Hyrcanus succeeded to the high-priesthood which had been held by his father. The Pharisees supported him against his brother Aristobulus, who was backed by the Sadducees. (In later times when the Pharisees were persecuted by Herod, the reign of Salome became for them a legendary golden age.) On her death, the quarrel between the brothers broke out into open strife and Aristobulus wrested kingship and high-priesthood from Hyrcanus.

70e severe reverse and almost lost his throne and life in a fierce popular revolt. But he succeeded in restoring his position and though he suffered further defeat at the hands of Aretas III, he made more conquests in Transjordan.

e It is at this time that the power which was to grow into the Herodian monarchy first appears. An Idumaeon, Antipater by name, son of one of the lieutenants of Jannaeus, espoused the cause of Hyrcanus, induced the Nabataeans to assist him and before long Aristobulus was besieged on the Temple site. But, more important still, Rome's power was now beginning to dominate the Levant. After the decline of Syria, the chief power in Asia Minor devolved upon Mithridates, king of Pontus. He soon tried conclusions with Rome and more than held his own until Pompey was sent by the Senate to end the threat to their interests in the Eastern Mediterranean. Having defeated Mithridates, Pompey resolved to settle the whole eastern question by a definitive arrangement. In addition to other annexations, the important province of Syria, with its capital at Antioch and stretching from the Mediterranean coast to the upper waters of the Euphrates, was added to the empire. This province, one of the most important of Rome's possessions, was destined to play a predominant part in the defence of the eastern frontier. In it were normally stationed three legions, which, in addition to warding off the menace of Parthia, could be employed to overawe the turbulent peoples to north and south, including the ever-troublesome Jews. It was necessary, at the same time, to make arrangements for the government of Palestine and in 63 Pompey was in Jerusalem. A couple of years earlier his lieutenants had made a temporary settlement by persuading the Nabataeans to withdraw their support from Hyrcanus and handing over the power in Palestine to Aristobulus. This decision was reversed by Pompey, who made Hyrcanus once more ruler and high-priest. Aristobulus himself saw the futility of resistance, but some of his followers held out, and could only be persuaded to yield by the arrival of Pompey in person at the head of an army. We are told that after reducing the citadel, Pompey made his way into the Holy of Holies itself, thereby shocking Jewish sentiment. Unlike other conquerors, however, he did not lay hands on the treasures of the Sanctuary. When Pompey returned to Rome to celebrate his triumph, Aristobulus was taken along with him.

f Though the Jews nominally retained their independence, henceforward they would always have to reckon with Rome. Their territory was reduced, the Greek cities and the seaboard being lost. Over Judaea, Idumaea, Galilee and Peraea reigned Hyrcanus, with the title of tetrarch, though he was also high-priest. He was in immediate subordination to the Roman governor of Syria and through him to the central authority in Rome. By way of controlling still more effectively this turbulent folk, Gabinius, governor of Syria (57-54) split up the Jewish territory for administrative purposes into five districts, each with its local συνέδριον, sitting at Jerusalem, Gaza, Amathus, Jericho and Sepphoris. The step was doubtless taken with a view to weakening the central government at Jerusalem, and preventing its becoming a threat to Syria as it had once been, but there were probably certain advantages to the Jews themselves in this devolution. At any rate we find traces of the survival of the local συνέδρια elsewhere than at Jerusalem, though of course in the NT it is only the Sanhedrin there that appears.

g Theoretically then the destinies of the Jews at this time were in the hands of Hyrcanus, high-priest and tetrarch. But the real power was wielded by Antipater, who was to play a role analogous to that of the Mayors of the Palace under the Merovingians. From now until the death of Herod the Great, the history of foreign affairs in Palestine is largely the story of the diplomatic relations between the Idumaeon family and the successive claimants for supremacy at Rome. Pompey and Caesar, the 'liberators' and the triumvirs, Octavian and Mark Antony struggled in turn for the lordship of the world, and all the cunning of Antipater and Herod was needed to enable them to maintain their position.

h In 54 B.C. Jerusalem received another visit from a Roman army. Crassus, on his way to the Parthian war in which he was doomed to meet disaster and death, robbed the Temple of something like 10,000 talents. But this was but an isolated incident. In 49 war broke out between Pompey, defending the established government, and Julius Caesar, and in the circumstances there was only one possible choice for Antipater to make. Not only was Pompey the representative of lawful authority, but the eastern provinces were largely under his control, whilst Hyrcanus and Antipater owed their present positions to him. Naturally Caesar liberated Aristobulus to embarrass Hyrcanus, but fortunately for the latter his brother met his death at the hands of Pompeian troops whilst on his way to reclaim his kingdom. Pompey's death in Egypt created what might have been a very awkward situation for Antipater, but he won the favour of the dictator by assisting him with troops when fighting for his life at Alexandria (47). In the relieving force which marched to Caesar's rescue was a contingent of Jewish soldiers under the command of Antipater himself. By this means, he obtained from Caesar confirmation of Hyrcanus in his position and also the establishment of himself as administrator of Judaea, despite the protests and appeals of Antigonus, son of Aristobulus. Moreover, Joppa was restored to Judaea. On Caesar's assassination, Antipater characteristically transferred his allegiance to the party of Brutus and Cassius, who controlled the eastern provinces of the empire, but their defeat at Philippi raised no problems for him. He had already died of poison administered by a private enemy that same year (42).

71a II Herod the Great (I) His Rise—When Antipater died, his two eldest sons, Phasaël and Herod, the latter a young man just over 30, were already prominent in public affairs. Phasaël had acted as his father's lieutenant in Idumaea, whilst Herod had held a military command in Galilee. Here he had come into contact with one of those outbursts of violence characteristic of the period. Whether they were genuine nationalistic uprisings, on the model of the Maccabean effort, or whether the 'zeal' of these men was little more than a cloak for personal aggrandisement and their activities not far removed from plain brigandage, we cannot decide. But we shall encounter a number of such incidents in the course of this review. The leader on this occasion was one Hezekiah. Herod suppressed the movement and killed the man himself, but he was summoned before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem to stand his trial on a charge of killing a Jew unlawfully. The support of the Roman governor and his own high standing in the eyes of Hyrcanus resulted in his b Mark Antony came to Palestine in 41 and, despite attempts on the part of the Jews to set him against the sons of Antipater, the Roman, appreciating Herod's capacity to control the Jews, showed favour to him and his brother and both were appointed tetrarchs. Antony's shrewdness was soon borne out by events. In 40 B.C., the Parthians, Rome's traditional enemy in that region, invaded Syria and the Jewish aristocracy saw in them a means to rid themselves of the Idumaeans intruders. Jerusalem received a Parthian army, Phasaël was killed, Herod fled. The high-priest, Hyrcanus, was mutilated and deported, and his brother's son, Mattathiah Antigonus, installed in his place, resuming the title of king. It was a repetition of the events of 67 B.C., with the Parthians playing the role assigned on that occasion to the Nabataeans.

71a acquittal (47 B.C.), but the incident rankled and he later exacted vengeance on those who had thus humiliated him.

c This Parthian invasion of Syria and Palestine meant, of course, that the cause of Herod was identified with the interests of Rome. He was formally recognized by the Triumvirs and the Senate as king of the Jews. The expulsion of the Parthians from Palestine, essential to the security of the Empire, was the necessary preliminary to Herod's assumption of power. Even after the Parthians had retreated, Rome co-operated with Herod in the military events leading up to the siege of Jerusalem, where Antigonus was resisting desperately. In 37 B.C., Herod entered into full possession of his kingdom, including Samaria once more. The last Hasmonaeon king perished under a Roman axe.

d (ii) Herod as King—Characteristically, Herod began his reign with a massacre. Of the members of the Sanhedrin who had brought him to trial ten years before, 45 were put to death, and the full quota of 71 was made up of Herod's own nominees. This broke the power of the aristocratic opposition, but at the same time left a rankling desire for vengeance. The situation was further complicated by domestic intrigue. Herod had married Mariamne, a member of the Hasmonaeon family, whose mother Alexandra wanted her son Aristobulus to be made high-priest. For this purpose she intrigued with Cleopatra of Egypt, who was coveting some of Herod's territory. To placate her, Herod yielded. Soon afterwards, however, he solved the problem in his own way by having Aristobulus drowned. He escaped the effects of the anger of Cleopatra and therefore of Antony's displeasure because the latter could not afford an unstable Judaea at his back at a time when the final break with Octavian was looming ahead (c. 34 B.C.). Henceforth Herod kept the appointment to the high-priesthood in his own hands, nominating only those who supported his policies. The break with the Hasmonaeon family was completed by the execution of Hyrcanus, the old high-priest (30) and the murders of Mariamne (29) and her mother Alexandra (28 B.C.).

e Into all the details of the political and domestic intrigues that made up the background of Herod's reign, it is impossible for us to enter. It will suffice to say that it was only by the most ruthless measures and the employment of numbers of spies and informers that he could hope to maintain his throne. Parallel to this was his extensive work of fortification, beginning with the restoration of the walls of the capital and the fortress Hyrcania. Throughout his reign, we hear of cities founded or rebuilt and fortified, and the disposition of troops. Herod also established a string of colonies and fortified posts to protect his frontiers—we may mention Machaerus, the scene of John the Baptist's death—and apparently reorganized the local administration of the country. Of his army, we know that it was composed largely of mercenaries—Idumaeans, Thracians, Germans and Greeks (he received from Octavian Cleopatra's Celtic bodyguard)—though it included a number of Jews of the Diaspora, always more loyal to Herod than the Palestinians.

Many of Herod's measures were clearly directed to the repression of brigandage and other disturbances, 71e and their success is proved by the almost complete absence of open rebellion during the reign. At the same time it should be said that his rule was manifestly efficient and prosperous, as is shown by the fact that he was able to make considerable reductions in taxation, even though his gifts were ostentatiously lavish.

Nor should it be thought that all his building was of a military nature. Outstanding was his work on the Temple. Pagan and sceptical as he was, he was yet shrewd enough to appreciate his people's passionate concern for the worship of God, and vainglorious enough to desire the renown attaching to such a work. Side by side with an appreciation of his subjects' traditional religion went all those Hellenizing tendencies and practices by which he thought to assimilate himself to his fellow-princes and perhaps curry favour with Rome. The building of pagan temples and theatres, the establishment of games, in a word all those activities which had characterized the rule of Antiochus Epiphanes and led to the Maccabaeon revolt, were repeated by Herod. But his knowledge of the Hebrew soul taught him where to halt.

The chief external events of the reign are naturally concerned with his relations with Rome. The enmity of Cleopatra, due partly to her covetousness and partly to the intrigues of his household, turned out in the end to Herod's advantage. In the year before the battle of Actium, Herod had been on the point of associating himself with Antony's preparations against Octavian, when Cleopatra had him dispatched on a mission against the Arabs. This proved a more difficult task than he had expected and he did not complete his mission until after Antony had sailed to his disastrous defeat (31 B.C.). When therefore Octavian met Herod there was no reason why he should not confirm him in full possession of his dominion. In fact the Jewish king received from his Roman overlord certain territories (e.g. Jericho, Gaza, Azotus) which had been taken away from the Jewish kingdom either by Pompey or by Cleopatra. Later in the reign Augustus presented to Herod the districts of Trachonitis, Batanæa and Auranitis, and on the death of the tetrarch Zenodorus two years later (20 B.C.) the remainder of his former dominions, Ulatha and Paneas. This meant that the area of the kingdom ruled over by Herod was greater than it had ever been in the history of Israel, and though his brother Pheroras was nominated tetrarch of Peraea, Herod was his overlord.

According to Josephus, the relation between Augustus and Herod was that of intimate friends. This seems hardly credible, but there is no doubt that Augustus took the greatest interest in the affairs of Palestine, which provides an excellent example of a 'client-kingdom'. Herod was nominally free, but all his policy was subordinate to the decision of the emperor. On one occasion we are told that, suspecting too great independence of action on the part of the Jewish king, the emperor wrote a sharp rebuke, saying that, whereas he had formerly treated Herod as a friend, henceforth he would deal with him as a subject. And in the closing years of the reign we are told of an occasion when the whole nation took an oath of loyalty to the emperor (the Pharisees manifesting their strong nationalistic feeling by refusing to take the oath).

Some account must be given of the family quarrels which embittered the closing years of the king's life. The complete story is too involved owing to the complexity of interests causing the friction. Nor does the manifest bias of Josephus's sources help us to a clear picture. But in brief outline the facts seem to have been as follows. Alexander and Aristobulus, Herod's sons by Mariamne, stood high in their father's favour, a fact which aroused the jealousy of Antipater, a son by an earlier marriage, who hoped to succeed to the throne and now feared that he might be displaced. He alleged that he had discovered a plot of his two half-brothers to kill their father and usurp the throne. Whatever be the truth of the story, Herod was con-

711 vinced by the evidence adduced and had his sons put to death, only to discover that the informer was not less guilty than they. Antipater therefore met with the same fate, very shortly before Herod himself died in agony. (On hearing the story of these executions Augustus is said to have remarked: 'I'd rather be a sow of Herod's than his son'.)

There were other instances of intrigue, fostered by the women of the court—Herod was married at least ten times—and involving the opposition of the Pharisees, which still further clouded the mind of the king, and in the end he was almost insane with suspicion and fear. He had waded to the throne through blood, he had maintained his position by assassination or judicial murder, and it is against such a background of ruthless and treacherous behaviour that we must read the story of the visit of the Magi and the massacre of the Innocents.

72a III Judaea under Archelaus and the Romans—On the death of Herod (4 B.C.) the kingdom was partitioned between three of his sons—Archelaus (who received Judaea, Samaria and Idumaea), Antipas (who held Galilee and Peraea) and Philip (to whom went the territory north-west of Galilee—Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Ituraea, etc.). The settlement was not made without friction, as there had been some inconsistency in Herod's own arrangements. The Roman emperor, after appeals to him from the interested parties, decided on the division described above, conferring the title of tetrarch on the three rulers. This division of territory remained substantially unaltered until after the Crucifixion, the only alteration in status being that after ten years of rule, Archelaus was dispossessed and his tetrarchy incorporated into the full imperial system. In fact the chief importance of the reign of Archelaus is that it paved the way for this step. Even whilst the negotiations at Rome, following on the death of Herod, were still proceeding, various claimants to the title of 'king' made their appearance in Palestine. One of these was Judas or Theudas, son of that Hezekiah who had been put to death by Herod in 47 B.C. (perhaps to be identified with the Theudas of Ac 5:36). The Roman governor of Syria, Quintilius Varus, dispatched two legions to repress these movements, and an uneasy peace prevailed for a time in Judaea. But the efficiency and strength of Herod had not been inherited by Archelaus who became increasingly unpopular, and in A.D. 6 two separate embassies, one Jewish and one Samaritan, begged Augustus to abolish the monarchy. He decided that the only practicable solution was to make Archelaus's tetrarchy a Roman province and he accordingly instructed the governor of Syria, P. Sulpicius Quirinius (the 'Cyrinus' of Lk 2:2) to make the necessary arrangements. A census of the district was initiated (cf. Ac 5:37) and a procurator, Coponius, was appointed. Another outburst of nationalistic feeling occurred, led by Judas the Galilean, who according to Josephus now founded the party of the 'Zealots'. If this last statement is true, he did little more than give formal character to a movement long in existence. Judas himself perished and his followers were disbanded, but he left sons who were to give trouble later. Archelaus retired into honourable exile in Southern Gaul.

6 Judaea a Roman Province—A succession of procurators, nominated by the emperor for varying periods of office, now ruled Judaea, with their headquarters at Caesarea on the coast. Most of them have left little beyond their names on the page of history. The great exception is Pontius Pilate, the most famous governor in the history of the world. His governorship began in A.D. 27 and ended ten years later. During that period, apart from his share in the events culminating in the Crucifixion, he is known for his arrogance or, it may be, mere lack of tact in his handling of the Jews. Of the riots which his conduct occasioned, the most interesting for us is that which occurred when Pilate alienated some of the Temple funds to help to build an aqueduct to improve the Jerusalem water supply. It is probable that this incident is referred to in Lk 13:1, 2; and it is not at all unlikely that Barabbas took part in the movement. The final incident in Pilate's career was an unnecessarily brutal suppression of a Samaritan rising, leading to his removal from office by the governor of Syria, Vitellius. 72c

IV Galilee under Herod Antipas—As we have seen, on Herod's death, a separate tetrarchy was constituted of Galilee and Peraea, ruled by Antipas. He took the name of Herod, as a sort of dynastic title and it is he who figures in various passages of the narrative of the Public Life. Apart from the building activities recorded of him by Josephus, we know little of the external events of his reign. It is of some interest to note that an unsuccessful expedition which he undertook against the king of Arabia Petraea is attributed by Josephus directly to his conduct in divorcing his wife, daughter of the Arabian king, in order to take his brother's wife, Herodias. There had been some previous friction about a disputed boundary, but the king made the treatment of his daughter a casus belli and fought a successful engagement against the troops of the ruler of Galilee. The people believed, we are told, that Herod's lack of success was due to his murder of John the Baptist. Like Archelaus in Judaea, Antipas was eventually deposed by Rome (at the instigation of his nephew, Herod Agrippa I, as we shall see later), and in the year A.D. 39 retired into exile in Gaul. His tetrarchy was for a time ruled by Agrippa. 73a

Meanwhile, a word must be said of the remainder of Herod the Great's kingdom, the region of Gaulanitis, etc. This passed into the hands of Philip, who also assumed the name of Herod. Like his father and his half-brother Antipas, he founded cities, notably Caesarea Philippi and Bethsaida Julias. He seems to have been an efficient and conscientious ruler and unlike most of the Herodians was universally regretted when the end came. He died in A.D. 34 and his tetrarchy was for a time attached to the province of Syria. b

V Herod Agrippa I—When Aristobulus was executed by his father, Herod the Great, he left two sons and several daughters. Of these Agrippa was to lead the most successful life and he laid the foundations of his future prosperity during the years of his sojourn at Rome. He was sent there (c. 7 B.C.) when he was still quite a small boy by his mother Salome, whose own mother Berenice was a friend of the empress Livia. The boy, who was popular and attractive, was brought up in close association with the younger members of the imperial family circle, but after the deaths of Germanicus (A.D. 18) and Drusus (A.D. 23) his prospects seemed very gloomy and he returned to Palestine. At first he received a post at Tiberias, one of the new foundations made by his uncle, Herod Antipas, but after a time he attached himself to the governor of Syria, L. Pomponius Flaccus (32-35). (He was therefore almost certainly at Tiberias during the Public Life.) Eventually (A.D. 36) he returned to Rome, where he managed to curry favour with Gaius, shortly to become Emperor. 6

When Gaius (Caligula) ascended the throne, one of his first acts was to make over to Agrippa the tetrarchy of Philip, who had died three years previously. Agrippa remained at Rome for the time being, setting sail for the East in the autumn of 38. His arrival at Alexandria, where he called on his way, began a disturbance which was to flare up into more serious riots, leading to the famous embassy to Caligula in which Philo took a leading part (cf. § 75b inf.). d

Soon after Agrippa's arrival in Palestine, he managed by intrigue to obtain the deposition of his uncle, Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee. Antipas was exiled to Lyons, his dominions being added to the tetrarchy of Agrippa (A.D. 39). When, in 41, Claudius succeeded Caligula, he practically reconstituted the old Herodian 73d kingdom, conferring on Agrippa the title of king. In other words, a fresh attempt was to be made to restore the old position of client-kingdom. But the death of Agrippa within three years put an end to this solution and once again the kingdom came under direct Roman control. Agrippa left a son of the same name, but he was too young to be trusted with power and he was given the small kingdom of Chalcis to rule. In A.D. 53 a new arrangement was made, Chalcis reverting to the province of Syria and Agrippa receiving the territory that had constituted Philip's tetrarchy, with the addition of Abilene and some outlying districts. Little of this territory was in any sense Jewish, but Agrippa's own descent and the part he plays in the story of Acts make it necessary for some mention to be made here of his kingdom. Moreover, on the accession of Nero (54) some portions of Galilee were added to his dominions.

There is little to record of the reign. Styling himself Marcus Julius Agrippa, he manifested his desire to associate himself closely with the Roman aristocracy, and it is not surprising to find him consorting with the Roman governor of Judaea. In other respects, his reign recalls some of the features of his great-grandfather's, especially in the liberality of his benefactions, particularly to the Greek city of Berytus, but he seems to have been blest with a more placid disposition. At any rate, his long reign, which lasted until his death (probably in A.D. 93) was not marked by any serious internal or domestic troubles, despite the complexity of the matrimonial arrangements of the members of his family.

74a VI Palestine under the Romans—Tacitus's well-known sentence, duravit patientia Judaeis usque ad Gessium Florum procuratorem, aptly sums up the story of Israel between the death of Herod Agrippa I and the outbreak of the rebellion (A.D. 44-66). A succession of incompetent or rapacious governors inflamed the already irritated feelings of the Jews who, as a nation, never reconciled themselves to Roman rule.

It may be true that, as Josephus argues, the final breach was the work of a minority of extremists, but it is not less certain that those who were content with their position in the Roman system were still fewer. The story of Roman-Jewish relations is one of an irreconcilable cleavage of ideals. The Jewish tradition of an autonomous theocracy could not be squared with the cosmopolitanism of a regime in which everything, including religion, must be subordinated to the interests of a universal empire. Whilst the Romans did try to make all possible allowances for the idiosyncrasies of the people they governed, the peculiarity of the Jewish ethos was something they never understood. The Maccabees had carried the nation with them in their resistance to Hellenization by Syria; we cannot doubt that the nation as a whole was behind the final attempt to win independence of Rome.

b The clash between Fadus, who took over the province on the death of Agrippa, and another Theudas, was followed by an outbreak, led by James and Simon, sons of that Judas who had raised the standard of revolt in A.D. 6. The governor of the time was an apostate Jew, Tiberius Julius Alexander—a tactless appointment though one which doubtless commended itself to the central government as providing a ruler who might be expected to understand this difficult race. The ringleaders were crucified. We hear of further troubles under his successor Cumanus, due to the insolence of the occupying troops, though one serious outbreak occurred as the result of the chronic hostility of Jew and Samaritan.

c We come now to the governorships of Felix and Festus, known to us from the closing chapters of the Acts. The former is shown by Josephus to have been brutal and treacherous in his handling of the constant risings, and though his successor seems to have displayed more tact, the situation was getting rapidly out of control. Festus died in office and before his successor arrived the Sanhedrin attempted to reassert its authority and independence by putting to death the Apostle James, bishop of Jerusalem. The high-priest was deposed for this, but no other punitive steps seem to have been taken. Albinus (62-64) appears to have been conciliatory in his treatment of the Jews, but his policy of appeasement received its inevitable reward. Mildness was mistaken for weakness.

VII The Rebellion—The anti-Roman element became ever more violent, and when Gessius Florus arrived (64) he doubtless came with orders to spare no effort to retrieve the situation. The temper of the Jews was everywhere inflamed, and it was perhaps beyond human ingenuity to avert disaster. But in A.D. 66 Gessius Florus repeated the action of Pontius Pilate in sequestrating Temple funds for administrative purposes and this provoked a riot. The governor marched in person to Jerusalem with a large force, demanded the production of the ringleaders, and when he received no more than an apology from the Sanhedrin, ordered his troops to clear the Upper Market. Many casualties were inflicted on the people and much material damage done. The Sanhedrin seems to have been genuinely anxious to co-operate with the Romans in the preservation of order, but the conduct of the troops was too provocative. For a time Agrippa's intervention and appeals to the more responsible elements in the capital met with some success, but he could not persuade them to accept the rule of Florus and in the end he had to withdraw, baffled. The extremist Eleazar then precipitated a crisis by proposing the termination of the daily sacrifice which by custom had long been offered for the emperor. The pro-Roman party, or at least those who believed that their own interests and those of the nation would best be served by loyalty to Rome, resisted this proposal, but the majority sided with Eleazar. The sacrifice was suspended. The rebellion had begun.

The Sanhedrin appealed to Florus and to Agrippa for military support, and though Florus did not think it prudent to risk his troops, a force was sent by Agrippa. Thus the rebellion began with a skirmish between the opposing parties amongst the Jews themselves. Passions rose higher, the whole city threw itself into the movement, the Roman garrison was besieged and when it surrendered on a promise that the lives of its members would be spared, they were all treacherously killed.

The inevitable sequel was an outbreak of anti-Semitism at Caesarea, where 20,000 Jews are said to have been massacred. The Jews in turn took reprisals and soon the whole country was aflame. The legate of Syria, Cestius Gallus, hastily led an army into Judaea, but after an unsuccessful siege of Jerusalem was compelled to withdraw to Caesarea.

The details of the story are inextricably confused, partly because of the nature of the situation, partly because we have to rely on the rather disingenuous narrative of Josephus. Since he wrote his Jewish War chiefly with an eye to excusing his own conduct and that of his people, there are necessarily suppressions and evasions. Moreover, the Jews themselves were fiercely divided and much of the time were fighting amongst themselves. Nor do the details concern us here.

In the spring of 67, Nero sent out a new legate to conduct the operations—Titus Flavius Vespasianus, the future emperor. He set about reducing Galilee and the rebellious parts of Agrippa's kingdom. This occupied the whole of the campaigning season of that year and the following spring Vespasian began the task of methodically crushing the outposts of Peraea, Idumaea and Judaea, gradually closing in on the capital. But the death of Nero constitutionally terminated his commission and he waited for its renewal before laying siege to Jerusalem. Throughout the year of the Four Emperors operations were held up, and when Vespasian was himself proclaimed emperor by his troops, he left for Italy, leaving his son Titus to complete the task of suppressing the rebellion.

74g The story of the siege of Jerusalem is sufficiently well known. All that need be said here is that the Jews were already considerably weakened by their own internal dissensions. Neither fanaticism nor the fear of reprisals could resist the methodical onslaught of the Roman army. The Temple was taken in August and (apparently deliberately) given to the flames. By the end of September all resistance was at an end and the city reduced to a heap of rubble. The prophecy of the rejected Messiah was terribly fulfilled. Judaea itself remained as a unit of the Roman Empire; but the Jewish national state came to an end with the destruction of Zion.

It seems likely that (as Eusebius tells us) the Christian community established at Jerusalem had withdrawn from the capital to Pella in Peraea before the siege operations began so that it was not involved in the common disaster. The final severance of Christianity from Judaism was achieved.

75a VIII The Jews of the Diaspora—No history of Israel is complete without some mention of those communities of Jews who lived scattered throughout the civilized world beyond the frontiers of Palestine. After the Babylonian captivity, a strong Jewish element remained in Mesopotamia, and we know that in Egypt also there were such large numbers of Jews as to constitute a special administrative problem. They had presumably made their way there originally for purposes of trading, as also they had established themselves in Asia Minor and Greece, and as far as Italy and Gaul. But many also, especially in Alexandria and the West, had come under compulsion, either as prisoners of war or deported by conquerors such as Ptolemy I of Egypt. It was reckoned that, at the beginning of the empire, there were in Egypt a million Jews to eight million Egyptians. We are told by Strabo that the Jews in Alexandria had their own national head, who apparently presided in certain legal and judicial processes. They also resided in special quarters of the city, as they seem to have done in most places (e.g. Antioch and Rome).

b One or two incidents may be singled out as exemplifying the nature of the problem created for the Jews themselves no less than for their rulers. Thus at Alexandria in A.D. 38 a fierce pogrom broke out, 75b occasioned it would seem by the visit there of Agrippa I, on his way to Palestine. Jews were maltreated, their property destroyed. The situation deteriorated still further when the governor of Egypt, apparently in an attempt to curry favour with the emperor, ordered the statue of Gaius to be set up in the synagogues. In their distress and danger, the Jews appealed to Caesar. Two embassies, the Jewish one headed by the philosopher-exegete Philo, the Gentile one headed by Apion, dilettante and charlatan, appeared before Gaius. Needless to say, the emperor insisted on the carrying out of the prefect's orders, and went so far as to require the Jews at Jerusalem to set up a similar statue in the Temple. However, the intervention of Agrippa and the emperor's death relieved the situation. The incident is significant as indicating the tension existing between Jew and non-Jew in the empire, a tension liable to burst out into open rioting given the necessary occasion. At Rome itself, in A.D. 19, Tiberius expelled the Jewish community (though we are told that no less than 4,000 of them were drafted to Sardinia for police-work), ostensibly because of the trickery of four men, but we cannot doubt that the measure was taken as a means to keep the peace. Similarly we are told of constant riots in the capital, leading to a further expulsion in A.D. 49, an event having special interest for us because of the reference to it in Ac 18:2.

The surprising thing is that, so long as no popular 6 disturbance was caused, the Roman authorities as a whole seem to have treated the Jews with remarkable forbearance, granting them unusual immunities and dispensations. They were apparently exempt from military service, and their Sabbath law was respected. But with the growth and spread of Christianity, the occasions for disturbance in the empire multiplied, and there can be little doubt that this was one factor in the attitude of the government to the Christian body. How far the Jews were responsible, through Poppaea, for the turning of Nero's mind to the Christians after the fire of A.D. 64, we cannot be sure, but it is by no means an unlikely hypothesis. But this is a question beyond our present scope, as is the position of the Jews in the empire after the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70.

ARCHAEOLOGY AND THE BIBLE

By E. POWER, S.J.

76a Bibliography—This list is necessarily limited but can be completed from the bibliographical indications in the books cited and the elenchus bibliographicus of Bi. General Information: *G. A. Barton, Archaeology and the Bible, Philadelphia, 1933; *F. R. Kenyon, Archaeology and the Bible, London, 1940; *S. L. Caiger, The OT and Modern Discoveries, London, 1938; *H. Gressmann, Allorientalische Texte und Bilder, Berlin, 1926-7¹, 2 vol.; *A. Jirku, Allorientalischer Kommentar zum AT, Leipzig, 1923; *C. M. Cobern, The New Archaeological Discoveries and their Bearing on the NT, New York, 1918; *W. Ramsay, The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the NT, London, 1915; *A. Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, Tübingen, 1923; Id., The NT in the Light of Modern Research, London, 1929. Egypt and the Bible: H. J. Heyes, Bibel und Aegypten, Münster, 1904; *W. Spiegelberg, Aegyptische Randglossen zum AT, Strassburg, 1904; *A. Mallon, Les Hébreux en Egypte, Rome, 1921; *A. Yahuda, Die Sprache des Pentateuch in ihren Beziehungen zum Aegyptischen, Berlin, 1929; *T. E. Peet, A Comparative Study of the Literature of Egypt, Palestine and Mesopotamia, London, 1931; L. Speclers, Egypte, DBVS 2 (1932) 756-919; *J. A. Knudtzon, Die el-Amarna Tafeln, Leipzig, 1915; P. Dhorme, Amarna, DBVS 1 (1928) 207-25; *A. Cowley, Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth century B.C., Oxford, 1923; L. Hennequin, Elephantine DBVS 2 (1934) 962-1032; A. Vincent, La religion des judéo-araméens d'Elephantine, Paris, 1937. Mesopotamia and the Bible: *E. Schrader, Die Keilinschriften und das AT, 3. Aufl. von H. Winckler und H. Zimmern, Berlin, 1902; *A. Jeremias, Das AT im Lichte des Alten Orients, Leipzig, 1906; *H. Winckler, Keilinschriftliches Textbuch zum AT, Leipzig, 1909; A. Condamin, Babylone et la Bible, DAFC 1 (1911) 327-90; C. F. Jean, Le milieu biblique, Paris, 1923; J. Plessis, Babylone et la Bible, DBVS 1 (1928) 713-852. Ras-Shamra: Articles of R. de Langhe, ETL 16 (1939) 245-327; A. Bea, Bi 19 (1938) 435-53 and 20 (1939) 436-53; R. de Vaux, RB 46 (1937) 362-72; 526-55; *J. W. Jack, The Ras-Shamra Tablets. Their Bearing on the OT, London, 1935. Palestine Explorations: *W. F. Albright, Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible, New York, 1935; A. G. Barrois, Manuel d'Archéologie Biblique, Paris, 1939; *S. L. Caiger, Bible and Spade, An Introduction to Biblical Archaeology, London, 1936; *J. G. Duncan, Digging up Biblical History. Recent Archaeology in Palestine and its Bearing on the OT, London, 1931; L. Hennequin, Fouilles en Palestine, DBVS 3 (1936) 318-524; *R. A. S. Macalister, A Century of Excavation in Palestine, London, 1925; J. Simons, Opgravingen in Palestina, Roermond-Masseik, 1935; L. H. Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, Paris, 1907; *C. Watzinger, Denkmäler Palästinas, Leipzig, 1935. Lakish Letters: Articles of A. Vaccari, Bi 20 (1939) 180-91; R. de Vaux, RB 48 (1939) 181-206; *J. W. Jack, PEQ 70 (1938) 165-87.

b Introductory—Archaeology has long been understood as a systematic presentation of the domestic, social, political, religious, literary, and artistic institutions of some ancient people, derived largely, or even exclusively, from the literary records of the past. Recently however it has come to be more generally regarded as the science of the monuments of antiquity revealed to us by the eye of the explorer and the spade of the excavator. The importance of this comparatively new science for the scriptural student is indicated by Pope Pius XII in the following passage of his recent Encyclical on the most opportune way to promote biblical studies: 'All can easily perceive that the conditions of biblical studies and their subsidiary sciences have greatly changed within the last fifty years. For, apart from anything else, when Our Predecessor published the Encyclical Letter, Providentissimus Deus, hardly a single place in Palestine had begun to be explored by relevant excavations. Now however this kind of investigation is much more frequent and, since more precise methods and technical skill have been developed in the course of actual experience, it gives us information at once more abundant and more accurate. How much light has been derived from these explorations for the more correct and fuller understanding of the Sacred Books all experts know as well as those who devote themselves to these studies. The value of these excavations is enhanced by the discovery from time to time of written documents, which help much towards the knowledge of the languages, letters, events, customs, and forms of worship of most ancient times. And of no less importance are the discovery and investigation, so frequent in our times, of papyri which have contributed so much to the knowledge of letters and institutions, both public and private, especially of the time of our Saviour', DAS, § 16.

The purpose of the following pages is to show how much and in what different ways archaeological discoveries have contributed to the interpretation of the Bible. Excavations in Palestine provide only a small part of the immense material from which a selection must be made. The discoveries which receive the widest publicity, such as the treasures of the necropolis of Ur and of the tomb of Tut-Ankh-Amon are usually of the least importance for our purpose. Ancient documents merit particular attention since they offer the most valuable information. Very many of these have been unearthed in Mesopotamia and Egypt, but comparatively few in Syria and Palestine, chiefly because of the quality of the writing materials used in these different countries. In Mesopotamia the cuneiform characters were impressed on soft clay, which was dried and fired and could thus resist the ravages of weather and time. As an example of their abundance may be cited the discovery in 1933, at Tell el-Hariri, the ancient Mari, on the Upper Euphrates, of a library of the 18th cent. B.C., containing over 20,000 clay tablets. In the western lands on the other hand papyrus leaves were the writing material usually employed, and these perished all too quickly in the damp climate of Syria and Palestine, but survived from very ancient times and in considerable number in the dry soil of Egypt. The very valuable library discovered at Räs-Shamra, the ancient Ugarit, in the north-west corner of Syria, in 1929, owes its preservation to the fact that a cuneiform alphabet and clay tablets were used.

The geographical position of Palestine and the early history of the Hebrews show clearly the necessity of archaeological research for the better understanding of the sacred text. Palestine was the bridge between 76d Asia and Africa, between the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean, the meeting-place of the armies, the wars, and the cultures of the ancient world. The people who held this bridge could not fail to be influenced in many ways by the various ancient civilizations of the East. Their great ancestor, Abraham, was of Babylonian origin; and Babylonian culture had spread to Canaan before they occupied it. Their great legislator, Moses, was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians; and it was during their long sojourn in Egypt that they became a nation. Amorites, Hittites, Hurrites had penetrated into Palestine at an early period and contributed to the complex Canaanite culture from which they were to borrow. They subsequently experienced more than two centuries of Persian rule. And finally Hellenic culture and Roman government exercised a strong influence on them in late OT and NT times. It is clear therefore that a knowledge of the history, literature, and culture of these ancient nations is necessary to understand the milieu in which the sacred books were written. Thus only can the difficulties arising from ignorance of local circumstances and literary devices, of the customs of the land and the history of the period, be met and the errors caused by the use of alien literary criteria and subjective norms of interpretation be rectified.

77a Egypt—To Egypt above all we owe a number of biblical texts, older in date than any MSS we possess, of which four fragments: Papyrus Nash, Papyri Rylands Greek 457 and 458, Papyrus Fouad 266, and one large collection, Chester Beatty Papyri, are of special interest. The Nash Papyrus, discovered at Fayum in 1902 and previously dated c. A.D. 100, but recently assigned by Albright for palaeographic reasons to 200–100 B.C., contains in Hebrew on a single page the decalogue and Deut 6:4. Its importance comes from its date, since we have no Hebrew MS of the MT earlier than A.D. 900, and especially from the character of its text, which is earlier than the MT and closer to the Greek and Samaritan texts. In particular it prefixes to the decalogue a descriptive title, absent from MT and Sam but found in LXX, and thus establishes the existence of a different type of Hebrew text prior to the MT and vindicates the authority of the Greek translators who used it. PRG 457, discovered about 1920, probably at Fayum or Oxyrhynchus, and published by C. H. Roberts at the Manchester University Press in 1935, contained part of a sheet of a codex of St John's Gospel of which the fragments preserved belong to Jn 18:31–33, 37–38. Experts in palaeography assign the writing to the first half of the 2nd cent. It is truly remarkable, as a proof of the authenticity and early diffusion of the NT writings, to find a Gospel, written in Asia, already in public circulation in Egypt within less than half a century of its origin.

e In 1936 appeared from the same press and editor PRG 458, the oldest Greek biblical text so far discovered, containing short fragments of Deut chh 23–28. This papyrus, which was found in the wrappings of a mummy, is assigned to the 2nd cent. B.C. and is thus only a century later than the original LXX. The fragmentary condition of the text makes the critical conclusions derived from it less decisive than its age might seem to warrant. It is generally good, though not free from scribal errors, and does not give exclusive support to anyone of the later MS families against its rivals. P. Fouad 266, first published at Cairo in 1939 and studied by W. G. Waddell in JTS 45 (1944) 158–161, contains Deut 31:28–32:7. It is of the same date and uncertain origin as PRG 458 and, though better preserved, is too brief to warrant more definite critical conclusions. It vindicates St Jerome's statement, doubted by critics, that the divine name Yahweh was not rendered κύριος but was still written in ancient Hebrew characters. The papyri, discovered in 1929 and called by the name of their original purchaser Chester Beatty, are Egypt's most important contribution to biblical study. They have all been published by Sir Frederic Kenyon in seven volumes of Introduction and Text and six volumes of Plates (London, Walker, 1933–7). The NT part (vol. II–III) contains considerable remains of two codices, one of the Gospels and Acts, the other of the Epistles of St Paul, both belonging to the early 3rd cent. and thus a century older than our earliest NT MSS, and some fragments of the Apocalypse (c. A.D. 300). The critical study of these ancient documents has shown them to be, not indeed free from scribal errors or without unimportant variant readings, but nevertheless in such remarkable agreement with our best MSS as to prove conclusively that the text of the NT was fixed and certain at the end of the 2nd cent. The OT part (vol. IV–VII) comprises large extracts of Genesis in two codices of the 3rd and 4th cent., portions of Numbers and Deuteronomy from the beginning of the 2nd cent., passages of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ecclesiasticus from the early 4th cent., and considerable sections of Ezekiel, Esther, and Daniel of the early 3rd cent. These documents, especially such as antedate the Hexapla of Origen, are of the greatest importance for the study of the LXX text. So far the verdict seems to be that while they support a number of the supposed Hebrew corrections of A they are nevertheless in more general agreement with B.

The non-biblical papyri and ostraca or inscribed potsherds have given us very valuable information on the language, the literary character and the historical background of the NT. We are not referring here to extracts from lost or extant literary works, though some of these have thrown fresh light on the religious history of the late Jewish and early Christian periods, but to the public and private original documents which have been discovered. The language of the NT is not classical but Hellenistic, the Koine or common Greek, which spread through the East after the conquests of Alexander. The Koine varies somewhat in character according as it is used for literary purposes or as the spoken and written language of the common people. The latter is the Greek of the Egyptian private letters and business documents, and also in general of the NT, though here there is a certain gradation from the more literary Epistle to the Hebrews at one end to Paul, John and Mark at the other. Biblical Greek thus appears for the first time in a historical linguistic setting. Most of the words formerly believed to be peculiar to it have been found in the papyri and ostraca. Its morphology and syntactical structure are illustrated and clarified. The accepted interpretation of certain expressions is more fully revealed, and a different interpretation of others is sometimes suggested by the new contexts in which they occur. Thus the difficulty of construing πῆρῃς as a genitive in Jn 1:14 disappears when we find that the adjective is not declined in the speech of the common people. The technical sense of ἐλλογέιν 'set down to one's account', βεβασιῶν 'guarantee', and ἀπέχειν 'receive full payment', makes the force of these words clearer in several NT passages. The new meanings of πήρα 'begging-bag', ἀνάρχη 'birth-certificate', and ὑπόστασις 'title-deeds', must be considered and may be found helpful in interpreting Lk 9:4, Rom 8:23, Heb 11:1. The use of ἀδελφός (lit. 'brother') for 'kinsman' in the recently published Adler papyri is an interesting linguistic confirmation of the traditional interpretation of the same word in the NT where it indicates not brother but kinsman of Our Lord.

St Paul tells us that the early Gentile converts belonged almost exclusively to the lower classes (1 Cor 1:26). It was for these that the NT was primarily intended, and it was written in language which they understood. It is not surprising therefore that the papyri and ostraca written by and for the common people offer many literary parallels to passages in the NT. Thus the plan of St Paul's letters: greeting, prayer, thanksgiving, subject-matter, salutations, farewell, is now revealed to us by Egyptian letters as the customary form of private correspondence. His method of 77i dictating his letters and inserting a passage of his own handwriting is abundantly illustrated in the papyri. His reference to those who have no hope (1 Thes 4:13) as opposed to the Christians who expect a better resurrection is exemplified by the conclusion of a letter of a certain Irene, written on the occasion of a death in the family: 'But still one can do nothing with regard to such matters. So console one another, and farewell'. St Paul concludes the passage, after describing the resurrection: 'So console one another with these words' (18). The touching letter of the wretched Antonis Longus to his mother helps us to realize the state of mind of the prodigal son after he had spent his substance living riotously. The cases of conscience proposed by the Corinthians to St Paul in connection with the eating of flesh offered to idols are graphically illustrated by invitations to a banquet at the table of the Lord Serapis, sometimes in the temple of the god, sometimes in a private house.

g While Greek literary works are chiefly concerned with the upper grades of society the papyri and ostraca increase our knowledge of the historical background of the NT by revealing to us the lower classes in the Roman Empire. Their hopes and fears, their interests and occupations, their virtues and vices, their family relations and financial burdens are made known to us by public documents and private records. We find them more religiously minded than the higher classes, less acquainted with the pleasures than the hardships of life, and thus better disposed to accept the Gospel teaching. Our increased historical knowledge enables us to confirm suspected statements and elucidate obscure passages in the NT. Thus the release of an imprisoned malefactor by an Egyptian official at the request of the people on the occasion of a festival illustrates and confirms the episode of Barabbas narrated in the history of the Passion. The records of the census of Roman subjects taken regularly every fourteen years in view of taxation have made intelligible to us St Luke's indication of the occasion and date of Our Lord's birth. These records extend over a period of two and a half centuries. The earliest so far discovered is dated A.D. 20. The census of A.D. 6 is attested by Luke and Josephus for Palestine and by CIL, III, 6687 for Apamea in Syria. Since our Lord was born sometime before the death of Herod in 4 B.C. St Luke must refer to the census of 9 B.C. as the first of the new fourteen-years system instituted by Augustus. This census was a house to house one; absentees had to return to their place of origin for the enrolment; the names of women also appear on the lists. The papyri have singularly vindicated St Luke's authority in the matter.

78a The Egyptian historical records, while attesting admissions into Egypt of emigrants from the east, make no mention of the arrival or departure of the Hebrews. But the Hyksos invasion explains the welcome they received and the position which Joseph attained. The store cities which they were forced to build, Pithom, the modern Tell el-Artabi (or less probably Tell el-Maskhūta), in the Wadi Tumilat, and Ramesses, probably the modern San el-Hagar and ancient Tanis, near the mouth of the Tanitic branch of the Nile, have been made known to us with their granaries and temples by recent excavations. The site of Ramesses, suggested indeed by the 'wonderful things . . . in the field of Tanis' (Ps 77:12) which are obviously the prodigies of the Exodus, is still disputed, but P. Montet's discoveries in 1929 (RB 39 [1930] 5-28) have strengthened the claims of Tanis. Egyptian evidence strongly supports the view that Ramesses II was the Pharaoh of the oppression and that the Exodus took place in the beginning of the reign of his successor, Merneptah (c 1232-1224). But it gives us also one of the strongest arguments for an earlier date in an inscription of the fifth year of the same Pharaoh where we read: 'Israel is destroyed; it has no longer seed. Palestine is become as a widow for Egypt'. The argument is not conclusive but cannot be discussed here. Finally may be mentioned 78a the inscription of Sheshonk I, the biblical Sesac (3 Kg 14:25), at Karnak, which records his invasion of Palestine and gives the names of sixty cities which he pillaged c 930 B.C. A fragment of a stele, erected by this invader at Megiddo, was discovered in the recent excavation of that city.

Two very valuable collections of ancient documents, b written one in Babylonian and the other in Aramaic, have also been found in Egypt, the cuneiform tablets of Tell el-Amarna, and the Aramaic papyri of Elephantine. The Letters of Tell el-Amarna, 350 in number, were discovered accidentally in 1887 on the site of the ephemeral capital of Amenophis IV, about 200 m. S. of Cairo. They contain the foreign correspondence of Amenophis III (c 1413-1379) and Amenophis IV (c 1379-1362), mostly with their Syrian and Palestinian officials and vassals, but also with their 'brothers', the kings of Assyria, Babylonia, Mitanni, Khatti, Cyprus and Arzawa. They give us invaluable information on the geography and history of Palestine in the first half of the 14th cent. B.C. The Habiri, who took a leading part in the struggle for independence which they record, were at first believed by many to be the Hebrew invaders, but are now better known as more ancient and more widespread than Israel. The Elephantine Papyri, about c 80 in number, of which nearly half are dated (495-400 B.C.), acquired partly by purchase but mostly by excavations in 1898-1908, are the records of a Jewish military colony, established at the southern outpost of Egypt most probably by Psammetichus I (663-609 B.C.). They contain official documents and family archives of especial interest. The language is closely akin to the Aramaic texts of the Bible and supports their traditional date. A Persian royal ordinance, minutely regulating the celebration of the feast of Azymes, refutes peremptorily the objection long urged by critics against the authenticity of the Persian royal decrees in the book of Esdras, namely that Persian monarchs did not interfere in the religious affairs of their foreign subjects.

Mesopotamia—Mesopotamia has given us no biblical 79a texts, but its cuneiform tablets have provided a very instructive commentary to many parts of the OT. They have fixed the sense of numerous terms previously obscure, identified a number of cities and countries otherwise unknown, confirmed and supplemented the records of the historical books, dated definitely or approximately many important events, facilitated the understanding of the customs of the Patriarchs and the laws of the Mosaic code and shown by many parallels the superiority of the moral and religious ideas and institutions of Israel.

Babylonian parallels to the biblical narratives of b Gen 1-10, though hailed by many on their first discovery as sources of the first chapters of the Bible, have been shown by closer study to have no direct literary connection with them. There are undoubtedly points of contact, for instance, in the concept of the material world. But it is only in the story of the deluge that we find such similarities between the two accounts as suggest a common and more ancient source. The name of Noah, like that of the Babylonian hero of the deluge, Um (Ur? Ut?)—napistim seems to mean 'length of days'; and there is little doubt that the same individual is indicated under both names. The local floods, of which traces have been discovered in one layer at Ur and in three distinct layers at Kish, are however too limited in extent and too recent in date to offer an adequate explanation of the deluge of the literary records. No genuine c parallels have been discovered to the description of Paradise and the temptation and fall of our first parents. Minor points however in the biblical narratives are usefully illustrated. The Cherubim at the gate of Paradise have their parallels in the genii that guarded the entrances of Babylonian temples and 79c palaces. The flame of the revolving sword (Gen 3:24) was probably a bronze thunderbolt like that erected by Tiglath-Pileser I on the ruins of a devastated city. The tree of life in Paradise has its counterpart in the plant of life sought by the hero Gilgamesh. The designation of the one God by a plural noun, Elohim, can no longer be regarded as a vestige of ancient polytheism, since a similar use of the plural to designate a single divinity is found in Babylonian, Hittite and Canaanite texts. Most of the peoples mentioned in the ethnographical table of Gen 10:1-32 are now known to us from the Assyrian and Babylonian documents.

d The biblical chronology of the monarchical period is based on the registration, in one of the Assyrian Canons giving the dates of the kings, of the solar eclipse, total at Nineveh, which occurred on the 15th June 763 B.C. This enables us to date exactly, for instance, the payment of tribute to Assyria by Jehu in 841 B.C. and by Menahem in 738 B.C., the fall of Samaria in 721 B.C., of Nineveh in 612 B.C., and of Babylon in 587 B.C., the battles of Qarqar, where Israel led by Achab first met Assyria, in 853 B.C. and of Megiddo, where Josias was slain, in 609 B.C. We learn that the enigmatic Phul of 4 Kg 15:19 was the Assyrian Tiglath-pileser III, also called Pulu as king of Babylonia. We read the fulfilment of the prophecies of Isaias on the imminent Assyrian devastation of Samaria and Damascus (Is 7:16; 8:4) and on the weakness of Egypt as an ally against Assyria (Is 20:5-6) and of Ezechiel (29:19-20) on the invasion of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor II, which occurred in the 37th year of his reign (569 B.C.). The rebellion, deportation, and subsequent restoration of Manasses by Ashurbanipal (2 Par 33:11), not mentioned in Kings and regarded as a pure invention by the critics, is at least rendered credible by recent discoveries. That Manasses took part in the rebellion of the western subject peoples against Assyria in 652 B.C. is legitimately concluded from the discovery of two Assyrian contract tablets, dated 649 and 647, at Gezer, which attest Assyrian occupation of this Judean city and thus presuppose a rebellion. His subsequent pardon and restoration is supported by an Assyrian record of the similar pardon and restoration of another of Ashurbanipal's royal prisoners, the Egyptian Nechao. Valuable information on the fortunes of the Jewish exiles is derived from the archives of a bank, discovered at Nippur in Southern Babylonia and published in 1896 and 1902 under the title Business Documents of Murashi Sons. In them we find the names of many Jews, descendants of those deported by Nabuchodonosor, enjoying full freedom, possessing lands and capital and engaged largely in commercial transactions. Several of them were tax-collectors and one, Hanani son of Menahem, had charge of the royal aviary. The condition of these Jews in the second half of the 5th cent. B.C. agrees with the indications of the sacred books; and their prosperity explains the comparatively small number of the exiles who returned with Zorobabel and Esdras.

g The discovery in 1901 of the famous code of laws, drawn up by Hammurabi in the early 17th cent. B.C., was followed by the publication of fragments of a still earlier Sumerian code in 1916, of an Assyrian code of the 16th cent. B.C. in 1920 and of a Hittite code of the 13th cent. B.C. in 1921. These codes were all unknown when a Mosaic code was regarded in critical circles as an anachronism and the mass of Pentateuchal legislation was assigned to the exilic or post-exilic period. Their discovery makes it impossible to deny the existence of a Hebrew code of laws at a very early period, to which additions could have been made as occasion demanded. Hebrew and Babylonian laws have naturally much in common but are essentially different in character and spirit. The code of Hammurabi supposes an advanced state of civilization, is based on principles of utility and aims at the protection of property. The law of Moses was enacted for a less civilized people, but has moral principles for its base and the practice of justice and charity for its 79g object.

A comparative study of Hebrew and Babylonian h religion reveals more contrasts than resemblances. The monotheism and supernatural prophecy, which are Israel's exclusive possession, are replaced in Babylon by numerous divinities and elaborate systems of divination. The Babylonians praise their gods, in psalms like those of the Hebrew Psalter, in order to assuage their anger and win their favour, but never with the sole object of religious worship. They beg for temporal favours and especially release from the chastisements which their sins have brought upon them, but never for release from the guilt of sin. They offer sacrifices like those of the Hebrews, but seem to have no conception of the need of moral dispositions for their efficacy. Attempts have been made to establish the Babylonian origin of the Hebrew feasts of Sabbath and Purim but without success. The Babylonian Sabbath, if it ever existed, was a monthly rather than a weekly religious celebration, not marked by abstinence from servile work. Purim ('lots') has been definitely proved from the Kultepe texts to be a Hebrew loan-word of Babylonian origin (Bi 21 [1940] 198-9), but that only confirms the narrative of the book of Esther according to which the feast was instituted by Hebrew exiles in Babylonia. As an instance of ritual resemblances may be cited the twelve loaves of shewbread offered to Yahweh in the temple and the twelve cakes offered by the Babylonians to Ishtar. The prophet Jeremiah in his protest against the introduction into Israel of the worship of Ishtar, the Queen of Heaven, twice refers to this rite (Jer 7:18; 44:19) and uses for cake the word kawwān, which is found in the Babylonian ritual texts, but nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible.

The antiquity and extensive character of Babylonian i ritual has revealed another error of the evolutionary theory which assigned the mass of Pentateuchal ritual to the exilic or post-exilic period. Quite recently the early origin of Hebrew ritual has been still more strikingly confirmed by the discovery of an extensive ritual, a little earlier than that of Moses, in the immediate neighbourhood of Palestine and in a language closely akin to Hebrew. The texts discovered at Ras-Shamra in the north-western corner of Syria and published in annual instalments 1930-39, are dated about 1400 B.C., written mainly in cuneiform alphabetic characters, and mostly of religious and mythological character. They exhibit extraordinary resemblances in language, style and ideological content to the poetical books of the OT. In them reappear the parallel members, emphatic repetitions and numerical gradations of Hebrew poetry and such expressions, literally reproduced, as 'the dew of heaven and the fat of earth' (Gen 27:28), 'the hind longing for the springs of water' (Ps 41:2), 'Leviathan the flying serpent and Leviathan the wounded serpent' (Is 27:1), etc. Their full value for OT study cannot yet be realized. They must first be all published and their correct interpretation assured.

The biblical association of Abraham and his kins- j folk with Northern Mesopotamia calls for a brief mention here of the letters of Mari and the contract tablets of Nuzu, both written in Akkadian but not by Babylonians or Assyrians. Mari, the modern Tell-Hariri on the middle Euphrates, was the capital of a very prosperous and powerful Amorite state which dominated the whole upper Euphrates valley before it was subjugated by Hammurabi who subsequently dismantled the capital (1695 B.C.). The royal palace contained 200 apartments and covered 15 acres of ground. Its paintings and sculptures surpassed those of the Sumerians and Babylonians. The city had commercial relations with numerous states from Crete and Cyprus to Babylon and Susa. Of the 20,000 tablets unearthed about 5,000 are letters, the correspondence between the kings of Mari and subordinate officials or contemporary rulers. Those so far published 79] have considerably increased our historical and geographical knowledge. By the synchronisms which the letters provide the chronology of the 2nd and 3rd millenniums B.C. has been revolutionized and established on a solid basis. Personal names in the OT, Terah, Nachor, Sarug, reappear as city names in the Haran neighbourhood. The Davidum or leader of West-Semitic roving bands reveals the origin of the name David. The Nuzu contract tablets, several thousand in number of which about 1,250 have been published, are private archives of families inhabiting the neighbouring towns of Nuzu (Yarghan Tepe) and Arrapkha (Kirkuk) near the little Zab, an eastern affluent of the middle Tigris. They were written in the 15th cent. B.C. largely by Hurrites, a people who had invaded Palestine in the 18th cent. B.C. The tablets reveal to us Hurrite customs and laws often in remarkable agreement with those of patriarchal times and early Hebrew legislation. We may instance the juridical condition of wives like Sarah and Hagar and of daughters like Leah and Rachel, the obligations of the Levirate, the right of daughters to inherit in default of male issue. These parallels are explained by the wide-spread diffusion of Mesopotamian civilization in the Near East and the Hurrite occupation of Palestine in the patriarchal period. They imply the antiquity and historical value of early Hebrew tradition.

80a Palestine—The method of excavation in Palestine has been considerably developed in recent times. The greatest attention is now paid to the collection of all available historical evidence. Digging of vertical shafts is being superseded, when possible, by surface stripping. The various layers, representing the different periods of occupation of the tell or mound are removed one by one, after they have been photographed and their contents carefully registered. The distinctive character of the various periods of occupation is thus revealed and their dates at least relatively determined. Layers of ash and other extensive traces of combustion, which indicate the capture and sack of a city, not only mark off different periods of occupation, but sometimes, especially if cultural changes manifest the predominance of occupants racially different in the later period, may be brought into connexion with known historical events. Some objects discovered may be definitely dated and pottery, whether native or foreign, is always available for approximate dating. The fragility of pottery and its comparative worthlessness circumscribe narrowly the period at which vessels or pieces of vessels discovered were in use and thus make it an excellent material for this purpose. The various species, moreover, are so constantly changing and so easily distinguished from each other by peculiarities of technique, shape and ornamentation that comparative study of the finds made at different sites, scientifically excavated, has led to the determination of the century or so to which they belong. Already in 1937 could be seen in the new archaeological museum in Jerusalem a magnificent collection of Palestinian pottery from the earliest times to 1200 B.C., arranged in chronological order. In this necessarily brief account of the results of excavations made in Palestine we shall confine ourselves to the Hebrew period, beginning with the transition from the age of bronze to the age of iron c. 1200 B.C., and to such discoveries as illustrate the contents of the sacred books and increase our knowledge of the historical milieu in which they were written.

c The ancient cities of the Israelites as revealed by the excavations were comparatively small, rarely more than ten or twelve acres in extent, were walled and fortified, though less strongly than those of the Canaanites, and had regular streets lined by moderate-sized houses. Many of the southern cities were more strongly fortified by Roboam (2 Par 11:5-11) and traces of his work have been found at Lakish, Azeca and Debir. The similar work of the Maccabees is attested at several sites and even in writing at Gezer, where a discontented builder scribbled on a wall his wish 'that fire might descend from heaven and consume the palace of Simon'. The houses unearthed at Tell Beit-Mirsim, the ancient Debir, consisted of a large central apartment, flanked by two or four small rooms, with an upper storey, supported on massive pillars, and reached by an outside staircase. The palace of Ahab, an enlargement of Amri's, at Samaria, was naturally on a much grander scale. It occupied the north-east angle of a space of about 100 yards square enclosed by casemated walls. Here were found magnificent specimens of ivory work, representing cherubim, Egyptian divinities, plants and animals, some in Egyptian and some in Syrian style. These belong to the 9th cent. B.C. and consequently to the ivory house of Ahab mentioned 3 Kg 22:29. In the centre of the enclosure were fifteen or more chambers, apparently used for archives and storage, one of which contained seventy-five ostraca, bearing written records of contributions of wine and oil to the royal stores from various cities, and giving us much information on the language, geography, and economic and administrative organization of the Northern Kingdom. The counterparts of these ostraca in Judah were jar-handles, of which over 200 have been discovered at various sites, belonging to the last century of the monarchy and inscribed 'to the king', followed by the name of one of the four southern cities: Hebron, Ziph, Socoh and Mamshat. These cities were apparently administrative centres holding a monopoly in the fabrication of jars of fixed measure for fiscal contributions. Among other buildings the elaborately constructed stable with stalls for 120 horses found beside a military encampment at Megiddo is of particular interest. The stalls were separated by pillars, provided with rings for the attachment of the horses, and paved with rough stones to prevent them from slipping. This discovery led to the recognition of similar stables, previously excavated but not recognized, at Ta'anak near Megiddo, and at Gezer, Lakish, and Tell el-Hesi in the south. The three last mentioned are naturally ascribed to Solomon (3 Kg 10:26-29) to whom also the stables of Megiddo are definitely attributed by the excavators. Some important cities: Jerusalem, Gezer, Megiddo, Ammon have elaborate tunnels, built with the bronze tools of the Canaanites, and designed to secure from an outside spring an adequate water-supply in time of siege. The tunnel at Jerusalem was supplemented by a new one, which brought the waters of Gihon into the city, under the menace of Sennacherib's invasion. This great work of Ezechias (4 Kg 20:20) is commemorated by a Hebrew inscription, recording the construction, and discovered with the tunnel in 1880. Canaanite sanctuaries also, such as the 'high place' at Gezer and the temples at Beth-Shan, deserve at least a passing mention.

h The occupations and interests of the people are indicated by the objects discovered: cisterns for water-supply, silos for grain storage, wine-presses and oil-presses, smithies, ovens, dyeing vats, earthenware vessels of all kinds, seals, coins, lamps, scarabs, children's toys, perfume-boxes and combs of bone and ivory, sickles and ploughshares, arms and amulets, pearls, pendants, rings, bracelets, brooches, etc. The owners of three seals, found one at Maspha and two at Lakish, are most probably mentioned in the Bible: Ya'azinyahu servant of the king (Jezonias 4 Kg 25:23), Gedolyahu the major-domo (Godolias Jer 40-41) and Shebne [son of?] Ahab (Sobna, secretary of Ezechias 4 Kg 18:14, 18; Is 22:15; 36:3, 22). Eliacim servant of Jokhin, whose name appears on three jar-handles, is unknown to us, but his master is the penultimate king of Judah, Jechonias. Among religious objects discovered, numerous images of Astarte and even moulds for making them illustrate various references in the OT to the idolatrous worship of this 80h goddess. A small altar of incense with four horns, found at Tell Beit-Mirsim in Judah, refutes at once the critical theory which admits no pre-exilic altar of incense and confirms the authority of the much misjudged Chronicler when he tells us that Achaz built altars to burn incense in all the cities of Judah (2 Par 28:25).

i The absence of all trace of writing in Canaan was once a stock objection to the early origin of the Pentateuch. Later on, the use of a cuneiform syllabary by the ancient Hebrew writers was seriously discussed. Now the question is rather which of the three alphabets existing before his time did Moses use? An ostrakon, unearthed at Bethshemesh in 1930, bears an inscription of the 15th cent. B.C., written in characters resembling those of Rās-Shamra. The inscriptions, discovered in 1904-5 at Serābiṭ el-Khādem in the mines of Sinai and variously dated 1800-1500 B.C., are in an alphabetic linear script. Fragments of texts in similar alphabetic characters have been found more recently in Palestine, one at Gezer, one at Tell el-Hesi (Eglon?), one at Shechem and six at Tell ed-Duweir (Lakish). They are mostly assigned to the 13th or 14th cent. B.C., but one is of the Hyksos period (c 1730-1580 B.C.). The discovery of the royal necropolis at Byblos in 1922 revealed in the epitaph of Ahiram of the 10th cent. B.C. the oldest inscription in the Phoenician alphabet, from which our own is derived. The finished form of the letters shows moreover that this alphabet was invented at a much earlier period.

j Three ancient records still remain to be mentioned, the agricultural calendar of Gezer, the inscription of Mesha of Moab and the Letters of Lakish. The first is a limestone tablet, engraved with cursive Hebrew characters, which may go back to the 11th cent. B.C., and acquainting us with the annual cycle of labours of the tillers of the soil. The Moabite Stone, discovered at Dibon in 1868, records, in a language closely akin to Hebrew, Mesha's successful revolt against Israel c 853 B.C. It supplements the Hebrew narrative and is besides of great linguistic and geographical importance.

k The ostraca with writing on both sides, found at Tell ed-Duweir, the ancient Lakish, in 1935, and published by H. Torczyner (London, 1938) were at that time the most valuable discovery yet made in Palestine. The fragments of pottery when put together revealed eighteen separate written records, of which only six are so well preserved as to admit of interpretation. Nearly all are letters to a certain Ya'ōsh (abbreviated form of Josias), commander of the garrison of Lakish, and can be dated 587 B.C., shortly before the capture of Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor. At this period only two fortified cities besides Jerusalem, namely Lakish and Azeka, still resisted, both of which are mentioned in the same order in the fourth letter and in Jer 34:7. The prophet, mentioned without name in the third letter, is very probably Jeremias. Most of the proper names occur also in the biblical records of the same period and are theophoric, having the divine name, Yahweh, fully written as the second element. This was probably a result of the religious reform of Josias. The most important conclusion to be deduced from these simple letters springs from their remarkable resemblance in language and style to our classical Hebrew texts. This suggests that these texts were carefully preserved and also supports their traditional pre-exilic date.

l Palestinian Hebrew MSS—A remarkable discovery of several ancient Hebrew MSS, as welcome as it was unexpected, was made in Palestine in 1947, not by excavators, but by Bedawin. The MSS are long rolls of skin not of parchment and were found in a cave near the northern end of the Dead Sea, wrapped in linen and enclosed in jars sealed with pitch. Seven documents were first discovered, viz. (1) a complete text of Isaiah, (2) an incomplete text of Isaiah chh 42-66, (3) a commentary on Habacuc ch 1-2, (4) laws and institutions of a body of Jewish sectaries, (5) a collection of hymns of praise, (6) an account of the conflict between the sons of Light and the sons of Darkness, (7) an apocryphal work, probably the book of Lamech, of which only a few pages have been deciphered. All these works are in Hebrew except the last which is in Aramaic. An archaeological exploration of the cave in 1949 resulted in the further discovery of fragments of at least forty jars, similar to those containing the documents previously discovered, and various fragmentary texts some of which could be identified as parts of Genesis, Leviticus, Deuteronomy, Judges and Daniel. Of these the Leviticus texts were written in the early Phoenician script. All are agreed that the cave contained a considerable cache of sacred books made by Jewish sectaries and subsequently discovered and rifled. The discovery of such a cache in the neighbourhood of Jericho is recorded by Origen in the 3rd cent. A.D. and by Timotheus II, Syrian patriarch of Seleucia, in the 8th cent. A.D. As the jars were adjudged to the Hellenistic period the cache was first dated c 100 B.C. It is difficult to maintain this date as a terminus ante quem for all the documents discovered. Kahle suggests the 3rd cent. A.D. as the date not of the writings but of the cache. He notes that the later text of part of Isaiah is closer to the MT than the earlier text of the whole book, while the latter exhibits later inter-linear corrections which seem to be based on the MT. Both texts, therefore, one in its composition the other in its corrections, imply the existence and authority of the MT, usually dated c A.D. 100. The complete text of Isaiah and the collection of laws and institutions are notably earlier than the five other documents. The lack of similar dated texts makes it practically impossible to date them palaeographically. It is noteworthy, however, that the use of special final forms of five Hebrew characters, fully developed in the MT and the Nash Papyrus, is still in an elementary stage in the complete Isaiah text. Only n has the final form regularly, k and m occasionally, p and s never. We can thus conclude that this text is earlier than the MT and the Nash Papyrus and must be dated in or before the 1st cent. A.D. When Hebrew as a spoken language was supplanted by Aramaic the vocalization of its consonantal script caused particular difficulty. This explains the chief peculiarity of the Isaiah MS, which frequently inserts the semi-vocalic letters, a, h, w and y, to indicate vowel sounds and thus gives us valuable information on the pronunciation of Hebrew at this period. Variations from the MT in other respects are comparatively rare and unimportant. There are some useful corrections of the MT which, however, represents on the whole a better manuscript tradition.

NT Discoveries—To our previous remarks on the Egyptian papyri must be added here some instances of the contribution made to the text and interpretation of the NT by inscriptions and excavations. A fragment of Tatian's Diatessaron, consisting of 14 lines of Greek text written on one side of a parchment leaf was unearthed in 1933 by the excavators of Dura-Europos in north-eastern Syria and published by C. H. Kraeling (London, 1935). It contains the conclusion of the narrative of the passion, taken from all four Gospels, and is dated by the destruction of the city in 255 and the discovery of a neighbouring private house converted into a Christian oratory in 223 to the first quarter of the 3rd century or less than half a century after the composition of the Diatessaron. It is thus apparently our most ancient NT text after the fragment of St John's Gospel mentioned, § 77b. Ancient and modern opponents of the perpetual virginity of the Mother of Christ have argued that the designation of Christ as 'her firstborn son' (Lk 2:7) implies that she had subsequently other children. St Jerome's reply, that 'firstborn' in this context, according to Jewish usage, only excludes an elder son and in no way implies future births, has been remarkably confirmed by a Greek funeral inscription, discovered at Tell el-Yehudieh in Egypt in 1922, which commemorates a

- 81b Jewish mother, Arsinoe, who died in the year 5 B.C. in the pangs of giving birth to her firstborn son' (cf. J. B. Frey Bi 11 [1930] 373-90). A dated letter of the Emperor Claudius, graven on a wall of the temple of Apollo at Delphi and published in 1905, mentions, as proconsul of Achaia, Gallio before whom Paul was arraigned by the Jews. From this we can date, at least very approximately, a central event in the life of St Paul and thus establish Pauline chronology on a solid basis.
- d Other inscriptions found at Delphi record the freedom of slaves redeemed by the god Apollo. Slaves became free by paying their masters a fixed sum which they laboriously accumulated. But unscrupulous masters after receiving the ransom could retain the slave in bondage. Hence the practice of paying the money into the treasury of Apollo who purchased the slave from his master and secured him by his protection from further molestation. St Paul illustrates his teaching on the Redemption by frequent references to this form of contract, and a knowledge of the technical terms used is necessary for the full understanding of the texts. Christ purchased or redeemed us, the Gentiles from the slavery of sin, the Jews from the bondage of the Law. The completeness of this redemption is expressed by the prepositional prefix in ἀπελευθέρωσις and ἀπολύτρωσις. The Christian, whatever his condition in life, is no longer a slave, but the freed-man (ἀπελευθέρως) of the Lord. He differs however from the freed-man of Apollo in several respects which are emphasized by the Apostle. He cannot now 'do what he likes'—the privilege of the slave freed by Apollo according to the words of the contract—but must fulfil in all things the will of Christ to whom he entirely belongs. Christ has endowed him with a freedom which is not licence but holiness, and the first fruit of his redemption is eternal life. He has contributed nothing to the price of his freedom which has been freely and fully paid by Christ himself. The rendering of δοῦλος by 'servant' instead of 'slave' in some modern English versions here obscures the imagery of St Paul.
- e The meticulous accuracy of St Luke as a historian is frequently attested by the new discoveries. According to him St Paul appeared before the supreme authorities in four Greek cities, the Strategoi at Philippi, the Politarchs at Thessalonica, the Areopagites at Athens, the Proconsul at Corinth. The local name is different in each case but is now known from inscriptions to be accurate in all. His location of Iconium in Phrygia and not in Lycaonia and his dating of the first Syrian government of Quirinius in the days of King Herod, though regarded half a century ago as manifest errors, have been shown to be correct by the Phrygian inscriptions of Iconium and the mentions of Quirinius in the Caristanii records of Pisidian Antioch and its neighbourhood.
- f His account of St Paul's mission at Ephesus has been copiously illustrated and confirmed by the extensive excavations of the site made by the British Museum and the Austrian Archaeological Institute which culminated in the discovery of the empty tomb of the Apostle St John beneath the high altar of the later Byzantine Church. The Ephesian Artemis is now made known to us, not merely nor principally as the virgin huntress of the Greeks, but as the Asiatic goddess of fecundity, presiding over all manifestations of plant, animal and human life and fanatically worshipped as the mainstay of the material prosperity of the city and its inhabitants. Her temple, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, the market-place where the disturbance caused by the silversmiths occurred and the neighbouring theatre where the people assembled are all revealed to us. The title νεωκόρος or 'sacristan' (of Artemis) accorded to the city, the use of θεός and θεά to designate the goddess, the epithet of μεγάλη applied to her are paralleled in inscriptions there and elsewhere discovered. From them, too, we learn that the Asiarchs were members of a religious body elected, one each year, by each of the principal cities of the province, but retaining their honorific title after their period of office, that the town-clerk, his humble title notwithstanding, enjoyed all the authority attributed to him by St Luke, that Ephesus was conspicuous above other cities for magical and divinatory practices.

Excavations have considerably increased our knowledge of the topography of Jerusalem in NT times. The exact position of the enclosure of the second temple, constructed by Herod and frequented by our Lord, has been revealed to us. The sacred rock in the Mosque attributed to Omar, but built by Abd-el-Melek, locates the temple itself, at least approximately, since it is still disputed whether the rock occupies the site of the Altar of Holocausts or the Holy of Holies. One of the inscriptions, affixed to the gates of the Inner Temple and forbidding non-Jews under pain of death to penetrate beyond the Court of the Gentiles, has been unearthed, and illustrates the gravity of the false accusation brought by the Jews against St Paul (Ac 21:28 f.). The second wall of the city, which determined its boundaries during our Lord's lifetime, has been traced and the traditional site of Calvary has been shown to be outside it. The site was providentially preserved by the erection thereon of temples of Jupiter, Juno and Venus when Jerusalem was made a Roman colony by Hadrian in A.D. 135. The stone which blocked the door of our Lord's sepulchre has been revealed to us by many parallels as having had the form of a large mill-stone fitted into a groove beside the opening and difficult to dislodge when it had been rolled into position. The extensive stone pavement or Lithostrotos in the Pretorium of Pilate, where Christ was condemned to death, has been discovered in the course of recent excavations on the site of the Herodian fortress of Antonia. Recent diggings have also more or less definitely established the location of other sites, such as Gethsemane, the house of Caiphas, and the Synagogue of the Libertini. Since early local tradition plays a considerable part in the identification of sacred sites, mention may here be made of the remarkable mosaic map of Palestine discovered in a church in the Moabite city of Madaba. Its graphic representation of the churches and monasteries of Jerusalem is a valuable record of Palestinian Christian tradition on this matter in and before the beginning of the 6th century.

Conclusion—Archaeological discoveries not only solve old problems, but sometimes raise new ones. Caution is necessary in accepting conclusions derived from them and patience in awaiting new light on the problems they raise. But their cumulative effect is aptly indicated by the words of Pope Pius XII in his recent Encyclical: 'Thus has it come about that confidence in the authority and historical value of the Bible, somewhat shaken in the case of some by so many attacks, today among Catholics is completely restored; moreover there are not wanting even non-Catholic writers, who by serious and calm inquiry have been led to abandon modern opinion and to return, at least in some points, to the more ancient ideas'.

MEASURES, WEIGHTS, MONEY AND TIME

By E. POWER, S.J.

82a Bibliography—A. Barrois, 'La Métrologie dans la Bible', RB 40 (1931) 185-213; 41 (1932) 50-76; *A. R. S. Kennedy, 'Some Problems of Herod's Temple (the Cubit)', ET 20 (1908-9) 14-17; Id., 'Inscribed Hebrew Weights from Palestine, ib. 24 (1912-3) 488-91; 538-42; *O. Viedebant, Antike Gewichtswesen und Münzfuesse, Berlin, 1924; *F. W. Madden, Coins of the Jews, London, 1903; *J. G. Milne, Greek Coinage, Oxford, 1931; F. Prat, 'Les cours des monnaies en Palestine au temps de Jésus-Christ', RSR 15 (1925) 441-8; id. Jésus-Christ II, Paris, 1946, 487-500; U. Holzmeister, Chronologia Vitae Christi, Rome, 1933; *K. Schoch, Planeten-Tafeln fuer jedermann, Berlin, 1927; J. B. Schaumberger, 'Tabella Neomeniarum Vitae publicae Domini et Procurationis Pilati', VD 13 (1933) 104-8. Biblical Dictionaries and Manuals of Biblical Archaeology may also be consulted.

b Measures of Length—The Hebrew measures of length like all similar ancient measures are derived from the human body. They are the finger-breadth, the palm or hand-breadth, the span or open-hand breadth, from the tip of the thumb to the tip of the little finger, and the cubit or forearm, from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger. The cubit is that of a (full-grown) man, Deut 3:11. There was also a conventional measure of six cubits called a reed. All the names are Semitic.

The value of the chief unit of measure, the cubit, may have varied at different periods and can only be determined approximately. The only direct indication (c 700 B.C.) is the length of the Siloe canal, 1,749 ft. by modern measure and 1,200 cubits according to the inscription. This gives a cubit of 17.5 inches only in the very doubtful hypothesis that the ancient method of measuring agrees with the modern and that 1,200 is an exact rather than a round number. As the Hebrews are unlikely to have systematized their measures before the early monarchical period and were then closely associated with Egypt it is very probable that they adopted the Egyptian cubit. This was twofold: the common cubit of 24 finger-breadths = 17.7 inches and the royal cubit of 28 finger-breadths = 20.66 inches. The distinction made by Ezechiel, 40:5; 43:13, between the ordinary cubit of 6 palms = 24 finger-breadths and the temple cubit of 7 palms = 28 finger-breadths supports this view. The Chronicler also, 2 Par 3:3, suggests the royal Egyptian cubit of 7 palms when he mentions the cubit of ancient measure used in the building of Solomon's temple.

c In NT times it is very probable that the Greek cubit of almost exactly 18 inches was adopted. The only certain indication of the use of this cubit in Palestine belongs to the 4th cent. A.D. Kennedy's evaluation of the NT cubit at 17.6 inches, deduced from a comparative study of the dimensions of various parts of Herod's temple, seems less probable. The determination of the Sabbath journey of 2,000 cubits as 5 stadia according to Josephus and Epiphanius is of no value owing to the round numbers and the difficulty of defining the exact length of the stadium. The Alexandrian stadium was 202 yds., that of Delphi 194, that of Olympus 210. Besides the stadium (DV furlong) another Greek measure, the fathom or 'stretch' = 6 ft., and the Roman mile of 1,000 double-paces = 1,618 yds are mentioned in the NT.

TABLE OF LENGTH MEASURES

Names	Cubit	Span	Palm	Finger
Ratio	1	= 2	= 6	= 24
OT Value	17.7 in.	8.85	2.95	.74
NT Value	18 in.	9	3	.75

Measures of Capacity—The Hebrew measures of capacity are naturally more disparate than the anatomical measures of length. They were originally utensils which became standards of measure. Some appear first in the monarchical period. Their names attest their different origin. Ephah and hin are Egyptian. Homer, lethekh and log appear in the Rās-Shamra tablets. Bath is Aramaean. Cor, seah and perhaps kab are Babylonian. The homer, lit. ass-load, was also used in Assyria. The 'omer (DV gomor) of Ex 16 is elsewhere replaced by the 'issaron or tenth of the ephah. Bath, hin, log and sometimes cor are liquid measures. Homer, ephah, seah and kab are dry measures.

The relative values of these measures are known to us partly from Scripture texts, partly from the Babylonian system and partly from Hebrew tradition. From Ezechiel we learn that homer = cor and ephah = bath and that the latter measure was a tenth of the former and from Ex 16:36 and Num 15:4 that the 'omer = 'issaron was a tenth of the ephah. St Jerome renders lethekh as half a cor, Os 3:2. The sutu = seah was a thirtieth of the gur = cor in the Babylonian system. Similarly Hebrew tradition makes the ephah = 3 seah. The kab corresponds to the Babylonian ka, a sixth of the sutu = seah. The relative values of the hin and the log are deduced from various texts of Josephus, St Jerome and the Talmud.

Our only information on the absolute value of these measures is derived from Josephus and later writers who equate the log with the Roman sextarius, the Hellenistic Xestes. This fixes the log at .96 of a pint. It is estimated at a pint in the table to avoid complicated figures. These values possibly but not certainly go back to Ezechiel and the monarchical period. The Persian measure artabe, Dan 14:2, is estimated by Herodotus at a bushel.

In the NT period Hellenistic measures were in general use. Hebrew measures: seah, bath, cor, appear only in Lucan parables, Lk 13:21; 16:6 f. The xestes, Mk 7:4, and the modios, Mt 5:15, are vessels rather than measures. But the metretres = 9 gal., Jn 2:6, and the choinix = 3 pecks, Apoc 4:6, are measures.

TABLE OF DRY MEASURE

Names	Homer	Lethekh	Ephah	Seah	'Omer	Kab
Ratio	1	= 2	= 10	= 30	= 100	= 180
Value	11½ bush.	5½ bush.	4½ peck	1½ peck	¾ peck	½ peck

TABLE OF LIQUID MEASURE

Names	Cor	Bath	Hin	Log
Ratio	1	= 10	= 60	= 720
Value	90 gal	9 gal	1½ gal	1 pint

MEASURES, WEIGHTS, MONEY AND TIME

82f Weights—The Hebrew system of weights is derived from the Babylonian. The talent (kikkar lit. round) contained 60 mines (maneh lit. part) and the mine or mina (Gk. mna) 60 sicles (shekel lit. weight) in Mesopotamia, but only 50 in Phoenicia.

The shekel contained 24 Babylonian giru, but 20 Hebrew gerah. According to Ex 38:25-27 (not Mosaic, cf. com.) the capitation tax of a half-shekel levied on 603,550 Israelites amounted to 100 talents and 1,775 shekels. A talent of 3,000 shekels based on the Phoenician mine of 50 shekels is implied. The mention of 100 shekels, Deut 22:19, and 50 shekels, Deut 22:29, suggests the same conclusion especially as the 50 shekels correspond to a mine in the code of Hammurabi. On the other hand, a half mine in the same code corresponds to 30 shekels in the earlier legislation of Ex 21:32 and thus suggests an earlier mine of 60 shekels. Ez 45:12, according to the more correct MT, fixes the mine at $20 + 25 + 15 = 60$ shekels but implies at the same time an actual mine of 50 shekels by mentioning its parts. We may conclude therefore that the mine of the monarchical period was Phoenician and the earlier mine probably Babylonian.

g Theoretical evaluations of the shekel unit of weight, based on Babylonian and Phoenician values, have received no support from the stamped weights, about 50 in number, unearthed by recent excavators in Palestine. The more usual stamp is Ω , now generally interpreted shekel. All the weights so stamped, with one negligible exception, vary between 11 and 12 grammes and average approximately 11.5 grammes = .4 oz. A gramme (gm.) is very nearly $15\frac{1}{2}$ grains (gr.). Four weights marked pym, the dual of peh and thus meaning two-thirds, belong to the same standard. So also does a weight of 11.14 gms. inscribed in archaic letters k'melek 'to the king'. Of the four weights marked beqa' or half-shekel two conform to the common standard but one is negligibly (12.2 gms.) and one appreciably (13.3) heavier. Finally nine weights marked nešef and averaging 10 gms. (.35 oz.) indicate a lighter standard. It is still uncertain whether nešef weights are shekels or half-shekels (according to the Arabic sense of nešf), nor is it possible to establish a distinction in date between the periods at which the two standards were in use. The Persian mine, Esd 2:69, is practically equivalent to the common Hebrew mine. It contained 100 sigloi of 5.61 gms or 50 Hebrew shekels of 11.22 gms. The Jews of Elephantine had a shekel of similar weight at the same period since they evaluated the keres or gold daric at 10 silver shekels. The Hebrew shekel cannot, however, be derived from the Persian. Several of the inscribed Hebrew weights belong palaeographically to the monarchical period.

h In the Hellenistic period the Greek system of weights was in general use. There were different standards of value of which the more common, Attic-Euboic and Aeginetan, are given in our table. An official market weight of 319 gms bearing a Greek inscription was discovered at Gezer. It is marked half and is dated probably in the year 84 of the Seleucid era, 229-228 B.C. It is apparently half of the Aeginetan mine of 630 gms. Another official market weight of 145 gms with a Greek inscription was found at Sandannah. Though neither marked nor dated it seems to be a third of the Attic mina of 435 gms. The Seleucid monarchs adopted the Attic standard. Their coins show a debasement of the Attic drachm unit (4.35 gms) to 4.20 under Antiochus IV Epiphanes and 4 under Tryphon thirty years later. The weights mentioned in 1-2 Mac should be estimated at the Seleucid standard.

The Roman pound (5,050 grs) is twice mentioned in the NT, Jn 12:3; 19:39. The shekel was reckoned at four Phoenician drachms of 55 grs. Josephus equates the Hebrew mine with $2\frac{1}{2}$ Roman pounds. He apparently reckons the mine at 50 shekels and the shekel at 4 Seleucid Attic drachms and thus makes the Hebrew mine = 2 Greek mines. However this may be, the talents, mines and drachms of the NT are 82h Greek or Greco-Roman. The pre-monarchical weights and the original shekel of the sanctuary cannot be determined.

TABLE OF HEBREW WEIGHTS

Names	Talent	Mine	Shekel	Gerah
Ratio	1	= 60	= 3000	= 60,000
Values	75 lb	20 oz	.4 oz	9.6 grs

TABLE OF GREEK WEIGHTS

Names	Talent	Mine	Drachm	Obol
Ratio	1	= 60	= 6000	= 36,000
Att. Values	52 lb	13.85 oz	66.5 grs	11.09 grs
Aeg. Values	76 lb	20.25 oz	97 grs	16.2 grs

Money—The shekels, half-shekels, quarter-shekels of the OT were not coins but weights, usually of silver. The first coins used in Palestine were the gold and silver darics. The silver daric of 5.6 gms (87 grs) was $\frac{1}{3}$ of the weight and $\frac{1}{3}$ of the value of the gold daric of 8.4 gms (130 grs). In the Hellenistic period Phoenician and Greek coins circulated in Palestine. Only copper coins were struck by Simon Maccabee and his successors. The silver shekels equivalent in weight to the Phoenician stater or tetradrachm and formerly attributed to the Maccabees are now generally ascribed to the Jewish rebels A.D. 66-70. Roman coins appear in the NT period. The coin most frequently mentioned is the denarius. Roman coinage was based on the aureus, a gold coin weighing $\frac{1}{2}$ of a Roman lb (120 grs). The silver denarius was half the weight and $\frac{1}{2}$ the value of the aureus. The as, reckoned as $\frac{1}{4}$ of the denarius, and its fractions were copper coins. The Asiatic and Phoenician coins still circulated. Beside the denarius of 60 grs were the Phoenician drachm of nearly 55 grs and the Asiatic drachm now reduced to 50 grs. Fiscal dues were paid in Roman weight, temple dues in Phoenician. In ordinary usage, however, denarius and drachm were regarded as equivalents, as were also shekel, stater, tetradrachm and argenteus.

In turning ancient money into modern account must b be taken of two important differences. Gold was rated at $12\frac{1}{2}$ times the value of silver not $15\frac{1}{2}$ as at present. Gold, moreover, was coined without alloy and the alloy in silver coins (.02) was practically negligible. It must be also noted that the purchase power of money was several times greater in biblical than in modern times. The values of the NT coins are determined according to the Roman gold standard of the period and the 1939 values of English money.

SILVER COINS

Name	Text	Weight	Value
Roman denarius	passim	60 grs	10½d
Phoenician drachm	Lk 15:8 ?	55 grs	9½d
Asiatic drachm	Lk 15:8 ?	50 grs	8½d
Tyrian didrachm	Mt 17:24	110 grs	1s 6½d
Stater = tetradrachm	Mt 17:27	220 grs	3s 1d
Roman argenteus	Mt 26:15	240 grs	3s 5d

BRONZE COINS

Double as (dipondius)	Lk 12:6	1½d
As (Gk. Assarion)	Mt 10:29	½d
Quadrans (fourth)	Mt 5:26	c ½d
Minutum (Gk. lepton)	Mt 12:42	c ¼d

The mines and talents of the Gospels are weights of silver. Estimated at the drachm-denarius unit a mine = £4 5s 5d and a talent = £256 5s. The similar denominations of 1-2 Mac had practically the same value. The gold daric was worth about £1 2s 6d.

Time. 1. The Day—Day in Hebrew means either c day and night or day as opposed to night. In the former sense it began originally at sunset but later as soon as three stars were visible. In the latter sense

MEASURES, WEIGHTS, MONEY AND TIME

83c it was originally divided into three equal parts: morning, noontide and evening, and night similarly into three watches (cf. Jg 7:19 the middle watch). The Roman quadripartite division was however more commonly used in NT times (cf. Mt 14:25; Mk 6:48 the fourth watch). The division of the day into twelve hours was known, Jn 11:9, but St John is the only NT writer who uses it regularly (cf. Jn 1:39; 4:6; 4:52). The Synoptics use instead the four three-hour periods which they call morning, third hour, sixth hour, ninth hour. When therefore Mark puts the crucifixion at the third hour (9-12 a.m., 15:25), he agrees with John's 'about the sixth hour', (11-12 a.m., 19:14). The hour and three-hour periods naturally varied in length according to the time of year. Hour as a time measure was unknown to the Hebrews.

d 2. The Week—The continuous week of seven days, so intimately connected with the observance of the Sabbath, was long peculiar to the Hebrews. It existed before the Sinaitic legislation, Ex 16:22 ff., and has no parallel in Babylonian or Egyptian institutions. The days of the week except the Sabbath were indicated only by numbers. In the Hellenistic period the sixth day was called the eve of the Sabbath, Jud 8:6, and later the Parascève or Preparation, Mk 15:42. The Greek pl. sabbata means week, Mk 16:2; Lk 24:1.

e 3. The Month—The Hebrew months were lunar months of 29 or 30 days since the period of the moon's revolution is roughly 29½ days. According to the Mishna (2nd cent. A.D.) the length of each month was determined not by calculation but by actual observation. If the New Moon was seen by three credible witnesses in the night following the twenty-ninth day of a month, that month had only twenty-nine days and the new month was announced by fire-signals all over Palestine. Otherwise the month had thirty days and the next month began automatically at the end of the thirtieth day. Party spirit and difference of opinion about the credibility of witnesses might thus produce two different computations of the days of a month. This is a common explanation of the discrepancy between John and the Synoptics on the date of Christ's last Pasch. The months are indicated by ancient Canaanite names, of which only four are mentioned, by numbers beginning with Nisan and by Babylonian names, of which seven appear in the sacred text. As the Macedonian names are used by Josephus and one is mentioned in 2 Mach 11:30, 33, 38, we include them in our table.

NAMES OF THE MONTHS OF THE JEWISH YEAR				83f
Babylonian	Canaanite	Macedonian	English Equivalent
Nisan	Abib	Xanthicos	March-April
Iyyar	Ziv	Artemisios	April-May
Sivan		Daisios	May-June
Tammuz		Pancemos	June-July
Ab		Loios	July-Aug.
Elul		Gorpaios	Aug.-Sept.
Tishri	Ethanim	Hyperberetaios	Sept.-Oct.
Marcheshvan	Bul	Dios	Oct.-Nov.
Kislev		Appellaios	Nov.-Dec.
Tebeth		Audynaïos	Dec.-Jan.
Shebat		Perittos	Jan.-Feb.
Adar		Dystros	Feb.-March

4. The Year—The Hebrew year was not lunar but lunisolar. This was necessitated by the harvest offerings at the annual feasts since harvest time is regulated by the sun. Another month, therefore, Adar II (Ve-Adar), was intercalated before Nisan if further time was needed for the ripening of the barley first-fruits to be offered during the feast of Pasch. It appears certain from the consistent evidence of the Mishna and Jewish tradition that the intercalation of Adar II was determined empirically and not according to a pre-arranged system by the Jewish authorities in NT times. Such systems, used earlier by the Greeks, were not adopted by the Jews before the 4th cent. A.D. The Elephantine papyri attest also an empirical Jewish calendar in the 5th cent. B.C. The date of the barley harvest in the warmest parts of Palestine warrants the conclusion that the Pasch was celebrated invariably in April. The various times of earliest visibility of the whole series of New Moons in ancient Palestine can be astronomically determined. In this reconstruction of the Hebrew calendar a possible error of a day must be reckoned with, as the New Moon may have been hidden by clouds. Such an error would not, however, affect subsequent observations.

The civil year began in the month of Tishri, Ex 23:16; 34:22, the religious year in Nisan, Ex 12:2, 18, etc.). The redactor of Jer (cf. 29:1 and 46:2) assigns the battle of Carchemish and the accession of Nabuchodonosor to the fourth year of Joachim. As the battle took place before the accession but after Nisan 605, the Hebrew year of the redactor began not in Nisan but in Tishri. The occasional adoption of the Babylonian system of dating regnal years, which appears side by side with the Hebrew system, does not therefore prove that the Hebrew civil year began in Nisan.

Events are usually dated by the regnal years of the kings in the monarchical period, sometimes also by outstanding incidents. The Seleucid era which began in October 312 is used in 1-2 Mac. In 1 Mac, however, dates are reckoned from Spring 311. The only NT monarchical date is the fifteenth year of Tiberius.

OUR LADY IN THE SCRIPTURES

By E. C. MESSENGER, PH.D.

84a Bibliography—In addition to the usual dogmatic treatises on Our Lady, see the following: A. d'Alès, 'Marie, Mère de Dieu, I, Marie dans l'Écriture Sainte', DAFC 3, 118-55; A. J. Maas, 'Virgin Mary', CE 15, 464-70; J. P. Arendzen, 'Our Lady in the Old Testament', in Our Blessed Lady, CSSL, 1933; id. 'The Virgin Mother', in The Gospels, Fact, Myth or Legend? pp 128-40; id. 'A Virgin shall conceive', in Prophets, Priests and Publicans, pp 97-111; C. Lattey, S.J., 'Our Lady's Gospel', in Our Blessed Lady, CSSL, 1933; R. A. Knox, 'Our Lady in the New Testament', ibid.; Pohle-Preuss, Mariology; G. Smith, Mary's Part in Our Redemption, 1938; E. R. Hull, S.J., First Book on Our Lady; E. F. Sutcliffe, S.J., 'Protoevangelium', in CR, Aug. 1931; cf. CR, Jan. 1932; id. 'Our Lady and the Divinity of Christ', Mn 180 (1944) 347-50; id. 'Scripture, Tradition and Mariology', IER, Ser. 5, vol. 70 (1947) 807-14; F. M. Willam, Mary the Mother of Jesus, E. tr. by F. Eckhoff, St Louis and London, 1947; P. F. Ceuppens, O.P., De Mariologia Biblica, Turin, 1949; Scheeben, Mariology, 2 vols (Engl. Trans. 1947-8, U.S.A.); J. Spencer Northcote, Mary in the Gospels, London, 1906; R. Garrigou-Lagrange, O.P., The Mother of the Saviour (Engl. Trans.), Dublin, 1948.

b I. Introduction—It is a defined point of Catholic Faith that for our doctrines we depend not only upon the written Word of Divine Scripture, but also on Divine Tradition, which interprets, and in some cases, supplements it. In no subject is it more important to bear this in mind than in that of our Blessed Lady. For some of our knowledge concerning our Lady we are indebted to Tradition, and to that alone. By 'Tradition' we here mean Dogmatic Tradition, i.e. the teaching and handing down of doctrines not expressly formulated in Scripture. This use of the term must be carefully distinguished from purely human tradition not guaranteed by divine authority, or by the Church, and from 'Tradition' in the sense of legend or folklore. In some important matters, Scripture has various things to say about our Lady. But even here Tradition plays an important part in determining the meaning of the inspired text, and in clarifying it.

c In this connexion we must remember that much of the teaching contained in Scripture is implicit rather than explicit. The full meaning and implication of a text may not be obvious at a first reading. And further we must remember that a few pregnant words may imply a whole theology. We shall mention some instances of this in the course of our essay. But these principles enable us to answer the difficulty sometimes raised from the comparative silence of Scripture on our Lady. It is at most a comparative silence. And what Scripture does say about her is very important. In this connexion we must remember that the central doctrine of our Mariology is that Mary is the Theotokos, the Mother of God. It was as God's Mother that she was fore-ordained from the beginning of the world, immaculately conceived in the fullness of time, filled with all graces, and finally assumed bodily into heaven. It was as God's Mother that she was the Second Eve, co-operating in the work of our Redemption. Hence, if Scripture teaches this fundamental fact of the Motherhood of Mary, it gives us the most important fact.

Mary's prerogatives flow from and depend upon her divine Motherhood. Some of these prerogatives are hinted at in Scripture, but for the clear enunciation of others we have to depend upon Tradition illuminating and supplementing Scripture.

II. Mary in the Old Testament—In the preliminary or expository part of the Bull Ineffabilis Deus, before the actual definition of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of our Lady, Pope Pius IX authoritatively stated in 1854 that God 'foresaw from all eternity the unhappy ruin of the whole human race of man through the sin of Adam', and 'determined, by a mystery hidden from all ages, to accomplish the first work of his goodness in a secret dispensation, by the Incarnation of the Word'. Accordingly, God 'chose and ordained from the beginning and before all ages, a Mother for his only-begotten Son, that by taking flesh from her, he might be born in the blessed fulness of time'.

From the truth that God chose and ordained 'from the beginning and before all ages' a Mother for his Son, it does not follow that this divine intention was necessarily made plain to mankind from the first, in language admitting of no other interpretation. There was a very real development of doctrine in the Old Testament, and indeed a progressive series of additions to the Faith, as new doctrines were revealed by God to the patriarchs and prophets.

This being the case, we could hardly have been surprised if there had been no reference at all in the books of the Old Testament to our Blessed Lady. Actually, however, there are some very significant references to her, and in particular we find the Blessed Virgin at least hinted at, and typically referred to, in the text rightly called the Protoevangelium or Original Gospel. This text is found in Gen 3:15. For details of its interpretation the reader is referred to the Commentary. We limit ourselves here to remarking that there is to be enmity between the Woman and the Serpent, as well as between the Seed of each. The victory is to be obtained by the Woman's Seed. In view of later prophecies such as those concerning Abraham's Seed, in which all the nations of the earth are to be blessed, it can hardly be doubted that, even though 'seed' may have a collective sense, the Messiah is included, i.e. Jesus Christ, in whom others are able to conquer the devil. Who, then, is the Woman? Is it Eve herself, or Mary the Mother of Jesus? Catholic scholars are not agreed as to the primary reference here. But even if the term refers in the first case to Eve, it can do so only because of her daughter Mary, the true and immediate Mother of the Seed which crushes the Serpent's head. Eve conquers through Mary, who is at once part of the (collective) Seed of the Woman, and at the same time the Mother of the Seed (in the singular).

Such is the meaning of this important text, when viewed in the light of other texts of Scripture and Catholic Tradition. It does not, however, follow that its full meaning was understood from the first. We may hold, with Canon Arendzen, in CSSL (1933), pp 3 f., that the Woman 'is not directly and exclusively Mary the Mother of Christ', and that when our first parents heard the promise of redemption, 'they only saw the direct reference to the guilty woman who stood 84g close by', just as 'in her seed they may have seen the mass of the children descending from her . . . It is certain that in the Old Testament the Redeemer is gradually revealed as one individual Person, and thus as the seed of one individual Woman'. We now know that this individual Woman is Mary.

h We must carefully note that this first Scripture reference to the Blessed Virgin is one which mentions her enmity against the powers of evil, represented by the serpent, and her victory over those powers in and through her Seed. Rightly, then, does the Catholic Church see in this text a 'designation' of the Blessed Virgin, and a foundation for the doctrine of her complete victory over sin, through her Son, in her Immaculate Conception, which preserved her from original sin, through the merits of Jesus Christ, applied beforehand to her soul. We say Mary is 'designated' here because Pope Pius IX asserts that in this text, as interpreted by 'the Fathers and ecclesiastical writers', the Redeemer is 'clare aperteque demonstratum', and his Mother is 'designatam'. The 'designatio' is obviously not so clear as the 'demonstratio'. But it is there.

After this first prophecy, Scripture is for a long time silent. The Messianic prophecies themselves were gradually added to and became clearer. Many of these were concerned less with the Messiah himself than with the Kingdom which he was to inaugurate. We could hardly expect to find references to Mary in these prophecies concerning the Kingdom. But there are two significant references to her in prophets who also deal with the personal and individual Messias.

i The first we must mention is the famous prophecy in Is 7, concerning the Virgin who is to conceive and bear a son, who is to have the name 'Emmanuel', meaning 'God with us'. Again we must leave to the Commentary a discussion of the many difficulties which this text involves. Suffice it to say that, even if a reference to some contemporary child need not be excluded, the final and definitive reference must be to the Messias. If this be so, Mary must here be indicated. It is true that the Hebrew word 'almāh' is not that technically used for a 'Virgin', but denotes simply a 'Maiden'. Nevertheless this Hebrew word combines in itself the two ideas of youth and virginity and always means an unmarried young woman; in fact, the LXX translates it by the Greek word 'parthenos', which certainly means 'virgin'. Thus, the text ultimately implies the Virginal Conception, and is rightly quoted in Mt 1:23 with this meaning. Even so, we must make a reservation similar to that made in the case of the Protoevangelium. It by no means follows that the precise meaning of the prophecy of Isaias was fully understood at the time. Indeed, it seems clear that even our Lady herself, in spite of her undoubted knowledge of the Scriptures and her internal illumination by the Holy Ghost, did not realize the full implication of this text or the fact that Virginity was compatible with Motherhood. For when informed that her Son would be the Messias, and would occupy the throne of David, she at once interposed: 'How shall this be, for I know not man?' The answer of the angel reassured her, and doubtless opened the way to a fuller understanding of the text of Isaias.

85a The second reference among the prophets to our Lady is found in the work of Micheas, a prophet contemporary with Isaias. In 5:2-3 he tells us that out of Bethlehem is to come—

'He that is to be the Ruler of Israel,

Whose origin is of old, and goes back to the days of yore. This is why God delivers them up,

Till the day when She who will bear, shall bear . . .'

Such is the translation given by Canon Arenden (Prophets, Priests and Publicans, 102). Here the advent of the Ruler of Israel at Bethlehem is linked up with a reference to his Mother. It can hardly be doubted that 'She who will bear' is the same person as 'the maiden who will conceive'. Thus the prophecy of Micheas confirms that of Isaias. It foretells the Motherhood of Mary, but throws no further light upon her.

85b There are other texts in the OT in which Catholic interpreters have found allusions or references to Mary. In some cases, however, the application to the Blessed Virgin may not be more than a typical one, and in others the meaning of the text is not clear. Thus we read in Jer 31:22: 'A woman shall encompass a man', and this has been taken to refer to Mary as the Mother of the Messias. But the original would seem to mean 'A woman shall woo a man', which appears to have no reference to the Incarnation. Yet it is certainly curious that older Jewish commentators interpreted the text of the future Messias. All this would seem to show that the Mother of the Messias formed an integral, though subordinate, part of Jewish Tradition.

In the case of some texts 'applied' to the Blessed Virgin by Christian commentators, it must remain doubtful whether the application is more than an 'accommodation'. Thus Ez 44:1-2 speaks of the eastern gate of Jerusalem, through which God alone enters, and which is henceforth for ever shut. Catholic commentators have seen in this an allusion to the perpetual virginity of Mary. But it is doubtful whether that is its inspired meaning.

In any case, given the fact that the Messias was to have a Mother who would be a person of great dignity and importance, it is not surprising that those acquainted with all the data of Tradition on the subject should apply to her texts which have a different primary significance. Ps 44, for example, gives us a picture of the Queen who stands on the right hand of the Messianic King. He is attracted by her beauty; the daughters of Tyre and the rich seek her favour; she is clothed in golden robes, and accompanied by virgins. This may certainly refer primarily to Israel, the Spouse of God, and to the Christian Church which is the spiritual Israel. But this collective meaning does not exclude the application of the text also to the King's Mother Mary.

Similarly, the Canticle of Canticles is full of praise of the King's Spouse. This is variously interpreted of Israel and the human soul. But it may also be applied to the Mother of the Messias.

Again, pious writers, and even the Church herself in her liturgy, have not hesitated to apply to the Blessed Virgin some passages of the OT which directly concern only Wisdom. Doubtless, as Cardinal Newman remarked in his Development of Christian Doctrine, ch 4, sect. 2, 8, this application to Mary arose in part from the Arian misuse of the texts in which wisdom is said to be 'created'. Even so, we must say with Pope Pius IX that the application of such texts to the Blessed Virgin is in the nature of a 'transference', justified by the fact that 'the origin of the Virgin was decreed at one and the same time with the Incarnation of the Divine Wisdom' (Ineffabilis Deus).

III. Mary in the New Testament.—'When the fulness of the time was come, God sent his Son, made of a woman, made under the Law'. This text (Gal 4:4) is the only one in which St Paul expressly refers to the Mother of Christ. But it is significant for two reasons. Firstly, in the context the phrase 'made of a woman' is almost superfluous, and would seem to have been inserted expressly. Secondly, St Paul here avoids the usual word 'born' and uses instead 'made', the same verb as is used in Jn 1:14, 'The Word was made flesh'. St Paul thus, in his one reference to our Lady, stresses her Divine Motherhood, and seems by his unusual language to call our attention to the unusual birth of Our Lord.

h St Luke and Our Lady—That birth is recorded for us in two of the Gospels, Mt and Lk. In Mt the story is told mainly from the standpoint of St Joseph, whereas St Luke's informant must ultimately have been our Lady herself. It is St Luke who records the Annunciation. Notice the angel's words, which are translated 'Hail, full of grace' in our version. Protestants prefer to translate 'highly favoured'. Lagrange concedes that the word might have this sense, though in any case the perfect participle signifies an eminent degree of beauty 85h or favour. Here the epithet takes the place of a proper name, 'as if it were especially suitable for the Virgin' (Lagrange, S. Luc., in loc.). The text implies that Mary is the object of God's bounty, which theologians understand as a gift of sanctifying grace, extraordinary, though capable of increase. In other words, as interpreted by Tradition and Catholic Theology, this text implies that Mary is indeed 'full of grace', and therefore all-holy. Reflection upon the implications of this text, taken in conjunction with the Protoevangelium, has contributed to the formulation of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, which declares that Mary was 'full of grace' from the first moment of her existence, and therefore free from the stain of original sin. This gift is hers because of her Divine Motherhood, for all Mary's graces follow from her special office as Mother of God. (It is worth adding that the doctrine of the divine Maternity led logically to the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, which has in turn thrown new light on many biblical passages referring to our Lady.) Well does her cousin Elizabeth greet her as 'Blessed among women', and pronounce the same blessing upon her Child: 'Blessed is the Fruit of thy womb'. And well does Mary herself in her Magnificat prophesy that henceforth all generations will call her blessed, because God has done great things for her. Small wonder that Elizabeth should express her joy and astonishment at receiving a visit from the Blessed Virgin, whom she calls the 'Mother of her Lord': 'Whence is this to me, that the Mother of my Lord should visit me?' (Lk 1:43). Note too that the sanctification of John in his mother's womb is the first miracle performed by Our Lady, or, rather, by the Incarnate Word through Our Lady.

Already we have an indication of the prominent position which Mary occupies in the Christian dispensation. God the Son derives from her his human nature. He will remain true man as well as true God for ever. He will therefore for ever be the Son of Mary, and Mary will for ever be the Mother of God.

Yet the fullness of her grace, and the exalted position to which she is raised by God, do not disturb her humility. She bows to God's will, and pronounces herself to be his handmaid. She keeps the great secret to herself, for she has not been authorized to communicate it as yet, and so she does not even tell her husband St Joseph, who has to be reassured by an angel.

Although the Virginal Conception and Birth can have caused no stain, Mary fulfils the prescriptions of the Jewish Law, presents her Son in the temple, buys him back again, and offers a sin-offering, in a spirit of obedience to the divine ordinances. On this occasion she hears the fearful prophecy of her own future sorrows in the mysterious words: 'Thine own soul a sword shall pierce' (Lk 2:35). Coming as they do after the prophecy that her Son is to be 'a sign which shall be contradicted', these words insinuate the compassion of Mary (in the literal sense, com-passion).

Then there is silence, until our Lord is twelve years of age, when we have the incident of his loss during a visit to Jerusalem. It is on this occasion that Mary said to Jesus: 'Son, why hast thou done so to us? Behold thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing' (Lk 2:48). Thereupon Jesus says: 'How is it that you sought me? Did you not know that I must be about my Father's business?' (or possibly: 'in the house of my Father'). The inspired narrative adds, for our instruction, that neither our Lady nor St Joseph 'understood the words he had spoken to them' (Lk 2:50). We must remember that, according to the doctrine of inspiration, the sacred writers wrote all those things and only those things which God willed them to write, and that accordingly the Holy Ghost deliberately willed these words to be written. Doubtless the Holy Ghost would have us realize that the fullness of grace which was our Lady's did not necessarily involve a corresponding fullness of knowledge of God's plans. Thus St Luke's words constitute a warning against unbridled a priori theological speculation concerning our Lady's gifts. Theological speculation there may and should be—for it is thus that doctrines develop—but in our reflections we are bound always to respect the formal statements of Scripture, and of course also the dogmatic Tradition of the Church. In virtue of this text of St Luke, we are not free to say that she knew all things, or understood all things. She had to walk by faith, as we do. For a fuller discussion of our Lady's knowledge, cf. articles by E. F. Sutcliffe, cited in the bibliography above. For a discussion of her other virtues, cf. Scheeben, op. cit.; T. Livius, The Blessed Virgin in the Fathers of the first six centuries, London, 1893—uncritical, but a mine of information.

After this incident, the veil is dropped once more over both the Mother and her Son, and we hear nothing more until the opening of the Public Ministry. Significantly enough, however, at the commencement of this Ministry we get a surprising miracle, that of the turning of water into wine at Cana, recorded in Jn 2:1-11. Here we may well note that in spite of an apparent reluctance, Jesus performs the miracle at the suggestion of his Mother. Mary says to Jesus: 'Son, they have no wine'. Our Lord replies: 'What to me and to thee?' This is a Hebrew idiom, which as Lebreton says (Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ, Vol. 1, p 52, 1935) 'was everywhere employed to resist an interference or decline a request, and there is really no room for any other interpretation here'. Jesus adds: 'My hour is not yet come'. Yet Mary is not dismayed by this apparent rebuff. She says to the waiters: 'Whatsoever he shall say to you, do ye'. Thereupon Jesus works the miracle. This is really quite in accordance with our Lord's way of acting. Over and over again in the Gospels we read how he apparently refuses requests, but only to grant them when they are repeated with greater faith and urgency. Instances are: the healing of the ruler's son at Capharnaum (Jn 4:46-54), and the healing of the daughter of the Canaanite woman (Mt 15:21-28). Moreover, Jesus himself has given us the parable of the householder who, aroused at midnight and asked for bread for unexpected guests, at first refuses and then grants the request of his neighbour 'because of his importunity', Lk 11:5-8. Hence in the incident at Cana our Lord's apparent reluctance to please his mother was meant only to evoke a greater act of faith and hope. [Others consider that our Lord aimed rather to show to posterity how powerful is Mary's intercession.—Gen. Ed.]

The event just referred to took place at the beginning of the Ministry. Mary was to take no active part in the work of the Ministry itself, for that was not her vocation. It was hers to pray, to suffer, and to minister with the other holy women. Even so, we have two further references to her in the Gospels. One was the occasion when Jesus was told that his mother was waiting to see him. He replied: 'Whosoever shall do the will of my Father that is in heaven, he is my brother and sister and mother', Mt 12:50. The other occasion was when a woman called out: 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps that gave thee suck'. To this Jesus answered: 'Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the Word of God and keep it', Lk 11:28. The purpose of these two sayings of our Lord was certainly not to dishonour or disown his blessed Mother, but rather to point out the true source of her own blessedness. She was indeed blessed because she submitted to God's will: 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord'. She heard the Word of God and kept it: 'Mary kept all these things, pondering them in her heart', Lk 2:19. As our own Venerable Bede says, 'the Mother of God is indeed blessed because she was the temporal minister of the Word Incarnate, but much more blessed because she remained the eternal keeper of his Love', Hom. in Luc., c. 11.

At the close of our Lord's life, Mary was to be associated

OUR LADY IN THE SCRIPTURES

86d with him in his Passion. For, as St John tells us, 'there stood by the Cross of Jesus, his Mother'. Jesus entrusted her to the care of St John: 'Woman, behold thy Son . . . Son, behold thy mother', Jn 19:26-27. Christian tradition from the time of Origen (Comm. in Joan., PG 14, 32) has seen in St John the representative of all Christians, of whom Mary is the spiritual Mother.

Finally, we find Mary at the birth of the Church. For when the disciples met together in the Upper Room to give themselves to prayers, awaiting the Holy Ghost, we read that Mary was there praying with them, Ac 1:14. Doubtless she received the Holy Ghost also on that occasion, though Scripture does not expressly say so.

• Catholic Tradition has consecrated a belief in our Lady's Assumption, and her Coronation as Queen of Heaven is commemorated in the Rosary, a belief that Pope Pius XII officially declared to be a dogma of the Church on 1 November 1950. There is no reference in Scripture to either of these events, whose historicity is a corollary of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, which is in turn based on the Motherhood of Mary as proclaimed in Scripture and Tradition, and on her position as the Second Eve. But it is significant that in the last book of the NT, St John, who had cared for our Lady during the remainder of her earthly life, describes a vision of 'a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars', who 'brought forth a man child who was to rule all nations with an iron rod' and who was 'taken up to God and to his throne', while the dragon made war upon the woman and 'with the rest of her seed', Apoc 12. St John tells of the 'great battle' between Michael together with his angels and the dragon with his angels, ibid. He says explicitly that the 'great dragon' is 'that old serpent who is called the devil and Satan', 12:9. The Son of the Woman, who is to rule all nations, is obviously Jesus Christ. Who, then, is the woman, and who are 'the rest of her seed'? As in the case of the OT prophecies, the seer may here be thinking of the Israel of God, continued in the Christian Church. But analogy surely suggests, to say the least, that together with this collective meaning the Woman has also a personal signification, and is none other than the Blessed Virgin, who is the Mother of Jesus and of all Christians. Pius X wrote, 'A woman clothed with the sun'. . . . Everyone knows that that woman signified the Virgin Mary who, inviolate, brought forth our Head' (Encyclical Letter Ad diem illum, 2 Feb. 1904). She, then, is 'the one clothed with the sun', with 'the moon under her feet', and 'on her head a crown of twelve stars'. Such is the picture of Mary in glory, painted for us by the inspired writer of the last book of the New Testament.

§ IV. Conclusion. Catholic Doctrine in Relation to Scripture—Such are the scriptural data concerning our Lady. In one sense they amount to little. But what Scripture does tell us is of the utmost importance, and we may say with confidence that it contains in germ most if not all of the developed doctrine of the Church concerning her office. Her position as the Woman who is to be at enmity with the Serpent, and who through her Seed is to crush its head, coupled with the doctrine of St Paul that Jesus Christ is the Second Adam, easily lead us to the principle so strongly asserted in early Tradition, that Mary is the Second Eve. This is confirmed by the traditional interpretation that at the Cross St John represented all Christians in taking Mary for his Mother, as also by the picture he has painted in his Apocalypse of the Woman clothed with the sun, who has other seed besides the Son who is to rule all the nations.

h We have seen too that careful reflection upon the enmity between the Woman and the Serpent, and the angelical salutation, 'Hail, full of grace', interpreted in the light of Catholic Tradition, has helped to illustrate the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception—a doctrine which in turn gives a full meaning to Mary's joy in God her Saviour in her Magnificat.

The statement of Simeon that a sword would pierce Mary's soul, taken in conjunction with the statement of St John that Mary stood by the Cross, provides a basis for the doctrine of the compassion of Mary, which has won for her the title of Co-Redemptrix.

Mary exercised on earth her divine Motherhood by watching over her Son during his infancy, praying and ministering to him during the Ministry, and by standing by his Cross. She exercised her Motherhood of Christians by interceding at Cana in Galilee, where the first miracle was worked, and by praying with and for the Apostles and their followers, especially before Pentecost. St John's picture of our Lady in glory gives us a glimpse of her position in heaven.

There is, of course, much more that we should like to know, especially concerning her earthly life. Scripture tells us practically nothing about Mary's parentage, her early years, or indeed her later life. It is silent about her Assumption. It was only natural that, where so much was left to our imagination or curiosity, pious Christian writers should have sought to supplement the data of Scripture. The Church has repudiated the Apocryphal Gospels, so full of details concerning our Lady. She does not deny, however, that they may contain some true traditions. Thus, the Church celebrates the feasts of Our Lady's parents, who are named in the Apocryphal Gospels as SS. Joachim and Anna (e.g. Gospel of James, Gospel of the Nativity of Mary). Similarly the Church celebrates Mary's Presentation in the Temple, an incident not mentioned in the canonical Gospels, but found in the same two apocryphal writings. The Church guarantees the occurrence of the events in question, but not the details found in these apocryphal works.

The above are instances of events outside Scripture. In other cases Scripture and Tradition both combine and illustrate each other. An interesting example is to be found in the doctrine of our Lady's perpetual virginity. That our Lady was a virgin in her conception is definitely asserted by St Matthew and St Luke, and is also implied in her question: 'How shall this be, for I know not man?' Lk 1:34. That Mary was a virgin also in the actual birth of our Lord is not expressly asserted in Scripture, but it is formulated in the Apostles' Creed, in the words 'born of the Virgin Mary'. This is in harmony with the prophecy of Isaiah, who says that the Virgin will not only conceive, but also bear a Son. Finally Christian Tradition asserts that Mary remained ever a virgin. This, again, is not directly stated in Scripture. Indeed, Scripture uses language which at first sight seems to be contrary to this doctrine, for we read that 'Joseph knew not his wife till she brought forth her firstborn son' (Mt 1:25), and again Scripture speaks of the 'brothers' and 'sisters' of Jesus. But the statement of St Matthew is an oriental expression which means precisely what it says and no more, i.e. that Joseph knew not Mary till the birth of Jesus. The 'brothers' and 'sisters' of Jesus are discussed in §§ 672-3.

This is an interesting example of the way in which Tradition clarifies and to some extent supplements Scripture. Tradition gives us the key to the meaning of Scripture. But viewed apart from Tradition—so far as this may be possible—Scripture provides us with an adequate foundation for the Catholic doctrine concerning our Lady, and for our piety and devotion towards her.

THE MIRACULOUS ELEMENT IN THE BIBLE

By E. C. MESSENGER, PH.D.

87a Bibliography—*H. S. Box, B.D., Miracles and Critics, London 1935; J. T. Driscoll, art. Miracle, CE; L. de Grandmaison, S.J., Jesus Christ, Vol. 3 (Eng. trans.), London 1934; G. H. Joyce, S.J., The Question of Miracles, London 1914; R. A. Knox, Miracles, CTS, London 1927; H. Lesêtre, art. Miracle DBV; *C. S. Lewis, Miracles, London 1947; J. H. Newman, Essay on the Miracles of Scripture, London 1870; J. de Tonquédec, art. Miracle, DAFC; *R. H. Trench (Abp), The Miracles of Our Lord, London n.d.; A. van Hove, La Notion du Miracle chez Saint Thomas, Paris 1927; also articles in Religion and Science, CSSL, 1939, by Rev. A. Manson, O.P., and Rev. C. Lattey, S.J. on Miracles, and by Canon Arendzen on The Bible.

b Ancient and Modern Attitude towards Miracles—The attentive reader of Holy Writ cannot but be struck by the prominent place which miracles occupy in the narratives. They are unhesitatingly presented as real historic events, and as certain signs of God's intervention in this world. More precisely, they are set forth as proofs that he is speaking and working through particular individuals. Thus, far from miracles needing to be proved, they are set forth in the Bible as undoubted facts which show that God is present and is speaking to us.

Modern incredulity and the rise of rationalistic exegesis, however, have radically changed this order of things, so that, far from biblical miracles being proofs of something else, it is held that they themselves are in considerable need of proof, and it is usually added that satisfactory proof of their reality is not available.

c The Supposed Impossibility of Miracles—There are two main lines of attack upon the reality of the miracles. The first is the philosophical approach. The Rationalists, for instance, insist for the most part that a miracle is an impossibility. Such a forthright statement, of course, calls for convincing proof. But the only argument which has been brought forward in support of it would seem to be that first advanced by Spinoza in his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (1670). His argument is that the laws of nature are the expression of God's Decrees, which are based upon the Divine Nature itself. But the Divine Nature cannot change, and neither can the Divine Decrees based upon it. Hence natural laws are immutable, and miracles are impossible. The reasoning is obviously fallacious, for while we may rightly urge that God cannot act against the metaphysical laws of being, which indeed have their ultimate foundation in the unchangeable Divine Nature, no such necessity is inherent in the laws of physical nature, which are, in philosophical terminology, 'contingent', and not 'necessary'. It is not possible to conceive that the laws of being, as expressed in the Principle of Contradiction, and the other first Principles, could be other than they are. But there is no such necessity inherent in physical or natural laws. Conceivably they might be different in a different order of things. Hence, as physical laws are contingent, and not metaphysically necessary, exceptions to them are not impossible.

d Another and more common argument against miracles is that they imply a change of mind in the Unchangeable God. This objection collapses if it be remembered that in our view, all miracles which have ever happened were foreseen and intended by God from the first. 87d

Again, it is urged that miracles, being derogations from or contradictions of laws of nature, imply that God's creation is imperfect, and needs to be supplemented or improved. The answer to this is that Nature is indeed perfect in its own sphere, and that miracles are primarily connected, not with the natural order, but with the supernatural order of grace. Grace perfects nature, but does not destroy it: rather, it presupposes it. The same is true of miracles and their relation to natural law.

There is thus no proof that miracles are impossible. On the contrary, we definitely assert that miracles are possible, precisely because natural laws are not in themselves absolutely necessary. The action of any one law is constantly being interfered with by the operation of some other law. A fortiori, the effect of a law in a particular case may be suspended through the special activity of the First Cause, who is the source of all Law. And that is what we mean by a miracle.

Can a miracle ever be proved?—In more modern times, the attempt to establish the impossibility of a miracle has been tacitly abandoned, and in its place we have various attempts to show that the reality of a miracle can never be established. Thus, Hume and Huxley have argued that the Principle of the Uniformity of Nature is established by universal experience. No supposed testimony to the reality of a miracle can prevail against this universal experience. But this statement obviously begs the question, because it assumes that there are not and indeed cannot be any exceptions to this general rule. In any case, human testimony which bears witness to the reality of a miracle is itself a part of universal experience. And there is no evident reason why the testimony in favour of uniformity should be accepted, while that in favour of a miraculous exception is rejected. Some modern writers object that to allow the reality of a miracle on human testimony would destroy the foundation of natural laws as such, for laws are but the expression or generalization of human experience. To that we reply that normal human testimony is quite able to provide a basis for the establishment of natural laws, and equally the exceptional human testimony to the reality of miracles establishes not only the fact of miracles, but also their miraculous character, i.e. the fact that they cannot be accounted for by the ordinary laws of nature.

Philosophical prejudices underlie rationalistic exegesis f

—These philosophical considerations have in reality had a great influence even upon those who have professed to deal with miracles solely upon the grounds of evidence. Rationalists and others may indeed pretend to be impartial when they study the books of Sacred Scripture. But an attentive student cannot fail to notice that the rationalist rejection of miracles is usually based upon a priori philosophical considerations or prejudices such as those we have just mentioned, rather than upon an objective and impartial study of the evidence for the miracles themselves. The reasoning usually takes this form: This account of a particular miracle must be rejected and regarded as legendary, or as a misunderstanding of a merely natural event, or perhaps even of a coincidence. The reason for this attitude is not always expressed, but it is evidently

THE MIRACULOUS ELEMENT IN THE BIBLE

87f based upon the supposed impossibility or improbability of a miracle really happening. Accordingly, recourse is made to various alternative explanations of the narrative. Thus Strauss (1808-74) regarded miraculous events as mythical accretions to the original narrative, and as entirely unhistorical. The growth of a legend, or the development of a myth, requires a certain space of time, and therefore Strauss maintained that the books of Scripture, and especially those of the New Testament, must have been composed or given their present form long after the events narrated in them, and indeed long after the deaths of the writers to whom they have been attributed by tradition.

88a The late dating of the New Testament has had, however, to be abandoned, and it is now admitted that it was all written during the 1st cent. The critics have fared somewhat better with the Old Testament, for their comparatively late dates for the various books still meet with very wide acceptance. Accordingly, it is urged with plausibility that as some hundreds of years elapsed between the supposed events and our present records of them, there was ample time for legendary development. Even so, the critical position is by no means so strong as it was, and modern writers, while adhering to the late dates for the books, have been compelled to allow that the materials used in them were more or less contemporary with the events recorded. Thus, modern students of the Pentateuch are disposed to attribute a large part of the materials used in it to a time not much later than that of Moses himself.

Catholics for the most part adhere to the traditional early dates of the historical books of the Old Testament, which make the records contemporary with the events, though it is admitted that there may have been a certain amount of subsequent 'editing' of the books. But we maintain that such 'editing' could not consist in the subsequent incorporation of legends devoid of any historical basis. The reason is that, in general, the miracles narrated were public events, so intimately bound up with the course of history that they actually influenced it. Thus, the whole history of Israel during the Exodus from Egypt and after its subsequent settlement in Canaan supposes the historic reality of the miracles performed by Moses in Egypt and at the Red Sea. These produced such an impression upon the minds of the Israelites that subsequent Hebrew literature was full of repercussions and reflections of these great events, which formed part of the whole national tradition. To deny the historical reality of these miracles is to destroy the foundation of the history itself. Similar considerations apply to the miracles of Elias and Eliseus. (For further treatment of OT miracles see § 226 f-h.) b The supposed natural character of miraculous events—Accordingly, some modern writers have suggested a more moderate theory. In their view, the miraculous events in the Bible had a real basis in fact. The underlying fact was some unusual event, probably due to natural causes, perhaps to unknown powers of nature, or again possibly due to the influence of mind upon matter. This is the basis of the 'faith-healing' view of miracles. Some non-Catholics accept the 'miracles of healing' narrated in the New Testament, but reject the 'cosmic miracles' in the world of inanimate nature. But there is no reasonable basis for such a distinction. Both are equally guaranteed by the records, and both are equally bound up with the history itself. Again, it is urged, especially against the New Testament, that many miracles consist in the expulsion of devils from those said to be possessed, and that the sacred writers, in accordance with the ideas of the time, attribute to diabolical possession many diseases which we now recognize to be quite normal, such as epilepsy or lunacy. But in point of fact, the New Testament writers clearly distinguish between cases of diabolical possession or obsession with their pathological accompaniments, and cases of diseases unaccompanied by any such diabolical possession, cf. Mt 4:24; 8:16; Mk 1:32, 34, etc. The existence of pathological symptoms in the case of those said to be possessed constitutes no special difficulty.

88b Why should not diabolical possession be a cause of disease in certain instances? No one has ever proved that diabolical possession is impossible. Indeed, there are many facts in history both ancient and modern which point to its reality. In any case, the books of the New Testament assert, not only that the devil was expelled but that the pathological conditions were also suddenly remedied, so that the miracle remains to be explained.

We conclude, then, that the rationalist attitude towards Scriptural miracles is unreasonable. It is based for the most part on a priori philosophical principles which are in fact false. Or else it involves an unjustifiable rejection of human testimony, or again a manipulation of the evidence for which prejudice alone can account.

The Church's Teaching on Miracles—What, then, is the Catholic attitude towards the miracles of the Bible? 89a The dogmatic position is set forth by the Vatican Council in its third Capitulum, De Fide, thus:

'In order that the service of our Faith should be agreeable to reason, God has willed to join to the internal helps of the Holy Spirit some external proofs of his revelation, namely, divine deeds, especially miracles and prophecies, which, inasmuch as they plainly show forth the omnipotence and infinite knowledge of God, are most certain signs of revelation and are suited to the intelligence of all. Wherefore, both Moses and the Prophets, and above all Christ the Lord himself, performed many and most manifest miracles and uttered prophecies; and we read of the Apostles that "they, going forth, preached everywhere, the Lord working withal and confirming the word with signs that followed".'

Also, we have the following canons of the same Vatican Council:

'If anyone shall say that divine revelation cannot be made credible by external signs, but that men must be moved to believe solely by the internal experience or private inspiration of each one, let him be anathema' Dz 1812.

'If anyone shall say that no miracles can take place, and that in consequence all the accounts of them, even those contained in Holy Scripture, must be numbered amongst fables or myths, or that miracles can never be known for certain as such, or that the divine origin of the Christian revelation cannot properly be proved by them, let him be anathema' Dz 1813.

Miracles and Revelation—There are some points about these ecclesiastical definitions which must be noted carefully. First, we observe that miracles are considered by the Council in so far as they are 'external proofs of revelation'. It is not impossible that miracles might sometimes be worked for some other purpose, not immediately connected with divine revelation—for instance, to call men's attention to God's existence. But the Council is concerned with miracles only as proofs of revelation. Miracles prove a revelation, either by confirming the authority of a religious teacher, or by confirming the truth of a doctrine preached by him.

The Council does not say that God must work miracles to prove his revelation: it only says that God has willed to do so, in order that our faith should be reasonable. Such divine intervention is eminently suitable, because it gives convincing proof that God is present and is teaching us.

The Comparative Infrequency of Miracles—This intimate connection with divine revelation explains the comparative infrequency of miracles in human history. The Vatican Council has nothing to say concerning miracles before the age of Moses: it neither affirms nor denies the existence of such divine interventions. It singles out for special mention the miracles of Moses and the Prophets in the Old Testament, and of our Lord and his Apostles in the New. This emphasizes the connexion between miracles and divine 80c revelation, for the foundation of the Mosaic religion, and the divine revelation on Mount Sinai were the occasion for an extraordinary number of miracles. There were some others, of course, which accompanied the establishment of the Chosen People in the land of Canaan, but they were less frequent and not so striking.

The next prominent group of miracles occurs in the vindication of the religion of Jahweh under the Monarchy—a vindication which was especially necessary in view of the tendency of the Chosen People to fall into idolatry and to adopt the pagan ideas of the peoples around them. There were few miracles during the Captivity: this catastrophe was in itself a manifest divine intervention and the fulfilment of prophecies. One might have expected a new outburst of miracles at the return from the Captivity. But miracles and prophecies almost ceased, and these special divine interventions were renewed only at the advent of Christ our Lord, when the divine revelation was given to us in its final form.

This intimate connexion between miracles and revelation enables us to see the reason for the miracles of Scripture. These are, as we have said, connected mainly with divine revelation. If the Mosaic religion was, as we hold, a special revelation from God—a fact which is confirmed by its transcendent character compared with the corrupt and immoral religions of the surrounding peoples—then it is not surprising that God should have confirmed his word by miracles. The same applies, of course, to the miracles of the New Testament.

d Are we bound to believe in Particular Miracles?—

Next, we must note that the Vatican Council, though mentioning groups of miracles, does not mention any particular one. Of course, the enumeration of two particular miracles in the Creeds—the Virginal Conception and Birth, and the Resurrection of our Lord—shows that these must specifically be accepted as of faith. Belief in other Scriptural miracles, taken individually, does not stand on the same footing. It is not precisely part of the defined Catholic Faith that every single marvellous event narrated in the Old and New Testaments was in fact a miracle. We are certainly bound to believe in the existence of groups of miracles, as we have already explained. But it would not be precisely heretical to say that some particular marvel narrated in the Old or New Testament was not in reality a true miracle. The Church leaves adequate room for discussion concerning the miraculous character of particular events. And the recent explicit approval by Pope Pius XII of the doctrine that there are varieties of literary form in the Bible emphasizes this freedom. Thus, it is arguable that the common interpretation of the story of Jonas and the sea-monster is not necessarily the correct one. Again, there might be something to be said for the view that the Book of Tobias, with its strange miracles, is not really intended to be regarded as history but is a kind of pious romance. The majority of Catholic scholars will doubtless adhere to the conservative and traditional view, at least for the present. But we must not regard the more liberal view as heretical, or indeed as unsound, unless and until the Church officially declares it to be such.

90a Some will doubtless hold that, while other literary forms may exist in the Bible, the form of a 'pious romance' is hardly compatible with the divine veracity. Leaving that question to be decided by the theologians and the exegetes, it is at least safe to call attention to the existence of the literary form of poetry, even in the historical books. That this has its bearing upon the study of some of the Scriptural miracles will be evident from the case of Josue's command that the sun should stand still. Poetry is the natural home of metaphor. It may be urged that the sacred writer himself says that the sun stood still and did not go down for a whole day, Jos 10:13. That is true. But Fr. Kugler, S.J., has shown that it was customary for ancient writers to call eclipses, thunder-storms and similar darknesses 'rests' of the sun and moon. We have an example of this use of the term in Hab 3:11. In any case 90a the context in Josue shows that there was an unprecedented storm of hail, which dealt death at the opposing army. It was almost as dark as night, but after the storm, the sun reappeared, riding in the heavens as before. The divine intervention is still there. But as Canon Arendzen has put it, 'the miracle consisted, not in a useless standing still of sun and moon in the sky, but in the abnormal continuance of a storm which completely hid the sun during the day and the moon during the night' (op. cit., p 218). [For other views on Jos 10:13 f. see the commentary in loc., § 232 f-i.]

Miracles and Natural Causes—This naturally leads us b to a more difficult and delicate question. How far did natural causes and powers contribute to the miraculous events in Scripture? That these natural forces did play some part is evident at least in the case of the passage of the Red Sea, for Ex 14:21 says: 'When Moses had stretched forth his hand over the sea, the Lord took it away by a strong and burning wind blowing all the night, and turned it into dry ground, and the water was divided'. It is not impossible that natural phenomena also played some part in many of the Plagues of Egypt. As Canon Arendzen has written: 'The Nile waters turn red, breed frogs, mosquitoes, flies. Murrain attacks the cattle, ulcers come on man and beast, a hail-storm wrecks and destroys all on the fields, a cloud of locusts devours the crops, a darkness covers the land. These nine plagues are not infrequent disasters which afflict the land of Egypt. . . . The Catholic has no temptation to explain the miracles in Egypt away, but deeper scientific knowledge of the natural phenomena in Egypt has shown him that the miracles lay, not in their bizarre character, but in that a series of national calamities, of a kind not otherwise unknown, was evoked and ceased at the bidding of Moses'. He adds that 'obviously the exemption of the children of Israel from the effect of these plagues is of a miraculous kind, and cannot be explained by science', and that 'the death of the firstborn of the Egyptians is manifestly an event which lies beyond the explanation of science' (op. cit. pp 216-17). Similarly, it has been suggested that the miraculous crossing of the Jordan recorded in Jos 3-4 may have been due to a landslide or an earthquake such as has happened in those regions in comparatively recent times. But in this particular instance the crossing was prophesied beforehand. From the Jordan the Israelites proceeded to the siege of Jericho, where we are told that the walls fell down after seven days of procession round the city. Recent archaeological research has shown that the double east wall of the city did indeed collapse, and it has been suggested that either defective foundations or an earthquake may have been partial causes. But even if natural causes played their part, God's intervention is no less evident.

In this connexion it is interesting to note that, c according to Aquinas (ST I, 105, 8), a miracle may exceed the powers of nature either as regards the nature of the fact, in which case we have the highest kind of miracle; or secondly, as regards not the fact itself but the subject in which the action takes place; or thirdly, as regards the manner and order of the event. The first category would comprise events which nature could never bring about, e.g. the presence of two bodies in one and the same position in space. The second grade would consist in an event which nature can bring about, but not in that particular subject. It is interesting to note that St Thomas includes in this second category the giving of life to a dead body, for he argues that Nature can give life, but not to a corpse. The third and lowest category, which exceeds the powers of nature only in mode and order, includes the sudden bringing about of a cure which could be effected in a longer period by natural means, or the sudden production of a storm of rain, apart from the action of the ordinary natural causes. St Thomas thus seems to exclude any activity of these natural causes. But why should these not be present and active, God 90c supplementing their natural activity, so that they lead to a result which they could not produce by their ordinary power? Such an event would of course be a true miracle, for it could not take place without an exercise of special divine power. We could apply this to some of the physical cures recorded in the Bible, and to many which have happened since, down to our own day.

THE MIRACULOUS ELEMENT IN THE BIBLE

In any case St Thomas and all Catholic theologians after him hold that the raising of a dead person to life exceeds the powers of nature, and is definitely a true miracle, though of the second order. Such miracles occur both in the Old and New Testaments, the supreme example being the Resurrection of our Lord.

91a Diabolical and Other Marvels—The fact that natural causes may play some part in certain miracles enables us to understand the possibility of wonders being wrought by human means, with or without the aid either of devils or of angels. Both Old and New Testaments bear witness to the existence of such marvellous happenings. Thus, Pharaoh's 'magicians' were able to imitate the results of some of the plagues of Egypt. In the New Testament we have the case of Simon Magus, who deceived many by his 'sorceries'. Yet there are limits, and the magicians themselves were forced to recognize the power of God in the miracles of Moses. And Simon Magus 'wondered to see the signs and exceeding great miracles' done by the Apostles. There is plenty of room for speculation as to the means whereby Pharaoh's magicians and Simon Magus had worked their own marvels. Probably natural powers would account for much, if not all. But though natural powers may have played their part also in the divine miracles, God's intervention was quite manifest, because the effects produced transcended the powers of nature, either in the fact, or in the mode or circumstances of the fact.

[There is also a Moral and Religious Quality in the Divine Miracles (cf. their connexion with Revelation). It may of course be argued that no wonder worked by any created agent, whether angel, devil or wizard, could really be supernatural, since any power they had would be a natural power. This is no doubt true, though from the point of view of physical nature these powers might be of a higher order, and so if not supernatural, at least preter-natural. But however true this might be, from the standpoint of ordinary mortals it remains hard to tell the difference between them in fact. That is where the difference between the evidential character of Divine Miracles and their connexion with revelation is so important. One immediately senses that they are from God because of this. That is, perhaps, why our Lord refused to perform any miracle that did not bear on it the evident stamp of divine origin 91a but might seem like a magical or diabolical wonder: as in the wilderness, or where faith was positively refused. St Paul also tells the Church to try the Spirits by their witness to the Truth, or denial of it.—Gen. Ed.] The reality of the NT miracles—Abundant as the evidence is for the reality of the Old Testament miracles, the evidence is still more cogent in the case of those recorded in the New. The books narrating them were written by eye-witnesses, or were based on the testimony of eye-witnesses. The miracles were many and varied. Thus, we have miracles wrought on irrational beings, such as the miraculous draughts of fishes, the stilling of storms, the multiplications of loaves and fishes, etc.; the curing of innumerable physical maladies, some temporary, e.g. fever; others chronic, e.g. paralysis; and others organic, e.g. the man born blind. These are distinct from the exorcism of those possessed by devils. Finally we have the supreme miracles of the raising of the dead to life. We have already pointed out that those miraculous events are bound up with the history itself, and that the one cannot be separated from the other. Most of these miracles were wrought in public and were well known, so that St Peter was able to say to the Jews that Jesus of Nazareth was 'a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs which God did by him in the midst of you, as you do know', Ac 2:22. Our Lord's bitterest opponents who disbelieved in his claims did not dare to deny the reality of his miracles. Indeed, they 'gathered a Council and said: "What do we, for this man doth many miracles?"', Jn 11:47. As they could not deny them, instead they attributed them to the use of diabolical power, Mk 3:22, Lk 11:15, or else they complained that they were worked on the Sabbath Day (Mk 3:23 f. and parallel passages). Quadratus, Bishop of Athens, writing at the beginning of the 2nd cent., was able to say that those whom Christ had cured were well known to many, long after Christ himself had died (in Eusebius, H.E. IV, c 3). Our Lord worked his miracles expressly in confirmation of his divine mission (cf. Mt 11:4-5; Jn 10:25, 37-38, etc.) or in proof of his teaching. This provides an explanation of the statement which has puzzled many, that at Nazareth Jesus could work no miracles 'because of their unbelief', Mt 13:58, Mk 6:5. It was not that the lack of faith in Christ's hearers made the working of a miracle physically impossible. Rather their obstinacy rendered the miracle useless in advance, for it would have failed in its primary purpose. It must never be forgotten that, while a miracle is a manifestation of God's Power, its performance is regulated by God's Wisdom.

THE APOCRYPHA

OF THE OLD TESTAMENT AND NEW TESTAMENT

By R. J. FOSTER

92a Bibliography—*R. H. Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT in English, Oxford, 1913, 2 vol.; idem., Between the Old and New Testaments, London, 1914; J. E. Steinmueller, A Companion to Scripture Studies, New York, 1941; *A Companion to the Bible, ed. T. W. Manson, Edinburgh, 1943; *M. R. James, Apocrypha Anecdota, Cambridge, 1893-7 (= Texts and Studies, II (3) and V (1)); ibid., The Lost Apocrypha of the Old Testament, their Titles and Fragments, London, 1920; ibid., The Apocryphal New Testament, Oxford, 1924; *E. Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments, 2 vols, Tübingen, 1900; *C. Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Leipzig, 1851; ibid. Apocalypses Apocryphae, Leipzig, 1866; DBV(S) Apocryphes; H. Pope, The Apocryphal Books of NT, in The New Testament (Papers read at the Cambridge Summer School), 1937. Ed. C. Lattey, S.J.; M.-J. Lagrange, Le Messianisme chez les Juifs, Paris, 1909; S. Székely, Bibliotheca Apocrypha, Freiburg i. Br., 1913; *E. Schürer, The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, Edinburgh, 1900; Institutiones Biblicae, I, 2, 73 ff.; DBV (S) 1, 354 ff.; CE 1, 601 ff.; HDB 1, 110 ff.; DTC 1, 1479 ff.; 1498 ff.

b The name Apocrypha is applied by Catholics to writings of a religious character, outside the scriptural Canon, which, though not inspired, made some pretensions to divine authority or were sometimes considered as sacred. To prevent possible misunderstanding it might be well to recall the different use of the word in Catholic and Protestant circles. By Protestants the term is applied to books which we hold to be inspired and canonical, i.e. the deuterocanonical books (cf. § 13a-f), and also to the Prayer of Manasses and 3 and 4 Esdras (cf. §§ 92f, 93b, i). Catholics reserve the name for those uncanonical writings, of uncertain or spurious origin, which appeared sometimes anonymously but usually under the assumed names of various patriarchs, prophets or apostles about the beginning of the Christian era. For these the Protestants introduced the name Pseudepigrapha.

This different usage of the term 'Apocrypha' in Catholic and Protestant circles is very confusing. In this article we use 'Apocrypha' and 'apocryphal' in the Catholic sense only, unless otherwise indicated. It is interesting to note that among the list of 'The Apocrypha' in the official AV and RV Anglican Bibles there are three items, viz., The Prayer of Manasses and 1 and 2 Esdras (in Catholic terminology, 3 and 4 Esdras) which Catholics regard as truly apocryphal, i.e. as being outside the Canon; the remaining items we regard as truly canonical (deuterocanonical as opposed to protocanonical, cf. § 13). The official view of the Church of England still is that its 'Apocrypha' are not fully inspired, so that while it reads them 'for example of life and instruction of manners, but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine' (Art VI of the English Church [Lat. 1562, Eng. 1571]).

c Meaning of the Name—Etymologically the name is a neuter plural from the Greek ἀποκρύφω, which means hidden or secret. When first applied to writings, it was used in a laudatory sense of books kept secret because they contained esoteric doctrine too sacred to be revealed to any save the initiated.

Thus the disciples of the Gnostic Prodicus boasted that they possessed the secret books, βιβλίου ἀποκρύφους of Zoroaster, Clement of Alexandria Strom. 1, 15. P.G. 8, 773. In this way, too, St Gregory of Nyssa refers to the NT, speaking of Apoc as ἐν ἀποκρύφους In suam ordinationem, P.G. 46, 549; cf. also JE 2, 1; 4 Esd 14:45 f. By degrees the original meaning became obscured, giving way to the unfavourable sense which it still retains, partly, no doubt, because esoteric literature flourished most amongst heretical sects and partly because the books themselves were pseudonymous.

Origen used it in a derogatory sense of questionable works which contained 'much that is corrupt and contrary to the true faith', Prol. Cant. PG 13, 83. It eventually connoted writings which were false, spurious or heretical. St Augustine, for instance, writes, 'Let us omit, then, the fables of those scriptures which are called apocryphal, because their obscure origin was unknown to the fathers from whose authority the true Scripture has been transmitted to us . . .'; and again, 'Many writings are produced by heretics under the names both of other prophets, and, more recently, under the names of apostles, all of which, after careful examination, have been set apart from canonical authority under the title of Apocrypha', The City of God, Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1934, 2, 95 f. And so the name came to be applied to certain Jewish and Christian writings, outside the Canon, composed about the beginning of the Christian era, of doubtful authority and ascribed to various patriarchs, prophets or apostles. In this way we understand the expression today. The Apocrypha are spoken of as OT or NT Apocrypha according as their subject matter refers to the OT or NT. The former are usually of Jewish, the latter of Christian origin, though many of the Jewish Apocrypha contain Christian interpolations.

It was not until Jerome's time that the word was used of the deuterocanonical books, and he was the first to do so (cf. PL 22, 877); his practice was followed by others, and in the sixteenth cent., when the Protestants adopted the Jewish Canon, they designated as Apocrypha the books they rejected.

THE APOCRYPHA OF THE OT

Their Origin and Purpose—Their origin was due to the unfortunate plight of, and depressed state prevailing amongst, the chosen people just before and during the commencement of the Christian era. Despairing of the times in which they lived, conscious of their enslavement to the hard yoke of foreign domination, they felt keenly the disparity between their present state and the ideal future which was assuredly one day to be theirs. With no prophetic voice to guide, encourage and console them, the writers of the Apocrypha strove to turn the eyes of the nation to a time, not far distant, when Israel would realize its destiny as a nation chosen apart. They gloried in painting a vivid picture of the triumphant reign of the Messiah, soon to come, in which all God's promises would be fulfilled and the triumph of the just would be evident to all. Hope is the keynote of the Apocrypha and, it has been well said, hope is the main underlying motive power which prompted the writing of many of f To bring about this transformation of outlook various methods were adopted. At one time the writers would modify the sacred text of the Scriptures, as it were rewriting it to suit their purpose; at another they would select one of the great characters of old and set him before their readers with added fictitious details and embellishments to inspire enthusiasm and provoke imitation (cf. Schürer, Div. 2, 3, p. 133 f.). Most frequently they adopted the prophetic or apocalyptic method, peering into the hidden future and, in mysterious and enigmatic form, revealing its supposed secrets. To accomplish their purpose more surely, they chose to compel the attention of their contemporaries by assuming the names and guise of the men of the ancient and classic past. They wrote as though from the early days of Israel's history, but foretelling to their own generation what was shortly to come to pass. In this way they could effectively issue warnings and inspire hope. How well they succeeded has been summed up by Schürer, 'If we find that, from the date of the tax imposed by Quirinius, whereby Judaea was placed directly under Roman administration, revolutionary tendencies among the people grew stronger and stronger year by year till they led at last to the great insurrection of the year 66, then there cannot be a doubt that this process was essentially promoted if not exclusively caused by the apocalyptic literature', loc. cit., p. 48.

92e them. This apocryphal literature served, in various ways, to rekindle in the Jews their intense faith in their own inevitable glorious destiny. It thus afforded them comfort in their trials, satisfied the demand for prophetic guidance and helped to solve the perennial problems of the suffering of the just and the apparent hopelessness of any fulfilment of the prophetic utterances of the past. It also served to drive home the pre-eminence of the Law and the need for its strict observance, whilst throwing light on many of their theological questions, such as the prosperity of the wicked, the certainty of judgement and retribution, and the resurrection of the dead.

g Division of Apocrypha—Although no division of the Apocrypha is entirely satisfactory nor completely free from criticism since many might be said to belong to more than one category, we might group them into three classes according to their character. This list is by no means exhaustive (cf. Charles, op. cit.).

Apocalyptic Apocrypha—Ethiopic and Slavonic Henoch, Assumption of Moses, 4 Esdras, Syriac and Greek Apocalypse of Baruch, Apocalypse of Abraham, Apocalypse of Elias, Testament of Abraham, Apocalypse of Sophonias, Sybilline Oracles.

Historical Apocrypha—Book of Jubilees, 3 Esdras, 3 Maccabees, Life of Adam and Eve (or Apocalypse of Moses), Ascension of Isaiah, History of the Rechabites, Sadokite Fragment, Book of Aseneth, Testament of Job, Testament of Solomon.

Didactic Apocrypha—Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Psalm 151, Psalms of Solomon, Odes of Solomon, Prayer of Manasses, 4 Maccabees. Considerations of space preclude a detailed treatment, but it is possible to give a short description of some of the more important books.

1 APOCALYPTIC APOCRYPHA

h The Ethiopic Henoch, perhaps the most important of the Apocrypha, is an apocalyptic work, composite in character, whose various parts range from c. 200 B.C. almost up to 1 B.C. It is known as 1 Henoch to distinguish it from the later Apocalypse, 2 Henoch; or, alternatively, as Ethiopic Henoch to distinguish it from the Slavonic 2 Henoch after the earliest extant versions of each. The original language of both of them is thought to be Hebrew or Aramaic.

The book falls into 6 parts: 1-36, The Angelic Book, which recounts the judgement and punishment of the angelic 'watchers' who fell on account of their love for the daughters of men, Gen 6:1-4, Henoch's intercession for them, and finally his journeys through the earth and Sheol. It is an attempt to explain the origin of sin and evil in the world.

37-69: The Book of Parables contains three parables or similitudes: the first reveals the secrets of heaven, the second the Messias, the Elect One, the Son of Man, and the third tells of the Great Judgement and the happiness of the just. In a passage remarkable alike for its doctrine and beauty of expression, the second parable describes the Son of Man: 'And before the sun and the heavenly signs were created, before the stars of heaven were made, his name was named before the Lord of spirits. He shall be a staff for the just, that they may lean upon him and not fall; he shall be the light of peoples, and he shall be the hope of those who suffer in their hearts. All those who dwell upon the dry land shall prostrate themselves and adore him, and they shall bless and sing praises to the Lord of spirits'; cf. L. de Grandmaison, Jesus Christ (London, 1932) 2, 27 f., where he discusses the phrase Son of Man and the use made of it by our Lord. 72-82: The Book of Astronomy which comprises the revelations of the angel Uriel to Henoch concerning the heavenly bodies. 83-90: The Book of Visions, which is Henoch's vision of the Flood and of Israel's history up to the establishment of the Messias' reign. 91-105: The Book of Exhortation, a warning foretelling the doom of sinners and the blessings of the just. 93+91:12-17: Apocalypse of Weeks, which stresses the final triumph of the just, their reward, and the final damnation of the wicked.

The Slavonic Henoch is an apocalypse which is sometimes known as the Secrets of Henoch. From its references to sacrifice it is concluded that the book was written before A.D. 70, and it probably belongs to the first cent. of the Christian era. Henoch in his 365th year is said to have been taken up by angels through the seven heavens to the throne of God. He sees the angels who rule the stars and keep the storehouses of snow and dew. The apostate angels ask him to pray for them. The main interest of the work is the light it throws on some scriptural allusions such as the seven heavens, the presence of evil spirits 'in heavenly places', and Ezechiel's creatures 'full of eyes' (cf. CE 1, 603).

The Assumption of Moses—This work typical of the apocalyptic apocrypha was first edited in 1861 from a 6th cent. Latin MS found in the Ambrosian Library, Milan. The first few lines, which probably contained the title, and the end of the book are missing. It was written in Hebrew or Aramaic by a Palestinian Pharisee shortly after the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6. In character it is something like a Testament or Farewell-speech. Moses, after appointing Josue his successor, foretells the entry of the Israelites into Canaan, the subsequent schism of the ten tribes, the ever-increasing religious corruption, the Captivity, the impiety of priests and kings, but, in the end, the final heavenly judgement by which Israel would be raised to the stars. It is a good example of the attempts made to halt the growing secularization of religion and to inculcate strict obedience to the Law.

The Fourth Book of Esdras is one of the most widely circulated, read and translated of the Apocrypha. It is a composite work: chh 3-14 were the Jewish original, to which the Christians added chh 1-2; 15-16. The Jewish part, written in Hebrew or Aramaic and dating back to the second half of the first cent. A.D. contains seven visions made to Esdras in Babylon during the Exile. The ever-present problems of human life form the subject of these visions: the trials of the just, the prosperity of the wicked, and the apparent greatness of the number of the damned.

The author finds his answer in the inability of the limited intellect of man fully to comprehend the plans of God, owing to the immensity of divine wisdom. In the last vision Esdras is bidden to write some books of instruction for future generations, because the Law had been burnt and the people had become ignorant 921 of it. Esdras then dictated to five scribes twenty-four books which were to be for all, and, in addition, seventy which were esoteric or reserved for the wise.

Several antiphons and liturgical texts, including the famous Reproaches on Good Friday, the Easter antiphons for martyrs, and the Requiem Aeternam of the office of the Dead, may be traced to this book. Their presence in our liturgy may be due to Byzantine influence (cf. I. Schuster, The Sacramentary (London, 1924), I, 80 f., 405).

m The Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch is so called from the Syriac form in which it has come down to us. Though written towards the end of the first cent. A.D., it professes to describe revelations made to Baruch at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. Charles describes it as 'almost the last noble utterance of Judaism before it plunged into the dark and oppressive years that followed the destruction of Jerusalem', CAP 2, 470. It is noteworthy for its treatment, from the point of view of the Pharisees, of such important doctrines as the Messiah and his kingdom, original sin and free-will, the future judgement and the resurrection.

The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch is of Jewish origin, and relates the journey of Baruch through the five heavens. It belongs to the second cent., and shows signs of having been edited by a Christian writer.

n The Apocalypse of Abraham belongs to the end of the first or beginning of the second cent. A.D., and is of Jewish origin. It was originally written in Hebrew or Aramaic. Chh 1-8 tell of Abraham's conversion from idolatry to monotheism: the remaining chapters, which are apocalyptic, comprise visions concerning the future of the Jewish race.

o The Sibylline Oracles in their present form consist of twelve books numbered 1-8; 11-14; an enumeration which does not represent any single MS but is the result of the fusion of three different types of text (cf. *H. N. Bate, The Sibylline Oracles (London, 1918) 16). The oracles and predictions ascribed to the Sibyl, the oldest of the Greek prophets, enjoyed great popularity and veneration throughout the Graeco-Roman world. In the capital itself they were jealously guarded and consulted in times of serious crisis. Her prophecies, marked by no fixed sequence or form, spoke of doom and disaster. Because of their awe-inspiring influence in moulding the religious thought and outlook of the time, the Hellenistic Jews of Alexandria enlisted the support of this kind of literature during the second cent. B.C. as a powerful means of propagating Jewish doctrine and faith. This practice continued down to Christian times and was borrowed by Christians themselves who, in their turn, brought into existence Christian Sibylline oracles. In some cases Christians revised or interpolated the Jewish sibylline writings, and it is now almost impossible to determine exactly what is Christian and what Jewish. Arendzen writes, 'Probably a dozen different Jewish hands, if not more, worked at the Sibyllines from 160 B.C. to A.D. 240. The varying fortunes of the Jewish race for four hundred years are thus mirrored in this collection of oracles. They are mostly oracles of doom on Israel's foes, and rather poor copies of the Burdens against the nations of Isaías, Jeremias and Ezechiel. The destruction of the world by water, fire, war, pestilence, earthquake and famine, and the subsequent happiness of Israel in the Messianic kingdom are commonplaces which grow monotonous', J. P. Arendzen, Men and Manners in the Days of Christ (London, 1928) 166. So it is that in the Dies Irae the Sibyl and David are quoted as testifying to the terrors of the judgement day, Teste David cum Sibylla, cf. *F. J. E. Raby, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry (Oxford, 1927) 446 f.

HISTORICAL APOCRYPHA

93a The Book of Jubilees derives its name from the fact that it divides the history of Israel, of which it treats, from the Creation to the time of Moses and the giving of the Law on Sinai into jubilee periods of forty-nine years. It is really a free reproduction of the biblical narrative, interspersed with legendary additions, with special emphasis on the greatness of the Law and its abiding validity, and upon the divine origin of certain legal practices, the strict observance of which it is concerned to inculcate. The author was desirous of a reform in the rules concerning the regulation of the calendar and festivals. It is also known as the Little Genesis and the Apocalypse of Moses, to whom the revelation was supposed to have been made on Sinai by the Angel of the Presence, 1, 27. Its date and authorship are uncertain; it may belong to the late second or first cent. B.C.

The Third Book of Esdras must be distinguished from b the canonical books of Esdras and Nehemias. Confusion is apt to arise since 3 Esd is sometimes called 1 Esd from its position in the LXX, the old Latin and Syriac versions, while Esd Neh which follow it are called 2 Esd. In the Vg it is set apart from the canonical books in an appendix under the name 3 Esd. For the most part the book corresponds with Esd Neh with the exception of the added section, 3:1-5:6, which is taken from elsewhere and describes an intellectual competition between three members of Darius' bodyguard in which Zorobabel, one of the three, was successful. 3 Esd seems to be independent of Esd Neh, and it is suggested that there are good grounds for maintaining that it is a direct translation of a Hebrew-Aramaic original, which differed in many ways, notably in the historical sequence of events, from the MT.

The Third Book of Maccabees—This is a strange title e for a book in which Maccabean history finds no place, but is due, no doubt, to its position in MSS after the first two Maccabean books. The author writes of events in Egypt during the reign of Ptolemy Philopater after his victory over Antiochus the Great at Raphia in 217 B.C. Enraged by the High Priest's refusal to allow him to enter the Holy of Holies, Ptolemy resolved to take his revenge on the Jews living in his domains. Ch 4 describes how they were brought to Alexandria and cruelly tormented. The king finally ordered that they should all be trampled to death in the hippodrome at Alexandria by infuriated elephants. At the prayer of Eleazar, a priest, angels sent from heaven rescue the Israelites by turning the elephants against their keepers. As a result of this Ptolemy becomes their friend and protector, issues a letter proclaiming their loyalty, grants them a seven days' feast, and allows them to return home and take vengeance upon apostates. The purpose behind the story is obviously to stimulate the enthusiasm of the Jews for their religion, to encourage them in adversity, to warn apostates, and to vindicate Jewish loyalty to civil authority. Events similar to those recounted in 3 Mac are to be found in Josephus Contra Apionem, 2, 5, but in a different context. Both accounts are based upon some historical events the time and circumstances of which cannot now be accurately determined. The book was written in Greek and belongs to the first cent. B.C. according to some scholars, but other prefer a later date, at the beginning of the first cent. A.D.

The Life of Adam and Eve, or Apocalypse of Moses— d The Latin Life of Adam and Eve and the Greek Apocalypse of Moses are both based upon the same Hebrew or Aramaic Jewish original. 'It is possible to prove that the apocryphas, Apocalypsis Moysis and Vita Adae et Evae, and to a certain degree even their Slavonic, Syriac, Ethiopic, and Arabic offshoots are of identical Jewish origin', JE 1, 179. These works embody a mass of legend about the life of our first parents. They serve to show later Jewish teaching, especially on the resurrection and future life, at the end of the first cent. A.D. when they were written.

The Ascension of Isaias is a composite work comprising e three originally distinct writings, the Martyrdom of Isaias, 1:1-3:12 and 5:1b-14, which is of Jewish origin;

98e a christian apocalypse, known as the Testament of Ezechias, 3:13-5:1a; and the Vision of Isaias, also of Christian origin, 6:1-11:40.

In its present form it seems to date back to the second cent. A.D., but the first part is more likely to be earlier, probably belonging to the first cent., if not to pre-Christian times. We are introduced, in the earlier section, to Isaias the prophet foretelling his own death at the hands of Manasses, the king in 'whose heart Beliar dwelt'. He is later denounced to the king for his alleged prophecies against him and against Jerusalem. The outcome of it all is the martyrdom of Isaias, told in the story, so familiar to Jews and Christians, of his being sawn asunder with a wooden saw (cf. ch 5). But meanwhile the so-called Testament of Ezechias has explained the reason for Beliar's hatred of Isaias, namely because he had foretold the destruction of Satan's power by Christ. The third part, the Vision, describes the prophet's journeys through the seven heavens where he is allowed to contemplate many hidden secrets. The chief value of the work is the light it throws upon the life of the early Church.

f The Book of Aseneth is a romance woven round the references to Joseph's marriage to Aseneth in Gen 41:45 ff. It is Jewish in character, but has been subjected to Christian revision. Its date is probably second cent. A.D. Kohler says it belongs to 'the Hellenistic propaganda literature by which Jewish writers endeavoured to win the non-Jewish world for the Jewish faith, while at the same time representing their Hebrew ancestors as physical as well as moral heroes', JE 2, 176.

DIDACTIC APOCRYPHA

g The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs—The general theme of this work is ethical. The twelve sons of Jacob are represented as giving their last words to their children, as Jacob himself had done to his sons in Gen 49:1-27. Each discourse falls into three parts, a brief autobiographical sketch of the Patriarch with emphasis upon his characteristic vice or virtue, then a moral lesson and exhortation based upon it, and finally a prophecy regarding the future of his descendants. The original language was either Hebrew or Aramaic, and its date was the second half of the 2nd cent. B.C. The Greek text contains some Christian interpolations.

h The Psalms of Solomon—These Psalms, eighteen in number, were written at about the time when Pompey captured Jerusalem, 63 B.C. Their author, a Palestinian Pharisee, expresses his confidence in God and the future, his contempt for wrongdoers, his sorrow at his country's misfortunes, and his opposition to the Hasmonean dynasty. His hope is fixed on the coming glorious reign of the Messias. The reason for their ascription to Solomon is not clear; the title may, of course, be a later scribal addition.

i The Prayer of Manasses owes its origin to 2 Par 33:11-13; 18 f. It is an attempt to supply the prayer to which the passage refers. Though short the prayer is beautiful: it opens with praise of God, vv 1-7; then follows an earnest prayer for pardon from sin, vv 8-18; it concludes with a short doxology. This prayer is found in the appendix to the Vg. The text of the prayer appears for the first time in the Didascalia, 2, 22, but its composition is much earlier, probably first cent. B.C.

j The Fourth Book of Maccabees is a Hellenistic work, written at the beginning of the Christian era, with the purpose of showing that right reason, under the guidance of the Law, was the complete master of all the passions—it is an attempt to blend orthodox Jewish faith and Stoic philosophy. The theme is illustrated from Jewish history, especially from the heroic sufferings of the Maccabean martyrs; hence the title of the book. It has been argued that it was primarily a lecture or address for the synagogue.

Psalm 151 is found as an additional psalm in the LXX with the title: 'This psalm was written by David with his own hand, though it is outside the number, composed when he fought Goliath (sic) in single combat'. It is a short psalm of eight verses, in which David boasts that though the least of his brethren, he was chosen to fight and overcome Goliath. Its origin is uncertain, and it has no claim to be considered genuine. Part of it, however, is to be found in the second responsory of Matins for Sundays and Thursdays after Pentecost: 'He it was who sent his angel and took me from my father's sheep, and anointed me with the oil of his anointing'. The text of the psalm is to be found in HDB 4, 146.

THE APOCRYPHA OF THE NT

We do not include under this heading those books, produced during the 1st and 2nd cent., now grouped together under the name Apostolic Fathers, some of which, for a short time, seemed to linger on the edge of the Canon before being finally excluded, such as the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, the Epistles of Ignatius, the Epistle of Barnabas and the Pastor of Hermas. We intend to confine ourselves, rather, to those writings which seem to make a false claim to be considered canonical and part of the NT, and of which some were tendentious or heretical. They may be conveniently grouped, analogously to the NT, as Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypses.

Apocryphal Gospels—The Gospels according to the Hebrews, according to the Egyptians, of the Ebionites. The Protevangelium of James, the Gospels of Peter, Thomas, Bartholomew, Nicodemus, and Philip. The Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, the History of Joseph the Carpenter, and the Assumption of Mary.

Apocryphal Acts—Acts of Peter, John, Paul. The Preaching of Peter, Acts of Andrew, Thomas, Philip, Matthew, Barnabas.

Apocryphal Epistles—Letters of our Lord and Abgar; Letters of Paul and Seneca; Correspondence between Paul and the Corinthians, the Epistle to the Laodiceans, the Epistle of the Apostles or Discourses of our Lord with the Apostles.

Apocryphal Apocalypses—Apocalypses of Peter, Paul, Thomas, Stephen, John, Blessed Virgin Mary, and others.

In addition to these there are the Agrapha, i.e. deeds or sayings of our Lord which find no mention in the Gospels (cf. Jn 20:30; 21:25), but which have been preserved and handed down to us by tradition. They are to be found here and there in the writings of the Fathers, in some biblical MSS and a few papyri fragments, but not many of them are considered authentic (cf. Steinmueller, 1, 117).

The Origin of the NT Apocrypha—It may be said, briefly, that the NT Apocrypha owe their existence to the fact that the narratives given to us in the canonical Scriptures are short and often undetailed. People were anxious to know more about our Lord's birth and early life. They wished for more details about his Mother and the other characters who played a part in the Gospel story. They wanted to know where those apostles, who are not mentioned in the Acts, exercised their missionary zeal. They were curious, too, about the future life and what happens after death. The Apocrypha set out to supply these apparent omissions and to supplement the knowledge of the faithful. Many legends were woven round the hidden life of our Lord, the life of Mary and the later activities of the Apostles, and more apocalypses appeared in order to satisfy popular desire. Most of this apocryphal literature is ill-founded, but some has been found worthy of credence and a small amount has been absorbed into the Church's liturgy and played its part in popular devotion and Christian art. We will now consider some of the more important works.

94d The Protevangelium of James is a very popular and widely read story of our Lady's life and the birth of her Son. It is based on the Gospel narrative which it fills out with many legendary and imaginative details, often of a puerile character. It tells how Mary was miraculously born to Joachim and Anna (incidentally, the first mention of the names of Mary's parents), and how, when three years old, she was presented in the Temple. Nine years later Joseph was miraculously singled out to be her spouse by a sign given to the High Priest—a dove coming forth from Joseph's rod and resting upon his head. The account of the birth of Christ is embellished with all kinds of unrestrained and unimpressive details. The book is of interest, however, as an indication of the early veneration for the Blessed Virgin and was written probably between A.D. 150 and 180.

e The Gospel of Thomas is another infancy gospel belonging to the 2nd cent. but of heterodox origin. It recounts extravagant youthful miracles of our Lord between the ages of five and twelve, as, for instance, when he formed clay birds on the Sabbath, and on being rebuked clapped his hands and caused them to fly away. The Child is represented as petulant, bringing sudden death to another child who collided with him, and when the bystanders blame him for such action, he strikes them with blindness. Such a picture stands in marked contrast to the quiet dignity of St Luke's story.

f The Assumption of Mary—The many translations and various forms of this work attest its wide popularity. In its Greek form it is introduced as 'The Narrative of St John the Theologian concerning the Falling Asleep of the Holy Mother of God', but the Latin version ascribes it to Melito of Sardis. In all probability it belongs to the 4th cent. It tells of the death of Mary and how the apostles were summoned to mount upon the clouds and assemble from all parts of the earth round her deathbed. Those who had died were raised to life in order to be present. For three days after her death the 'voices of invisible angels were heard glorifying Christ our God which was born of her. And when the third day was fulfilled the voices were no more heard, and thereafter we all perceived that her spotless and precious body was translated into paradise', James, Apoc. NT, 208. The interest which centred round the early tradition of Mary's Assumption is further illustrated by the added legendary details.

g The Letters of Our Lord and Abgar—The historian Eus., 1, 13 (PG 20, 119 ff.) records the story of Abgar, king of Edessa, who wrote to our Lord asking him to come and cure him of the terrible disease with which he was afflicted. Jesus sends back a written reply, praising his faith and assuring him that although he could not come in person he would certainly send one of his apostles, after his Ascension, to heal him. This legend, which belongs to the first part of the 3rd cent., became popular during the Middle Ages and has left its mark on the Syrian and Celtic liturgies (cf. CE 1, 43).

h The Letters of St Paul and Seneca—There are fourteen letters, written in Latin, which were known to Jerome and Augustine and were therefore in existence in the 4th cent. The contents of the letters are rather commonplace and the style is poor. Seneca tells Paul that he has been much refreshed by reading his epistles, but expresses his anxiety lest 'polish of style' be wanting to his 'majesty of thought'. He mentions Nero's favourable reception of his views. In his reply the Apostle shows appreciation of the philosopher's goodwill, but warns him against bringing the Christian religion any more to the notice of Poppaea and Nero. Seneca then sends Paul a book on 'elegance of expression', and sympathizes with the sufferings of the Christians. In conclusion Paul expresses the hope that he may become a 'new author, by showing forth with the graces of rhetoric the unblameable wisdom of Jesus Christ, which you, having wellnigh attained it, will instil into the temporal monarch, his servants, 94h and intimate friends', James, Apoc. NT, 484.

The Acts of Peter were written in Greek c. A.D. 200. i

It is said that when Paul left Rome for Spain, Peter was summoned to the capital from Jerusalem to combat the errors of Simon Magus. It is these Acts which give us the famous and familiar 'Quo Vadis' story and the description of Peter's being crucified head downwards. Traces of Gnostic influences are found here and there. One interesting example occurs quite early, in the description of the Eucharistic sacrifice offered by Paul before he sets out for Spain. We notice that bread and water are brought for the sacrifice in accordance with the Gnostic Encratite practice, for they regarded wine as evil, cf. Epiphanius, Adv. Haer., 2, 1, 47 (PG 41, 853). 'Now they brought unto Paul bread and water for the sacrifice that he might make prayer and distribute it to every one. Among whom it befell that a woman named Rufina desired, she also, to receive the Eucharist at the hands of Paul; to whom Paul, filled with the spirit of God, said as she drew near: Rufina, thou comest not worthily to the altar of God, arising from beside one that is not thine husband but an adulterer, and essayest to receive the Eucharist of God', James, Apoc. NT, 304.

The Apocalypse of Paul—The author pretends that j this work was discovered in the foundations of St Paul's house at Tarsus. The Apostle is represented as urging the world to repent of its crimes because the forces of nature are crying out against the wickedness of the human race and calling for punishment of sinners. He witnesses the ultimate fate of just and unjust, and sees the torments of the wicked in Hell. The terrible scenes so vividly depicted were known to Dante, who made some use of them in his Inferno. Torments which surpass all others are reserved for those who confess not that 'Christ is come in the flesh and that the Virgin Mary bare him, and whosoever saith of the bread and the cup of blessing of the Eucharist that it is not the body and blood of Christ', James, Apoc. NT, 547 (cf. DBV (S) 1, 468). The work is generally assigned to the 4th cent. but some writers place it much earlier (cf. Pope, op. cit., 293). The work was widely read in the Middle Ages, despite St Augustine's severe condemnation of it.

The Church and the Apocrypha—In the earliest period k little objection seems to have been made to the Apocrypha. The book of Enoch and the Assumption of Moses had been quoted in the canonical epistle of Jude, and there was in places a lingering hesitation about the inspired character of some of these books, such as the Esdras apocrypha. But with the rapid increase of Christian apocryphal literature and its widespread use by the heretical sects amongst whom some of it arose, the Fathers began to examine it more carefully. Their verdict was highly unfavourable, and they frequently warn the faithful against such writings. Irenaeus denounces the heretics because 'They adduce an unspeakable number of apocryphal and spurious writings, which they themselves have forged, to bewilder the minds of foolish men, and of such as are ignorant of the Scriptures of truth', Adv. Haer., 1, 20. Origen was outspoken in his condemnation, and Eusebius no less severely writes, 'We have been compelled to make a catalogue . . . in order that we might know these same writings and those which have been put forward by the heretics in the name of the apostles, whether as containing Gospels of Peter, Thomas or Matthias or of some others besides these, or as containing Acts of Andrew and John and the other apostles. None of these has been thought worthy of any kind of mention in a treatise by any member of the successive generations of ecclesiastical writers. The character of their style, also, is far removed from that of the apostles, and the thought and tenor of their contents is so much out of harmony with true orthodoxy as to prove that they are certainly the forgeries of heretics. For this reason they ought not to be placed amongst the spurious writings, but 94k rejected as altogether monstrous and impious', Hist. Eccl. 3, 25.

THE APOCRYPHA—NEW TESTAMENT

l The first official declaration about them comes from the Council of Hippo (A.D. 393) which said that apart from the canonical Scriptures nothing was to be read in the church under the heading 'Sacred Scripture'. This enactment was repeated at Carthage in 397, Dz 92. The so-called Decree of Gelasius, variously ascribed to Damasus, Gelasius, and Hormisdas, but, as now seems almost certain, of much later origin (cf. JTS 14 (1913) 321 ff.; 469 ff.) contains a list of about forty books which it condemns as apocryphal. Innocent I in his letter to Exsuperius also condemns them, EB 17. In the course of time these condemnations were forgotten, the apocrypha came to enjoy once again great popularity, and in the Middle Ages exercised no small influence on devotion, art and literature.

m The Value of the Apocrypha—Their value, from the theological point of view, is small, for they contain little that could deepen our understanding of divine revelation. But both Jewish and Christian apocrypha serve to throw light on the times in which they were written. The former reveal the doctrines which were to the forefront and commonly accepted at the time of our Lord; the latter make known to us what interested the early Christians. We learn what held their attention, what attracted their veneration and devotion, what ideals they cherished for this life and what they expected to find in the next. Nor must we overlook the part they have played in the liturgy and in the literature and art of the Middle Ages. To them we owe the feast of the Presentation of our Lady (cf. Schuster, op. cit., 5, 290) and the names of Joachim and Anna. Some of the masterpieces of art and literature drew their inspiration from them (cf. DBV (S) 1, 468; E. Male, L'Art religieux en France (Paris, 1923) ch 3). And finally, even where they fail, they are not without their value, for a mere cursory reading of the legends, marvels and aberrations of the Apocrypha intensifies our appreciation of the true Scriptures, setting in gratifying relief the quiet simplicity and unassuming majesty of the inspired Word of God.

(Sections 95 to 98 vacant)

THE MEANING OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

By E. F. SUTCLIFFE, S.J.

- 99a The Non-Religious Interest of the OT—Why do we still take an interest in the Old Testament? The OT has been replaced by the NT, and therefore why dissipate our energies which could be wholly and usefully devoted to the study of the NT and the effort to elucidate passages still obscure after all these centuries? Before answering these questions which raise a purely religious issue, it is well first to glance at the importance of the OT from the point of view of human interest and its place in various branches of study. In the history of world literature the books of the OT must always have an honoured place on account both of their antiquity and beauty as literary works of art. The literature of Rome is recent compared to that of Israel, and the most ancient monuments of Greek literature as handed down in the Homeric poems, even on the most generous estimate of their antiquity, were composed long after the time of Moses. The earliest Chinese songs and lyrics may antedate the oldest Hebrew literature, and as the Vedic hymns were already old and in part no longer understood when collected about 1000 B.C. their origin must go back several centuries earlier, probably into the first half of the second millennium. Literature, it must be remembered, may be literature in fact before it can acquire the name in its etymological sense, before, that is, it is committed to writing. And the great stories of the patriarchs, at least in oral form, owe their origin to a time long preceding the age of Moses. Even in this form, however, they yield in antiquity to literary monuments of other Middle East races, the Sumerians, the Babylonians and the Egyptians. But inferior though they are in age, their literary merit far exceeds that of these other peoples. In the field of historical writing, in particular, as Pope Pius XII has recently reminded us, the discoveries of the last decades have shown the pre-eminence of the Hebrews in point both of antiquity and of accuracy, AAS 35 (1943) 315. Apart from divine inspiration this superiority is to be attributed to the religious character and aim of the historical records preserved in the Bible. This literary genius of the Hebrews is the more remarkable in view of their general artistic penury.
- b These historical writings not only preserve the memory of the religious history of Israel but incidentally are valuable aids to the secular historian in reconstructing the partially known story of other ancient peoples. For the study of Semitic philology the OT is of prime importance as so few remains of ancient Hebrew exist outside its pages. The damp soil of Palestine has been unfavourable to the preservation of hand-written documents and the number of inscriptions cut on stone or rock is surprisingly small. Further, quite apart still from its religious values, the OT affords most interesting information concerning early 'scientific' beliefs, ancient customs, and legal practices. For us, however, the OT would always be of supreme importance even if it in no way served these secular branches of knowledge, and that on account of its religious character and divine origin. But before considering its importance for Christians we must first of all consider the purposes for which it was originally written.
- d The Meaning of the OT for the Israelites—The OT was inspired and written primarily for the benefit of the Hebrew nation, which God had chosen to be his own special possession, Ex 19:5. For the members of that race it contained the history of the Covenant entered into with them by God, the divinely sanctioned code of law, both civil and religious, based upon the Covenant, and the history of the subsequent mutual relations of God and his people. It contained, in particular, the record of God's fulfilment of his promise, Deut 18:18, to send a line of prophets who should mediate between himself and the people, with a very full account of the messages delivered by them in God's name. And not only was it the devout Israelite's religious history and law-book, but also his prayer-book and practical guide to life with its collections of beautiful hymns of praise and thanksgiving and written storehouse of divinely sanctioned maxims of the wise handed on for the guidance of future generations.

In a word the OT was a divine library of books affording help and counsel, commands and prohibitions, touching all aspects of life. But it was not a library of fixed extent and of definitely limited content. With the passing of the centuries the number of its scrolls grew as the Divine Wisdom extended the gift of inspiration to new writers and gradually too the extent of revelation expanded as God made known new truths, as about his own spiritual nature, the spiritual character of man's soul with its capacity for independent existence after severance from the body, the reward of the good and the punishment of the unrepentant wicked after death.

To what extent was this wonderful gift valued and utilized by its recipients? With all its literary beauty the OT did not teach the highest form of religion, or the noblest norms of morality, or the most perfect system of law. But in all respects it offered what was most suitable to the mental and spiritual development attained by the Israelites. No doubt there were at all epochs devout souls whose delight it would have been to read and meditate on the holy books and strive to conform their lives to the ideals there presented. But to what extent did this divine library actually influence the people? The knowledge of letters seems to have been early diffused if we may judge by the example of the chance boy of Succoth who wrote down the names of seventy-seven men of the town, Jud 8:14. But were the scrolls of the law and other sacred books multiplied sufficiently to make them at all widely accessible? This seems improbable at the least. Moses ordered that his book should be laid up by the side of the ark of the covenant, Deut 31:26. On account of the sanctity of such a document laid up in such a place it appears unlikely that copies would be made without express injunction given to that end, and the only injunction of the kind is that laid on the king at his accession to the throne, Deut 17:18. That this command was never obeyed cannot be affirmed, but the evidence afforded by the history of Israel up to the time of the Exile is that the law was not held in great honour and that the observance of the law, such as it was, was due rather to traditional knowledge than to study of its written prescriptions. The law according to Deut 31:10-13 was to be read every sabbatical year at the Feast of Tabernacles, but it is hard to believe that this was ever done during 99g the troubled period of the Judges, and what is recorded of the respect shown for the law after the building of the temple makes it doubtful whether the custom was then introduced. By the time of Josias the book of the law had been lost, though it was remembered that it had existed, 4 Kg 22:8. This suggests that the copy then found in the course of restoration work in the temple was the only one known to exist. After the exile the law came to be held in very high regard, but even then the knowledge and practice of it seem to have been of slow growth. In the time of Nehemias we are told that they 'discovered' in reading the law how the Feast of Tabernacles was to be celebrated and then proceeded to keep it as it had not been kept since the days of Josue, Neh 8:14, 17. Later genuine religion reached in some the heroic heights exemplified by the sufferings cheerfully borne by the Maccabean Martyrs. With others religion degenerated into a legalistic idolatry of the law quite alien from its true spirit. This was one of the intensely hostile forces with which our Lord had to contend in his effort to establish the New Kingdom of God.

100a Our Lord and the Old Testament—Though our Lord repudiated the unbending and pitiless obedience to the letter of the law preached and practised by the Pharisees, Mt 12:1-7, 10-13, the law itself and the institutions of the OT were sacred. The temple was the house of God and must not be profaned by secular uses, Mt 21:12 f.; the priests, whatever their personal shortcomings, were the accredited ministers of God to whom due deference must be paid, Mt 8:4. For him as for other Jews the books of the OT were inspired and sacred. Whatever was 'written' was of unchallengeable authority, and if David wrote a psalm of the psalter it was written in the Spirit, Mt 4:4, 6, 7; 22:43. Still, early in his preaching career he indicated that sacred though it was, the validity of the OT was only for a time. Not the most insignificant portion of it would or could be set aside, he said, but with the added clause 'till all be fulfilled', Mt 5:18; and he let it be known further that he himself had come to fulfil it, Mt 5:17. This same teaching he conveyed in different ways. He asserted his superiority to the temple, Mt 12:6, and his inherent authority over the God-given institution of the Sabbath. The Sabbath was made for the benefit of man, and as, he went on to imply, the Son of Man has full authority over man, so also has he authority over the Sabbath since it was instituted to serve man's needs, Mk 2:27 f. He set aside the Mosaic permission of divorce and recalled the law of marriage to its primitive strictness, Mt 19:8 f. He showed the imperfection of the moral law promulgated on Sinai, though written by God's own finger on the tablets of stone, and himself not only preached a higher norm of action but proclaimed its sanction in the life to come, Mt 5:21 f. In such various ways he made it clear that the Kingdom of God he preached and laboured to establish was to bring the old covenant to its fulfilment and by so doing to replace it. His culminating speech and act in this regard were reserved by him for the evening before he suffered, when he instituted the new covenant or testament and its central and most sacred rite, Mt 26:26-28.

101a The Old Testament in Apostolic Times—Though the Apostles followed, of course, in the footsteps of their Master, it did not become at once apparent to the early Church that the whole ceremonial law of the OT was no longer binding under the new covenant. In particular was this the case with regard to circumcision. It needed a vision and the outpouring of the Holy Ghost on uncircumcised Gentiles to teach this fundamentally important lesson to St Peter, and his witness and authority to have the matter definitively settled by the Council of Jerusalem, Act 10:1-48; 15:5-29. The Council decided the question of principle that the Mosaic law was not obligatory on Christians. Nonetheless the Council decreed that Christians should still observe certain prescriptions of the Mosaic law, as the prohibition of consuming blood, not, however, in virtue of the old ordinance, but in virtue of the authority of the Council, or because in its own words 'it has seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us'. And the motive which prompted the Council to impose these restrictions, namely, the desire to avoid giving unnecessary scandal, 15:21, implied that the new law was a temporary measure designed to last only as long as the need. This Council, of course, did not itself abrogate the Mosaic law, but solemnly promulgated the fact that it had been already in fact abrogated by the new dispensation instituted by Christ. Together with the rest of the Mosaic ordinances the Council implicitly promulgated the freedom of Christians from the obligation of Sabbath observance. Already in the NT there are signs of Sunday observance, Ac 20:7; 1 Cor 16:2; Apoc 1:10; and cf. Rom 14:5. Later this practice of keeping the Sunday holy as a day of rest and worship attained the status of law and obligation, cf. DTC art. 'Dimanche' 1309-12.

St Paul explained this Christian freedom to the Galatians. He compared the law to a pedagogue or tutor, Gal 3:24, whose surveillance lasted only till his young charge was ripe enough in years and discretion to be allowed freedom from daily supervision. The law had acted as a tutor of the Jews until the time came when they could attain justification by faith in the living Christ. This time, St Paul pointed out, had come, and therefore 'we are no longer under a tutor', Gal 3:23-25, for the state of sanctifying grace conferred by Christian faith and Baptism, as he implies, is a state of spiritual maturity compared to that attainable by virtue of the practices of the OT which were not instituted by God as channels of supernatural grace. The Apostle then uses another comparison to drive home this lesson of the freedom of Christians from servitude to the law. The spiritual state of people under the law was immature like the condition of a minor placed by his father's disposition under the control of guardians and stewards. And just as the ward attains his freedom and throws off this subjection on attaining the preordained age, so the Israelite people, now that the fullness of time ordained by God had come, were no longer bound by the material observances which had been imposed upon them during the long period of religious immaturity, Gal 4:1-5.

This preparatory character of the law is especially manifest in its incapacity to bestow true justification in the sight of God or 'the righteousness of God', Gal 3:11; Rom 10:3. The law could not offer the gifts of supernatural grace. Its promises of reward were confined to benefits of a purely temporal order. The recompense promised to legal righteousness, that is to strict observance of the law, was length of days and prosperity. 'Keep my statutes and my judgements: the man who does them, shall have life through them', Lev 18:5 quoted Gal 3:12 and Rom 10:5. So the precept to pay due honour to father and mother, which St Paul calls 'the first commandment with a promise', is followed by the words 'that thy days may be long and that it may be well with thee upon the land that Yahweh thy God is about to give thee', Deut 5:16 quoted Eph 6:2 f.

What St Paul has to say of this immaturity and preparatory character of the OT he sums up in the words 'the end of the law is Christ' leading up to that righteousness of God which is bestowed as the reward of faith, Rom 10:4. The temporal end of the law as a valid dispensation came with the advent of Christ, but St Paul was not speaking chronologically. His meaning was that the purpose of the law and its scope was to lead on to Christ in whom it found its fulfilment. This beacon truth that the whole long course of OT history and development was on a road leading slowly but surely to Christ supposes and rests on the further truth that the hand of God was guiding the course of Israelite history as played out on the stage of human relationships and also the course of its literary record together with all the elements which went to produce it. This 101d means that we cannot reach the core of the OT if we conduct our study of it on the lines suitable to purely human history and purely human records. To hope for success we must attempt to read these sacred writings in the same spirit in which they were written.

• Otherwise we shall not see the New Testament foreshadowed in the Old, despite the fact that as Augustine said, in the Old Testament the New is present though obscure and in the New the meaning of the Old is manifest ('In Vetere Testamento Novum latet et in Novo Vetus patet', Quaest. in Hept. 2, 73, PL 34, 623). And Pope Leo XIII has warned us that as the Holy Ghost is the primary author of Holy Scripture, its words sometimes contain 'a fuller and more recondite sense than appears to be expressed by the letter or to be indicated by hermeneutical laws', EB 93. St Augustine further says that our Saviour Jesus Christ 'spoke of himself in the prophets, for he is the Word of God, and if the prophets said aught of him, it was because they were full of the Word of God; hence they announced Christ because they were full of Christ', Enarr. in Ps 142, n. 2, PL 37, 1845. And St Jerome in the preface to his commentary on Isaiah writes 'If according to the Apostle Paul Christ is the power of God and the wisdom of God and he who knows nothing of the Scriptures knows nothing of the power of God and his wisdom, ignorance of the Scriptures is ignorance of Christ' ('ignoratio Scripturarum ignoratio Christi est', PL 24, 17).

f Before we pass on to consider the meaning of the OT for our own age, it is worth mentioning one point of difference in the decades succeeding the Ascension. Then the books of the NT were either not written or not all written, or existed as yet in comparatively few copies. In other words the writings of the NT were not available even to the pastors of the Church at large for reading and meditation. The books of the Scriptures they had will have been those of the OT; and for that reason they will probably have played a larger part in the devotional life of the period than at any subsequent time in the life of the Church. That St Paul carried copies of the OT Scriptures about with him, 2 Tim 4:13, is, I think, certain. He also exhorted St Timothy to be diligent in reading the Scriptures at the meetings of the faithful at which the reading was accompanied by a discourse, hortatory or doctrinal, 1 Tim 4:13. In this text the Scriptures perhaps already included some of the Gospels; cf. Justin, Apol. 1, 67, PG 6, 429B, in whose time likewise the sermon followed the reading of a portion of the Gospels or the prophets.

102a The Meaning and Value of the Old Testament Today—There can be no essential difference in the regard of the Church for the OT at different periods of her history, since its sacred character as the inspired word of God can never undergo modification. Hence, though it is profitable to consider it from the standpoint of our own times, we may be guided in our consideration by St Paul's teaching concerning it. Writing to the Romans, 15:4, he lays it down that whatever was written of old 'was written for our instruction that we might hold on to hope through the patience and consolation instilled by the Scriptures'. And to Timothy, who had been familiar with the books of the OT from childhood, he says that 'they are able to make you wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus; every Scripture being inspired of God is useful for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for training in justice, that the man of God may be perfect, equipped for every good work', 2 Tim 3:15-17.

b The OT, therefore, was not intended by God for the exclusive benefit of those who lived under the old law. Not merely can Christians learn to bear the trials and sufferings of life and especially those endured for the sake of religion, from the examples and teaching of the OT, and from the same source derive spiritual consolation in times of affliction or persecution, but it was the positive purpose of God that they should. And this source of strength is by no means to be over-102b looked even though more powerful motives for peace of mind and even cheerfulness in suffering are furnished by the words and deeds of the Son of God. The tense used by St Paul shows the meaning to be, not that we should win hope, but that we should be encouraged to persevere in hope through the consolation in endurance to be learnt from the Scriptures. So St John Chrysostom who paraphrases 'lest we be dejected' and points out the interactions of patience and hope. Hope ministers strength to endure with fortitude, and patient endurance gives fresh ground for hope, PG 60, 646.

When St Paul further says that all Scripture is useful for teaching, for rebuking and correction of moral faults and errors in doctrine, and for positive formation in right-doing, he is thinking of the benefit to be derived primarily by the student of Holy Writ himself. Knowledge of the Scriptures is of the utmost importance for the preacher and moral reformer, but these will not achieve much unless they have first applied the lessons of the sacred books to themselves and the improvement of their own lives.

St Paul says that the OT is useful as a source of teaching, but he would be the first to admit that it needs supplementing from the NT. The OT is definite from the beginning concerning man's survival after death, but for the greater part of its course it is vague concerning the constitution of man and what element of man actually survives. It is from the late book of Wisdom that we first learn that 'the souls' of the departed just are in the hand of God, 3:1. Similarly it is only in the last centuries before Christ that the doctrine of future rewards and punishments is to be found. And it is only in 2 Macc 12:39-46 (2nd cent. B.C.) that we read of prayers and sacrifices for the dead with the implication that there is an intermediate state in which the departed are in a permanent state neither of rewards nor of punishment, and which we have come to call Purgatory. The doctrine of the Trinity remained to be revealed in the NT as also that of supernatural sanctifying grace. Still withal there is a large body of positive doctrine about God, his eternity, his ubiquity, his omnipotence, his justice, his mercy. But the OT has this in common with the NT, that it neither is nor contains a manual of theology. These theological teachings are consequently incidental. Moreover, on account of the development of doctrine over so many hundreds of years knowledge of a doctrine manifested in a later age must not be assumed to have existed in earlier times. It may be said that God reveals himself in the OT as much by action as by direct teaching. And this method of teaching is, of course, for most minds both more intelligible and more impressive than the enunciation of abstract truths.

As in the matter of theological doctrine, so also in that of morality or right standards of human conduct the OT needs to be supplemented by the NT. It does not require to be corrected, as what it positively enjoins cannot be intrinsically evil, but, as our Lord taught in the Sermon on the Mount, it omitted positively to prohibit much that the fuller revelation of the NT shows to be sinful. In condescension to the less developed spiritual perceptions of the time only the broad outlines of morality, so to say, are dealt with. It has to be remembered, too, in regard to both positive and negative prescriptions of the old law, that not all rest on eternal and immutable principles of right and wrong. Some, like the strict prohibition to consume blood, were conditioned by the circumstances of the age, and were not, therefore, of permanent validity. Other teachings are not only of permanent, but also of the highest, value, as that of complete and confiding trust in God, a trust based on the conviction, which permeates the OT, that, despite appearances to the contrary, God guides and rules the universe. Nothing happens without his overruling providence: 'Lots are cast into the lap, but they are disposed by the Lord', Prov. 16:33, which, of course, is far from f Though the abstract standard of moral rectitude put forward in the OT was so much inferior to that of the NT, nevertheless the ancient Scriptures record many instances of heroic virtue. It suffices to recall the faith of Abraham, 'who against hope believed in hope', Rom 4:18, and his heroic obedience, Gen 22:16, the fearless chastity of Joseph, Gen 39:9, the humility and repentance of David, 2 Kg 12:13, the devouring zeal for God's honour of Elias, 3 Kg 19:14, the incomparable fortitude and fidelity of the Maccabean Martyrs, 2 Macc 7. One of the most moving chapters of the NT is in praise of these ancient Saints: 'They were stoned, they were cut asunder, they were tempted, they were put to death by the sword, they wandered about in sheepskins, in goatskins, being in want, distressed, afflicted, of whom the world was not worthy', Heb 11:37 f. And this heroic virtue, be it remembered, without the help of the Sacraments, without, except for the Maccabees, the hope of eternal felicity with g God, without the example of Christ. And if it be asked what especially distinguishes the perfection of Christian Saints from that of these Saints of the old law, I think we may answer that, apart from what was possible only after the Christian revelation such as personal love and devotion to Christ, God made Man, it is the realization of the nothingness of all temporal, earthly wealth. This was not taught in the OT, but is the fruit of the example and teaching of Christ: 'If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell what thou hast and give to the poor . . . and come, follow me!', Mt 19:21. It was from this teaching that the Christian world learnt that the goods of this world, beautiful though they are in themselves and the work of God's hands, nonetheless are as a veil that hides God from us, and tend to draw us from his complete service.

102e saying that the lot has been given to us as a means of discovering the secrets of God's omniscience.

h And now it is time to go back to St Paul's teaching that the holy Scriptures of the OT can make wise 'unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus', 2 Tim 3:15, and that 'the end of the law is Christ', Rom 10:4. Hence the OT led up to Christ by prophecies, or predictions in word, and by types or figures, or predictions in act and fact. The Jews knew well that their dispensation pointed to the Messias as its goal, as is manifest in the NT, but partly on account of the admitted obscurity of the prophecies, partly on account of the ambitious worldly mentality brought to the reading of the prophets, they had failed to interpret them aright. 'The end of the law is Christ', writes St Ambrose, 'and his death gave the solution to the enigmas of the prophets, and what was unknown to the Jews when the prophecies were made, later became manifest as the effect of the Lord's passion', In Psalm 43 Enarr. n. 57, PL 14, 1116B. Without this understanding of Christ the prophecies are insipid, says St Augustine: 'Prophecy without any understanding of Christ was only water. . . . Read all the prophetic books omitting Christ, what will you find so insipid and meaningless? Understand Christ there and not only is your reading full of savour but also inebriating, diverting the mind from the body that forgetting the past you strain forward to the future', In Joan. Evang. Tract. 9, 3, 2 (referring to Phil 3:13), PL 35, 1459. On the partial and apparently conflicting character of OT predictions see § 417e.

i This series of prophecies is scattered over the books of the OT. It begins with general predictions the reference of which to a personal Messias becomes intelligible only in the light of later prophecies. Once this central fact emerges that blessing and salvation are to come through one to whom above all others is to belong by special right the title of the Anointed of God, such being the meaning of the synonyms Messias and Christ derived respectively from Hebrew and Greek, then many individual traits of his person, character, kingdom and rule are successively revealed. But nowhere does the OT gather these various particular details into one picture. Such a unifying delineation would have manifested how apparently conflicting elements were to find their harmonious combination in one and the same person. As always God demands implicit trust and faith: 'Is anything too wonderful for God?', Gen 18:14. So often man falls short of this requirement and in his self-satisfaction thinks he can apply the foot-rule of his own limited ideas to the infinite wisdom and power of God. This unifying and harmonious correlation of the prophecies was not to be given till in the fullness of time Jesus Christ revealed it in the unfolding of his own life and death and in the kingdom which he lived and died to establish.

A sketch of some outstanding prophecies will serve to illustrate these general and abstract remarks. After the wiles of the evil spirit symbolized by the serpent had robbed our first parents of their innocence and thereby also their descendants of the inheritance which would otherwise have been theirs, God promised the final victory to the human race, not indeed individually but collectively. The seed of the woman was to crush the serpent's head, Gen 3:15. But it could not have been yet understood that this victory was to be gained under the leadership and through the strength of one. In what has been called the second Messianic prophecy God takes the race of Sem under his special protection and promises to bestow especial favour upon it, Gen 9:26 f. Of the race of Sem Abraham then receives an individual call and the promise that through him and his seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, Gen 12:3; 18:18; 22:16-18. Of the issue of Abraham this promise is renewed to Isaac, the child of promise, Gen 26:4. And a further limitation is made when it is repeated to one of Isaac's sons, namely, to Jacob, Gen 28:14. The next limitation of the line of descent through which the blessing forecast was to be brought about, occurs in the blessing of Jacob. Here the patriarch predicts the right of the tribe of Judah to the sceptre which is to abide with it until he comes whose it is, Gen 49:10, a prediction to be echoed centuries later in the words spoken by the Angel of the Child to be born, 'He shall reign in the house of Jacob for ever', Lk 1:32. The line of descent was still further defined in the prophecy of Nathan, 2 Kg 7:14, in which God promises this honour to the posterity of David. This prediction made a deep impression in OT times. It is often referred to as in Ps 88 and in Ps 131, and gave rise to the designation of the coming King simply under the name of David, Os 3:5; Jer 30:9; Ez 34:23 f. No wonder the Pharisees knew that the Messias was to be David's son, Mt 22:41, and that the multitudes hailed him as the Son of David, Mt 21:9. With the Davidic ancestry of the Messias is aptly conjoined the prophecy of his birth at Bethlehem, the city of David, Mic 5:2, another prophecy well understood by the rulers of the Jews, Mt 2:5 f. That he was to be virginally conceived was also understood by the pre-Christian Jews, as is shown by the sense-translation of the LXX, 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a child', Is 7:14. This, however, in the nature of things could not be a sign to mark him out to contemporaries.

Not only was the sceptre and royal dignity of the Messias the subject of prophecy but also the character of his rule. His dominion was to be universal: 'Ask of me, and I will give thee the Gentiles for thy inheritance, and the utmost parts of the earth for thy possession', Ps 2:8. And again: 'All kings of the earth shall adore him; all nations shall serve him', Ps 71:11. His rule was to be guided by justice. He was to judge the people with justice and the lowly with judgement and to secure their rights to the oppressed, Ps 71:2, 4. The consequence of such government would be a kingdom at peace without disturbance even in such dangerous regions as the mountains, ibid. 3. And so marked a characteristic was this tranquillity to be that the King would be called 'the Prince of Peace', Is 9:6. Indeed, he would be the very embodiment of peace itself, Mic 5:5. The dominion being universal and peace reigning throughout its length and breadth 1021 there would be no need of warlike implements. 'They shall turn their swords into ploughshares and their spears into sickles; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they be exercised any more to war', Is 2:4 = Mic 4:3. And if here it be asked how then does it come about that the Messias has come and yet the world is plagued with wars, the answer is simply that this picture of loving comradeship among the nations depicts the happy state that would flourish if the nations and their rulers submitted themselves to the sweet and light yoke of Christ. But despite its claim to universality Christ will not force his rule on unwilling peoples. His service must be free and willingly accepted. His purpose was not to deprive kings of their temporal rule to impose his own. In the beautiful language of the Church's hymn 'Non eripit mortalia qui regna dat coelestia'. For Christ's rule is a spiritual rule. Therefore the peoples of their own accord say 'Come and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord and to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us his ways and we will walk in his paths', Is 2:3 = Mic 4:2. There lies the root of the world's sorrows: they have not decided to put aside the lust for wealth and power and to learn the ways of Christ and walk in his paths.

■ Into this canvas of a victorious king ruling in justice over a peaceful people it was difficult to fit the prophecies which foretold the humiliation, the rejection, the suffering and even the violent death of the Messias. Yet these are foretold in the OT with unusual wealth of detail. Read Ps 21 and Is 53. Of the psalm St Augustine says that to hear it sung one would almost think he was listening to the chanting of the Gospel, Contra Faust. Man. 12, 43, PL 42, 277. So clear was the evidence to many of the Jews that they bethought them of the solution of two persons to be named Messias, Messias ben David, the victorious king, and Messias ben Joseph, the sufferer, JE 8, 511. The Gospel story presents a more moving and a more beautiful solution.

● To other prophecies, though important, a brief reference must here suffice. The Messias was to be not only of kingly rank but also endowed with the prophetic office, Deut 18:18. It was this text that the priests and Levites had in mind when they asked John the Baptist whether he was 'the prophet', whom they had not identified with the Messias, Jn 1:21. The Messias was further to combine with his royal dignity that of the priestly order. This was no projection into the future of the conditions of the past, as the Davidic origin of the Messias would appear incompatible with the priesthood, as among the Israelites only descendants of Aaron of the tribe of Levi could approach the altar. Even more surprising still, the Messianic priesthood is described in terms of a completely non-Israelite institution: 'Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech', Ps 109:4. The sacrifice offered by this king-priest of Salem was one of bread and wine. Now the offering of sacrifice is the essential function of a priest and therefore the Messias King-Priest must have his sacrifice too. The prediction of this was reserved to Malachias, the last of the prophets. He foretold the rejection of the Jewish sacrifices and their substitution by 'a clean oblation' offered among and by Gentiles from the rising of the sun even to the going down thereof, Mal 1:10 f.

▶ This outline will serve to give some idea of the rich content of the OT prophecies concerning Christ, of their completeness and their harmony. These predictions in word are supplemented by others in act which are called types or figures. The significance of these has become apparent in their fulfilment in the antitype. It is a moot question and one full of difficulty to know to what extent the OT was impregnated by divine disposition with the foreshadowing of Christ and his dispensation. St Paul's words, 1 Cor 10:11, 'all these things happened to them [the Israelites] in figure' has been understood to refer to types, though the meaning is 'as (warning) examples' to future generations. Understanding the Apostle's saying in the former sense and giving an undue extension to his universal expression some have given the widest scope to this figurative significance of the OT. They found further motive in the consideration of the apparent inutility of the knowledge conveyed by many passages understood in the literal sense, as St Jerome asks what is the profit of knowing the age of Methusala at death or of Solomon at the time of his marriage, PL 26, 596BC, partly by the conviction that as divinely inspired the pages of Holy Writ must be replete with recondite meanings in accordance with the words of St Gregory the Great that the text of Scripture is 'exceedingly sublime and profound with a multiplicity of senses', In 1 Reg. Proem., PL 79, 20. On this matter the opinion expressed by St Augustine is, I think, in agreement with the mind of the Church: 'For my part I think those to be greatly in error who consider that no events (of the OT) have any other significance beyond their own historical truth, and equally those to be unduly rash who maintain that absolutely everything is wrapped up in allegorical allusions', De Civ. Dei 17, 3, PL 41, 526. It is not a question of where we can detect some resemblance between the events of the OT on the one hand and on the other of the Kingdom of God either already glorious in heaven or yet engaged in the spiritual warfare of life on this earth. It is God only who can so dispose the events of life as to prefigure the future; and the question is, therefore, in what events of the OT are we to see this purposeful guiding of the hand of God. Great stress is laid on this typological significance of the OT in the Homily on the Passion of St Melito of Sardis. In this venerable monument of the early Church dating from the second century and the earliest extant homily of the kind the Saint writes: 'The people became the pattern of the Church, and the Law the writing of a parable, and the Gospel the setting-forth and fulfilment of the Law . . . (Christ) is the Passover of our salvation, he it is who in many men suffered many things. This is he who in Abel was slain, in Isaac was bound, who in Jacob dwelt in a strange land, who in Joseph was sold, who in Moses was cast out, in the lamb was sacrificed, in David was hunted, in the prophets was dishonoured' (edited by Campbell Bonner, 1940, nn. 40 and 69).

Our Lord himself pointed out the analogy of the saving power of the brazen serpent lifted up by Moses in the desert and the salvation to be won through his own elevation upon the Cross. Indeed, Christ did more than indicate the analogy. By saying 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the desert, so must the Son of Man be lifted up', Jn 3:14 f. and Num 21:9, he showed that the analogy was divinely intended and that his own raising on the Cross was to be the fulfilment of the type. This figurative significance of the OT is, therefore, certain and should never be lost sight of in the reading of the Scriptures, though we may not always be sure whether the analogy we detect is one divinely intended. See further § 417g.

Knowledge of the OT indispensable for the Understanding of the NT—This interplay between the prophecies of the OT and their fulfilment in the NT, this delineation of types among the Israelites and their realization in the antitypes of the Christian dispensation, will have made it plain that there cannot be an adequate apprehension of the NT which is not based on a knowledge of the OT. But a knowledge of the OT is necessary in other ways besides. In the first place the NT taken in isolation is a torso, without foundations, and unable to explain itself. That this is so as regards the presentation of the new dispensation we have already seen, for the OT was the pedagogue or tutor leading the Israelites on to Christ. And it is also true as regards the whole Jewish background of the NT and in particular as regards the Jewish background of the life of Christ which in the main was that of a Jew among Jews led according to the traditional Jewish manner of life. A knowledge of its Roman

THE MEANING OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

- 103a background is also obviously necessary, but that is not to our present purpose. The following are a few illustrations of the knowledge necessary for the due understanding of the NT: the law governing the purification of women after childbirth, that concerning leprosy, the annual visits to the temple at Jerusalem, the sacrifice of the Paschal Lamb and the Paschal Supper, the institution of the Sabbath, the Nazirite vow. Another important instance is the history of Samuel's birth and childhood which contributed so much as literary model to the manner of presentation of the infancy narratives in St Luke, cf. E. Burrows, S.J., The Gospel of the Infancy.
- b Some reference should here be made to the question how far the language of the OT has influenced that of the NT. In the first place a distinction must be 103b made between passages where the thought is expressed in language which though idiomatic Greek, is based upon the OT, and passages where the turn of language used is not idiomatic Greek but the reproduction of a Semitic original. In the latter case a further distinction must be made between texts in which the Semitic influence is that of the native Aramaic speech of the NT writer or of his source and texts in which the Semitism in question is a Hebraism mediated by the LXX translation of the original Hebrew. The subject is one of admitted difficulty and complexity in which expert opinion is frequently divided. Reference may be made to *J. H. Moulton and W. E. Howard, A Grammar of NT Greek, II (1929) 14-34, 413-85; *M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, Oxford, 1946.

THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

By E. F. SUTCLIFFE, S.J.

- 104a Bibliography—M.-J. Lagrange, O.P., Etudes sur les Religions sémitiques, Paris, 1903; M. Hetzenauer, O.C., Theologia Biblica, I, Friburgi Brisgoviae, 1908; *G. F. Oehler, Theology of the OT, 2 vol., Edinburgh, 1874-5; *H. Ewald, Old and New Testament Theology, Edinburgh, 1888; *H. Schultz, OT Theology, 2 vol., Edinburgh, 1895; 1909; *W. H. Bennett, The Theology of the OT, London, 1896; *A. B. Davidson, The Theology of the OT, Edinburgh, 1904; *W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, Hebrew Religion, London, 1930; P. Heinisch, Theologie des Alten Testaments, Bonn, 1940; *A. Edersheim, The Temple, its Ministry and Services, London, no date; E. Mangelot, 'Dieu, sa Nature d'après la Bible' in DTC 4, 948-1016; F. Prat, S.J., 'Jéhovah' in DBV 3, 1220-41; F. X. Kortleitner, Ord. Praem., De Hebraeorum ante Exilium Babylonicum Monotheismo, Innsbruck, 1910; J. Touzard, 'Le Monotheisme' in DAFC 2, 1566-1614; A. Van Hoonacker, Le Sacerdoce Lévitique dans la Loi et dans l'Histoire des Hébreux, London and Louvain, 1899; 'La Date de l'Introduction de l'Encens dans le Culte de Jahwé' in RB (1914) 161-87; A. Médebielle, 'L'Expiation' in DBV(S) 3, 1-112; L'Expiation, I, Rome, 1924; *J. H. Kurtz, Sacrificial Worship of the Old Testament, Edinburgh, 1863; *G. Buchanan Gray, Sacrifice in the Old Testament, Oxford, 1925; *W. O. E. Oesterley, Sacrifices in Ancient Israel, London, 1937; E. F. Sutcliffe, S.J., The Old Testament and the Future Life, London, 1947; *J. W. Jack, The Ras Shamra Tablets: their Bearing on the Old Testament, Edinburgh, 1935; in some respects now out of date; *C. F. A. Schaeffer, The Cuneiform Texts of Ras Shamra-Ugarit, London, 1939; *R. Dussaud, Les Découvertes de Ras Shamra (Ugarit) et l'Ancien Testament, Paris, 1941.

- b Introduction—By religion we mean a system of beliefs concerning the divinity and of man's duties in regard thereto. If such a system, whether practical or theoretical, is based merely on what the human reason can discover by its own powers, it is called natural religion. If it is based on knowledge communicated by God to man in some way outside the working of his ordinary providence, it is called revealed religion. Such was the religion of Israel, and it depended on divine revelation not only in its origin but also in the course of its development, for through the greater part of OT history God continued to speak to the people through the mouth of accredited messengers who delivered in his name and with his authority the message which he wished (cf. §409e). In this the religion of Israel differed sharply from Christianity, as the Christian revelation was completed by the death of the last of the Apostles. Since that time there has been no new revelation to the Church, though, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, knowledge and understanding of the original revelation has deepened and widened. To say, however, that the religion of Israel was revealed does not mean that it was in all points revealed in the strict sense of that term. In this strict sense, only that is said to be revealed which man's natural powers are incapable of discovering. In a wider sense everything is said to be revealed which God makes known to man in a supernatural way. Again, the fact that Israel enjoyed a revealed religion does not preclude from it practices which grew up apart from revelation but received a subsequent divine sanction.

A systematized exposition of belief about God and his dealings with mankind is called theology and is distinguished into natural theology if based on the efforts of the human mind alone, and dogmatic theology if founded on the authority of revelation. But among the various kinds of literature in the Bible there is no such theological exposition. The ancient Hebrews were neither theologians nor philosophers. Their writers were deeply religious men whose minds were busy with the problems of life, but not in that coherent, logical and systematized manner characteristic of the theologian and the philosopher; and the inspiration exercised on them by God was in harmony with their natural gifts and dispositions. As a result their writings contain the elements of a theology, not a theology itself. The correlative in religion to a system of beliefs about God and his providence over man is a system of beliefs about the duties of man towards God. These duties may be summed up as the carrying out of his holy will, which is that we should do good and avoid evil. 'Hate evil and love good' (Am 5:15). These duties in the first place regard God himself. And as man is an individual human being who is also a member of society, these God-regarding duties comprise both the individual relations of each to God, and the public manifestation of our relation to him by participation in public worship. Our duties in the second place concern our use of all creatures and especially our relations to our fellow-men. These various duties come under the heads of ritual and liturgical obligations in so far as they are concerned with the public worship of God, and all other obligations come under the head of moral theology. Ethics or deontology is concerned with our obligations in so far as these are known from reason alone, and moral theology in so far as they are known from revelation.

An exposition of the religion of Israel should therefore set forth the beliefs of Israel concerning God as he is in himself and concerning his relations to men; concerning man's worship of God; and concerning man's relations to creatures, especially his fellow-men.

The religion of Israel, understood as the religion of the people of Israel, began when Israel became a nation under the leadership of Moses. It was at one and the same time that the people was welded together into an independent, self-governing unit and received in a series of revelations at Sinai the main outlines of its religious life. But this religion was not something entirely new. It had its roots in the past, as the Israelites well knew. It was 'the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob' (Ex 3:6), who appeared to Moses in the Burning Bush. Both the history of Israel and the history of its religion are unintelligible without the history of the Patriarchs and of their religion. An account of this, therefore, must stand at the head of our exposition. But it will be convenient to mention first a modern theory which would invalidate the history of Israelite religion as presented in the OT.

The Evolutionary Theory of Israelite Religion—The evolutionary hypothesis, which came into such favour in the last decades of the 19th cent., was applied to all departments of life, including religion. According to this theory everything started in a lowly and undeveloped form and thereafter progressively evolved 104h into higher and more developed forms. In the sphere of religion this process was thought to necessitate initial stages of fetishism, totemism, animism and so up to polytheism, and then through monolatry to monotheism. The story of Hebrew religion, therefore, as recorded in the OT could not be historical, for in its pages monotheism is found in possession from the beginning. By a chronological rearrangement of the documents, however, it was found possible to date the introduction of this highest form of worship as late as the 8th cent. and to attribute its propagation to the great prophets. A brief discussion of this documentary theory has been given, §§ 44-5 and 135a-h. Apart from the difficulties there indicated that militate against its acceptance, it must be added here that exact researches into the religions of primitive peoples have established the contrary thesis to be the historical fact, namely that monotheism is not a higher development arisen from polytheism but that polytheism is a degradation of monotheism. See the monumental work of W. Schmidt, S.V.D., Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Münster in W., I (1926²), II (1929)-IX (1949), also that of Mgr. A. Le Roy, La Religion des Primitifs (Paris, 1909). Moreover, apart from this conflict with the conclusions of scientific research, this evolutionary theory of religion rests on the false assumption that in the investigation into the divine man must necessarily be left entirely to his own resources. This premise would be justified if it could be demonstrated that God, who created the universe, is nevertheless incapable of communicating directly with the rational creatures of his own making or, alternatively, had made it a condition of his government of the world never so to do. The first suggestion is not only incapable of proof, but it is actually a contradiction in terms to say that the omnipotent God has not the power to make any revelation to human beings. The second suggestion is not in itself impossible, but has against it an impressive weight of historical evidence and neither argument nor evidence in its favour.

Hence to such books as that by *Karl Marti, The Religion of the Old Testament (London, 1907, English trans.), must be applied the verdict passed by E. Kautzsch on works dealing with the same subject written before these new theories became fashionable: 'The view . . . held . . . gives so completely false a picture of the development of this religion, that in such works it is at most only the treatment of neutral points (where the question of gradual development does not occur) that can have any value', HDB 5, 732.

105a The Religion of the Patriarchs—The historicity of the patriarchal narratives must be rejected by those who hold that God Almighty cannot intervene by miracle or revelation in the world he created. Its rejection is, of course, involved also by the theory, which has the same unsound philosophical basis, that religion is necessarily the product of natural evolution. There is, however, no serious difficulty against the historical character of these narratives; see § 139.

b Monotheism.—Whether Abraham was ever an idolater is a question to which exegetes have given both a negative and an affirmative answer. Josue, speaking in the name of God to the Israelites, said: 'Your fathers dwelt of old on the other side of the river [Euphrates], Thare the father of Abraham and the father of Nachor; and they served strange gods' (Jos 24:2; cf. 24:14 f.). It is hard to see that Abraham is not included among those who served strange gods. And according to the tradition recounted by Achior Abraham and his family were converted to the worship of 'one God of heaven' before settling in Haran (Jdt 5:7-9, Gen 11:31). It is not explicitly stated that the Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, recognized the existence of one and only one God, but there is no hint that they did not and the impression made by the whole story is that their religion was monotheistic. The God they worshipped was no territorial deity with power limited geographically. Yahweh's power and influence extended wherever he willed. (It is disputed whether God was known to the Patriarchs as Yahweh; see § 165c. In any case when God spoke to Moses under this name, he said he was the God of the Patriarchs [Ex 3:6, 6:2 f.], and it will make for clearness to use it.) He brought Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees in Babylonia (Gen 15:7). He appears and speaks to the Patriarchs in various places in Canaan (Gen 12:7, 13:14, etc.), and promises the land to Abraham's seed (12:7, 13:15, etc.). He punishes the Pentapolis (chh 18 f.), chastises Pharaoh (12:17), promises to judge Egypt (15:14), threatens Abimelech, king of Gerara (20:3), gives victory to Abraham over the four invading kings north of Damascus (14:15, 20). He is 'the most high God' (14:18, 19, 20, 22); 'the possessor of heaven and earth' (14:22 and 19); 'the God of heaven and earth' (24:3), the 'God of heaven' (24:7), where LXX adds, probably rightly, 'and the God of earth'. In other words, his dominion is universal and absolute, and there is no god beside him. That the family of Abraham 'would not follow the gods of their fathers, who were in the land of the Chaldeans, (but) forsaking the ceremonies of their fathers, which consisted in the worship of many gods, they worshipped one God of heaven' (Jdt 5:7-9), most naturally means that they recognized the nothingness of those many gods and the existence of one only God. Moreover, there is no sign that Moses was introducing anything new in his monotheism. His system is proposed as a development of the worship of the great Patriarchs.

It has been asserted that Jacob chose his God. If this were true, it would imply that his religion was not monotheistic but henotheistic, that is, a form of monolatry, by which, while acknowledging the existence of a plurality of divinities, he confined his worship to one only. It will be helpful first to recall the promise of Yahweh to Abraham: 'I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee . . . to be a God to thee and to thy seed after thee; and I will give to thee and to thy seed the land of thy sojournment, all the land of Canaan for a perpetual possession, and I will be their God' (Gen 17:7 f.). This does not mean that if it were not for the covenant, Yahweh would not be the God of Abraham and of his posterity. It means that by his special providence and favour he would prove himself to be their divine protector. This same formula occurs in the late prophets whose pure monotheism is doubted by no one. Thus in Ez 34:24: 'I the Lord will be their God'; similarly 11:20, 14:11, 37:23; Zach 8:8: 'They shall be my people and I will be their God in truth and justice'. Jacob on his long and lonely journey to Haran made a vow saying, 'If God shall be with me and shall protect me on this journey, and shall give me bread to eat and raiment to put on and shall bring me back in peace to my father's dwelling, and Yahweh shall be my God, then this stone which I have set up as a title [a memorial pillar] shall be the house of God, and of all things that thou shalt give to me, I will offer thee tithes' (Gen 28:20 ff.). That is, if Yahweh proves himself to be my protector, I will make special offerings in gratitude. Without much change of meaning, the HT allows the apodosis to begin earlier: 'then Yahweh will be my God and this stone . . .'; that is, if Yahweh's providence looks after me on my journey, he will have proved himself to be my divine protector and in gratitude I will offer tithes. On his return Jacob went to Bethel, where he had set up the stone, and there erected 'an altar to God, who heard me in the day of my affliction and accompanied me in my journey' (Gen 35:3).

The Names of God—Both Elohim and El are used as equivalents of our word 'God'. Both belong to the common Semitic stock and are of uncertain derivation. There is no perceptible difference of meaning between them. The former, though plural in form, is nearly always used with qualifying words in the singular. Its root meaning is possibly that of strength, and the form is probably that of the plural of majesty. El is qualified in various ways: El elyon 'The most high God'

105f (Gen 14:18); 'God eternal' (DV), 'the Everlasting God' (RV), Gen 21:33; 'God of Vision', Agar in Gen 16:13; El shaddai occurs Gen 17:1, 28:3, 35:11, 43:14, 48:3, and, as a certain emendation, 49:25. The meaning of this last name is dubious and was already unknown to the LXX translators of Genesis, who substitute 'my God' or 'thy God'. Vg in each case has 'Deus omnipotens' in accordance with the translation used elsewhere by the LXX. 'The God of Bethel' [Gen 31:13] (DV and RV) is a translation that sins against Hebrew usage, and in agreement with LXX and the Targums the text should read 'the God who appeared to thee at Bethel'.

g Attributes of God—He is eternal (Gen 21:33), though no doubt the full philosophical implications of eternity were not understood. He is just and will not inflict punishment unless it is fully deserved (Gen 15:16), but he abhors iniquity and metes out condign chastisement as in the case of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen chh 18-19). He knows the future (Gen 15:13-16). That he can do his will with any nation (Gen 15:14) is a sign that his power was known to be unlimited.

108a Worship—Each of the three Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob is recorded to have offered sacrifice to God. Abraham built altars at Shechem (Gen 12:7) after a vision of Yahweh; between Bethel and Ai (Gen 12:8, 13:4); at Hebron (Gen 13:18); 'in the land of Moriah' (Gen 22:2, 9) [the Syriac has 'the land of the Amorite']^f. Isaac built an altar at Beersheba after a vision of Yahweh (Gen 26:23-25), and Jacob at Salem near Shechem (Gen 33:18, 20), and at Bethel (Gen 35:1, 3, 7), where Yahweh had appeared to him on his journey to Haran. Altars, literally 'places of sacrifice', were built both in spots sanctified by a divine vision and also where no such vision is recorded to have occurred. The nature of the victims is not mentioned except in the case of the ram offered instead of Isaac (Gen 22:13). And it is only in that story that we find details of the ritual. Abraham arranged wood on the altar, and then having bound Isaac placed him on the wood. Only then would he have killed him before igniting the wood had not the Angel of Yahweh intervened (Gen 22:9 f.). The ram substituted for Isaac was offered as an 'olâh, i.e. a whole-burnt offering. It is curious that in the other passages only the building of the altar is mentioned and the sacrifices themselves are left to be understood. On the other hand sacrifices are said to have been offered by Jacob at Beersheba without mention of an altar (Gen 46:1), presumably because the erection of an altar there by Isaac had already been recorded (Gen 26:25). Prayer is sometimes mentioned in connexion with an altar (Gen 12:8, 26:25, 33:20), but the calling on the name of Yahweh, which is the vague phrase used, does not indicate whether it was a prayer of adoration, praise or petition.

b The purpose of these sacrifices is not mentioned, but we shall not be wrong in assuming that they were the expression of adoration and an acknowledgement of the supreme dominion of God. An element of thanksgiving and petition was no doubt also present. The acknowledgement of God's supreme dominion is clearly indicated in the sacrifice of Isaac. This was commanded by God as a sign that all things and persons are his and that man has no independent rights even over what is most dear to him. The command having taught this lesson and having met with absolute obedience from Abraham and from Isaac, whose resignation and obedience we are left to infer, was changed into a prohibition in order to show that God would never actually demand a human sacrifice. On Gen 15:9-21 and 31:54 see the commentary.

c Mention is made of an oak or oaks in the same context with an altar in Gen 12:6 and 13:18. In neither case is it explicitly said that the altar was erected under a tree, though very likely it was. In the second passage it is said, and in the former it is to be understood, that Abraham chose the spot for his own dwelling. He would wish to benefit by the shade against the heat of the Palestinian sun; cf. Os 4:13 where sacrifice is said to be offered under trees 'because the shade thereof 108c was good'.

Moral Code—Besides acknowledgement of his supreme d rights God demanded of men also the avoidance of evil; and the fear of God was a force to keep men from wrong-doing (Gen 20:11). The unnatural vices of the Amorites and other Canaanite nations (Gen 15:16; Lev 18:24-27), the cruelty of their human sacrifices (Deut 12:30 f.), their witchcraft and necromancy (Deut 18:10-12) were most displeasing to God. The abominations of Sodom and the neighbouring cities called for summary punishment (Gen chh 18-19). Adultery is sinful (Gen 12:17, 20:3, 39:9), as also the misuse of marriage rights (Gen 38:9). Jacob knew that deceit merited 'a curse instead of a blessing' (Gen 27:12), though he allowed his mother to entice him into it; and Judah knew that he had acted wrongly in withholding his son Sela from Tamar (Gen 38:26). Note that the punishments mentioned in 12:17 and 20:17 f. were not for adultery, which had it been committed would have been a material but not a formal sin as it was not known that Sara was married, but for the crime of her forceful seizure. A breach of an honourable covenant was known to be displeasing to God (Gen 31:44-54).

The Covenant with Abraham and his Seed—The ties e which bound the Patriarchs to God were strengthened by the privilege of a special covenant entered into by God with Abraham and his seed (Gen 15:18, 17:7). The covenant was ratified in the manner usual among the Semites at the time (Gen 15:8-18). On his side God promised the possession of the land of Canaan (Gen 15:18 ff.), the multiplication of Abraham's seed, the issue therefrom of kings (Gen 17:6), and that in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed (Gen 12:3, 22:18). From Abraham God demanded a blameless life, 'Walk before me and be perfect' (Gen 17:1), and that all males should be circumcised as a sign of the covenant (Gen 17:11).

Circumcision—The rite of circumcision, which was f obligatory on the eighth day, became part of the Mosaic law (Gen 17:12; Lev 12:3), and was in force throughout OT times (Lk 2:21), though the practice was interrupted during the wanderings of the Exodus (Jos 5:5). As an initiation ceremony it is practised by tribes in Africa, Australia and America. That it was customary in Egypt is known both from Herodotus II 104 and from the ancient monuments. In Babylonia, whence Abraham came, the available evidence shows that the ceremony was not in use, B. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien, I (Heidelberg, 1920) 394. Its significance seems to lie in its connexion with the origin of life and in the shedding of blood which is entailed. God is the author of life, and 'the life of the flesh is in the blood' and the blood of sacrifices was an expiation (Lev 17:11). Only the circumcised were allowed to eat the Pasch (Ex 12:44, 48). Indeed the uncircumcised, even of the descendants of Abraham, had no share in the privileges of the Hebrew people, because they were by the very fact unfaithful to the covenant (Gen 17:14).

Circumcision did not confer grace, for, as taught by g the Council of Florence, the rites of the OT were only figurative of the grace to be given through the Passion of Christ (Dz 695). It is the common opinion, however, that original sin was forgiven and sanctifying grace granted in, though, unlike baptism, not by, circumcision to infants and those properly disposed; see St Thomas, Sum. Theol., III, qu. 70, art. 4. This opinion is supported by the fact that the rite of circumcision signified aggregation to the holy people of God. And for the details of various theological views see e.g. V. Ermoni, art. 'Circoncision' in DTC II 2523-7.

Infidelities—Scripture is not silent about the sins and h infidelities of those who figure in its pages. Here, however, as space is lacking for an enumeration of the virtues manifested by the Patriarchs like the faith of Abraham, the chastity and forgiveness of Joseph, so also for a detailed list of their shortcomings, like the 106h fornication of Judah, the hatred and cruelty of Joseph's brothers. Still special mention must be made of false worship. In flying with Jacob from Laban Rachel stole her father's teraphim, which he himself calls his 'gods' (Gen 31:19, 30). The exact nature of these objects and the derivation of the word are alike uncertain, but the DV is substantially correct in translating 'idols' in agreement with the Vg 'idola' and the LXX εἰδωλα. They seem to have varied in size, as Rachel was able to hide Laban's under a camel's trappings (Gen 31:34), whereas Michol put one in David's bed to simulate his presence (1 Kg 19:13, 16). They were used for divination (Ez 21:21 [MT 26], Zach 10:2). The influence of pagan worship affected others besides Rachel. When Jacob was commanded by God to offer sacrifice at Bethel, he 'said to his household and to all in his company: Put away the strange gods that are among you', and after collecting these gods, probably teraphim, he buried them under a terebinth (Gen 35:2, 4). He also buried the earrings which had served as charms or amulets and perhaps bore pagan images. How long Jacob had tolerated these abuses is not clear. It may be that the pagan objects had been appropriated in the city recently plundered (Gen 34:27). A Lapide thought that Jacob first destroyed the images before burying them, as seems probable (cf. Ex 32:20; 4 Kg 18:4). If this tree near Shechem is the same as that at which Josue later persuaded the people again to put away 'strange gods' (though the vocalization of the MT is different), the probable explanation of Jacob's choice of the spot for the burial is that the sanctuary of Yahweh there (Jos 24:23, 26) already existed in his time and he wished to show the nothingness of the pagan images by contemptuously throwing them, as it were, under Yahweh's feet.

107 Religious Life in Egypt—Little is recorded of the religious life of this period. Josue speaks of pagan worship (24:14), and Ezechiel shows that the defection spread to many Israelites as God was minded to 'pour out (his) indignation upon them' (20:5-10). Others, however, were God-fearing, even to the braving of Pharaoh's anger (Ex 1:15-21). The practice of circumcision had not ceased (Jos 5:5), nor that of sacrifice (Ex 5:3, 20:24). It may be inferred from Ex 20:24 f. that the altars were of earth or unhewn stone, as Moses seems in this to have been sanctioning existing practice. Some have thought that the tabernacle of meeting (Ex 33:7-11), mentioned before the erection of the tabernacle of the testimony as ordered by God, was of pre-Mosaic origin; cf. Hummelauer, Comm. in Exod. (1897) 178, 323. On this section see F. X. Kortleitner, Israelitarum in Aegypto Commoratio (Tongerloae, 1930) 92-6.

108a Mosale Religion—Religion was organized and developed under the leadership of Moses. It was not a new creation. Its roots went back to the distant past. The God of the exodus and of Sinai was the God of the patriarchs (Ex 3:6, 6:2 f.). But the clan had become a people and the people was about to become a nation in possession of its own territory (Gen 15:18-21; Ex 3:8). With the people God renewed the covenant he had made with Abraham (Ex 24:6-8). And as a nation it was fitting that they should be ruled by divinely sanctioned law, and no longer by conscience and custom only. The legislation is based on the covenant by which the Israelites became God's 'peculiar possession above all people' though all the earth is his (Ex 19:5) and God would have them to be 'holy men' (Ex 22:31). As they were to be 'a priestly kingdom and a holy nation' (Ex 19:6) the whole of life was to come under the influence of religion and the whole was to be sanctified. In particular it was fitting that the outward expression of worship in cult and ritual should be regulated and should become richer and more elaborate. It must be borne in mind that the laws promulgated at Sinai had in view an imminent entry into the Promised Land. It was only after the culminating sin of the people in murmuring against God when the messengers returned from spying out the land that God postponed the entry till all of twenty years old and upward had perished in the wilderness (Num 14:27-33).

Monothelism—The worship of other gods is strictly forbidden (Ex 20:3, Deut 5:7). And (Deut 32:12) it is said of the people that Yahweh 'alone was his leader, and there was no strange god with him'. And again, Yahweh is 'the God of gods and the Lord of lords' (Deut 10:17). Such texts taken alone would be consonant with a henotheistic religion. Actually they do not suppose the existence of other gods. Other gods among the nations 'were framed with men's hands; wood and stone that neither see nor hear nor eat nor smell' (Deut 4:27 f.). The idols of Egypt and the nations through which Israel passed are 'abominations and filth . . . wood and stone, silver and gold' (Deut 29:17). The sun, moon and stars worshipped by other nations are creatures made by God (Ex 20:11; Deut 4:19). Yahweh has universal dominion: 'Behold heaven is the Lord's thy God, and the heaven of heaven, the earth and all things that are therein' (Deut 10:14). Indeed 'the Lord made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are in them' (Ex 20:11); cf. Gen 1. As Yahweh made heaven and earth and all therein, there cannot be another god beside him. Whatever there is was made by him. Hence explicitly, 'The Lord he is God, and there is no other besides him' (Deut 4:35); 'The Lord he is God in heaven above and in the earth beneath; and there is no other' (Deut 4:39). On Deut 6:4 see note and Hummelauer, Comm. in Deut. (1901) 243 f.

Certain texts, however, at first glance seem to approve of the worship of other 'gods' by pagan nations. 'They have gone and have served other gods and adored them, whom they had not known and for whom they had not been assigned' or 'and who had not been assigned to them' (Deut 29:26 [MT 25]). 'Lest perhaps lifting up thy eyes to heaven thou see the sun and the moon and the stars, all the host of heaven, and be driven on to adore them and serve them, which Yahweh thy God assigned to all the nations that are under heaven' (Deut 4:19). St Jerome, as his version shows, understood this passage to say that God created the heavenly bodies to minister to all nations, but the use of the same word in both texts with their similar context is evidence of the correctness of the interpretation current in the 2nd cent. among both Christians and Jews as testified by their representatives St Justin Martyr and Trypho, who both say that the sun was given by God to be worshipped, Dial. cum Tryph., 55, 121 (PG 6, 596, 757). All the passages which condemn pagan worship make it clear that the explanation lies in the difference between the permissive and the absolute will of God, a distinction which the ancient Hebrews did not make explicitly, though they knew that God neither causes nor approves the evil that he condemns and punishes. St Paul speaks in a similar way in Rom 1:24-26.

God's Works and Attributes—Yahweh is the creator. He 'made heaven and earth and the sea, and all things that are in them' (Ex 20:11). He created the light and the heaven and the heavenly bodies out of nothing by his mere word (Gen 1:3, 6-8, 14-17). This is equivalent to saying that God is omnipotent. 'Is the hand of the Lord unable?' (Num 11:23).

The truth that God is the creator of all things has as its correlative that he himself was made by none and that, therefore, he exists of himself and has the reason for his existence in himself. In other words he is the one necessary being. This truth is implicit in the doctrine of creation, and is the meaning of the divine name Yahweh. Yahweh is he who is; he exists necessarily and of himself. A necessary consequence, which the Hebrews will not have consciously grasped, is that God is the fullness of all being, and is consequently infinitely perfect. Evil, it must be remembered in this cone The spiritual nature of God was too refined a conception to be understood in the time of Moses and the idea of his nature remained vague. It contained, however, no gross or low element. Yahweh had no family and no consort, in this a great contrast to the gods of the pagan nations. That the nature of God was such as no form known to man could represent was strongly impressed on the Israelites by the repeated prohibition of fashioning any image whatsoever as a likeness of him (Ex 20:4; Lev 26:1; Deut 5:8). Moses strongly emphasizes this truth: 'You heard the sound of his words, but you saw not any form at all. . . . You saw not any similitude in the day that the Lord God spoke to you in Horeb from the midst of the fire, lest perhaps being deceived you might make you a graven similitude or image of male or female, the similitude of any beasts that are on the earth, or of birds that fly under heaven', etc. (Deut 4:12, 15 ff.). This vague and negative conception was immensely superior to the ideas of the surrounding nations whose gods were conceived in human, zoomorphic and astral form. Though God did not allow the people to see him under any form whatever, he did appear in human form to Moses, Aaron and the elders, as A Lapide rightly says with Lyranus and Cajetan (Ex 24:9-11). (This last verse still speaks of the chosen group, and not of the children of Israel as in the DV.) In the case of these leaders there was not the same danger of misconception as in the case of the common people. Of Moses it is said that God spoke to him 'mouth to mouth' and that 'he beheld the form [or, likeness] of Yahweh' (Num 12:8). And with the same meaning of intimate communing it is said, 'The Lord spoke to Moses face to face, as a man is wont to speak to his friend' (Ex 33:11). That these words are figurative is clear from Ex 33:20, 'Thou canst not see my face, for man shall not see me and live'. The face stands for the person, and is so translated in verse 15 in the Vg and DV. Anthropomorphisms are inevitable in speaking of God even among those fully conscious of his spiritual nature, as is evidenced by their frequent use even in the official documents of Christianity.

100b nection, is negative and consists in a lack of conformity to what is right and good. On the name Yahweh see § 165a-c. A further consequence of God's uncreated, necessary existence is his eternity: 'I live for ever' (Deut 32:40).

e Examples of God's foreknowledge of free human acts are given in Ex 3:19-22, 4:14, 14:4; Deut 31:16, 20 f. The last passage is a prophecy of the idolatry of the Israelites after their conquest of the Promised Land.

f Yahweh is 'great and mighty and terrible', that is, to be feared (Deut 10:17), but above all his attributes is his holiness. Everything in any way connected with him is holy, a place in which he manifests himself (Ex 3:5), the sacerdotal vestments (Ex 28:2, 4), feast days (Ex 12:16, 31:15), meats from sacrifices (Ex 29:33). All such things have a mere extrinsic holiness, such as among us belongs to churches and chalices. It is based on their dedication to the service of him who is holy in himself and of his very nature: 'Be ye holy, because I the Lord your God am holy' (Lev 19:2). The etymological meaning of the word qāḏōš, if it was that of 'separation', is not helpful, partly because spiritual ideas have to be expressed by words of an originally material meaning, as the word 'spiritual' itself, partly because words so applied come entirely to transcend their original connotation, and partly because the separation in question is of a unique kind. The word is sometimes used of legal holiness: 'I am the Lord your God; be holy because I am holy; defile not your souls by any creeping thing that moveth upon the earth' (Lev 11:44). Here A Lapide says that the word is equivalent to 'clean' as in Deut 23:14, 'Thou shalt cover that which thou art eased of, for the Lord thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp . . . and let thy camp be holy, and let nothing indecent appear therein'. But this does not do justice to the conception, which is that uncleanness would be contrary to the holiness 100g which belonged to the camp of the people of God, as with us uncleanness would be considered contrary to the holiness proper to a consecrated church. For the Hebrews the whole nation, the whole land and all that pertained thereto were holy because the Lord had chosen them 'to be his peculiar people' (Deut 7:6). The concept, consequently, of extrinsic holiness was of far wider application with them than it is with us. In the sphere of non-moral actions what offenses against this extrinsic holiness depends largely on custom and common estimation as it does in the analogous matter of the exhibition of the reverence due to certain persons on account of their position and authority. In these regards God condescended to the received customs of his people, and for them there was something unclean, perhaps indecent, in eating and even touching certain animals. Of course, once such customs received the sanction of religious law, their violation became a transgression of that law and, therefore, took on a definitely moral character. The moral nature of Yahweh's holiness is shown by the moral nature of the holiness which he demanded of his people, and this is manifested in the decalogue; see §§ 172f-173c.

Although in the time of Moses we do not expect to find evidence of the abstract idea of the omnipresence of God, it was known that his presence was not confined to any one place. On the contrary, he manifested himself wherever he wished. He spoke to Abraham in Mesopotamia (Gen 12:1-4); he protected him in Canaan (Gen 14:20); he manifested his might by the plagues in Egypt, and his majesty by the theophany of Sinai. That his power was known to extend to the whole world is clear from Gen 1.

Secondly must be considered the divine attributes as manifested in God's government of the world. He has supreme power over the universe. 'Heaven is the Lord's thy God, and the heaven of heaven, the earth and all things that are therein' (Deut 10:14). He can 'shut up heaven that the rain come not down nor the earth yield her fruit' (Deut 11:17). And all peoples who dwell on the earth are under his sway: 'This day will I begin to send the dread and fear of thee upon the nations that dwell under the whole heaven' (Deut 2:25). This power was displayed in particular by the liberation of Israel against the will of the mighty people of Egypt and by giving the Israelites the land of 'great nations and stronger than they' (Deut 4:37 f.).

It follows that man depends completely on God. All he has comes from him. God said to Moses: 'Who made man's mouth? or who made the dumb and the deaf, the seeing and the blind? Did not I?' (Ex 4:11). So too, if men have any kind of skill, it is the gift of God. It was God who had 'filled with the spirit of wisdom' all those who had the craftsmanship to make the sacerdotal vestments (Ex 28:3).

So absolute is the divine power in the government of the world that everything is ascribed to God whether in the realm of natural causes or in that of man's moral acts. 'God had not rained on the earth' (Gen 2:5); and speaking of her sterility Sarah said, 'The Lord hath restrained me from bearing' (Gen 16:2). As God is the author of nature and of its laws, this manner of speaking is quite exact, but is apt to mislead the unwary reader into thinking that the sacred writer is speaking of a miraculous intervention of God where nothing of the kind is intended. It is several times said that 'The Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart' (Ex 9:12, etc.), and no distinction is drawn between God's permissive will and his absolute will. In other words the text does not distinguish between God's taking positive action to harden Pharaoh's heart, and his permitting Pharaoh to harden his own heart. That the latter is the sense intended is shown by 1 Kg 6:6. 'Why do you harden your hearts as Egypt and Pharaoh hardened their hearts?' and by Deut 10:16 'stiffen your neck no more'. It follows also from the sense of God's justice. Pharaoh's admission 'It is Yahweh who is just' (Ex 9:27) certainly reflects the belief of the Israelites. The divine

- 109 I justice is also reflected in the law of Ex 23:7, 'The innocent and just person thou shalt not put to death'.
- m God's justice is manifested by the punishments with which he visits iniquity. Mary's rebellious complaints against her brother Moses were punished by leprosy (Num 12:10), and the man who violated the Sabbath rest was ordered to be stoned (Num 15:35), and there are many other examples. If the punishments seem to be severe, it must be remembered that the doctrine of future retribution had not yet been revealed and that the people were spiritually crass and 'stiffnecked' (Ex 33:3, 5) and needed the help of a stern discipline.
- n On the other hand Yahweh is compassionate and tender towards the weak: 'He doth judgement to the fatherless and the widow, loveth the stranger, and giveth him food and raiment' (Deut 10:18). He is 'merciful and gracious, patient and of much compassion, and true' (Ex 34:6); he is 'patient and full of mercy, taking away iniquity and wickedness' (Num 14:18). He is quick to forgive when man is worthy of forgiveness. Mary was quickly healed of her leprosy (Num 12:13 ff.). The idolatry of the people was foretold and their dispersal among the nations, but straightway was added the promise, 'When thou shalt seek there the Lord thy God, thou shalt find him; yet so, if thou seek him with all thy heart and with all thy soul' (Deut 4:29). And see Deut 30:1-10.
- 110a The Covenant between Yahweh and Israel—That Yahweh was the Lord of all peoples we have seen in the above sketch of his nature and attributes as depicted in the Mosaic writings, but by a mysterious disposition of his providence he chose Israel out of all the peoples of the earth. 'The Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be his peculiar people of all peoples that are upon the earth, not because you surpass all nations in number is the Lord joined unto you, for you are the fewest of any people, but because the Lord hath loved you, and because he hath kept his oath which he swore to your fathers, he hath brought you out with a strong hand and redeemed you from the house of bondage, out of the hand of Pharaoh the king of Egypt' (Deut 7:6-8). 'Know that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this excellent land in possession for thy justness, for thou art a very stiffnecked people. Remember and forget not how thou provokedst the Lord thy God to wrath in the wilderness' (Deut 9:6 f.).
- b With this stiffnecked race Yahweh renewed 'the covenant which he made with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob' (Ex 2:24). The solemn ceremony is described in Ex 24:4-8, and further detail, presumably derived from tradition, is given in Heb 9:19 f. The blood of the holocausts and peace offerings was divided into two equal parts, one half being poured upon the altar as representative of Yahweh and the other half sprinkled upon the people. This ritual of sprinkling the two parties to the covenant, or their representatives, with blood from a common source was symbolical of their entering into a living and lifelong partnership. See further § 111c. On his side God promised to fulfil the promise he had made to the patriarchs 'to give them the land of Canaan' (Ex 6:4) and to protect and bless the people therein (Ex 23:23-31). On their side the people promised to observe all the obligations laid upon them in 'The Book of the Covenant' (Ex chh 20-23) which Moses read out to them: 'All things that the Lord hath spoken we will do, we will be obedient' (Ex 24:7). These precepts are partly moral, partly cultic, for the covenant was to make Israel 'a priestly kingdom and a holy nation' (Ex 19:6). The religion of Israel was from the beginning an ethical monotheism. 'And now, Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee but that thou fear the Lord thy God and walk in his ways and love him and serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, and keep the commandments of the Lord and his precepts which I command thee this day, that it may be well with thee' (Deut 10:12 f.). 'The fear of God' is practically the equivalent in Hebrew of the English word 'religion', and the fear in question is filial fear as shown by its conjunction with love, which is incompatible with servile fear.

As a consequence of the pact or covenant made with the patriarchs and to be renewed with their descendants Yahweh regarded Israel as his son: 'Israel is my son, my firstborn' (Ex 4:22). And the depth of God's fatherly affection is proclaimed by Moses: 'In the wilderness thou hast seen how the Lord thy God hath carried thee, as a man is wont to carry his son, all the way that you have come' (Deut 1:31; cf. 8:5; 14:1; 32:6). And this relationship was conceived to exist not merely with the people as a whole but with its members separately: 'Of the Rock who begot thee thou art unmindful and hast forgotten God who bare thee; the Lord saw it with abhorrence because his own sons and daughters provoked him' (Deut 32:18 f.). Note that women are the children of God equally with men.

The Obligations of the Israelites—As their side of the pact the Israelites bound themselves to be obedient to the law of God. Its contents were not all new. The supernatural builds on the natural, and many parts of the law will have been divine sanctions of existing custom and tradition. The wickedness of wilful murder will have been recognized by the popular conscience before the promulgation of the decalogue; abstinence from the flesh of certain animals and birds considered unclean will have been a matter of ancient custom, and the texts unearthed at Räs-Shamra have shown that ritual practices of the Hebrews were also in vogue among the Canaanites, as would be expected from their proximity in race and territory. The two fundamental principles which underlie the law are that as God is holy, all that belongs to him is holy, and the people, as his special possession, should be holy; and, secondly, that as the people belonged entirely to him, their land, their produce, their time, everything they had, were held in stewardship from him.

The moral prescriptions of the law are contained chiefly in the decalogue, in the laws of the Book of the Covenant and in Lev 19. The commandments of the decalogue (cf. § 173a-c) are all precepts of the natural law, of their nature binding on all men, except for the obligation of Sabbath observance. This is a special definition of and application to the Hebrews of the principle that part of man's time should be set aside for divine worship. The Hebrews to whom the law was given were such as 'have need of milk and not of strong meat' (Heb 5:12), and consequently the perfection of Christian morality must not be expected. It should be remembered, however, that sins of thought are already forbidden and not merely external acts (Ex 20:17; Deut 5:21). Faults of omission are taken account of as well as those of commission (Num 15:22). The sanctity of human life was safeguarded in the decalogue itself. Yet the Hebrews, like the Assyrians, were merciless even in their official conduct of war. The wholesale slaughter, for instance, of Midianite men and women ordered by Moses (Num 31:1-19) was a ferocious act compared with the Christian (I cannot say, the modern) standard of warfare. To pass a just judgement on such conduct, it must be viewed in its historical context. The Israelites enjoyed a reputation for clemency among the Syrians (3 Kg 20:31). The particular case of the war against the Midianites must be seen in connection with the incidents of Num 25. And, in general, men had not yet had their ideals elevated and their innate brutality softened by the influence of Christianity. Moreover, the sense of corporate, collective responsibility was very strong, as it still is among the Arab tribes of today; cf. A. Jausen, O.P., Coutumes des Arabes au Pays de Moab (Paris, 1908) 436. The tribe or nation was guilty and all its members were liable to the penalty which could be justly inflicted for the crime committed. Christianity, by enhancing men's estimate of the worth of each individual man as created by God with an immortal soul and responsible by his own acts for his eternal welfare, has been instrumental in shifting the emphasis from collective to individual responsibility. The justice, however, of 110f collective responsibility and of collective retribution, unanimously admitted and acted on in OT times, has, of course, never been repudiated by Christian teaching, though Christianity has striven to make men forgiving, and, if justice demands retribution, more gentle in its execution. See also §§ 208f, 211g. The Mosaic code itself forbade the extension of the ancient concept of family solidarity to the execution of all the male members of a family for the crime of one. Such was the practice of the Persians and other ancient peoples; cf. Herod. 3, 119, Quintus Curtius 6, 20. This prohibition is given in Deut 24:16, 'Fathers shall not be put to death together with their sons nor sons with their fathers'. The code also strove to mitigate man's natural harshness and selfishness. This can be illustrated by many prescriptions. The wickedness of abusing the weakness of the stranger, the widow and the orphan is stressed (Ex 22:21 f.). And in many ways the law strove to inculcate a positive spirit of humanity and kindness. It is of obligation to help even a personal enemy among fellow-Israelites (Ex 23:4 f.). Help must be given when another man's animal has strayed or is in difficulties on a journey (Deut 22:1-4). Grapes may be eaten in another's vineyard and ears of corn in another's field, though grapes may not be carried away in a basket or a sickle be used in the field (Deut 23:24 f. [MT 25 f.]). The owner was not permitted to glean his own olive trees or vines. The gleanings were to be left for the stranger, the widow and the orphan (Deut 24:20 f.). The Hebrew must be kind to strangers and love them as God himself does (Lev 19:33 f.; Deut 10:18 f.). Men were weaned from cruelty towards dumb animals by laws enjoining humanity and kindness in their use (Deut 22:6 f.; 25:4).

b The ideal of monogamous marriage was proposed by the example of our first parents and was strongly recommended to the later Israelites by the prophets' habitual description of Yahweh's union with his people under the figure of a marital union (Is 1:2, Ez 16:8, etc.). But monogamy was not prescribed. The patriarchs Abraham and Jacob had each several wives. And the history of both shows that a sterile wife would invite her husband to take a handmaid as secondary wife in order to raise up issue. Following this precedent the Mosaic law recognized the practice of polygamy, stipulating only that the father may not substitute a son born to a specially loved wife for his firstborn, issue of a wife less esteemed (Deut 21:15-17). And kings were prohibited from multiplying their wives after the manner of oriental despots (Deut 17:17), a prohibition entirely disregarded by Solomon. Divorce also was not prohibited. Abraham dismissed Agar; and the Mosaic law tolerated the practice on account of the hardness of men's hearts (Mt 19:8) but made repudiation more difficult by requiring legal formalities (Deut 24:1-4).

i Side by side with prescriptions relative to moral conduct are set down what today would be considered enactments of civil law (Ex 22-3; Deut 20). The civil law of Israel was thus a divinely sanctioned law in harmony with the character of Israel as God's 'peculiar possession', every part of whose life came under the direction and protection of religion. Some of these laws are, as in all codes, a determination of the natural law. As an example may be cited the law regulating compensation when one man's ox gores and kills another's (Ex 21:35 f.). Such laws regulating the rights of property are fundamental, as all codes must endeavour to secure strict justice between the members of the commonwealth. This end of preventing the bounds of strict justice from being exceeded in a spirit of revenge was the purpose of the Lex Talionis, which allowed no greater injury in punishment than had been unjustly inflicted, 'an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth' (Ex 21:24 f.; Lev 24:19 f.; Deut 19:19-21).

j Other laws are directly religious as regulating the outward forms of the worship of God and man's other duties in the direct service of God. Under the former head come the laws and regulations concerning the 110j Tabernacle, its ministers, sacrifices and feasts. Under the latter head are comprised tithes, firstfruits and vows. Lastly, there are religious observances connected with uncleanness, the avoidance of certain foods, the sabbatical year and the year of jubilee.

Divine Worship—The centre of the cult was the 111a Tabernacle, which with its appurtenances is described in §§ 176f-178c. The Holy of Holies was entered by no one but the high-priest, who himself entered only on the day of atonement. The most important ceremony of this day was the sprinkling of the blood of the victims offered for sin on and in front of the propitiatory or mercy-seat. The purpose of the whole ceremony was not only to make atonement for the transgressions of the people but also to purify the sacred place from contamination caused by sin. And as it might be supposed that the Holy of Holies, to which there was no access except on this day, could not be contaminated, the ceremony was a striking witness to God's abhorrence of evil and demand for the most absolute sinlessness. Once in the year, on the same day, blood was to be sprinkled in atonement on the horns of the altar of incense (Ex 30:10) which stood in the Holy Place, the chamber immediately in front of the Holy of Holies. Otherwise this altar was reserved exclusively for the daily offering of incense, once in the morning and once in the evening (Ex 30:7 f.; Lk 1:9 f.). This offering of incense was an act of adoration, and an atoning power is ascribed to the burning of incense in Num 16:46 f. (MT 17:11 f.), where DV has 'pray' for 'atone'. The Psalmist compares it to prayer (Ps 140:2); cf. Apoc 5:8. The laying out of the twelve loaves of b proposition or shewbread on the table on the north side of the Holy Place was a cultic observance of which the Bible offers no explanation. The obvious symbolism was the recognition of the truth that man owes to God not only his existence but also his means of subsistence. The seven lamps on the lampstand (DV 'candlestick', Num 8:2) were apparently to burn from evening to morning only. (They were trimmed at the time of the morning offering of incense [Ex 30:7] and were to be set up at the time of the evening offering of the same [v 8]; Ex 27:21 and Lev 24:3 fix the time as 'from evening until morning' [cf. 1 Kg 3:3]; there were no windows in the Holy Place, but it would seem that the provision of artificial light was not deemed necessary between the two offerings of incense.) This suggests the symbolism that the burning lamps figure the worship of the sons of Israel during the hours of darkness when worshippers would not be present.

Hebrew cult had no feature more prominent or more c important than the frequent animal sacrifices. The altar of burnt offerings on which the victims were consumed by fire in whole or in part lay in the court before the Holy Place. See the description § 178d. The different types of sacrifice and offering are explained § 183a-e.

The supreme act of worship was the d holocaust, in which, as the name implies, the whole victim was consumed by fire on the altar and no part of it fell to the use of man. On its ritual see § 184b-c. The actual slaying of the victim was a necessary preliminary but by no means the essential part of the ritual. The offering of sacrifice was a priestly act and only priests were allowed to minister at the altar of burnt offering (Ex 30:20) [where DV incorrectly 'offer incense'], but the duty of killing the animal fell to the offerer, who for the most part would be a layman (Lev 1:5, 3:2, etc.). The duty of the priests was to sprinkle the blood round about on the altar (Lev 1:5, 11, 3:2, etc.), and to arrange the portions of the victim on the altar to be burnt (Lev 1:9, 13). The consumption of blood was e prohibited to the Hebrews, whether priest or lay (Lev 3:17, 7:26 f.); and the reason is given in Deut 12:23, namely that the blood is the soul or life. The blood, that is to say, is the most obvious necessary condition of life; an otherwise perfectly healthy body is dead when once drained of its blood. And in Lev 17:11 the 111e atoning power of blood is explicitly referred to this fact that it is the vehicle of life, though as the word nepes is used both of the soul as spirit of life and of life itself, the exact translation is uncertain: 'The life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you that you may make atonement upon the altar for your souls, for it is the blood which makes atonement through the life'. This explains clearly the significance of the outpouring of the blood on the altar in the ritual of sacrifice. It was not the blood as such but the blood in its relation to life that had atoning power. God alone is the author of life, and the ritual act was a solemn confession of the supreme dominion of God the Creator over man as over all his creatures. The other part of the ritual, the burning of the victim upon the altar, had its own significance. The whole victim seemed to go up to heaven to God in the only way within the power of man as it rose in smoke from the altar; and this rising up to God is expressed by 'ôlâh, the Hebrew name for the holocaust. Man thus gave it back to God, from whom he had received it, in as absolute a manner as possible. And the complete destruction of the victim by fire was the means necessary to make possible this rising up to God, and at the same time entirely removed it from the ownership or use of man. The holocaust was thus the most solemn act of worship in Israel. In it alone was the whole victim burnt on the altar. In the case of sin-offerings made when the anointed priest had sinned and brought guilt on the people or when the people itself had sinned, the whole victim was burnt, but only part upon the altar and part without the camp (Lev 4:12, 21). In addition to being the supreme act of worship the holocaust had also expiatory value, as is explicitly noted Lev 1:4. Besides other occasions holocausts were ordered to be offered in perpetuity every morning and every evening (Ex 29:38-42).

g This atoning power of the holocaust was not held to suffice and was probably considered to apply only to sin of which the offerer was never fully conscious, as special sacrifices existed for the atonement of specific transgressions. These were the sin-offering and the trespass-offering (RV 'guilt offering'). They are mentioned as different sacrifices (Lev 7:7). As the same word is used for 'sin' and 'sin-offering' and the same for 'trespass' and 'trespass-offering', there is in some passages room for different interpretations and the translations will accordingly be found at times to differ. It is a result of this double meaning that RV makes the sin-offering of Lev 5:6 also a 'guilt offering'. It is not easy to make a clear-cut distinction between the cases calling for atonement respectively by one or the other sacrifice: see § 183c. It may be noted here that the sprinkling of the blood of the victim on the altar either of incense or of burnt-offerings is characteristic of both offerings (Lev 4:7, 18, 25, 30, 34, 5:9 and Lev 7:2). On the other hand it is only in reference to the trespass-offering that there is question of restitution, fine or money value of the victim (Lev 5:15 f., 18, 6:5 f.). (The absence of reference to the value of the trespass-offering to be made by lepers and Nazarites is due to the fact that the degree of legal uncleanness was not variable.) Both sacrifices were means of obtaining atonement and forgiveness (Lev 4:26, 31, 35, 5:10 and 5:16, 18, 6:7), but the righting of a wrong done was proper to the trespass-offering.

h It is to be noted that all the faults calling for expiation by a sin-offering enumerated in Lev 4 and 5 are cases of inadvertence or complete ignorance (4:2, 13, 22, 27; 5:2, 3, 4) [DV incorrectly 'forget'], except 5:1 which is concerned with a sin of omission. Num 15:22-29 goes further and lays it down that sins such as the above could be atoned for, but not (22:30 f.) sins committed 'with a high hand' (DV 'through pride'). Any committing such sins were to be cut off from the people with whom God had entered into a holy covenant. They had proved themselves unworthy of it. Grave sins were punished by death and there was no possibility of atonement (Ex 21:14-17, etc.). In 111b regard to the trespass-offering atonement is limited again among sins against God to those committed in inadvertence or ignorance (Lev 5:15, 17), whereas there is no such limitation as regards injustices against man. In these latter cases the emphasis is on righting the wrong done to another. The obligation to atone even for unwitting breaches of the divine law was a means aptly chosen to inculcate on Israel the absolute obedience and sinlessness required in the service of the all-holy God.

There remain the peace offerings, on which see § 183b; Lev 3, 7:11 ff. They might be offered either in thanksgiving for benefits received or in supplication for future divine favours. The sprinkling of the blood which formed part of this ritual also indicates a sense of the abiding need of sinful man for expiation. But the characteristic feature of this sacrifice, which was a joyful one, was the feast enjoyed by the offerer and his family or friends of those portions of the victim which belonged neither to God nor to the priests. The flesh could be eaten by all except those suffering from legal impurity. These peace offerings, as well as holocausts, were of pre-Mosaic origin (Ex 20:24).

A later Mosaic law turned all animals, whether ox, sheep or goat, sacrificed for food into peace offerings (Lev 17:1-7). Moses found that his people, always so prone to idolatry, were killing these animals in honour of local desert spirits (DV 'devils'). In order to check this grave abuse God ordered that none of these animals should be killed anywhere, whether within or without the camp, except at the tabernacle. The animals which were then being killed 'in the field' or open country, the Israelites are ordered in future to bring to the tabernacle, there to be slain and offered with the ritual of peace offerings. Thus every repast of flesh meat became a holy meal shared with the priests and sanctified by oblation to God. (The attempt to remove this law from its Sinaitic setting by excising 'the camp' and 'the tent of meeting' is quite arbitrary.) Moses foresaw the impossibility of this law once the tribes should have been dispersed over the Promised Land, and it was modified when the Israelites were about to cross the Jordan, to allow animals to be killed for food anywhere if the distance from the central place of sacrifice should be too great (Deut 12:20 f.).

112a The Israelites would always be exposed to the danger of idolatry on account of their close contact with pagan nations; and as worship entailed sacrifice, this danger would be mitigated by the limitation of sacrifice to one shrine erected in honour of Yahweh. In the earliest legislation there is no provision for such limitation. Sacrifice is allowed in every place which God has sanctified by some divine manifestation (DV 'where the memory of my name shall be') [Ex 20:24]. But after the consecration of the ark and the tabernacle that shrine was the one and only such place always accessible to the Israelites during the period of the wanderings, and there they were commanded to bring their sacrifices (Lev 17:8 f.). Actually this law was not observed (Deut 12:8). This, however, is not surprising, as the Israelites fell into worse sins during the wanderings of the exodus. Despite the manifestations of divine power in their favour both in Egypt and at Sinai they fell into idolatry before entering Canaan (Lev 17:7; Num 25:2; Ez 20:16 f.). It is, therefore, to be expected that other less vital laws should have been violated. Moses could only hope that religious observance would improve when the people had come to rest in the possession that the Lord was to give them (Deut 12:9). With that end in view he insists upon the law with emphasis and reiteration. In the place which the Lord should choose, there and there only was sacrifice to be offered (Deut 12:5, 11, 14, 18, 21, 26). This sixfold mention of the Lord's choice of a place is joined with the promise that God would give them peace from their enemies, and it is implied that this choice would not be made until peace had been granted (10). These conditions were not fulfilled until the time of 112b Solomon. The tabernacle and ark were long at Silo (Shiloh; Jos 18:1; 1 Kg 1-4), and by the court of the tabernacle, and probably surrounding it, were buildings for the service of the ministers and for the needs of divine worship. These with the shrine itself were the hékál or temple mentioned in 1 Kg 3:3. (Compare the name ἱερόν 'temple' given to the whole complex of buildings erected by Herod as opposed to the vaós 'shrine' in which were the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies.) The evidence is against the idea that at Shiloh the ark was itself housed in a building. Cf. 'I chose no city . . . for a house to be built that my name might be there' (3 Kg 8:16), and 'I have not dwelt in a house from the day that I brought the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt even to this day, but have moved about in a tabernacle and in a tent' (2 Kg 7:6). In his message to David delivered through Nathan God said that he had never required any of the tribes (or, Judges) to build a temple, but David's son is to build a house to God's name, and 'my people . . . shall be disturbed no more, neither shall the children of iniquity afflict them any more as they did before from the day that I appointed Judges over my people Israel, and I will give them rest from all their enemies' (2 Kg 7:7, 10 f., 13). And from the dedication of Solomon's temple Jerusalem is frequently spoken of as 'the city which the Lord chose out of all the tribes of Israel to put his name there' (3 Kg 8:44, 48, 11:13, 32, 36, 14:21; 4 Kg 21:7; 23:27). These considerations are supported by 3 Kg 3:2, 'the people sacrificed in the high places, for there was no temple built to the name of the Lord until that day', and explain how it happened that during the period of the Judges sacrifices were legitimately offered in various places. After the dedication of Solomon's temple the conditions required for the law to come into force were fulfilled. The circumstances of the time, however, were most unfavourable for its observance or even for an attempt to enforce it. Solomon's own religious practice (cf. § 114i) was against the very purpose of the law, and the people had grown accustomed to the contrary practice during the previous centuries. Then the revolt, which split the kingdom into two after Solomon's death, brought with it a religious schism. As a safeguard against attempts at reunion with the Southern Kingdom Jeroboam did everything in his power to prevent the people from making pilgrimage to Jerusalem. This was the object of his new shrines of Yahweh at Bethel and Dan where the God of Israel was to be worshipped under the image of a bull. And Baasa took measures to close the frontier to prevent all intercourse between the two kingdoms. In these circumstances the law of the one sanctuary became impossible of fulfilment in the Northern Kingdom, and altars were built to Yahweh to aid in the preservation of true religion. These altars were destroyed in the religious persecution of Baal-worshipping Achab and Jezabel, a destruction bemoaned by Elias, 'They have thrown down thy altars, they have slain thy prophets' (3 Kg 18:32, 19:10, 14), and Elias himself built an altar on Mount Carmel. These altars are not in any way evidence that the law of the one sanctuary did not exist. What they do show is that the law did not demand a rigid observance to be urged even in circumstances when its purpose, which was to further the true worship of God, would not be furthered but rather hindered. That the altars promoted the worship of Yahweh is clear from the fact that their destruction sprang from the desire to uproot that worship altogether. Elias bewailed at the time that 'the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant' (3 Kg 19:14).

e The Ministers of the Cult from the time of Moses were divided into two grades. These were the priests for the sacerdotal work, and their assistants who came to have the exclusive designation of Levites. For the priesthood God appointed Aaron and his male descendants (Ex 28:1). The Hebrews, like the Arabs, attached particular importance to their line of ancestors, and the fact that the right to the priesthood depended on descent from Aaron was a strong added incentive to the maintenance of careful family tables. Accordingly after the exile we find that Esdras, priest and scribe, traced his descent through Sadoc and Eleazar to Aaron (Esd 7:1-5, 11), and those who could not establish their Aaronic descent by documentary evidence were expelled from the priesthood (Esd 2:62). There is no reason to doubt that in this matter the law was always adhered to rigidly. The priesthood was a vested interest and temporal advantage was a re-inforcement of the spiritual motive of obedience. At the same time the hereditary nature of the priesthood was unfortunately the cause of many entering its ranks for whom spiritual motives had small appeal. This was a recurring source of religious weakness and even indifference, and at least a contributory cause of many scandals in the national life. Aaron and his sons were initiated into their sacred office by a special form of consecration (Ex 29:1-37; Lev 8). And the future successors of Aaron as chief priest were also to be anointed and officially installed in office (Lev 16:32). There is no specific regulation about any ceremony by which the lesser priests were to be introduced to their work.

To the priests fell the most sacred functions, and, of course, the sacerdotal act of offering sacrifice. It was their duty to offer the blood of the victims and to sprinkle it on the altar of burnt-offerings, to put part of it on the horns of the altar of incense or of burnt-offerings, or to pour it out at the base of the latter altar according to the nature of the sacrifice and its ritual (Lev 1:5, 4:7, 25). The actual killing of the victims and their division into parts were not sacerdotal acts (cf. § 111d). It was further the duty of the priests to lay the portions of the victim on the altar and consume them with fire (Lev 1:8 f., 12 f., etc.). All the more sacred functions were performed exclusively by the priests. They performed all duties within the tabernacle. They offered incense on the altar of incense (Ex 30:7 f.; Num 16:40), a duty which was reserved to the Aaronites under pain of death. In fact they alone were allowed within the Holy Place (Ex 30:19 f.; Num 18:7); and consequently they had charge of the seven-branched lampstand and of the table of shewbread (Ex 27:20 f.; Lev 24:5-9). Not only might no one but the priests enter the sanctuary, no one else was allowed even to touch the vessels and objects which belonged to it (Num 4:15). It was, therefore, the privilege of the priests to take down and wrap up all the appurtenances of the sanctuary when the Israelites were about to strike camp (Num 4:5-15). It was further the priestly office to bless the people (Num 6:23-27). The priests had also a teaching office entrusted to them. They were to instruct the people in the law of God (Lev 10:11; cf. Mal 2:7). Other duties, such as purification from the uncleanness of leprosy (Lev ch 13 f.) can only be alluded to here.

The name of Levites given to the second class of ministers is not without ambiguity, as strictly it denotes all the members of the tribe of Levi to which the priestly family of Aaron also belonged. Thus Aaron himself is spoken of as 'Aaron the Levite' (Ex 4:14); and the priests are included among the Levites of Num 35:2 ff. (cf. Jos 21:1-4). However, the name became the technical designation of the non-Aaronite male members of the tribe from the age at which they entered on office (Num 7:5-9). At the coming forth from Egypt God had claimed as his own all the first-born males of Israel in memory of the manner in which the deliverance had been finally achieved. They were to be 'sanctified' to God, that is, specially dedicated to his service, presumably as ministers of his worship (Ex 13:2), but another later law ordained that they should be 'redeemed' or bought back (Ex 13:13, 34:20). Finally God chose the Levites to 'serve in his ministry' in place of the firstborn (Num 8:11, 16-18). The age of service is laid down as 'twenty-five years old and upwards' (Num 8:24), though those deputed to carry the tabernacle and its belongings on the march were only those between the ages of thirty and fifty 112b (Num 4:3 ff.). (Later the heavy work required during the wanderings being over, David lowered the age to twenty [1 Par 23:24-27], and in view of this passage the age of thirty given in 1 Par 23:3 must be a textual error based on Num 4:3. David's innovation is important as showing that the prescriptions of the law were not regarded as being immutable even when circumstances had completely altered.) Beyond the duty of carrying the tabernacle and its vessels on the march (Num 4) the office of the Levites is only vaguely indicated in the Pentateuch. They were to camp around the tabernacle and guard it (Num 1:53). For the rest it is laid down that they are to minister to Aaron and busy themselves with the work of the tabernacle, without, however, permission to touch the vessels of the sanctuary or the altar (Num 18:2-4). Later David organized them as porters, singers, musicians and so forth (1 Par 23-26).

1 There is very little information about Levites in the early centuries after the occupation of Canaan. In the turbulent period of the Judges the law was honoured in the breach more than by observance: each did what seemed right in his own eyes (Jud 17:6, 21:24). In the days of Saul the ark was neglected (1 Par 13:3). For a period the ark and the tabernacle were even separated at different places (1 Par 16:39; 2 Par 1:3-5). This astonishing fact gives an idea of what the ritual observance must have been. Moreover, the authors of some of the early histories were not interested in or did not choose to give space to ritual matters. The Books of Paralipomenon, on the other hand, give abundant information on these topics drawn from ancient sources which the earlier histories had not utilized. It has even been suggested that the carrying of the ark by the priests on certain occasions is an indication that the Levites did not exist at the time, as this function is assigned to the latter in Num 4:5 f., 15. It must be remembered, however, that the Levites were to carry the ark when wrapped up for journeys in the wilderness. On solemn occasions when the ark would be carried uncovered, the Levites would not be permitted to touch it and the honour fell to the priests (Jos 4:9, 6:6). During times when the worship of God was neglected (4 Kg 23:5; 2 Par 28:24) and it was impossible for the Levites to gain their sustenance from service in the temple, many of them may have become merged in the people at large. Ezechiel (44:10-14) planned to recruit their ranks by the degradation of those priests who had fallen into idolatrous worship. Only 'the priests the Levites, the sons of Sadoc' who had remained faithful, were to retain the sacerdotal office (44:15).

113a Feasts—As God created man and the whole of his life belongs to God, he is at all times to bear the law of God in mind faithfully to observe it (Deut 6:5-9), and every day public worship was offered especially by the morning and evening holocausts (Ex 29:38). In addition there were certain holy days and holy seasons. These came round every seven days, every month, every year, every seven years, and every seven times seven years. The weekly feast was the Sabbath which fell on the last day of the week. (The first mention of it occurs Ex 16:23-30; on its origin see §172*k* and on the Sabbath precept of the decalogue §173*b*.) The day had its negative and positive observances. The name is taken from the negative element, as it was a day of strict rest or abstinence from all work (Ex 20:10). The special solemnity of the feast was marked by this complete prohibition of all work, whereas on other feasts only servile work is forbidden (Lev 23:7 and cf. Ex 12:16; Lev 23:8, 21, 25, 35 f.), with the exception of the day of atonement (Lev 23:28) [MT and LXX]. This complete rest incumbent on the whole household was a memorial of their liberation from the hard tasks of Egypt (Deut 5:15), and at the same time provided suitable rest and relaxation (Ex 23:12). The Sabbath was intended to be a day of gladness (Os 2:11), very different from the burdensome yoke it became in the time of Christ owing to the multiplication of Pharisaical o regulations. Every Sabbath the loaves of proposition were changed (Lev 24:8), and special sacrifices were offered in addition to the daily holocausts (Num 28:9 f.). A 'holy convocation' is prescribed (Lev 23:2 f.) [MT], but the exact meaning of this is nowhere explained. The term does not signify a meeting to be held at the sanctuary by all, as only thrice in the year were all males under an obligation to 'appear before the Lord' (Ex 23:17) on the three chief feasts of the calendar. In later times these holy convocations were meetings in the synagogues for worship and preaching. So far as is known, there was nothing analogous to the Sabbath in the religions of neighbouring peoples.

As every week so every month was consecrated by a d feast, the feast of the new moon or first day of the month, as the Hebrew months were reckoned by the moon. Special holocausts were prescribed for this day, and a sin-offering in atonement for the wrong-doing of the previous month (Num 28:11-15). On this day the priests were to blow the silver trumpets at the time of the holocausts (Num 10:8, 10). Abstinence from work was not prescribed, nor a holy convocation. Custom, however, forbade trading on this day (Am 8:5), which was a holiday celebrated by a feast (1 Kg 20:5) and therefore unsuitable for fasting (Jdt 8:6).

The first day of Tishri (September-October) was a e feast of special solemnity (Lev 23:23 f.; Num 29:1-6) commonly called the Feast of Trumpets. Whether this day owed its sacred character to its being the opening of the seventh month or the beginning of the civil year is not clear. It was to be celebrated by abstinence from servile work, by a holy convocation, special holocausts in addition to those belonging to the day as the first of the month and to the perpetual daily sacrifice, and by a sin-offering in atonement for the sins of the people. Further, as the name implies, there was a special blowing of trumpets, probably at intervals throughout the day, whereas on other feasts the silver trumpets were sounded only at the time of the sacrifices (Num 10:2, 10). As a distinguishing feature ram's horns seem to have been used on this day, and consequently the allusion in Ps 80(81)d would be to this festival. See art. 'Trumpet' in HDB.

As from the time of Moses the liturgical year began f with the month Abib, later called Nisan (March-April) [Ex 12:2], the first great festival was that of the Pasch and feast of unleavened bread (Lev 23:5 and 6 where they are spoken of separately). In practice the two coalesced into one, as no leaven was permitted from the evening of the 14th, when the Paschal supper was eaten, for the seven days to the evening of the 21st (Ex 12:18). The origin of the two feasts was probably different. That of the Pasch is given in Ex 12, §169*e-f*, and it is probable that the feast of unleavened bread was more ancient. It may have been the feast which Moses asked permission to go and celebrate in the desert (Ex 5:3, 10:24-26). The ancestors of the Israelites were not true nomads but remained long enough in one place to raise crops (Gen 26:12), and the agricultural feast of unleavened bread may have been celebrated by the patriarchs. Its essential feature was the consecration to God of the firstfruits of the new barley crop, the first of the year to mature. Before the new produce had been thus publicly acknowledged as the gift of God it was unlawful to partake of it in any form (Lev 23:6-14). The names Pasch and Phase (Ex 12:11; Deut 16:1) are synonyms, the former being derived from Aramaic and the latter from Hebrew. The equivalent English name is Passover, the feast commemorating the salvation of the Israelites when the avenging Angel passed over the dwellings of the Israelites to strike only all the firstborn of the Egyptians. On the whole feast see also Ex 13:3-10; Num 9:2-14, 28:16-25; Deut 16:1-8. The animal to be sacrificed g and eaten at the paschal supper was a lamb or a kid (Ex 12:5), and this animal is itself sometimes called the pasch or phase (Ex 12:21). In Deut 16:1-8 the feasts of the pasch and of unleavened bread are so welded into one that victims for sacrificial meals on the days following the paschal supper are also called by the 113g name pasch or phase (Deut 16:2 f.). These could be sheep or oxen, and later received the name chagigah, which originally denoted the celebration of a feast. This may be the meaning of pasch in Jn 18:28. It may further be noted here that in Ex 12:9 it is ordered that the pasch is to be eaten roasted, neither raw nor boiled. In Deut 16:7 cooking but not the manner of cooking is prescribed, the word used, bāšal, which originally meant 'to ripen' (in the sun), being applied to the artificial 'ripening' of food by cooking to make it fit for eating. At this feast all males were 'to appear before the Lord', that is, to attend at the sanctuary (Ex 23:14-17). We have historical notices of the first pasch celebrated by Josue and the people after their entry into the Promised Land with which was connected the cessation of manna (Jos 5:10-12), of the pasch celebrated by Ezechias (2 Par 30), and also of that celebrated at the time of Josias' great reform (2 Par 35). The latter were celebrations such as had not been seen for centuries.

h As the feast of unleavened bread at the time of putting 'the sickle to the corn' (Deut 16:9) sanctified the beginning of the barley harvest, so the feast of weeks (Ex 34:22) was that at which thanksgiving was made to God for the completion of the wheat harvest. Barley ripens several weeks before wheat in Palestine. The two feasts were thus complementary. And the initial and final character of the two festivals was appropriately symbolized by the waving before the Lord of a sheaf of barley at the former (Lev 23:11), and of two loaves made of fermented flour, such as the people were wont to eat, at the latter (Lev 23:17). The interval of time between the two offerings was to be seven weeks, so that the second offering took place fifty days after the first (Lev 23:15 f.), whence the NT name of Pentecost (Ac 2:1). The exact day from which the count was to be made was disputed among the Jews themselves at the close of the OT period. The prevailing practice was to understand the Sabbath of Lev 23:11, 15, of the day of rest which opened the feast of unleavened bread (Lev 23:7), whereas the Sadducees claimed that the Sabbath in question was the weekly Sabbath which fell within the seven days of the feast; see art. 'Pentecost' HDB 740. The feast of weeks was the second of the three at which all male Hebrews were to 'appear before the Lord' (Ex 23:14-17, 34:23). The legislation regarding the feast is given Lev 23:15-22; Num 28:26-31; Deut 16:9-12. (The difference in the number of victims read in Lev and Num respectively is probably due to textual corruption, Num 28:27 being correct in prescribing two young bulls and one ram in accordance with the practice at the new moon feasts and the seven days of the feast of unleavened bread [Num 28:11, 19, 24]. Josephus, however, records that in his time the two texts were taken to give two distinct prescriptions and two sets of victims were offered accordingly [Ant. 3, 10, 6], where, by another slip, the combined figure for the rams is given as two instead of three.)

j The third of the great feasts at which all male Israelites were required to repair to the sanctuary (Ex 23:14-17) was the feast of tabernacles (Lev 23:34), otherwise called the feast of ingathering (Ex 23:16 [where for 'corn' read produce]). The feast proper lasted seven days from the 15th to the 21st day of the 7th month and was followed by one day of celebration on the 22nd, which brought the cycle of annual feasts to an end. This additional day tended inevitably to be identified with the feast proper; contrast Lev 23:35 f., 39 and 2 Mac 10:6. In the agricultural calendar this festival celebrated the conclusion of the labours of the year when the crops had been gathered from field, vineyard and olive grove. This was the fundamental idea of the feast. It was a time of rejoicing and of thanksgiving when the good gifts of God had been gathered in from the land divinely given to the Hebrew people. For a comparatively primitive people an appropriate setting for such a festivity was in 'tabernacles' or booths set up, for instance, in the vineyards. This gave the feast a further historical significance as a commemoration of the long years the Hebrews had sojourned in tabernacles (Lev 23:43). Not all the Mosaic prescriptions were considered to bind for all time. Some were given for the preparatory period spent in the wanderings in the wilderness. And it is interesting that when the feast was celebrated in 444 under Esdras and Nehemias and the people made themselves tabernacles, it is recorded that the feast had not been kept in that manner since the days of Josue (Neh 8:17)—incidentally an illustration of the strict observance of the law which set in after the exile. The relevant legislation is given Lev 23:34-36, 39-43; Num 29:12-38; Deut 16:13-16, 31:10-13. This celebration as the final and greatest of the year is spoken of simply as 'the feast', e.g. 3 Kg 8:2, 65; Neh 8:14.

Lastly must be mentioned the day of atonement (Lev 23:9) in Ac 27:9 called 'the fast'. This fell on the 10th day of the 7th month between the feast of trumpets and the feast of tabernacles (Lev 23:27). Feasts and fasts were reckoned from evening to evening, and the 9th day of Lev 23:32 is a loose expression for the evening beginning the 10th day. The relevant passages are Ex 30:10; Lev 16, §191d-k, 23:27-32; Num 29:7-11, where the various sacrifices and special ceremonies of atonement are prescribed, and see §111a. The day was one of fasting (the only one ordered in the law) called 'afflicting the soul', and of abstinence from servile work. Thus, though the sacerdotal ceremonies of atonement took place in the tabernacle or temple, which there was no obligation to attend on this day, the whole nation had its part in the work of expiation by personal penance, and was encouraged to enter wholeheartedly into the spirit of repentance and purpose of amendment which were the natural fruits of such an observance. The atonement was for the wrong-doing of the whole nation including the priests and served also to purify the sanctuary from any defilement that the contact of sinful man might have brought upon it. In view of the paucity of the references to the feasts in the OT it is not inexplicable that the only allusion to the day of atonement is in Eccles 50:5 ff. (observed in DV). It has, however, caused surprise that there is no mention of it in Neh 8-9, and the fact that a solemn day of atonement was celebrated on the 24th of the 7th month has been thought to imply a recent origin for the day of atonement on the 10th. Actually had the introduction of the day taken place, as is claimed, after the 7th month of Neh 8-9, the yearly day of atonement would have been fixed on the anniversary of that celebrated by Esdras (Neh 9:1). Moreover, it would not have been introduced in the form it has. The most solemn act of the whole year would not have been prescribed in a form incapable of fulfilment as the Holy of Holies was empty, the ark was not there nor the propitiatory. Actually, there is no valid argument from silence in the case. The feast of trumpets is not named nor its ceremonies referred to. It is alluded to (Neh 8:1 ff.) merely on account of the reading of the law which took place that year on, though not prescribed for, that feast. Similarly, the feast of tabernacles is mentioned, not simply because it was kept, but because for many centuries it had not been kept as it was that year (Neh 8:17). There is thus no ground for saying that had the day of atonement been observed on the 10th, the fact would have been recorded. If it was kept in the ordinary way, there was no reason for recording it. The assumption of the argument used to prove the late introduction of the feast is that, had it been found in the book of the law, it would have been kept and the fact would have been recorded. Therefore, it is claimed, it was not in the law. But, if it was not in the law publicly read out on the feast of trumpets (Neh 8:2-9) and on each day of the feast of tabernacles (Neh 8:18), it could not have been subsequently introduced as of Mosaic origin. There was no reason to record the observance of the day on the 10th, and a special day of atonement was instituted that year on the 24th in preparation for the solemn covenant (Neh 10:29-31).

114a The Spirit of the Mosaic Religion—Mosaic religion inculcated the most profound reverence for God, whose majesty had been graphically symbolized by the terrifying theophany of Sinai. He had created the heavens and the earth and all that is in them (Ex 20:11). Everything in this world was subject to his dominion, as was manifested by the plagues of Egypt and the other miraculous events accompanying the liberation from Egypt. His dwelling was in heaven far exalted above the abode of men. In recognition of this supreme dominion of God the Israelites were under the obligation of offering sacrifices and of making pilgrimages to his shrine; and as God had made all and all belonged by right to him, the Israelite was to recognize this divine ownership by 'redeeming' or buying back his firstborn males, whether of his family, of his herd or his flock, by offering a tithe of the produce of his land, by setting aside part of his time, Sabbaths and other holy seasons, for the worship of God.

b Yet this God of supreme power and dominion did not wish to remain aloof from man as the remote object of worship. He was the God of loving condescension. He deigned to enter into a covenant with Israel, whom he chose as his own special possession (Ex 24:8, 34:10; Deut 5:2). And not merely that, he deigned to dwell in their midst and to manifest his presence in the Holy of Holies (Ex 25:22; Lev 16:2; Num 7:89). God was thus exalted above the earth in his heavenly dwelling and yet living in the midst of his people. They were his children, not merely his creatures; Israel was his firstborn (Ex 4:22). In answer to this love and favour God claimed not only exclusive adoration (Ex 20:1-5) but also an absorbing love: 'Thou shalt love Yahweh thy God with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole strength' (Deut 6:5). And this exhortation not merely to reverence and obey God but to do so with wholehearted love is emphasized by repetition (Deut 10:12, 11:1, 13). The Hebrew words rendered in the received English form as 'with thy whole-soul' did not convey to the Hebrew mind quite what the English words signify to us, as the spiritual nature of the soul was a truth unknown in the time of Moses and for many centuries thereafter. The Hebrew word is nepeš, which has the same sense here as in Ps 40:3, 'Deliver him not up to the will (nepeš) of his enemies'. The word signifies that the Israelites were to love God with all the desire and longing of which they were capable, that is with an intense love. This precept, the noblest of the OT, alone raised the religion of Israel to heights undreamt of in the ancient pagan religions, and even the NT could offer no more exalted idea of the relation in which man should stand to God than this of wholehearted and intense love. To Christians the idea is so familiar that there is a danger of overlooking what would have appeared to non-Israelites as the revolutionary character of this religious precept.

d The God of majesty who thus manifested himself to Israel in loving condescension was also the God of holiness; and this holiness of God was impressed on the people by emphasis on God's detestation of all evil and by the necessity of absolute ritual purity in his service. Our Lord's exhortation, 'Be ye perfect as also your heavenly father is perfect' (Mt 5:48), is an echo, though with a higher connotation of perfection, of the ideal of Mosaic religion. One of Moses' last addresses to his people contains the appeal, 'Thou shalt be perfect and without spot before the Lord thy God' (Deut 18:13) [where the words 'without spot' are a doublet added by St Jerome to bring out the meaning of perfection]. What God asked of his people was obedience to his law (Deut 10:12). By correspondence to its just demands they would be what God desired above all 'a holy nation' (Ex 19:6; Lev 20:7). This holiness would be manifested in just dealing and in respect for the rights of others. But the good Hebrew was not to be satisfied by conformity to the strict demands of justice. His dealings were to be marked by kindness towards the weak and helpless. And the stranger, the fatherless and the widow are specially singled out as requiring and deserving kindly help (Deut 14:29, 16:11, 14). Indeed the precept of charity extended to all fellow-Israelites: 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Lev 19:18). The Hebrew word rea' here used does not warrant an extension of the precept to all men (Maldonatus, Knabenbauer; it was allowed to exact usury from strangers though forbidden in the case of Israelites [Deut 23:19 f.]). It remained for our Lord, who came 'to fulfil the law', to bring this precept to perfection by extension to the hated Samaritans, and by implication to all men (Lk 10:29-37). But even in its restricted sense the precept raised the religion of Israel above that of other ancient peoples, and represented the highest ideal the Israelites were capable of assimilating in their then stage of spiritual development.

Violations of God's commandments and precepts were, of course, known to be offences against God the all-holy law-giver. The Israelite had a sense of sin. He did not think of it as a defilement of the soul, since not only the spiritual but also the substantial nature of the soul was not known till long after the Mosaic period. Sin was considered to make the whole man displeasing to God, which indeed it does. Neither was sin thought of as involving the loss of supernatural grace, as this too was unknown. The sense of sin shows that man was known to be free and responsible for his acts. And accordingly a clear distinction was drawn in the culpability incurred by different types of sin; cf. § 111*h*. For grave offences no means of reconciliation was offered. Lesser offences were atoned for by sacrifices. Confession of guilt was explicitly ordered in the case of trespass-offerings (Lev 5:5; Num 5:7) and on the day of atonement (Lev 16:21). Penance was also enjoined by the fast of the day of atonement (Lev 16:29) by the addition of a fifth of the value in the case of injured or usurped rights (Lev 5:16, 6:5, 22:14; Num 5:7). There was, besides, the pecuniary penance involved in providing the animals prescribed for sacrifice.

As no revelation had been made concerning rewards and punishments after death, the sanctions proposed were all temporal (Ex 20:12; Lev 26; Deut 28). At its institution, therefore, the Mosaic religion could not be called either otherworldly or spiritual, the notion of spirit being too subtle to be grasped by a comparatively uncultured people. And such the religion remained for the greater part of OT history. Nonetheless it was the highest form of religion to which the people could attain at the time and was immeasurably superior to the religions of the surrounding nations. Faithful observance of Mosaic religion meant a profound sense of the majesty and holiness of God, of his right to the entire and pure service of man, and in daily life ensured a high standard of justice in all human relationships, of family morality and of kindness to the weak and defenceless.

As regards the world at large, it remains to notice that Hebrew religion was a national and not a universal religion. It was based on a covenant entered into by God with Abraham, the father of the race (Gen 15 and 17) and solemnly renewed with the people at Sinai (Ex 24). There is nowhere an exhortation to labour for the conversion of the pagan nations to the religion of Yahweh. Yet the religion was not on a narrowly racial basis. 'A mixed multitude without number' came out of Egypt with the children of Israel (Ex 12:38). And any of these and any other strangers who were willing were free to become part of the people of the covenant. The one condition explicitly made was that all males were to undergo the rite of circumcision (Ex 12:48), which was the external sign of God's covenant (Gen 17:11). A later modification of this universal permission excluded Edomites and Egyptians to the third generation and Ammonites and Moabites to the tenth (Deut 23:3, 7*f.*). This prohibition did not, of course, exclude any from the knowledge and worship of the true God. The exclusion was from the covenant and from participation in the temporal bless-114h ings promised by God as reward for its faithful observance. To any believers thus shut out from membership of God's earthly kingdom, God would show his mercy in ways outside the covenant.

1 Mosaic Religion in Practice—This sketch of Mosaic religion has attempted to set down in brief its beliefs, practices and ideals. These were, however, very imperfectly reflected in the history of the people. While the words of the decalogue were still ringing in their ears, they had violated one of its fundamental precepts by setting up the golden calf for worship and that with the connivance of Aaron himself (Ex 32). This was an evil presage for the future. Moses accused the people of being stiffnecked and of having striven against the Lord from the time of leaving Egypt (Deut 9:6 f., 31:27). Indeed it was not long before they fell into actual idolatry while Moses yet lived (Num 25:3; Ez 20:16, 24). And idolatry was to be rampant among them through the greater part of their history. In the time of Elias only seven thousand of all the population of the Northern Kingdom had not bowed the knee to Baal (3 Kg 19:18). Solomon himself not only worshipped false gods, like Astarte and Moloch, but actually built them temples near the holy city (3 Kg 11:5-8). Manasses even built idolatrous altars to the host of heaven in the very temple of God (4 Kg 21:4 f.). These are but a few examples. And where their leaders led the way, the people were not slow to follow. What such idolatry entailed in the neglect of God's law and its religious observances can be easily imagined. In the wilderness the rite of circumcision which impressed on man the outward and essential sign of his membership of the covenant race (Gen 17:14) was not observed (Jos 5:5 f.). Whatever the reason for this failure, the fact was not such as to train the people in an exact following of the ceremonial law. This tendency was accentuated by the turbulent conditions prevalent in Canaan during the period of the Judges when conditions made the due observance of the law impossible in many respects. Non-observance led to disregard, contempt, oblivion. In the days of Saul the ark, Israel's most sacred possession, was neglected (1 Par 13:3). Even among the pious the law seems to have been very imperfectly known. Elcana went once a year to offer sacrifice at Shilo (1 Kg 1:3, 7) [DV 'upon the appointed days' is unwarranted], though the law ordered attendance at the three great festivals (Ex 34:23; Deut 16:16). After the time of the Judges when 'every one did that which seemed right to himself' (Jg 21:24), and the general neglect of the days of Saul, it would not have been easy to institute a thorough reform in the nation even if such had been attempted. David, despite his zeal to honour the ark, violated the law of Num 4:15 and had the ark carried on a cart, an error which he subsequently avoided (1 Par 13:7, 15:13, 26). Things came to such a pass that the book of the law was actually lost until the only copy which apparently existed was found in the temple in the days of Josias (4 Kg 22:8). This gave new impetus to that king's reforms, which, though more thorough than that of Ezechias, did not produce lasting results. Of each of Josias's four successors, Joachaz, Joakim, Joachin and Sedecias, it is recorded that 'he did evil before the Lord according to all that his fathers had done' (4 Kg 23:32, 37, 24:9, 19). It was only after the sufferings of the exile and the reform under Nehemias and Esdras when princes, priests, Levites and people made a solemn covenant to 'walk in the law of God' (Neh 10:29) that the life of the nation was faithfully based on its observance.

1 Apart from the constant danger of idolatry and consequent neglect of the worship of Yahweh, the other outstanding danger to which the Israelites were exposed was that of formalism and externalism. They were inclined to imagine that because God had chosen them and because his temple stood in their midst, he was certain to favour and protect them, forgetting that God is not pleased by the mere offering of sacrifice but requires the sacrifice to be offered with a pure heart and with pure hands. The people needed constantly to be reminded of the lesson given by Samuel to Saul, 'Doth the Lord desire holocausts and victims and not rather that the voice of the Lord should be obeyed?' (1 Kg 15:22). This is the meaning of the denunciation of feasts and sacrifices by prophets and psalmists (Is 1:13 f.; Mic 6:6-8; Ps 49:9). These writers did not repudiate sacrifices as such any more than did Samuel who offered them himself; cf. *H. H. Rowley, The Unity of the Old Testament reprinted from BJRL 29 (1946). Not all the efforts of the prophets were able to wean the Israelites from this formalism and externalism which, as the NT shows, became the besetting sin of a certain part of the population (Mt 23).

It would be an error, of course, to concentrate on the gloomy side of the picture and to forget the faithful souls who in every age 'with zeal' were 'zealous for the Lord God of hosts' (3 Kg 19:10). Many suffered for their devotion, many like the prophets of Yahweh in the Northern Kingdom were 'slain with the sword' (ibid.). And the Church has ever held in especial honour the seven brothers who with their mother suffered the glorious death of martyrs in the persecution of Antiochus (2 Mac 7). The faith and devotion of these holy men, women and children were sustained and strengthened by the labours of the prophets whose preaching played a vital part in rebuking vice and in keeping alive the spirit of true religion. They did not form part of a regular organization like the priesthood with functions regulated by the law. But God had promised through Moses to raise up such a succession of men who would be his personal representatives and make his will known to the people (Deut 18:15), a succession which was to culminate in the person of Christ our Lord, king, priest, and prophet. See further § 409-j.

Post-Mosaic Development—In the space remaining an attempt must be made to give some idea of the progress made in religious thought in the centuries subsequent to Moses. A more noble idea of the nature of God gradually developed. The idea of spiritual substance, so difficult for man to grasp, was evolved and it became known that God is a spirit: 'Egypt is man and not God, and their horses flesh and not spirit' (Is 31:3). Useless to rely on man and flesh; he only can give aid who is God and spirit. The omnipresence of God is clearly conceived and beautifully expressed: 'Whither shall I go from thy spirit? and whither shall I flee from thy face?' etc. (Ps 138:7-10). The same psalm in unforgettable language tells of God's knowledge of the innermost thoughts of man: 'When yet there is no word upon my tongue, thou, Yahweh, hast perfect knowledge thereof' (v 4 f.). God's foreknowledge was a thought familiar to Moses (Ex 3:12). In the time of David we find a realization of God's knowledge of what would happen if some condition never in fact to be fulfilled were actually fulfilled (1 Kg 23:10-13). Belief in God's eternity is given utterance in Ps 89:2, 4: 'Before the mountains were given birth and earth and world begotten, from eternity to eternity thou art God . . . for a thousand years in thy sight are as a by-gone yesterday and as a watch in the night'. And in Ps 101:26 ff.: 'The heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish but thou remainest. All of them shall grow old like a garment . . . but thou art the self-same and thy years shall not fail'. God not only created the universe; he created according to his good pleasure and his own free will: 'Whatsoever the Lord pleased he hath made in heaven, in earth, in the seas, and in all the deeps' (Ps 134:6). This is a noble and elevated conception of the nature of God—spiritual in substance, eternal, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent, though, as the OT nowhere presents a theological treatise, these attributes are not expressed in this abstract language.

There was progress, too, in the knowledge of the nature of man, though it appears only in the Greek-composed Book of Wisdom. The Hebrews had always known 115c that man is immortal, though they had no clear conception what part of man survived the corruption of the grave. In the older literature, when a man dies, 'he' goes to Sheol; it is never said that his soul or his spirit survives. It is God's breath breathed into man and beast that gives them life (Gen 2:7; Ps 103:29 f.). Ecclesiastes makes a distinction between the case of man and of beast despite the fact that to all appearance the life of man and the life of beast are the same. (The Hebrew 'Who knows' means 'it is difficult to learn'.) He says literally 'Who knows whether the breath (rûah) of the sons of man goes upward and the breath (rûah) of the beasts goes downwards to the earth?' (3:21), and the meaning is 'It is difficult to learn whether the breath of man goes upwards, whereas the breath of beasts goes downwards to the earth?' For the construction, whereby a subordinate clause is expressed paratactically, cf. Mt 11:25; Rom 6:17; Is 12:1. (The rûah in question cannot be other than the breath of life for it is said to be one and the same in man and beast 3:19.) Later Ecclesiastes expresses his faith clearly: 'The breath returned to God who gave it' (12:7). The Book of Wisdom has advanced beyond this. After death 'the souls of the just are in the hands of God'; they seemed to die but in fact they are immortal (3:1-4).

d Towards the close of the OT period a development of fundamental importance, indeed a revolution, is to be noted in beliefs concerning life after death. Religion is no longer this-worldly looking for rewards and punishments on this earth alone. In life after death God will give to each according to his works, and man will live on not as a disembodied spirit but with soul and body reunited in the resurrection. These beliefs, however, did not become universal as the Sadducees persisted in the old ways and denied the resurrection and the existence of spirit (Mt 22:23-32; Ac 23:8). The first indication of belief in the resurrection and future retribution occurs in Dan 12:2. Belief in both was nobly professed by the Maccabean martyrs in presence of the tyrant king Antiochus: 'The King of the world will raise us up, who die for his laws, in the resurrection of eternal life' (2 Mac 7:9, 10 f., 14, 23). This resurrection was not restricted to the just, though for the wicked like Antiochus himself there would be 'no resurrection unto life' (14). This eternal life will be the reward of the just: 'My brethren . . . are under the covenant of eternal life, but thou by the judgement of God shalt receive just punishment for thy pride' (36).

e The same faith in rewards and punishments for the good and wicked after death is found in the Book of Wisdom. Of the just it is said (3:1-4 and 5:16 f.), 'The just live for ever, and in the Lord is their reward and the care of them is with the Most High. Therefore they shall receive the kingdom of glory and the diadem of beauty from the hand of the Lord'. The chastisement of the wicked is implied in 3:1, 'the souls of the just are in the hands of God and torment shall not touch them', and 3:10 reads, 'the impious . . . shall have chastisement who neglected the just and revolted from God'. And see 4:18-5:14.

f That there is further an intermediate state after death in which the departed have not received the final reward of the good and can still atone for sin was also known at this time. Judas Maccabeus collected and sent to Jerusalem a sum of money to have a sacrifice offered in atonement for the sin committed by men who had fallen in battle under his command (2 Mac 12:39-46). As the Greek reads, 'he made propitiation for the dead that they might be loosed from sin'.

g With a few restrictions Moses had allowed all foreigners who would to undergo the rite of circumcision and share in the privileges of the covenant people. But the OT records tell of few who embraced the worship of Yahweh. There was Ruth the Moabitess (Ru 1:16) and Naaman the Syrian (4 Kg 5:15). And we read nothing of missionary effort to spread the faith. On the other hand there becomes manifest a generous attitude towards other nations and a spirit of universalism. 'O praise the Lord all ye nations! Praise him all ye people!' (Ps 116), a passage quoted with others by St Paul to show that 'the Gentiles are to glorify God for his mercy' (Rom 15:9-12). Isaiah sees many peoples flocking to the mount of Yahweh (2:2-4 = Mic 4:1-3). Isaiah even foresees the day when Gentiles shall become priests of God (66:21), and Malachi foretells the offering by Gentiles of a pure oblation from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof (1:11). Finally mention should be made of the passionate love of the law and zeal for its strict observance which developed in Israel after the reform under Nehemias and the covenant then entered into to make it the rule of life (Neh 10). Unfortunately with many this love and zeal gradually took a wrong turning into the ways of external formalism without regard to the inner spirit. This became the outstanding characteristic of Pharisaism.

This outline of the growth of religious belief especially in the last centuries of the OT period gives also a general idea of the state of religion among the chosen people when Christ our Lord was born into the world. Conclusion—It is a remarkable fact that the people of Israel, small in number and unimportant politically, should have been the only race in the ancient world among whom the worship of the one God, Creator and Lord of the world, should have been preached and practised. And the fact is not the less remarkable for the reason that Israel owed this unique honour not to any merit or exertion of its own but to divine election. It is an outstanding example of the divine policy so often manifested in history of choosing the weak things of the world to confound the strong (1 Cor 1:27). A study of the religious history of this chosen race makes its election even more remarkable still, for its record through the pages of the OT is largely one of back-sliding and infidelity. Still with all its individual and even mass neglect of God the nation remained the one bright spot in the ancient religious world where pure and true worship was at least the ideal proposed to all and at all times found faithful followers.

Not only had Israel the glory of being the one centre of monotheism, its beliefs about God were noble and pure. A glance at the zoomorphic gods of Egypt and at the fighting and ignoble conduct of the deities of Babylon brings into sharp relief the immeasurable superiority of the religion of Israel. And this nobler conception of the divinity is reflected in the far higher standard of conduct demanded of his people. Immorality and human sacrifice, which disgraced pagan cults, had no part in the worship of Israel; necromancy and all forms of magic were forbidden. Above all else the religion of Israel owed its pre-eminence to the bond of strong personal love which it sought to establish between man and God. This was the tremendous truth revealed to Israel. The lord and master of the universe dignified to love Israel and to ask for the love of his people in return.

However, despite all the grandeur and nobility that elevated it above all the other religions of the world, the religion of Israel was not itself perfect either in its revelation of religious truth or in the standard of morality which it demanded of its adherents, for it was itself preparatory and destined to lead the people on to the spiritual and universal religion to be inaugurated by Christ our Lord. (On the Messianic prophecies and Israel as pedagogue to Christ see also §§ 102h-103a).

THE GENTILE NEIGHBOURS

By E. POWER, S.J.

116a Bibliography—The Cambridge Ancient History, generally reliable, except in its very radical account of Israel, but occasionally antiquated by recent discoveries, must be consulted for older works, as only a selection from recent literature can be given here.

b General History—*W. F. Albright, 'How well can we know the Ancient Near East?' JAOS 56 (1936), 121-44; *F. Bilabel und *A. Grohmann, Geschichte Vorderasiens und Aegyptens, Heidelberg, 1927; B. Bonkamp, Die Bibel im Lichte der Keilschriftforschung, Recklinghausen, 1939; G. Capart et G. Contenau, Histoire de l'Orient Ancien, Paris, 1936; *V. G. Childe, New Light on the Most Ancient East, London, 1935; L. Delaporte, Le Proche-Orient Asiatique, Paris, 1938; L. Dennefeld, Histoire d'Israel et de l'Ancient Orient, Paris, 1935; *E. Ebeling, Geschichte des alten Morgenlandes, Berlin, 1929; *B. Hrozný, Die älteste Geschichte Vorderasiens, Prague, 1939; H. Junker und L. Delaporte, Die Ägypter, Babylonier, Assyrer, Perser, Phoeniker, Freiburg, 1933; *E. Meyer und *H. L. Stier, Geschichte des Altertums, Leipzig, 1937; *A. Moret, Histoire de l'Orient, Paris, 1936; *M. Noth, Die Welt des AT, Berlin, 1940; J. Vanderworst, Israël et l'Ancien Orient, Bruxelles, 1929.

c Special Subjects—*A. Alt, Voelker und Staaten Syriens im fruhen Altertum, Leipzig, 1936; *G. A. Barton, Semitic and Hamitic Origins, Philadelphia, 1934; A. Bea, 'La Palestina preisraelitica', Bi 24 (1943), 231-60; G. Contenau, La civilisation d'Assour et de Babylone, Paris, 1937; E. Dhorme, 'Les Amorrhéens', RB 37 (1928), 63-79, 161-80; 39 (1930), 161-78; 40 (1931), 161-84; C. F. Jean, 'Hammourapi', DBVS 3 (1938), 1379-408; *A. Scharff, Die Fruhkulturen Aegyptens und Mesopotamiens, Leipzig, 1941; *S. Smith, Alalah and Chronology (London, 1940); R. de Vaux, 'Les Patriarches hébreux et les découvertes modernes', RB 53 (1946), 321-48; *E. Drioton et J. Vandier, L'Égypte, Paris, 1938; *K. Galling, 'Hyksosherrschaft und Hyksoskultur', ZDPV 62 (1939), 89-115; *P. Montet, Le drame d'Avaris, Paris, 1939; *F. Petrie, The Making of Egypt, London, 1939; *H. Stock, Studien zur Geschichte und Archäologie der 13. bis 17. Dynastie Aegyptens, Glueckstadt-Hamburg, 1942; L. H. Vincent, 'Les pays bibliques et l'Égypte à la fin de la XII^e dynastie', RB 51 (1942), 187-212; G. Contenau, La civilisation des Hittites et des Mitanniens, Paris, 1934; Id., 'Les Hourrites', DBVS 4 (1941), 128-38; *A. Goetze, Hethiter, Churriter und Assyrer, Oslo, 1936; R. de Vaux, 'Etudes sur les Hurrites', RB 50 (1941), 194-211; R. T. O'Callaghan, Aram Naharaim (Upper Mesopotamia in the Second Millennium B.C.), Roma, 1948; L. Delaporte, Les Hittites, Paris, 1936; Id., 'Les Hittites', DBVS 4 (1941), 32-110; *J. Garstang, The Hittite Empire, London, 1929; E. Dhorme, 'La question des Habiri', RHR 118 (1938) 170-87; *J. Lewy, 'Habiri and Hebrews', Hebr. Union Coll. Ann. 14 (1938), 587-623; G. Contenau, La Civilisation phénicienne, Paris, 1939; *O. Eissfeldt, Philister und Phoenizier, Leipzig, 1936; *R. Weill, La Phénicie et l'Asie Occidentale, Paris, 1939; *G. Cameron, History of Early Iran, Chicago, 1935; E. Dhorme, 'Elam', DBVS 2 (1932), 920-62; *K. Galling, Syrien in der Politik der Achaemeniden bis 448 v. Chr., Leipzig, 1937; *F. W. Koenig, Älteste Geschichte der Meder und Perser, Leipzig, 1934; *E. Bickerman, Institutions des Seleucides, Paris, 1938.

Introduction—The most ancient civilizations revealed to us by recent discoveries developed contemporaneously in Egypt and Mesopotamia. Between these two countries at their northern ends is a long, narrow strip of land lying between the Mediterranean sea and the Arabian desert. The northern and larger part of this bridge between east and west is Syria, the southern and smaller Palestine. Through these regions passed the chief trade routes of the ancient east. Their inhabitants had not politically developed beyond the stage of independent city states, constantly warring with one another. They were thus unprepared to resist the attacks of the more powerful and better organized neighbouring kingdoms which coveted their rich territory and lucrative trade routes. The ancient history of the Near East is largely a record of the struggle for Syria and Palestine, in which the Babylonians, the Egyptians, the Hurrites, the Hittites, the Assyrians, the Chaldaeans, the Persians and the Greeks all took part at different periods. This history is further diversified by constant incursions into 'the fertile crescent', formed by Egypt, Palestine, Syria and Mesopotamia, of fresh peoples seeking new homes, chiefly Aryans from the north and east, and Semites from the west and south. Of these the Hurrites, Hittites and Kassites were Aryanized Asianics; the Medes, Persians and Greeks were Aryans; the Assyrians, Amorrhaeans, Habiri, Aramaeans and Chaldaeans were Semites. Some knowledge of the history of these various peoples, who were the Gentile neighbours of the Palestinians before and after the Hebrew conquest of Canaan, is necessary for the biblical student. It enables him to locate the chosen people in their historical setting, to evaluate the foreign influences to which they were subjected, and to understand many obscure passages and incidental allusions in the sacred text.

The Babylonians—The ancient Babylonians inhabited the region between the Euphrates and Tigris from about 34° N. latitude to the Persian Gulf. These rivers then approached each other more nearly in their lower courses and entered the sea considerably higher up than they do at present, and Babylonia (OT Sennaar) was originally about the size of Belgium. Its alluvial soil was extraordinarily fertile and was irrigated by numerous canals, without which it would have suffered from drought in the dry season and annual devastation when its great rivers were flooded by the melting of the snows in the mountains of Armenia. Its southern and northern parts, later distinguished as Sumer and Akkad, were inhabited from the earliest known period by different races. The Akkadians were Semites of Arabian origin. The Sumerians were Asianics who had entered Babylonia from the north-east. Their earliest culture is an uninterrupted continuation of the still earlier culture of the Iranian plateau, which also appears with local variations in Northern Mesopotamia and Syria. Three stages in the development of this culture during the prehistoric period are named after the sites where they were first discovered: el-'Obaid near Ur (el-Mukeyir) and Uruk (Warka), both in Sumer, and Djemdet-Nasr near Kish (el-Oheimir) in Akkad. After

- 117a el-'Obeid, when copper appears but is extremely rare, comes Uruk, memorable for the invention of writing.
- b The earliest writing is pictographic. We can trace the development of the original pictograms into conventional phonetic signs with syllabic values in the following period at Djemdet-Nasr. In hasty writing straight lines impressed with a stylus on clay tablets become wedge-shaped at one end. Hence the name cuneiform given to this script. The final stage appears in the inscriptions of Ur at the beginning of the historic period. The Elamites who first borrowed this script gave originally different syllabic values to the cuneiform characters, but later conformed entirely to the Babylonian system which was universally adopted in the Near East. The Djemdet-Nasr culture had a very wide diffusion. We find undoubted traces of it at Mohenjo-daro in the Indus valley, at Megiddo, Jericho and Gezer in Palestine, and in Egypt during the late predynastic period and the early Thinite dynasties. The latest prehistoric cultural period at Kish is immediately preceded by an inundation of the Euphrates which destroyed the city. A similar inundation at Ur in the earlier el-'Obeid period is attested by a layer of silt ten feet deep. No other traces have been discovered of a Babylonian deluge. The distinction between postdiluvian and antediluvian kings, made by the later historians of Ur, seems therefore to be based on a local inundation. But an earlier deluge of much wider extension is presupposed by the Babylonian literary records as well as by the biblical narrative.
- c The prehistoric period cannot be exactly dated, but most probably covered and overlapped the fourth millennium B.C. The historic period begins with the first dynasty of Ur. The earlier importance of Uruk and Kish is undoubted, but the records of their first dynasties are legendary. At Ur on the other hand the reigns of the kings are of normal length and A-anni-padda, son of the founder of the first dynasty Mes-anni-padda, appears in an inscription as the builder of a temple of Ninhursag at el-'Obeid. Recent discoveries which lower considerably the pivot date of the first Babylonian dynasty make it difficult to date the first dynasty of Ur earlier than c 2500 B.C. Of the subsequent monarchs Lugalzaggisi of Uruk is the first who claims to have extended his rule beyond Babylonia and to have reached the Mediterranean. He was dethroned by Sargon of Akkad or Agade (unidentified but near Kish), a Semite and founder of a dynasty which lasted nearly two centuries (c 2360-2180 B.C.). Akkad now first appears as the name of northern Babylonia and the struggle for dominion between Sumerians and Akkadians becomes pronounced. Sargon first subdued the Sumerian city states and then gradually extended his empire to the Lebanon and Amanus in the west, Cappadocia in the north, Elam in the east and parts of Arabia in the south-west. His empire was still intact and trade and commerce flourished under his third and most famous successor, Naram-Sin, but the last three kings were hard pressed by the Gutians who descended from the slopes of Mt Zagros into Babylonia and ruled the land for more than a century. The Sumerian states of Umma (Djoha), Lagash (Tello) and Ur apparently came to terms with the invaders and enjoyed a period of prosperity. The Gutians were finally expelled by Utu-Hegal of Uruk who, after a seven years' reign, was replaced by Ur-Nammu, founder of the third dynasty of Ur (c 2070-1960 B.C.). The first three kings of this dynasty were prosperous at home and abroad and extended their rule over most of northern Mesopotamia. The fourth, Gimil-Sin, had to build the Amurru wall, connecting the Euphrates with the Tigris in the region of Sippar, to avert a threatened Amorrrhaean invasion from the west. The last, Ibi-Sin, succumbed finally after a long resistance to an invasion from the east and was dethroned and taken prisoner to Elam. The Sumerians are now politically unimportant. Originally mountaineers, they suffered 117b from the unhealthy climate and would in any case have been overwhelmed by the constant inflow of Semites from the west. But the civilization which they created survived among their supplanters and exercised a profound influence over all the Near East, especially after the foundation of the Babylonian empire.

In the renewed struggle for dominion between the city states, Isin (Bahriyat) in the north and Larsa (Senkereh) in the south play the leading parts for more than a century, after which a new claimant appears, the hitherto insignificant Akkadian city of Babylon (Hilleh). Sumu-Abum, an Amorrrhaean or western Semite, founded the first Babylonian dynasty c 1830 B.C. His successor, Sumu-la-ilum, ruled over all Akkad and part of Sumer. It was not, however, until the defeat of Rim-Sin (very probably the Arioch or Riu-Aku of Gen 14:1) and the capture of Larsa by Hammurabi, the sixth and greatest of the Babylonian kings, that Sumer was completely subdued.

Hammurabi (c 1728-1686 B.C.), very probably the Amraphel of Gen 14:1, is the most remarkable figure of all the ancient east. He reduced all Mesopotamia under his sway and as 'king of the west-land' seems to have claimed a suzerainty over Syria and Palestine. He is more famous, however, as a ruler and legislator than as a warrior. He was the first to establish a centralized administration in the home countries of Sumer and Akkad by substituting personally appointed governors for native princes and a single law-code for different local customs. In the outlying regions on the other hand vassal princes were confirmed in office and local usages were retained. He spent forty years of his reign in preparing a most comprehensive code of laws which exercised a considerable influence, directly or indirectly, on all subsequent eastern legislation. He reformed religion by raising his city god, Marduk, to the head of the Pantheon and transferring to him the attributes of the other local gods and by conferring on his consort, the Semitic Ishtar, the same pre-eminence among the goddesses. In the ancient east religion was of first importance. Hittites and Assyrians as well as Babylonians regarded the ruler as the vicegerent of the principal divinity to whom the state belonged. Finally in his correspondence with his governors Hammurabi shows an admirable solicitude and personal interest in the administration of justice and of property, in works of piety and public utility and in everything which contributed to the welfare of his people.

Excavations have revealed the contacts existing between the remotest parts of the Near East at this period. It was by trade and commerce rather than by conquest that the civilization which the Babylonians borrowed from the Sumerians, script and legislation, cosmogony and natural science, religion and mythology, was so widely diffused. The OT commentaries will reveal how far the Hebrews surpassed the Babylonians in their religious ideas and how much they were indebted to them in almost every other department of knowledge.

Aryan peoples from the north-east invaded Cappadocia and northern Mesopotamia in the beginning of the second millennium B.C. and succeeded in establishing themselves as ruling classes over the Asianic inhabitants among whom they settled. Their racial character is determined by their personal names and by the Aryan gods in their Pantheons. Of these were the Kassites, who made their first inroads into Babylonia under Hammurabi's successor, Shamsu-iluna. At the same time remnants of the Sumerians and other malcontents founded the second Babylonian dynasty in the maritime regions of the south. A disturbed period followed until a Hittite raid on Babylon put an end to the first Babylonian dynasty of the Amorrrhaeans. It was succeeded by the partly contemporaneous third Babylonian dynasty of the Kassites (c 1600-1170 B.C.). Under these rulers Babylonia retained her independence and national existence, but never recovered her ancient pre-eminence. The second k Chronological Note—The reader may be surprised that the dates given in the preceding section are so much lower than those for instance of the Cambridge Ancient History. The reason is that the Babylonian chronology of the early historical period has been revolutionized by important discoveries. Babylonian inscriptions record various dynasties and regnal years of successive kings. They do not however inform us when these dynasties are contemporaneous or enable us to convert relative into absolute dates. Calculations based on the Venus tablets of Ammisaduga gave, at best, a choice of dates but no definite chronology. Assyrian inscriptions by recording an eclipse of the sun in 763 B.C. provide a solid foundation for an absolute chronology at a later period. A relatively complete list of regnal years of the Assyrian kings discovered at Khorsabad in 1933 extends this chronology, with due reservations, to the second millennium B.C. The most assured base of an absolute chronology is the Egyptian Sothic period (§118e). Synchronisms with Egypt and Assyria enable us to establish an approximate but reliable Babylonian chronology. Pottery and cylinder seals of the first Babylonian dynasty (now dated c 1830–1530) have been found at Ugarit above the layer containing finds of the XII Egyptian dynasty (c 1980–1776). More definite is the evidence derived from the letters discovered at Mari which establish beyond all doubt that Hammurabi (now dated 1728–1686) was a younger contemporary of Shamshi-Adad I of Assyria (c 1748–1716). This date is also archaeologically confirmed by the Khabor ware, unearthed at various sites in northern Mesopotamia, which covers a continuous period of about three centuries from the reign of Shamshi-Adad I (18th century) to the new ware of Nuzi (15th century). Finally the Byblian prince, Entin, attested by various scarabs and a hieroglyphic inscription as a contemporary of the Pharaoh Nefer-hotep I (XIII dynasty, c 1740–1730), appears in fuller form, Yantin-hamu, in a Mari document. He too was a contemporary of Hammurabi, who put an end to Mari's greatness in the thirty-second year of his reign. Earlier Babylonian periods, of which the length is known, are calculated backwards from the new date of Hammurabi.

117] Babylonian dynasty maintained itself in the south for two and a half centuries while the first and third ruled in the north.

118a The Egyptians—Egypt is the long narrow strip of land extending from the Mediterranean in the north to Assuan in the south and bounded by deserts on either side. No larger than Belgium or ancient Babylonia, it owes its extraordinary fertility, and indeed its very existence, to the annual inundations of the Nile. Its original Hamitic inhabitants, dolichocephalic and small in stature, were racially akin to the Nubians in the south and the Libyans in the west. They had politically developed from city states into the two kingdoms of Upper and Lower Egypt and attained a high degree of civilization in the fourth millennium B.C. This civilization originated more probably in the Delta region, but it is still uncertain whether and how far Asiatic infiltrations contributed to it. The union of the two kingdoms seems to have been effected about 3000 B.C., when the historical and dynastic periods begin. The earliest inscriptions belong to the first dynasty, but the writing is then too developed for a recent invention. The script was and remained pictographic, but certain signs were conventionally used to express consonantal sounds so that the proper names and abstract ideas could be graphically indicated. The different materials used, papyrus in Egypt and clay tablets in Babylonia, largely explain the different developments of the Egyptian and Babylonian scripts, which seem to have originated independently and contemporaneously.

b The ancient historians reckoned thirty dynasties of Egyptian kings. Of these the best known and the most important are I–VI (Old Kingdom, c 3000–2350 B.C.), XI–XII (Middle Kingdom, c 2150–1776 B.C.) and XVIII–XX (New Kingdom, c 1580–1090 B.C.). The dynasties of the disturbed intervening periods were less stable and to some extent contemporaneous. In the Old Kingdom period the union of North and South was consolidated by Khasekhem (II dynasty), who moved the capital from the south to Memphis at the apex of the Delta triangle. The erection of the pyramids was begun by his successor, Zoser (III dynasty). The three great pyramids at Ghizeh, however, belong to the IV dynasty and were built by Khufu (Cheops), Khufu and Menkaure (Mycerinus). A tomb and a chapel are the principal contents of these great funeral monuments, which still attest belief in and preparation for a life after death as a distinctive element of Egyptian religion. Contacts with Byblos in Phoenicia are found throughout this whole period. It was not for conquest, but to secure materials for the building and adornment of temples and palaces, that expeditions were made by land and sea to distant regions. Granite was brought from Assuan, gold from Nubia, copper from Sinai and cedar-wood from Lebanon. Pottery and stone vases found in the royal tombs of the I dynasty at Abydos are of North Syrian origin. Conversely alabaster vases of the III dynasty were discovered at Hai in Palestine. The Old Kingdom reached its culminating point in art and organization in the IV dynasty under Snefru. Egypt was then divided into nomes or districts about forty in number. District rulers, judges and minor officials were royal nominees. Estates were settled on favourites by royal gift.

To this period at latest belongs the institution of the calendar. The heliacal rising of Sothis or Sirius, the dog-star, at the beginning of the inundation of the Nile, introduced the first year of the new calendar. As the Egyptian year had invariably 365 days and was therefore nearly six hours shorter than the solar year, the next coincidence of the civil New Year and the heliacal rising of Sothis occurred after a period, roughly determined by the ancients as $365 \times 4 = 1460$, but more accurately by Schoch in 1928 as 1456 years. This is called a Sothic period. We know that the last Sothic period ended A.D. 140–43 and can thus fix the beginnings of two such periods at 2772–2769 and 1316–1313 B.C. A few events of which the relative date is recorded as coinciding with a rising of Sothis can thus be dated absolutely, since their position in a Sothic period is exactly determined.

Military expeditions to Palestine are recorded in the last dynasties of the Old Kingdom. The capture of a walled town, probably Lydda, is represented on a fifth dynasty tomb. Uni, an officer of Pepi I of the sixth dynasty, boasts of five successful military expeditions against the neighbouring Asiatics. The fifth dynasty is remarkable for the elevation of Ra, the Sun-god, to the head of the Egyptian Pantheon. The sixth is a period of decentralization when authority passes over into the hands of noble families and local chiefs. Rival contemporary rulers now appear for a time at Heracleopolis in Middle Egypt and at Thebes in the south. The ultimate victory of the Thebans inaugurates the Middle Kingdom.

Little remarkable is recorded of the eleventh dynasty, but the Amenemhets and Senurets of the twelfth raised Egypt to the highest peak of power and prosperity yet attained. Amon, the human-headed Theban divinity, was particularly venerated by them. He was soon identified with Ra and under the name Amon-Ra became king of all the gods. They transferred the capital from Thebes to a more central position at Itht-toui south of Memphis, reintroduced centralization of government and reduced the power of the nobles. Magnificent buildings were erected and adorned. The arts were particularly cultivated. The twelfth dynasty is the classical age of the sculptor, the painter, the wood-carver and the jeweller. It is also the classical period of the Egyptian language. Trade and commerce flourished. The Kamars were of Crete appears in Egypt in the reign of Senuret II.

THE GENTILE NEIGHBOURS

118g Military expeditions are recorded. Senusret III (1876-1838), a great warrior, captured the town of Sichem in Palestine. His successor, Amenemhet III (1837-1789), the builder of the Labyrinth and the regulator of Lake Moeris, was a great and provident administrator, who devoted all his energies to increasing the prosperity of his people. He and Hammurabi are the best types of ancient rulers.

h Egyptian interest in Palestine and Syria at this period is strikingly illustrated by the 'Proscription Texts' of the XII dynasty. They give lists of the enemies of Egypt, whose names and districts are inscribed either on buried clay statuettes or on shattered vases of earthenware or alabaster. The Asiatic districts are not all identified, but on the earlier statuettes we find Ascalon and Jerusalem in Palestine, Byblos, Arqatum, Ullaza and Yarimutu in Syria, and on the jar fragments, a generation later, also Sichem, Afek, Akko, Aksaph, Misael, Samkhuna, Cana, Pella, Rehob, Laiš, Iyyon. The personal names are all west Semitic like those of the first Babylonian dynasty. From the regional names we may conclude that Egyptian interest was concentrated on the plain land and trade routes, and from the personal ones that the Amorrrhaeans or west Semites had recently invaded Palestine and Syria. The burying of the images and the shattering of the vases were intended to represent, if not magically effect, the destruction of Egypt's foes. Later, however, in the XIII dynasty, these hated Asiatics invaded Egypt and ruled over the land from 1730-1580 B.C.

i The Hurrites—Hurrite records are few and are written in a language of the agglutinative type still very imperfectly known. The Hurrites of Nuzi, east of the Middle Tigris, used the Babylonian tongue in their contract tablets, from which we obtain interesting information on their laws and customs. Our scant knowledge of their history is chiefly derived from excavated sites and from Babylonian, Egyptian and Hittite records. They were racially Asianics, most probably Armenoids, with an intermixture of Aryans who formed the ruling classes. Descending from the mountains in the north-east they settled in the basin of the Euphrates and Tigris, in the region subsequently known as Mitanni and called Khanigalbat by the later Assyrians. We find them also in outlying regions, Ugarit in western, Alalakh and Qatna in eastern Syria and Taanach in Palestine. Hurrite names first appear in the inscriptions of Naram-Sin and of the third dynasty of Ur and in the Cappadocian tablets of Kultepe. They are historically important as partakers in, and probably organizers of the Hyksos invasion of Egypt and as subsequent rulers of the great kingdom of Mitanni in Northern Mesopotamia, extending from Syrian Qadesh in the west to Mt Zagros in the east.

k The Hyksos—The word Hyksos, mistranslated Shepherd Kings by the ancients, literally means princes of the lands and was the ordinary Egyptian expression for the rulers of Asiatic districts. It gives no help therefore towards the racial identification of the invaders, most probably composed largely, if not entirely, of Hurrites and Semites. Some of the names of the Hyksos rulers are Semitic, but the majority appear to be Hurrite or Aryan. The invaders had superior military equipment, especially horses and chariots, then unknown to the Egyptians. The Hurrites were adepts in the rearing of horses. The invaders exhibit also a special technique in the fortification of cities by the use of glacis, fosse and counterscarp. This appears in the Hyksos stronghold of Tell el-Yehudieh in Egypt, in several Palestinian cities of the XVIII century B.C., Jericho, el-Fara' (most probably the Hyksos Sharuhēn), Tell Beit-Mirsim, Lachish, Sichem, Haşor and also at Qatna, a Hurrite outpost in Syria. The technique thus appears to be Hurrite and is certainly not Semitic. The fortifications show that a military occupation of the regions was intended. The era of Tanis, which began c 1730 B.C., seems to determine the date of the invasion. Tanis was very probably the Hyksos capital, Avaris. The statement in Num 13:22 that Hebron was built, i.e. fortified, seven years before Tanis refers to the same era in dating a Hyksos fortification in Palestine. The invaders seem to have penetrated beyond Thebes in the south. They introduced no new culture into Egypt, except in the matter of military equipment, and gradually became themselves Egyptianized. Resistance to their rule developed in the south and Ahmose I, the founder of the XVIII dynasty, at last succeeded in taking their capital and expelling them from Egypt c 1580 B.C. He completed his victory by the capture of the strongly fortified Sharuhēn in southern Palestine three years later. The Hyksos occupation inspired the Egyptian rulers with a great hatred of Asiatics and a strong determination to secure themselves against future invasion by the conquest of Palestine and Syria. The struggle between them and their northern rivals, the Hurrites of Mitanni and the Hittites of Asia Minor, for the possession of Syria, was to last for the next three centuries.

The Hittites—This ancient people (OT Hittim, DV Hethites) takes its name from the city of Hattuš in the bend of the Halys in Cappadocia, about a hundred miles east of the Turkish capital, Angora. Their records, written mostly in the Hittite language but with Babylonian cuneiform characters, were discovered in the adjoining village of Boghazkeui and published at intervals during the last half-century. Originally Asianics like the Hurrites, they were to some extent Aryanized c 2000 B.C. by immigrants from the north-east, who became the ruling class and imposed their language on their subjects. The word Hittite is now specifically used of the empire founded by these Aryanized Asianics in the eighteenth century B.C. and destroyed by northern invaders c 1200 B.C. Hittites of earlier and later date are called respectively Proto-Hittites and Neo-Hittites. Little is known of the Proto-Hittites. Their chief divinity was Wurūšemu, the goddess of Arinna (unidentified), who remained, under the title Sun of Arinna, at the head of the Hittite pantheon. Her consort was the storm-god, the Hurrite Teshup and Syrian Haddad. Our first information on the foundation of the Hittite state is derived from the Cappadocian Tablets discovered at Kultepe, the ancient Kanēš, about a hundred miles south-east of Hattuš. One of them mentions the successful efforts of a certain Pithana, prince of Kussar, and his son, Anitta, to establish their dominion over the neighbouring city states. Their successors were Tudchaliya I and his two sons, whose names only are known to us. It is very probable that this Tudchaliya, a contemporary of Hammurabi, is the Tid'al of Gen 14:1.

The historical records of the ancient empire begin with Labarna, usually regarded as its founder (c 1600 B.C.), who extended his conquests to the Mediterranean. His son, Hattušil I, invaded northern Syria, but failed to reduce Aleppo, captured eventually by his son and successor, Muršil I, who made Hattuš, his father's city, the capital of the empire. This monarch is also famous for his combats with the Hurrites and especially his raid into Babylonia, in which he captured and sacked Babylon and thus put an end to the first Babylonian dynasty c 1530 B.C. His assassination by his brother-in-law, Hantili, introduced a period of calamity under the usurpers Zidanta and Huzziya. Order was restored by Telepinu, who induced the assembly of the nobles to pass new laws regulating the succession to the throne and punishing crimes committed by members of the royal family. Hittite rule was less absolute than that of the Babylonians and Egyptians and the powers of the monarchy were constitutionally limited by those of the assembly of the nobles.

An obscure period follows the death of Telepinu and marks the close of the old Hittite empire. Tudchaliya II inaugurated the new Hittite empire (c 1420 B.C.), checked at first in its expansion by the Hurrite kingdom of Mitanni in the east and the Egyptian 119d conquest of Syria in the south. His son and successor, Hattusil II, hard pressed by rebels in Asia Minor, was forced to yield Aleppo to the Hurrites. Under the next monarch, Tudchaliya III, the Hittites were beset by enemies on all sides. Kizwadna, the maritime region to which Tarsus and Adana belong, transferred its allegiance to Mitanni. Arzawa, west of Kizwadna in the south, Ashuwa, corresponding roughly to the later Roman province of Asia in the west, the Gasgas and Hiyasa in the Black Sea regions of the north revolted and ravaged the interior. At this dark period Suppiluliuma became king (c 1375-1335 B.C.). The exploits of this great warrior, under whom the Hittites reached the height of their power and practically dominated the Near East, belong to the history of the Amarna period.

6 Egypt versus Mitanni—We have no account of the expeditions of Ahmose I to Phoenicia and Thuthmose I to the Euphrates. The real conqueror of Palestine and Syria was Thuthmose III (c 1485-1450), who devoted to the task the campaigning seasons of at least fifteen years of his reign. The Egyptian inscriptions of the fifteenth century B.C. gave the name Huru, land of the Hurrites, to the conquered regions. The Hurrite kingdom of Mitanni in northern Mesopotamia (c 1500-1350 B.C.), which held the Assyrians in subjection and wrested territories from the Hittites, was then the most powerful state in the Near East. Its king bore the Aryan name of Šaušatar and organized the resistance to the Egyptians in the subject or allied states of the south. The Pharaoh confined his first campaigns to the subjugation and organization of Palestine. He surprised his foes—concentrated at Megiddo under the leadership of the prince of Qadesh on the Orontes—by the boldness of his advance, choosing the most direct but most difficult of the three passages across the mountain range. He then defeated them in pitched battle and after a siege of seven months captured the city. Little resistance was encountered elsewhere and an Egyptian fortress was erected at the entrance of the Beká' valley to secure Palestine against attacks from the north. The chiefs who submitted retained their authority, but rebels were replaced by loyal native rulers. The sons of these rulers were sent to Thebes and there educated after the Egyptian fashion to secure their future loyalty. A fixed annual tribute was the only burden imposed on the subject princes. Some Egyptian troops were left in the country and an Egyptian prefect or governor was appointed over the whole region. Sound strategy marked the Syrian campaigns. The Pharaoh perceived that the coast cities had to be first reduced and turned into bases of operation before the hinterland could be attacked with any hope of permanent success. A powerful fleet conveyed supplies and troops northwards and landed them in the neighbourhood of Arwad. The campaign by sea and by land quickly effected its object and subsequent expeditions, based not on distant Egypt but on neighbouring Phoenicia, easily reduced the Syrian cities. The Euphrates was crossed and a stele of victory erected, but no attempt was made to conquer Mesopotamia.

6 The Assyrians, Hittites and Babylonians were deeply impressed by the victories of the Pharaoh and sent him valuable gifts, interpreted as tribute by the Egyptian. He extended his rule in Nubia to the fourth cataract of the Nile and reduced the oases of the Libyan desert. Egypt now overflowed with riches. Nubian and Asiatic captives were employed in the erection of magnificent monuments in Thebes and other cities of Upper Egypt. Thuthmose III was also an able and vigilant administrator. The Asiatic revolt which followed his death, according to the general custom of eastern subject peoples, was quickly repressed by his successor, Amenophis II, who made no further expedition into Asia. The next Pharaoh, Thuthmose IV, has also only one Asiatic campaign to his credit. He abandoned however the isolation policy of his predecessors and concluded alliances with Mitanni and Babylonia. His son, Amenophis III 119h (c 1405-1370), had a Mitanni princess for his mother, Mutemuya, daughter of Artatama I, the son and successor of Šaušatar. It was once very generally believed that Thuthmose III was the oppressor of the Hebrews and Amenophis II the Pharaoh of the Exodus. Both these Pharaohs, however, resided at Thebes and were chiefly occupied with building operations in Upper Egypt. They needed no Migdols on their eastern frontier to protect themselves from Asiatic inroads, since they were secure in the possession of Palestine and Syria. The Delta region on the other hand was the scene of the chief building operations of Ramesses II and it was there that he and Merneptah resided.

The Amarna Age—We have abundant information on the history of the Near East in the fourteenth century B.C. from the historical records of the Hittite monarchs and the diplomatic correspondence of the Egyptian Pharaohs, Amenophis III and Amenophis IV, discovered at Tell el-Amarna (cf. § 786). The Hittites now reached the height of their power. Assyria threw off the yoke of Mitanni and Babylonia and attained imperial status. The Hurrites lost their empire and the Egyptians their Asiatic dominions. The Hittite monarch, Suppiluliuma, after establishing order provisionally in the interior, invaded Mitanni. A scission among the Hurrites had produced a second kingdom in the east, then ruled by Artatama II. By the neutrality or co-operation of this monarch Suppiluliuma was enabled to overrun Mitanni from east to west and crossing the Euphrates near Carchemish to capture Aleppo and Qatna and reach Qadesh on the Orontes. He thus supplanted Mitanni and Egypt in northern Syria and, while avoiding open conflict with the Egyptians, extended his sphere of influence by intrigues with the native princes. Šutarna, king of Mitanni, whose daughter, Gilu-Khepa, became the wife of Amenophis III c 1400 B.C., was succeeded by his two sons, Artasumara, assassinated after a brief reign, and Tushratta (c 1385-1365). The latter, whose daughter, Tadu-Khepa, was married to Amenophis III and after his death to Amenophis IV, was also assassinated in a palace intrigue. The eastern Hurrite, Artatama II, aided by the kings of Alshi and Assyria, then invaded Mitanni and installed his son, Šutarna II, as king under Assyrian protection. Tushratta's son, Muttiwaza, sought refuge in Babylonia, but when the Babylonian king, Burnaburiash II, became allied with Assyria and espoused the daughter of Aššurballit, the dethroned monarch, fearing for his life, fled to his ancestral enemy, Suppiluliuma. The Hittite received him graciously, gave him his daughter in marriage and a few years later expelled the Assyrians from Mitanni and restored him his kingdom. He had already enthroned his sons in northern Syria, Piyassili at Carchemish and Telepinu at Aleppo. Farther south Aziru, prince of Amurru, was his ally. His correspondence with Naqamad, prince of Ugarit, enables us to date the cuneiform alphabet, invented during that monarch's reign. The Phoenician alphabet, still in use, was an earlier invention, though its earliest known occurrence is on a 10th cent. inscription at Byblos. The latter was intended for papyrus, the former for clay tablet writing. A presumed act of treachery on the part of the Egyptians provoked a declaration of war from the Hittites at the close of the Amarna period. Of its course we are only informed that Egyptians, made prisoners in the opening campaign, spread a pestilence among the Hittites, which raged twenty years, including among its victims Arnuwanda I, the son and successor of Suppiluliuma.

Meanwhile in southern Syria and Palestine there was a widespread revolt against Egyptian rule, of which the successive phases are vividly depicted in the Amarna tablets. The loyal princes, among whom Rib-Addi of Byblos and Arti-Khepa of Jerusalem were the most conspicuous, described in their letters the progress of the movement and begged repeatedly for

- 1191 reinforcements. Foreign invaders, sometimes called Habiri, but more usually SA-GAZ, an ideogrammatic equivalent of the Akkadian habbatu 'plunderer', devastated the land. Their most prominent leaders were native princes, Labaya in the south and Abd-Ashirti of Amurru in the north. When these leaders were slain their sons took their place. The rebel princes protested their loyalty to Egypt and their readiness to pay tribute, but at the same time supported the invaders and enlisted their aid to extend their own dominions. The Egyptian officials temporized. A struggle for power between rival local potentates, all apparently loyal to their suzerain, may have appeared at first politically unimportant. Troops sent from Egypt were insufficient and sometimes failed to reach their objectives. Amenophis III lacked energy for a personal expedition and Amenophis IV was too absorbed by religious reforms to make any attempt to check the later stages of the revolt. Byblos finally joined the rebels and Rib-Addi was slain in exile at Sidon. Aziru, prince of Amurru, transferred his allegiance to the Hittites. Arti-Khepa's associates, according to his last letter, had all joined the Habiri and Jerusalem alone still acknowledged Egyptian rule.
- 120a The Habiri—Who were these foreign invaders of Syria and Palestine? Probably Bedawin from Arabia like the earlier Amorrrhaeans. Habiri first appear as soldiers in the armies of Naram-Sin of Akkad, Rim-Sin of Larsa, Zimrilim of Mari and the Hittites of Asia Minor and subsequently c 1500 B.C. as immigrants from various Mesopotamian districts who have sold themselves into slavery at Nuzi, a south-eastern outpost of the Hurrite kingdom of Mitanni. They are called SA-GAZ as well as Habiri in the Hittite, Amarna and Rās-Shamra inscriptions. The alternative form of the name at Ras-Shamra 'apr(m) suggests also their identity with the Aperu, who appear as soldiers or slave-labourers in the Egyptian inscriptions from Thutmose III to Ramesses IV (c 1500–1160 B.C.). From these texts it may be concluded that the Habiri were landless people or Bedawin who penetrated into various settled regions, where they were regarded as aliens, formed an inferior class of the population and were employed as mercenary troops or in servile works.
- b The Semitic word habiru has been variously interpreted and may be either descriptive like habbatu or racial. In the first alternative it has been derived from the root hbr 'bind', and understood either as confederates or as prisoners, deported persons. It seems more probable, however, from the evidence of the Rās-Shamra tablets, that the initial letter is 'ain rather than heth. 'Hebrew' and 'Habiru' may thus be philologically akin. In the OT 'Hebrew' has a wider extension than 'Israelite' and is preferably used by foreigners such as Egyptians and Philistines to designate the chosen people. 'Eber' moreover is the common ancestor of Israelites and Arabs (Gen 10:24 f.). Hebrews, who were not Israelites, may thus have invaded Palestine before the Exodus and remained in Egypt after it. Whatever be the origin of the name, it is certain at least that the people who bore it were more ancient and more wide-spread than the Israelites.
- c From Amarna to the Sea Peoples (c 1350–1200 B.C.)—The Pharaohs of the eighteenth dynasty who succeeded Amenophis IV made no attempt to recover their Asiatic dominions. Their Hittite contemporary, Muršil II, campaigned chiefly in Asia Minor. He was obliged, however, to expel once more the Assyrians from Mitanni and to check their intrigues in northern Syria. Seti I of the XIX dynasty (c 1318–1298) restored Egyptian rule in Palestine in the first year of his reign and in a later campaign encountered the Hittites under Muwatalli, son and successor of Muršil II, at Qadesh on the Orontes. The only result of the battle was a brief Egyptian occupation of Qadesh. Seti also erected forts on the Asiatic border of Egypt, of which two are designated by the Semitic name Migdol, in Egyptian texts and in the OT, one in the north at

Tell el-Her (Jer 44:1, 46:14; Ez 29:10, 30:6), the other in the south most probably at Abu Hāsa south-west of the Bitter Lakes (Ex 14:2, cf. Mallon, Les Hébreux en Egypte, pp 167–71). Ramesses II, his successor, the Pharaoh of the oppression (c 1298–1232), transferred the capital from Thebes to the Delta and inaugurated vast building operations in that region. He encountered the Hittites at Qadesh on the Orontes c 1294 B.C. and though victorious in battle failed to capture the city. His return to Egypt was followed by a widespread revolt in Palestine. Three years were spent in its reconquest. Syria was then invaded and cities north of Qadesh, Tunip and Qatna, were at least temporarily occupied. Meanwhile in the north the Assyrians had again invaded Mitanni and been expelled by Muwatalli. His brother Hattusil III, who had usurped the throne of his nephew, found increasing difficulty in resisting Assyrian pressure on Mitanni, now garrisoned by Hittite troops, and saw the expediency of peace and alliance with Egypt. We have Egyptian and Hittite copies of the treaty concluded between him and Ramesses II c 1278 B.C., which ended the long struggle of the two empires for the possession of Syria. The line of partition is not precisely defined in either document, but must have corresponded roughly with Qadesh and the Orontes valley, since Amurru remained a Hittite dependency. The alliance was offensive and defensive, and the delivery of fugitives to their overlords was expressly stipulated. The Hittite monarch visited the Pharaoh in 1265 B.C. when his daughter became the wife of Ramesses II. Peace with Egypt was undisturbed under Ramesses' successor, Merneptah. But the Assyrians again invaded Mitanni in the reign of Tudchaliya IV (c 1260–1230), defeated the allied forces of the Hittites and the Hurrites and deported the mass of the inhabitants. The Hurrites now disappear from history. Mitanni, repopled by Aramaeans, becomes the Aram Naharaim of the OT.

The Sea Peoples—Our information on this movement of peoples is chiefly derived from the inscriptions of the Pharaohs Merneptah and Ramesses III, who record the repercussion in the Nile valley of a European invasion of the Near East. In the fifth year of Merneptah, c 1228 B.C., an Aegean fleet, manned by Achaeans, Tyrrhenians, Lycians, Sardians and Sagalassians, entered the mouth of the Nile and co-operated with an army of Libyans who invaded the Delta region from the west. These sea peoples inhabited the coast of Asia Minor, where the Achaeans had settled more than a century earlier, as we learn from the Hittite inscriptions. Merneptah succeeded in repelling the invaders. A second invasion of Libyans by land, Philistines and Zakkara by sea, was repelled by Ramesses III c 1196 B.C. These two sea peoples subsequently appear settled on the southern coast of Palestine. Three years later Ramesses had to equip a fleet and lead a land army into Canaan to meet a third and more formidable group of immigrants seeking new homes. They were encamped in the land of Amurru and included Philistines, Zakkara, Sagalassians, Danaans and Wasasa. According to Ramesses no nation, not even the Hittites, had been able to resist them, but he defeated them with great slaughter in a combined land and sea engagement.

These invaders had apparently been pressed southward by Balkan peoples who had crossed the Hellespont and settled in Asia Minor. Of these the Phrygians and the Moschians now become known to us. The destruction of the empire of the Hittites may be attributed to their inveterate northern enemies, the Gasgas, aided by the Moschians, who had been pressed eastwards. Gasgas and Moschians subsequently fought against the Assyrians in the upper reaches of the Tigris and the Euphrates. Hittites in outlying regions who survived the disaster formed isolated city states like Malatya and Carchemish. The introduction of iron into Palestine is usually attributed to these northern invaders. Though mentioned earlier, especially in h The Philistines—Cretans and Philistines are associated in the OT, not only by parallelism (Soph 2:5; Ez 25:16), but also in the expression, Cerethi and Phelethi, by which David's bodyguard is designated. The absence of the sibilant in Phelethi may be due to assonance, but is more probably the result of assimilation (cf. LXX Pheletti = Pheletti = Pheleṣti). Their original home was Caphtor (Am 9:7), usually identified with Keftiu, the Egyptian name for Crete. It does not follow, however, that the Philistines came from the island of Crete, since Caphtor and Keftiu have a wider signification and include Cretan dependencies in the Aegean and on the coast of Asia Minor. Like the other sea peoples they came from the north, where they may have settled earlier like the Achaeans. The exact period of their arrival in Palestine is uncertain.

120g Hittite inscriptions, it was not in general use in the Near East before 1200 B.C.

i The discovery of Philistine mercenaries in the army of Ramesses III and of so-called Philistine pottery at Tell el-Fara' in a stratum dated c 1250 B.C. has led some scholars to conclude that they were already in Palestine half a century before the northern invasion. The Caphtorites or Philistines (DV Cappadocians) mentioned in Deut 2:23 were not ancient inhabitants but late arrivals who dispossessed the Hevites. The word Philistine is sometimes used in the OT, not in a racial but in a local sense, of earlier inhabitants of the district subsequently occupied by the Philistines. These invaders were superior to the Israelites in culture and especially in military equipment, and held Judah in subjection until the period of the monarchy. Though of alien race and uncircumcised they soon became semitized in Palestine to which they gave their name, as the Assyrians gave theirs to Syria.

j The Aramaeans—The name first appears in an inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I, c 1100 B.C., who subdued Ahlamu Aramaeans settled in the biblical Aram Naharaim. We meet the Ahlamu, literally confederates, earlier, in the fourteenth century, and can locate them sometimes in the same region. This is very probably, but not quite certainly, the land of Aram, mentioned in a much earlier inscription of Naram-Sin. The Aramaeans were thus apparently nomads from the west, who got their distinctive name from the land in which they settled. They spread rapidly in Mesopotamia itself, and crossing the Euphrates from Aram Naharaim founded independent city states from Armenia in the north to Palestine in the south. Their states with which the Israelites had hostile or friendly relations were Damascus in the east, Soba and Beth-Rehob in the north and south of the Bekā', Geṣur and Beth-Maacha east of the upper Jordan. It was probably their ubiquity which gave their language its importance. There were Aramaean secretaries at the Assyrian court in the eighth century B.C., and Aramaic became the international language of the Near East two centuries later. It even supplanted Arabic in north Arabia and Hebrew in Palestine as the language of the people. In the OT Aramaean is used like Philistine in a local sense to designate earlier inhabitants of regions peopled by Aramaeans in biblical times. The geographical sense of the term is evident when Jacob is called an Aramaean (Deut 26:5) as long resident in Aram Naharaim. Abraham's brother, Nachor, was a Hebrew, but as he settled in Harran, a city of Aram Naharaim, his son, Bathuel, is called an Aramaean (Gen 25:20).

k From the Sea Peoples to the Assyrian Invasion—The fall of the Hurrite and Hittite empires, the decadence of Egypt after the reign of Ramesses III and internal disturbances in Mesopotamia gave the smaller nations of Syria and Palestine a providential breathing-space of nearly three centuries. The Israelites were thus enabled to complete the conquest of Canaan without serious external interference and under David's rule to throw off the Philistine yoke and reduce to subjection the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites and Aramaeans.

The Phoenicians in the north, with whom they had friendly relations, had meantime monopolized the sea trade in the Mediterranean and established numerous colonies and trade centres at suitable positions on its islands and coasts. Their settlements at Gades and Tharsis in Spain go back to the eleventh century after Tyre took the leadership from Sidon and became 'the mart of nations'. There was a Tyrian trading centre at Memphis in Egypt early in the twelfth century B.C. The Dorian invasion favoured Phoenician expansion by confining their Greek rivals to the Aegean. The only important Egyptian interference in Palestine during this period was a raid of Sheshonq I (Sesac), the founder of the twenty-second dynasty, c 927 B.C. The Pharaoh sacked Jerusalem and its temple and many other cities and erected a commemorative stele of victory at Megiddo of which a fragment has been discovered.

The Assyrians—They inhabited the region between 35° and 37° N. latitude bounded by the Middle Tigris on the west and the mountains of Kurdistan on the east. The old capital, Aššur, was the most southerly of their cities, and the only one on the west bank of the Tigris. It was superseded as capital, first by Kalhu (Cale) on an affluent of the Upper Zab, c 1280 B.C., and two centuries later by Nineveh opposite the modern Mosul. The region had settled inhabitants before Babylonia and participated in the pre-Babylonian civilization of northern Mesopotamia. Its population was predominantly Semitic in the historic period and usually subject to Babylonia. The traders whose rights Naram-Sin enforced in north-eastern Asia Minor were probably Assyrians. In the nineteenth century B.C. Assyrian colonists had important and well-organized trading centres in this region, as we learn from the inscriptions of Kultepe, the ancient Kanēš. The geographical position of Assyria between the Hurrites and Hittites in the north and the Babylonians in the south checked its expansion during the next four centuries. A vassal state of Hammurabi and later of the Kassites, it naturally welcomed the intervention of the Egyptians and was the first of the northern states to send presents and congratulations to the victorious Thutmose III. Shortly afterwards, however, it was invaded by Šaušatar and incorporated for a century in the empire of Mitanni. The Assyrians recovered their independence under Aššur-uballit I (c 1380-1341) who aided the eastern Hurrite monarch, Artatama II, in invading Mitanni and assumed a protectorate over that kingdom. He also forced the Kassites to abandon their claim of suzerainty over Assyria, gave his daughter in marriage to the Kassite prince, Kurigalzu III, and secured the accession of his son-in-law, the future conqueror of Elam, to the throne of Babylon. Assyria was now a great power. Her monarchs during the next century fought against the Hittites in the north and the Babylonians in the south, without however materially extending their dominions. The first empire builder was Tukulti-Ninurta I (c 1255-1218) who finally drove the Hittites out of Mitanni and also subdued the Nairi region in the north, Gutium in the east and Babylon in the south. His successors however were unable to retain his conquests, but a century later Tiglath-pileser I (c 1116-1090) recovered and extended them. He wrested Commagene from the Moschians and Malatya from the Neo-Hittites, attacked the Aramaeans in Aram Naharaim and, crossing the Euphrates at Carchemish, reached the Mediterranean at Arwad on the Phoenician coast. But another period of weakness followed the conquest, and lasted for two centuries.

Assyrian expansion recommenced in the ninth century B.C. Aššur-nasir-pal II (884-860) crossed the Euphrates in 877 and received tribute from the Neo-Hittite states in the Syrian hinterland and the Phoenician cities on the coast. His successor, Shalmaneser III (859-824), pressed further south against the Aramaeans and was met at Qarqar on the Orontes in 121c 853 by a coalition of Aramaeans, Cilicians, Phoenicians, Israelites, Edomites and Arabians under the command of Adadidri (Ben Hadad) of Damascus. The Israelite contingent was led by Achab. The Assyrian claimed the victory but was checked in his advance. He returned to the attack in 848, 845 and 841, and on the last occasion devastated the territory of Damascus and received tribute, not only from Tyre and Sidon which had not joined the coalition, but also from Jehu of Israel. Besides their ancient enemies, the Aramaeans, Babylonians and Elamites, the Assyrians had now to contend with the Urartians, who appeared as powerful rivals in the regions about Lake Van and subsequently pressed southwards as far as Aleppo.

d They also met in battle for the first time their future conquerors, the Chaldaeans, nomads from the west who had settled in southern Babylonia, and the Medes, who had taken part in the great Aryan migration of c 2000 B.C. and found a home, at first in eastern, but later in western Iran. Shamshi-Adad V (824-810) lost the Syrian conquests of his predecessors and is best known as the husband of Sammu-ramat, the legendary Semiramis of the Greeks, who was regent during the first five years of the reign of her son Adad-nirari III (810-782). This monarch crossed the Euphrates in 802, conquered the Hittites and Phoenicians and reduced Damascus. Among his tributaries are mentioned Tyre, Sidon, Israel and Edom. The Syrian expeditions of Shalmaneser IV (782-772) and Ashur-dan III (772-753) were directed almost exclusively against Hazrak. This was a powerful Aramaean state, extending from Hamath in the south to within twenty miles of Aleppo in the north, whose king, Zakir, was strong enough to defeat a coalition of Syrian states and check for a time the southern expansion of Assyria. Israel was thus unmolested during the prosperous reign of Jeroboam II.

e The fourth and last period of Assyrian expansion begins with Tiglath-pileser III (745-727), also called Pul as king of Babylon (cf. 4 Kg 15:19, 29). He inaugurated the policy of deporting the inhabitants of devastated cities and replacing conquered rulers by Assyrian princes or governors. The Urartians were first expelled from north Syria in 744. Assyrian rule was then established in eastern Asia Minor. After a Syrian campaign in 738, Tiglath-pileser received tribute from Commagene, Malatya, Cue (Cilicia) and Tuwanawa (Tyana) in the north and from the kings of Tyre and Sidon, Menahem of Israel, and Razon of Damascus in the south. He invaded Philistia in 734 and sacked Gaza, whose king Hanun fled to f Egypt. It was probably on this occasion that Achaz of Judah sent him presents and invoked his aid against Pekah (DV Phacee) of Israel and Razon of Damascus who were meditating a revolt against Assyria and sought to dethrone Achaz and set up a partisan monarch in Jerusalem. The result was the devastation of northern Israel, the sack of Damascus captured in 732, and the deportation of a large number of the inhabitants of both countries. A usurper, Osee, replaced Pekah in the diminished kingdom, obtaining Assyrian recognition by the payment of a heavy tribute. Assyrian provinces, Gal'azu, Magidu and Du'uru were established in Galaad, Galilee and Sharon. Under Shalmaneser V (727-721) Tyre and Israel revolted, relying on Egyptian aid. Tyre was soon reduced but Samaria was only captured after a three years' siege by Sargon II (721-705) in the winter of 722-721. Of its inhabitants 27,290 were then deported and the city was repopled by colonists from Babylonia, Syria and Arabia.

g Sargon II, the son of Tiglath-pileser, was an indefatigable warrior, who pursued extensively his father's policy of transplanting conquered peoples and replacing native princes by Assyrian governors. His chief opponents in the north-west were Rusa of Urartu and Midas of Mushki, whose power he reduced by repeated campaigns. Assyrian rule was strengthened in eastern Asia Minor and extended to the island of Cyprus. An expedition to Syria in 720 was necessitated by a revolt of Hamath, Arpad, Simirra, Damascus and Samaria in the north and Gaza in the south. The northern rebels were defeated at Qarqar on the Orontes, and Hamath, whose prince Yaubidi organized and led the revolt, was repopled by Assyrians. Hanun of Gaza, abandoned by his Egyptian allies, was conquered and made prisoner. Ezechias of Judah is not included among the rebels, but later played a minor part with Moab and Edom in the Philistine revolt punished by the sack of Ashdod and Gath in 711. Three months after Sargon's accession to the throne Merodach-Baladan II, king of Bit-Yakin on the north-eastern coast of the Persian Gulf, proclaimed himself king of Babylon and, aided by the Elamites, defeated an Assyrian army sent against him. Sargon led another expedition into southern Babylonia in 710 forced him to fly first to Bit-Yakin and then to Elam and repopled Bit-Yakin with colonists from Commagene. Merodach-Baladan reappeared after Sargon's death but was defeated near Kish by Sennacherib (705-681). The embassy of Merodach-Baladan to Ezechias had no doubt a political object, the anti-Assyrian league of 713, but was not connected with the later revolt of Judah, Philistia and Phoenicia in 703. After two campaigns against the Kassites and the Medes Sennacherib marched into Syria in 701 and quickly reduced the northern cities, most of which submitted without a battle. He then captured Ascalon in the south before the Egyptians arrived to relieve it. The relieving army was next routed at Eltekeh, but not pursued, Ekron (Accaron) was stormed and western Judah was devastated. Jerusalem was neither surrendered nor taken by assault, but Ezechias had to pay a heavy tribute and submit to the deportation of his people and the diminution of his territory. The disaster which closed the campaign is not recorded by the Assyrians. Sennacherib was troubled by Babylonian revolts during most of his reign. He finally destroyed the city itself and placed as governor over the district his son and successor, Esarhaddon (680-669).

Sennacherib had fallen victim to a conspiracy led by his son, Arad-Malik (Vg Adramelech). Esarhaddon, a younger son, had first to quell the civil discord provoked by fraternal jealousy and to punish his father's murderers. He rebuilt Babylon, which his father had destroyed, and made some expeditions against the Medes and Scythians. But the chief event of his reign was the invasion of Egypt. The first campaigns were unsuccessful. Finally however in 671, after securing the co-operation of the Arabs whose camels were needed for desert transport, Esarhaddon subdued the land of the Nile. The native rulers of the various nomes were maintained in office but were assisted by Assyrian residents. There was a wide-spread revolt in 669 and Esarhaddon died on the march to repress it. Though the conquest of Egypt was desirable from the Assyrian point of view for the pacification of Palestine and Syria, it had the disadvantage of extending the empire unduly in the west when the real danger was in the east.

k In the reign of Ashurbanipal (669-626) Assyria reached the height of its power and then hastened to its fall. Egypt was reconquered in 667 and Taharqa fled to Nubia. His nephew and successor, Tanut-Amon, again raised the standard of revolt in 663, but an Assyrian expedition restored order and sacked the southern capital, Thebes. Shamash-shum-ukin, Ashurbanipal's jealous elder brother, had received from his father the kingdom of Babylonia. His constant intrigues culminated in 652 in the organization of a revolt extending from Elam to Egypt. Manasses of Judah seems to be included among the kings of Amurru who took part in it. The repression was severe. The Elamite capital, Susa, was sacked and Susiana became an Assyrian province. Shamash-shum-ukin perished in the flames of his palace at Babylon. Manasses was taken to Nineveh in chains, but was subsequently released and restored to his kingdom. About the same period Psammetichus 121k threw off the Assyrian yoke in Egypt and Gyges of Lydia vainly invoked the aid of his suzerain against the invading Cimmerians.

121g

I Under the successors of Ashurbanipal, Ashur-etil-ilani (626-621) and Sin-shar-ishkun (c. 620-612), three enemies gradually close in on Assyria, the Babylonians from the south and west, the Medes and Scythians from the north and east. The Babylonians under the Chaldaean general, Nabopolassar, founder of a dynasty called Chaldaean or Neo-Babylonian (626-605), had already reduced the chief cities in the south and west when the Medes under Cyaxares (633-584) captured Ashur in 614. A joint attack was then made on Nineveh which was taken and sacked in 612. In the subsequent division of the spoils the Medes received the northern and eastern provinces of the empire, the Babylonians the western and most of Mesopotamia. The Scythians settled in Aram Naharaim under the protection of the Medes. Another section of these European invaders pressed southward through Asia Minor, Syria and Palestine to the gates of Egypt. Scythopolis, the name given by the Greeks to Beth-Shan in Palestine, preserves the memory of this invasion. The marriage of Nabopolassar's son, Nabuchodonosor, to Cyaxares' daughter, Amytis, sealed the alliance between the Medes and the Babylonians.

II The Assyrians are notorious among the peoples of the ancient east for their inhumanity, manifested in the severe penalties of their law code as well as in the harsh treatment of their vanquished foes. They were good soldiers but bad colonizers. Utterly indifferent to the welfare of the subject peoples, they squandered the resources of the provinces in the adornment of magnificent palaces and temples in the cities of Assyria, imposed on their inhabitants forced labours and military conscription and adopted extensively an inhuman and uneconomic deportation policy to lessen the danger of revolt. The sudden collapse of their hated empire was greeted with a universal outburst of joy and exultation.

122a The Chaldeans—The nomads from the west who had attained power in Babylon, after the destruction of the remnants of the Assyrians under Ashur-uballit II in the region of Harran, had still to contend with the Egyptians for the possession of Syria and Palestine. Nechao II (609-594), who had succeeded his father, Psammetichus, on the throne of Egypt, marched at the head of an army to the aid of the Assyrians in 609 B.C. Josias, king of Judah, perished in the attempt to block his passage at Megiddo. Driven out of Mesopotamia, Nechao encamped at Riblah on the Orontes, where he received tribute from Phoenicia, Syria, Arabia and Edom. He deposed and imprisoned Joachaz of Judah and appointed in his stead his elder brother, Eliacim, whose name he changed to Joakim. His success was short-lived, for the Babylonians under the young prince Nabuchodonosor crossed the Euphrates in 606, defeated his army near Carchemish and pursued him to the Egyptian frontier. Egypt was only saved from invasion by the death of Nabopolassar which necessitated the return of the prince to Babylon. Secure in his western dominions, Nabuchodonosor II (605-562) devoted himself to the fortification and embellishment of his capital. He also reconstructed the Amurru wall of the third dynasty of Ur, now called the wall of the Medes. He repressed a revolt of Judah, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon, incited by Nechao, in 598, and taking Jerusalem, deported its principal inhabitants, including King Joachin, to Babylonia and placed Sedecias on the throne. Records of provisions supplied to Joachin and his more distinguished fellow-prisoners have been discovered in the royal palace in Babylon. A second revolt, provoked by the Pharaoh Apries, in which Judah and Tyre were particularly involved, was more severely punished. Jerusalem was captured after a long siege in 587. The city and temple were completely destroyed, the king Sedecias blinded and imprisoned, the people deported. Nabuchodonosor 122b invaded Egypt towards the close of his reign but achieved no permanent results. His three immediate successors, Evil-Merodach, Neriglissar and Lebashi-Marduk had short and inglorious reigns. A usurper, Nabu-na'id, the Nabuchodonosor of the book of Daniel (555-539), was the last king of Babylon. He repressed a revolt at Hamath in 553 and marched against Adummu and Tema' in Arabia the following year. He lived in retirement at Tema' for some years, leaving his son, Bel-shar-usur (Baltasar) as regent in Babylon. During his reign Cyrus II founded the Persian empire, subjugated the Medes and invaded Babylonia. His capture of Babylon in 539 put an end to the empire of the Chaldeans.

The Persians—In the great Aryan migration (c. 2000 B.C.) the Persians had settled beside the Medes in eastern Iran. Their kingdom of Anzan under Teispes (675-645), Cyrus I (644-588) and Cambyses I (587-558) acknowledged the suzerainty of the Medes. Cyrus II (557-529) proclaimed his independence and by his victories over the Medes in 549 and the Lydians in 546 had extended his empire from the Aegean to the Indus before he attacked and subjugated the Babylonians in 539. His mild and provident policy contrasts with that of his imperial predecessors. He sought to conciliate the subject peoples by honouring their gods and respecting their national customs. The Babylonian divinities, transported to the capital by Nabu-na'id, were restored to their respective cities where provision was made for their worship. The Jewish exiles in Babylonia were authorized to return to Jerusalem and to rebuild the temple of Yahweh. His son and successor, Cambyses (529-522), added Egypt to the empire. Faithful at first to his father's policy of religious toleration, he subsequently treated the Egyptian divinities with hostility and contempt. Thus at Elephantine, the southern outpost of Egypt, where Jews formed part of the Persian garrison, the Egyptian temples were all destroyed but the temple of Yahweh was not molested. The death of Cambyses, probably by suicide, in Syria coincided with a successful movement against a pretender in the east, organized by seven Persian nobles. One of these, Darius I, the I greatest of the Persian monarchs, succeeded to the throne (529-485). Though himself a sincere worshipper of Ahura-Mazda, as we learn from the Behistun inscription which commemorates his exploits, he built temples to the Egyptian gods in Egypt, supported Greek worship in Asia Minor and forbade all opposition to the building of the temple of Yahweh in Jerusalem which was resumed and completed in the early years of his reign. The armies of Darius, though unsuccessful against the Greeks, extended his empire to Thrace, Macedonia and India. More famous as an administrator than as a warrior, he completed the political organization of his dominions begun by Cyrus. Now for the first time in the East the same administrative system was adopted for every part of a vast empire with equal rights and burdens for all. This unification admitted such exceptions as the exemption from tribute of the Medes and Persians and did not affect national religions and national customs and institutions. The empire was divided g into twenty provinces, each governed by a satrap, though this title was also used to designate the rulers of smaller districts subject to the provincial governor. The latter had supreme civil, judicial and military authority in his province. His chief duties were to maintain order and security and to collect and transmit the tribute imposed. He was obliged to respect local forms of government like the regime of the high-priests in Judaea. His power was sometimes limited by royal appointments of military officers, directly responsible to the king, to special posts, and was to some extent controlled by a royal secretary in permanent residence and royal inspectors who paid unexpected visits. Darius used his enormous revenues for the public good. He connected the Nile with the Red Sea by a canal

122g and built roads to facilitate communications between Susa, the capital, and distant parts of the empire.

h Darius had no worthy successors. Xerxes I (485-464), portrayed in the book of Esther, is noteworthy for an attempt to impose the worship of Ahura-Mazda on his Babylonian subjects and for the disasters which followed his invasion of Greece. Artaxerxes I (464-424), who authorized his cup-bearer Nehemias to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, quelled an Egyptian revolt, but was defied and twice defeated by Megabyzus, the satrap of Syria. Under Artaxerxes II (404-358) Egypt recovered its independence, several satraps refused obedience to their king and the defeat of a great Persian army by 10,000 Greeks at Cunaxa between Babylon and Baghdad in 401 showed the real weakness of the vast empire. Artaxerxes III (358-338) reconquered Egypt and, with the aid of the Greeks, overcame the rebellious satraps. Their repression is probably the background of the Judith narrative. He and his son died by poison and Darius III (335-330) had only begun to reign when Alexander embarked on his career of conquest in 334.

i The Lagids and the Seleucids. Hellenization.—The death of Alexander in 323 was followed by the wars of the Diadochi from which two of his generals, Ptolemy, son of Lagos (323-283), and Seleucus, son of Antiochus (312-280), ultimately emerged as the heirs of his African and Asiatic conquests. They founded the dynasties of the Lagids and the Seleucids, who reigned respectively at Alexandria in Egypt and at Antioch in Syria. Besides Egypt, Cyrenaica and Palestine the Lagids originally held some coastal regions in Asia Minor and Coele Syria, the Syrian depression. The latter district was, however, claimed by the Seleucids and remained a bone of contention during the third century B.C. Ptolemy II Philadelphos (283-246), Ptolemy III Euergetes (246-221), Ptolemy IV Philopator (221-203) were efficient rulers and held their own in the Syrian wars. But Ptolemy V Epiphanes (203-181) had to abandon all his Asiatic possessions, Palestine included, to the Seleucids. Egypt now fell under the protectorate of Rome and declined in power until it became a Roman province in 30 B.C. Seleucus, at first governor of Babylonia, then protégé of Ptolemy, finally extended his rule over the Asiatic provinces from Syria to India. His successors, Antiochus I Soter (280-261), Antiochus II Theos (261-247) and Seleucus II Callinicos (247-226) waged war on the Ptolemies for the possession of Coele Syria without decisive results. But Antiochus III, called the Great (223-187), by his victory at Bannas in 200 (or 198) expelled the Egyptians definitely from Asia. He also reduced to temporary obedience remote eastern provinces which had proclaimed their independence, but met disaster in a rash encounter with the Romans. Defeated at Magnesia in 190, he was forced to evacuate Asia Minor and pay a crushing war indemnity. Seleucus IV Eupator (187-175) is noteworthy for his attempt to appropriate the treasures of the temple at Jerusalem. His brother, Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-163), in his misguided zeal for Hellenism, sought by a cruel persecution to extirpate the religion and national institutions of the Jews. Checked in his designs on Egypt by a Roman veto, he died in Iran while endeavouring to consolidate his empire and restore Hellenism in the east. His puppet son only reigned a year when he and the real ruler, Lysias, were slain by Demetrius I Soter (162-150), son of Seleucus IV. Demetrius himself died fighting against a usurper, Alexander Balas (150-145), who was supported by the Romans and favoured by the Jews, but was opposed and slain in battle by the Egyptians. Syria had now two kings, Antiochus VI Dionysos, son of Balas (145-142), later assassinated by his general Tryphon, and Demetrius II, son of Demetrius I (145-138). The Jews at first supported Antiochus, but after experiencing the treachery of Tryphon, embraced the cause of Demetrius, who subsequently lost his throne in an expedition against the Parthians, having been defeated and held prisoner by Mithridates I. His brother, Antiochus VII Sidetes (138-129), effected his liberation in 130, but was himself defeated and slain in 129. He was the last worthy successor of Seleucus. He forced the Jews to acknowledge his rule, but treated them kindly and respected their religion and national institutions. A period of confusion and rapid decline followed his reign. Syria was subject to Tigranes, king of Armenia, 95-69, and became a Roman province in 65 B.C.

The most important result of Alexander's conquests was the Hellenization of the East, projected and inaugurated by the conqueror himself and energetically promoted by his successors. Thus the language and thought, the arts and sciences, the political and social institutions of the Greeks penetrated the vast Persian empire. Bactria on the confines of India is an example of an autonomous Hellenistic state in the middle of the third century B.C. The Jews were naturally affected by the movement and about the same period we find them at Alexandria, where they enjoyed a certain autonomy and filled a large quarter of the city, engaged in a Greek translation of their sacred books. The tolerance of the Lagids favoured the movement in Egypt as the intolerance of the Seleucids retarded it in Judaea and provoked the heroic and triumphant reaction of the Maccabees. But the language prevailed and 1 Mac. only survives in a Greek version while 2 Mac. like Wisdom is an original Greek work. Thus was a world tongue prepared to be the vehicle of Christ's message to all mankind.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

By E. F. SUTCLIFFE, S.J.

123a Bibliography—(1) General: *F. K. Ginzel, Handbuch der mathematischen und technischen Chronologie, 3 vols, Leipzig 1906-14; *H. R. Hall, Ancient History of the Near East, London 1950¹¹; *D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 2 vols, Chicago 1926-7; CAH I-VI, Cambridge 1925-7; A. Deimel, S.J., Vet. Test. Chronologia Monumentis Bab.-Assyr. illustrata, Romae 1912; F. X. Kugler, S.J., Von Moses bis Paulus, Münster in Westf. 1922; E. Ruffini, Chronologia Vet. et Nov. Test., Romae 1924; E. Mangenot, DBV II (1895) 718-40; L. Pirot and V. Coucke DBV(S) I 1244-79; *E. L. Curtis, HDB I (1900) 397-403; I. G. Hagen, S.J. and J. Knabenbauer, S.J., in M. Hagen, S.J.'s Lexicon Biblicum I (CSS), Parisiis 1905, 882-910.

(2) Maccabean Age: J. Hontheim, S.J., 'Zur Chronologie der beiden Machabaerbüchen' ZKT 43 (1919) 1-30.

(3) Esdras-Nehemias: A. Van Hoonacker, Nouvelles Etudes sur la Restauration juive après l'Exil de Babylone, Louvain 1896; RB 10 (1901) 5-26, 175-99; 32 (1923) 481-94; 33 (1924) 33-64; A. Fernandez, S.J., 'Epoca de la Actividad de Esdras' Bi 2 (1921) 424-47; *W. M. F. Scott, 'Nehemiah-Ezra' ET 58 (1946-7) 263-7; *J. Stafford Wright, The Date of Ezra's Coming to Jerusalem, London 1947.

(4) Period of the Kings: J. Hontheim, S.J., ZKT 42 (1918) 463-82; 687-718; A. M. Kleber, O.S.B., Bi 2 (1921) 3-29; 170-205; H. Hänsler, O.S.B., Bi 10 (1929) 257-74; 377-93; 11 (1930) 63-80; *E. R. Thiele JNES 3 (1944) 137-86; *C. J. Gadd, The Fall of Nineveh, London 1923; B. Alfrink, 'Die Gadd'sche Chronik und die hl. Schrift', Bi 8 (1927) 385-417; 'Die Schlacht bei Megiddo und der Tod des Josias (609)' Miscellanea Biblica I, Roma 1935, 53-64 = Bi 15 (1934) 173-84.

(5) Judges and Exodus: J. Hontheim, S.J., 'Die Chronologie der Richterzeit in der Bibel und die ägyptische Chronologie' ZKT 37 (1913) 76-132. Supporting the earlier date for the Exodus: *J. W. Jack, The Date of the Exodus, Edinburgh 1925; L. Desnoyers, Histoire du Peuple Hébreu I, Paris 1922, 407-17; F. X. Kortleitner, Ord. Praem., Israelitarum in Aegypto Commoratio, Tongerloae 1930, 97-170; *J. Garrow Duncan, Digging up Biblical History I, London 1931, 232-8; *J. Garstang, Joshua Judges, London 1931, 51-66, 344-7. Favours the late date but leaves the question open: A. Fernandez, S.J., Comm. in Lib. Josue (CSS), Parisiis 1938, 16-22. Supporting the later date: L. R. de Vaux, O.P., ZAW 56 (1938) 225-38; L.-P. Vincent, O.P., RB 48 (1939) 579-83; *W. F. Albright, BASOR 74 (1939) 11-23; *H. H. Rowley, PEQ (1941) 152-7; From Joseph to Joshua, London 1950, gives an exhaustive bibliography. Favours the 14th cent.: *T. H. Robinson, ET 47 (1935-6) 53-5. See also references in the text.

b An adequate discussion of OT chronology would require, not an article, but a volume. Indeed the considerations relevant to the date of the Exodus alone have provided matter for a book. Hence the present treatment cannot be more than a bare summary. The subject is complex and delicate as the OT provides very imperfect information about relative chronology and none at all about absolute chronology. Though the broad sweep of the story is in chronological sequence 123b this is not always the case with regard to particular events. In some cases events apparently successive in time were actually contemporaneous as in Judges; the story itself is not complete, witness the gap of unspecified length between Esdras-Nehemias and Maccabees; the numbers given are not always correct, they and proper names being most exposed to corruption in transmission; numbers accurately transmitted are sometimes intentionally vague as in the frequent use of the number forty, and sometimes difficult of interpretation through ignorance of ancient methods of computation.

Though the idea of an absolute chronology is foreign e to the OT, it does contain information which renders possible the determination of definite dates for certain events around which others may be grouped with greater or less probability. The history of the Maccabees is reckoned by the Seleucid era, called in 1 Mac 1:11 'of the kingdom of the Greeks'. This era was computed by the Greeks from 1 Oct. 312 B.C. There were, however, local variations, Ginzel 3, 41 f. The author of 2 Mac, writing in Greek, also begins the year in the autumn. 1 Mac, on the other hand, puts the beginning of the era in spring six months earlier, reckoning from 1 Nisan. The two systems thus overlap by half a year. This is the clue to apparently conflicting statements. In 1 Mac 6:16 Antiochus Epiphanes is said to have died in the year 149, whereas in 2 Mac 11:33 a letter of Antiochus Eupator, the son and successor of Antiochus Epiphanes, is dated the 15th of the month Xanthicus (§ 83j) in 148. The half-year Tishri to Nisan is the 2nd half of a year in 1 Mac and the 1st half of a year in 2 Mac. Thus Tishri to Nisan 148 is the 2nd half of that year in 1 Mac and the 1st half in 2 Mac. The following 6 months from Nisan to Tishri are the 1st half of 149 in 1 Mac and the 2nd half of 148 in 2 Mac.

In order to convert a Seleucid year into the corresponding Julian year the number of the former is subtracted from 313. It should be remembered, moreover, that only the first 3 months of a Seleucid year beginning in Tishri fall in the corresponding Julian year and that the remainder fall in the following Julian year as the latter began on 1 Jan.

A discussion of the chronological order, Esdras-Nehemias or Nehemias-Esdras, will be found § 289i-q.

The second great help in fixing the absolute chronology of the OT is the Canon of Ptolemy, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer who lived in Egypt in the 3rd cent. A.D. The Canon, which begins with the Babylonian king Nabû-nasir (Nabonassar), 747 B.C., after the Babylonian and Assyrian kings continues with the Persian and Greek monarchs, and ends with the Roman emperors in the Christian era. The year according to Egyptian custom is reckoned as beginning on the 1st day of the month Thoth. As the Egyptian year consisting of 365 days was a quarter of a day shorter than the solar year, the 1st Thoth moved through the course of the solar year returning to the same day of the solar year in a period of 1,460 years, the Sothic cycle. The regnal years are all given as full years. This method means that the year in which a king dies is reckoned wholly either to the deceased king or to his successor, i.e. either according to the f The dates of this Canon partly coincide with those of a series of Assyrian documents which are of great importance for our purpose. These are the Assyrian eponym lists, the eponym being the official after whom each year was named. The lists are printed in Deimel 5 ff. and, with the results of later research, in Luckenbill II 427-9. In one form of these lists a brief historical note is attached recording some outstanding event of the year, generally a military campaign. For the eponymate of Bur-Sagale it is an eclipse of the sun, which astronomers have shown to have taken place in 763 B.C. By means of this entry the absolute date of all others can be fixed with the reservation made § 124c. The lists are thus found to extend from 893 (892) to 648, and in a partially fragmentary state from 1103 to 933. On the use of these Canons in fixing the dates of Assyrian monarchs see Deimel 19 and 32. In Assyria the kings reckoned their regnal years from 1 Nisan of the year following their accession. The period between the date of accession and the following 1 Nisan was called rēš šarrūti 'the beginning of my reign' and is followed by 'the first regnal year'. For an example from the Obelisk of Shalmaneser III see Deimel 24, Luckenbill I, §§ 557 ff. Similarly Nabuchodonosor ascended the throne in the spring of 605, but counted his 1st regnal year from 1 Nisan 604.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

123a system of post-notation by which a king's regnal years were counted from the 1st Thoth following his accession, or the system of pre-notation according to which they were counted from the 1st Thoth preceding his accession. Calculation has shown that the Canon post-dates up to Alexander exclusively and predates from his reign onwards, Hontheim ZKT 42 (1918) 465 f. For instance, the Emperor Titus is known to have commenced his rule on 23 June 79, whereas the accession year assigned to him in the Canon is that beginning 4 August 78, that year ending according to Egyptian reckoning on 3 August 79. The reliability of the Canon has been tested in various ways and is universally acknowledged. It may be consulted, e.g. in Ginzel I 139 or Ruffini opposite p 50.

124a Fortunately for our chronology the contacts of the Hebrews with Assyria and Babylonia provide certain synchronisms which afford a sure basis for the determination of the absolute dates of many of the kings of Israel and Judah. It is convenient to begin with Josias. He fell in battle near Megiddo attempting to prevent the march north of Pharaoh Necho. The date of this encounter is fixed by the Babylonian chronicle which gives an account of the last years of the Assyrian empire and was published by C. J. Gadd, The Fall of Nineveh (London 1923). This shows that Necho's march to the Euphrates took place before Tammuz (the 4th month, June-July) in Nabopolassar's 17th year, which began Nisan 609. See B. Alfrink, Bi 8 (1927) 385-95. This fixes the 3 months reign of Joachaz from before the 4th month to before Tishri, the 7th month, 609. Hence Joakim, his successor, came to the throne before Tishri, and that month 609 began his 1st regnal year (post-dating, § 124b-i). This is supported by the addition in Jer 25:1 which equates the 4th year of Joakim with the accession year of Nabuchodonosor. This ended with Nisan 604, when his first regnal year began, whereas Joakim's 4th year ran from Tishri 606 to Tishri 605. Nabuchodonosor's rēš šarrūti or period of reign preceding his 1st complete year, thus overlapped with Joakim's 4th. Joakim died in the course of his 11th year, which began Tishri 599, and was followed by Joachin. His 3 months reign ended with his own captivity and that of many others including Ezechiel. This is dated in 4 Kg 24:12 in the 8th year of Nabuchodonosor, which (by pre-notation, the system followed for Nabuchodonosor elsewhere in Kg; see below) began Nisan 598. In view of the synchronisms given in § 124b Sedecias's 1st regnal year began in Tishri of the same year 598 and his 11th and last in Tishri 588. Jerusalem fell in the 5th month of that regnal year, and the months being always calendar months this was Ab (July-Aug.) 587.

This month Ab 587 fell in the 18th year of Nabuchodonosor reckoned by post-notation and his 19th reckoned by pre-notation. This explains the different year assigned in different sources. The fall of Jerusalem is assigned to the 11th year of Sedecias in 4 Kg 25:2, Jer 39:2 and 52:5-6, and to the 19th year of Nabuchodonosor in 4 Kg 25:8 and Jer 52:12. With this agrees the equation of the 10th year of Sedecias to the 18th of the Babylonian in Jer 32:1. On the other hand, Jer 52:29, which is recognized to be from a different source, attributes the captivity following the siege of Jerusalem to the 18th year of Nabuchodonosor. Following the same system of post-notation Jer 52:28, from the same source as 52:29, assigns the captivity of Joachin to the Babylonian's 7th year, whereas in 4 Kg 24:12 it is assigned to his 8th. It is thus seen that for the Babylonian reign Kg + Jer follow pre-notation and Jer 52:28-30 post-notation.

Esnahaddon, 680-669, mentions Manasses among his vassals, Luckenbill II, § 690 (cf. 2 Par 33:11). The year 701 saw Sennacherib's invasion of the kingdom of Ezechias; see Luckenbill II, §§ 240, 312, and 4 Kg 18:13, where the 14th year should probably be reckoned from Ezechias' miraculous cure, Hänsler in Bi 10 (1929) 273 f. When this king celebrated his first Pasch, the Northern Kingdom is thought by some to have ceased to exist. Otherwise, it is stated, it would not have been possible to send his messengers as far as Dan and to invite the men of the northern tribes Ephraim, Manasses, Aser and Zabulon to celebrate the feast at his capital city, 2 Par 30:1, 5, 10 f., 18, nor for the men of Judah to march through the land destroying the altars and high places not only in the Southern Kingdom, but also in Ephraim and Manasses, 2 Par 31:1. But that the death of Achaz and the accession of Ezechias took place in 727, the year of Tiglath-pileser's death, is shown by Is 14:28 f., Coucke 1266 f., Hänsler in Bi 10 (1929) 269-72. And the happenings at the time of Ezechias' first Pasch are an indication of the weakness of the Northern Kingdom at the time. Moreover, Ezechias' accession year fell in the 3rd year of Osee, 4 Kg 18:1, and his 4th and 6th years in Osee's 7th and 9th respectively, 4 Kg 18:9 f. (Incidentally this shows that his accession year was not reckoned as one of his years of reign.)

The fall of Samaria marked the end of the Northern Kingdom, 4 Kg 17:5 f. Shalmaneser is said to have begun the siege and taken the city, 4 Kg 18:9 f., but this may signify only that the credit of the capture was really his, as Sargon, 721-705, his successor, claimed to have captured the city himself before the second year of his reign, Luckenbill II, § 4. His accession took place at the death of Shalmaneser 10 Tebeth (= 20 Dec.) 722. This fixes the date within narrow limits, even if it is admitted with some that Sargon appropriated to himself a conquest which rightfully belonged to Shalmaneser. Further synchronisms are provided in the reign of Tiglath-pileser III, 745-727. Rasin, king of Damascus, and Phacee, king of Israel, attacked Achaz, king of Judah, who appealed for help to the Assyrian king, 4 Kg 16:5-7. Tiglath-pileser made a campaign against Philistia in 734, and against Damascus in 733 and 732 (eponym list; tribute of Iauhazi of Judah, i.e. Achaz, Luckenbill I, § 801). He records that he set Auzi' (Osee) as king in Israel in place of Pakaha (Phacee), whom the people had deposed, Luckenbill I, § 816. Moreover, earlier in his reign Tiglath-pileser received tribute from Manahem, 4 Kg 15:19, where the Assyrian king is called by his Babylonian throne-name of Phul. The Assyrian monarch's mention of this tribute from Menihimmu in his annals (Luckenbill I, § 772) has led some to place this event in 738, Tiglath-pileser's 8th year, but without sufficient reason, and it can safely be dated several years earlier.

The two remaining synchronisms with Assyrian history are the payment of tribute by Jehu to Shalmaneser III and the defeat inflicted by the latter at Qarqar on Achab and his confederates. These two events used to be dated with confidence in 842 and 854

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

124e in reliance on what has been rashly styled 'the infallible Assyrian eponym-list'. But the fact is that above 786 dates will differ by one year according as Balatu who is given in one list as eponym for 787 is considered an erroneous insertion in that list or an accidental omission elsewhere. Here the shorter chronology is followed and the two events are dated 841 and 853 respectively. In either case the important fact remains that they are separated by an interval of just 12 years.

f Further help is provided by the synchronisms between the kings of Israel and of Judah. Jeroboam and Roboam, the first rulers of the divided kingdom, came to the throne almost at the same time. Jehu gave Joram of Israel and Ochozias of Judah their death-wound on the same day, 4 Kg 9:24-27. Moreover, the biblical story provides a whole series of cross-references between the reigns of the two kingdoms. These synchronisms of each kingdom in terms of the regnal years of the other fit into a consistent and harmonious scheme down to the death of Azarias in 740-739 if due account is taken of the time of year when the regnal years began in each kingdom and of their methods of treating a sovereign's accession year. Thiele's study has rendered invaluable service to chronology in these matters.

g To discover the method of computing regnal years it is necessary to bear in mind the Hebrew custom of counting a part of a year or a day as a whole year or day. Thus Abiam came to the throne of Judah in the 18th year of Jeroboam, and is said to have reigned 3 years though he died in the latter's 20th year, 3 Kg 15:1 f., 8 f. Similarly Nadab became king in the 2nd and was murdered in the 3rd year of Asa, but is said to have reigned 2 years, 3 Kg 15:25, 28.

h The method of computing regnal years was from Tishri in Judah and from Nisan in Israel. Solomon began the building of the temple in the 2nd month of his 4th year, and completed it in the 8th month of his 11th year, 3 Kg 6:1, 37 f. It would therefore seem that the building occupied $7\frac{1}{2}$ years. Actually it was $6\frac{1}{2}$ years recorded as 7 according to the custom of counting a part as a whole, 3 Kg 6:38. The months were counted from Nisan, Ex 12:2, and, if Solomon's regnal years had also been reckoned from Nisan, then the building would have taken $7\frac{1}{2}$ years. They must have been counted from Tishri, for in that case the building began in the 8th month (not calendar) reckoned from the beginning of his 4th regnal year, occupied the next 6 years reckoned from that month, and was concluded in the 2nd month reckoned from the beginning of his 11th year. Roboam and the other kings of Judah naturally followed the same system. Jeroboam and the other northern kings, on the other hand, reckoned their regnal years from Nisan, no doubt out of a desire to begin a new tradition and break away as far as possible from everything associated with the hated rule exercised from the southern capital. The proof of the change lies in the fact that on this basis of computation the synchronisms between the two kingdoms fit in harmoniously down to the death of Azarias.

i These synchronisms also reveal the method followed in the two kingdoms for dealing with the accession year of each sovereign. In Judah the accession year of a king was reckoned to his predecessor and the new king began the enumeration of his regnal years with the month Tishri following his accession. This is called post-notation or the accession-year system. The opposite system by which the accession year was counted as the 1st year of the new sovereign was adopted in Judah from 848 with the accession of Joram down to the accession of Amasias in 796. This would be explained by Athalia's desire to follow the custom of the northern court where she had been born, for there the system of pre-notation was followed. In this system the sovereign's accession year was reckoned both to himself and to his predecessor, and it was followed in Samaria from the dividing of the kingdom down to the accession of Joas in 798. From this time 124i the post-notation system was followed in both kingdoms to the end of their history, in this agreeing with the practice of Assyria and perhaps reflecting its influence.

As the beginning of the regnal year in the two kingdoms was separated by the six months between Nisan and Tishri, it may happen that the synchronisms fix the accession of a new ruler between either Nisan and Tishri or between Tishri and Nisan. In the former case the calendar year is fixed as both months fall in the same Julian year. In the latter case it remains uncertain whether the accession took place in the closing months of the preceding calendar year or the opening months of the following. Thus Joas of Judah came to the throne in 835 (between Nisan and Tishri) whereas Joachaz of Israel began his reign in 814-813 (between Tishri 814 and Nisan 813).

It will be seen that the chronological data are complicated. k Allowing for the different months in which the two kingdoms began their regnal years, for the systems of pre-notation and post-notation, and for certain co-regencies, all the regnal years fit in harmoniously except in the most difficult period 740-727. Here the years assigned to Phacee seem too long (20 in 4 Kg 15:27) and can only be accounted for on the very improbable supposition that he reckoned his years from the beginning of Manahem's reign, during a period when he was neither co-regent nor had any claim to the throne. So too there is no room for the 16 years assigned to Achaz, 4 Kg 16:2. His death appears to have fallen in the year of Ezechias' accession and he can hardly have been co-regent at the same time as his father. The possibility of two co-regents simultaneously may be ruled out.

The chronology of the undivided kingdom is vaguely l indicated. Solomon is said to have reigned 40 years, 3 Kg 11:42, so is David, 2 Kg 5:4, and so is Saul, Ac 13:21. This number 40 recurs in the history of the Judges (see §125a) and is used to indicate a period of long but uncertain duration. Still some events do actually occupy just or almost 40 years. David ruled 7 years and 6 months in Hebron, 2 Kg 2:11, and 33 years in Jerusalem, 3 Kg 2:11; 1 Par 29:27. And in the case of Solomon also the number 40 appears to be a close approximation. Synchronisms based on the reign of Hiram of Tyre lead to about 972 for the beginning of his reign, Jos. C. Apion. 1, 18; J. Hontheim, S.J., ZKT 36 (1912) 50-5; Kortleitner, 131 ff.

The length of the period of the Judges is variously 125a estimated according as the Exodus from Egypt is dated in the 15th or in the 13th cent. The longer chronology squares with the 480 years said to have elapsed from the Exodus to Solomon's 4th year, in which he began the building of the temple, 3 Kg 6:1, and with the 300 years which Jephthe averred to have elapsed from the occupation of the lands beyond the Jordan, i.e. from the end of the wandering in the wilderness, to the Ammonite oppression, Jg 11:26. But no accurate chronology is possible. As the rule of the Judges did not extend over the whole of Israel there is no reason to suppose that they were all successors in authority, but it is impossible to say how many of them may have been contemporaneous in whole or in part. Moreover the vague number 40 occurs five times. There were 40 years of rest under Othniel, Jg 3:11; 40 more of rest after the victory of Deborah and Barac, 5:32; 40 of rest under Gedeon, 8:28. There were 40 years of oppression before Samson, 13:1, and Heli judged Israel for 40 years, 1 Kg 4:18. Further 80 (= 40 × 2) is the number of the years of rest recorded in Jg 3:30, and 20 years (= half 40) occurs 4:3 and 15:20.

The evidence for the date of the Exodus is conflicting b and diversely interpreted with the result that there is no unanimity on the matter. The two main views are that it occurred in the 15th cent. under the XVIII Egyptian dynasty and that it must be dated in the 13th cent. under the XIX dynasty. These may be called respectively the early and the late dating. For 125b the former, appeal is made to 3 Kg 6:1 where the 4th year of Solomon is equated with the 480th year after the Exodus. This equation carries less weight today when the artificial and schematic character of ancient numbers is widely recognized. The evidence of the Tell el-Amarna correspondence has also seemed to some to confirm the early dating. Letters from Palestinian princes to the Egyptian court in the early 14th cent. show that the country was being invaded by people called Habiru, a name which suggests the Hebrews under Josue. But it has become more and more widely admitted that the accounts in the Bible and in the letters do not really touch at any point. Both the names and the course of military operations are different. In Jos 10:31-32 it is recorded that Josue slew all the inhabitants of Lachish. In the correspondence, on the other hand, we read of help afforded to the invaders by this city, KIB V, p 306. The main support for the early date is that of the fall of Jericho, though this too is disputed. The city was destroyed by the Israelites, Jos 6, and thereafter remained practically in ruins till the time of Achab, 3 Kg 16:34. A. Rowe and J. Garstang, both distinguished Palestinian archaeologists and the latter excavator at Jericho, date its fall between 1400 and the accession of Akhenaton in 1380 (Hall) or 1375 (Breasted): 'No other conclusion will satisfy the archaeological evidence as a whole', PEF (1936) 170. Another leading authority, W. F. Albright, judged that 'the fall . . . took place somewhere between cir. 1375 and cir. 1300 B.C. in all probability', BASOR 74 (1939) 20. In 1949, however, he favoured a date in the latter part of the 14th cent. or in the early 13th, The Archaeology of Palestine 109. Père Vincent puts the date lower still towards 1230, RB 48 (1939) 580, though Prof. G. E. Wright maintained that the publication of the pottery of the Lachish temple had given the final blow to this 13th cent. date, BASOR 86 (1942) 33. Later, while stating 'that it [Jericho] was abandoned by the 2nd or 3rd quarter of the 14th cent. seems certain', he rallied to the 13th cent. for 'the main wave of the conquest', BA 10 (1947) 14. This absence of decisive evidence is unfortunate, as the date of the fall of Jericho is crucial, since there is no question of its having been destroyed by anyone except the Israelites.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

6 A difficulty against the early dating is that little is known of building operations in the Delta by Pharaohs of the XVIII dynasty, whereas the late date is indicated by the many remains there of constructions of Ramses II in the 13th cent. The name of Ramesses (Raamses), where Israelites were set to forced labour, Ex 1:11, points to the Ramesside dynasty and the late date. The identification of the city, however, is still uncertain, and, as the name is compounded of that of the great god Ra, may be older than the XIX dynasty or may be the name later given to the place. Iron is mentioned as in use at the time of the conquest of Canaan, Jos 6:19, 24; 17:16, 18. But, though the beginning of the Iron Age in Palestine is dated about 1200 B.C., the use of iron is considerably older. As early as 'the 14th cent. B.C. . . iron began to be used rather extensively for weapons', W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine (1949) 110. The Israelites entered the country not as marauders in quest of booty but with the intention of permanent settlement to take possession of 'houses full of riches', Deut 6:11, and theirs was no policy of indiscriminate ruin. The biblical account records their deliberate destruction only of Jericho, Jos 6:24, and Hasor, Jos 11:11. (On Jg 1:8, see note.) Lachish (identified on probable grounds with Tell ed-Duweir) they captured on the second day, Jos 10:32, and there is no mention of its destruction. This is dated on archaeological evidence late in the 13th cent. and is often ascribed to the Israelites as is that of other cities destroyed about the same time. The silence of the Bible, which is not a complete record, does not disprove this ascription. But neither is it proved correct by the fact that the destruction was soon followed by a new civilization which was of Israelite stamp. J. W. Jack wrote on this question: 'The destruction was undoubtedly due, as the excavators themselves prefer to believe, to Merenptah's Raid, which we know from this Pharaoh's Victory Stela occurred in 1230 B.C., and was more widespread and devastating than commonly supposed', ET 52 (1940-1) 232. This supposes that the city was re-occupied by Canaanites after the slaughter of the original inhabitants by the Israelites, and that after the departure of the Egyptians the Israelites took the site for their own. The evidence of various short genealogies is also alleged, to show that the period in Egypt and the period from the Exodus to David were of no long duration. But the argument is not convincing. There is no evidence that the genealogies were meant to be complete. The writer may well have judged that a long list of unknown names would not be of interest to his readers. Moreover, it is reasonable to suppose that his purpose was not to establish but to indicate the line of descent, and it will be noticed that these genealogies lead back to some well-known or honoured figure as to Moses or to one of the twelve sons of Jacob. There could well be a firm and reliable tradition in a family that, say, Moses was their ancestor even though the names of many intervening progenitors had been forgotten. The reader will find the argument for a 13th date more fully discussed in §§ 163a-e, 228a-b. In view of the conflicting evidence it appears wiser to withhold judgement at present and to await a possible definitive solution of the problem as a result of further investigations.

The story of the patriarchs does not give time-d indications by which either the length or date of the period can be determined accurately. The figures by which the length of the period appears to be determined are: (1) Abraham was 75 years old at his entry into Canaan, Gen 12:4; (2) he was 100 at the time of Isaac's birth, 21:5; (3) Isaac was 60 at the birth of Jacob, 25:26; (4) Jacob was 130 years old when he left Canaan for Egypt, 47:9. This scheme gives 215 years as the period between Abraham's departure from Haran and Jacob's descent into Egypt. On the historical character of the figures see § 140b-f.

According to the Samaritan text of Ex 12:40 this period of 215 years passed in Canaan is exactly equal to that of the sojourn in Egypt: 'The abode that the children of Israel and their fathers made in the land of Canaan and in Egypt was 430 years'. LXX, without the words 'and their fathers' except in the Alexandrine codex, has the inverse order 'in Egypt and in the land of Canaan', which cannot be judged original; and MT mentions neither the fathers nor the land of Canaan. The mention of the sojourn in Canaan is not suitable in the context, but it is not easy to find a reason for the insertion of the words. On the other hand, a motive for their omission might be to give greater antiquity to the people, a motive which seems to have played its part in the manipulation of the numbers in Gen, chh 5 and 11. Ex 6:16-20 gives only two generations between Levi and Moses, who were respectively among those who entered and left Egypt. The list is: Levi, Caath, Amram, Moses. But arguments from the genealogies are apt to be misleading as intervening members are freely omitted as exemplified in Mt ch 1 and in Esd 7:1-5 compared with 1 Par 6:1-14.

That Joseph was elevated to high rank in Egypt and his father and family so well received suggests that the Hyksos (§ 118k-l) were ruling at the beginning of the Israelite sojourn in that country. This would date the descent into Egypt in the period c 1720-1580. The Pharaoh who 'knew not Joseph', Ex 1:8, no doubt belonged to a later dynasty of native Egyptian kings who would feel no gratitude for benefits conferred under the rule of the Asiatic invaders. On the other hand Gen 43:32 might suggest the opposite conclusion as the Hyksos would not be likely to share the Egyptian scruples of eating with foreigners. To this it may be answered that the Hyksos will have found it necessary 125f to accommodate themselves in many ways to the strong prejudices of the native population.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

g The date of Abraham could be fixed by an external synchronism if Amraphel, Gen 14:1, could be proved to be Hammurabi of Babylon and the date of the latter were definitely known. We have certainty on neither point. Opinion is hardening against the identification since the allied kings cannot be fitted into this period.

The date of Hammurabi is much lower than used to be 125g thought and is fixed with probability as 1728-1686, R. de Vaux, O.P., RB 53 (1946) 343, W. F. Albright, BASOR 88 (1942) 28 ff.; 106 (1947) 19. See also H. H. Rowley, Recent Discovery and the Patriarchal Age, reprint from BJRL 32 (1949); From Joseph to Joshua, 57 ff. On this as on other matters the future may set us in possession of fuller knowledge.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

TABLE OF DATES

Egyptian Dynasties

THE XV AND XVI DYNASTIES (HYKSOS)

c 1720-1580
c 1580 Expulsion of the Hyksos

THE XVIII DYNASTY

1580-1558 Amasis (Amosis)
1558-1545 Amenophis I
1545-1514 Thothmes I
1514-1501 Thothmes II
1501-1479 Hatshepsut
1479 (1501-1447) Thothmes III
1447-1420 Amenophis II
1420-1412 Thothmes IV
1412-1376 Amenophis III
1380-1362 Amenophis IV (Akhenaton)
1362-1360 Smenkhkara
1360-1350 Tutankhamen
1350-1346 Kheperkhepuarimaatra

THE XIX DYNASTY

1346-1322 Horemheb
1321 Ramses I
1321-1300 Seti I
1300-1233 Ramses II
1233-1223 Merenptah
1223-1220 Amenmeses (Amonmose)
1220-1214 Ramses-Siptah
1214-1210 Seti II

Hebrew History

c 1050-1012 Samuel ; Saul c 1012-972 David c 972 - 931 Solomon

Judah

931-913 Roboam
913-911/10 Abiam

911/10-870/69 Asa

870/69-848 Josaphat

848-841 Joram
841 Ochozias
841-835 Athalia
835-796 Joas

Israel

931-910/9 Jeroboam

910/9-909/8 Nadab
909/8-886/5 Baasa
886/5-885 Ela
885 Zambri
885-884/3 Amri (Omri)
884/3-853 Achab

853-852 Ochozias
852-841 Joram

841-814/3 Jechu

814/3-798 Joachaz
798-782/1 Joas

Notable Events

925 Shishak (Sheshonk I) invades Judah
913 The 18th year of Jeroboam by Judahite reckoning, the 19th by Israelite

873 Asa's 38th year Josaphat becomes co-regent
858-824 Shalmaneser III
854 Joram of Judah becomes co-regent 853 Battle of Qarqar in Achab's last year

841 Jechu kills Joram of Israel and Ochozias of Judah on the same day ; he pays tribute to Shalmaneser III

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Judah	Israel	Notable Events
796-768 Amasias		793 Jeroboam II becomes co-regent 791 Azarias becomes co-regent
768-740/39 Azarias	782/1-753 Jeroboam II
	753-752 Zacharias	753 Joatham becomes co-regent
	752-752/1 Sellum	745-727 Tiglath-pileser (Phul)
	752/1-742/1 Manahem	743 (?) He receives tribute from Manahem
740/39-736/5 Joatham	742/1-740/39 Phaccia
736/5-727 Achaz	740/39-730/29 Phacee	740/39 Death of Azarias (Ozias) ; call of Isaias 735 Rasin of Damascus and Phacee attack Achaz 734 Tiglath-pileser's expedition against Philistia 733 and 732 His campaigns against Damascus
727-698/7 Ezechias	730/29-721 Osee	727-722 Shalmaneser V 724 He begins the siege of Samaria 722-705 Sargon II
	721 Destruction of Samaria ; end of the Northern Kingdom
698/7-643/2 Manasses		714 The cure of Ezechias and mission of Mero-dachbaladan (Marduk-apal-iddin of Babylon, 722-711) 705-681 Sennacherib 701 He invades Judah 680-669 Esarhaddon who names Manasses among his subject kings
643/2-641/0 Amon
641/0-609 Josias		628 Jeremias begins his mission 625-604 Nabopolassar 623/2 The finding of the book of the Law 612 Fall of Nineveh ; virtual end of the Assyrian Empire
609 Joachaz		609 Death of Josias defeated at Megiddo by Necho of Egypt (610-594)
609-598 Joakim		605-561 Nabuchodonosor 604 Nabuchodonosor's 1st regnal year from 1 Nisan
598 Joachin		598 Captivity of Joachin
598-587 Sedecias		589 Jan. 15. Beginning of the siege of Jerusalem 588 Imprisonment of Jeremias
587 End of the Kingdom of Judah ; deportation of Sedecias		587 Fall of Jerusalem ; Babylonian captivity
		574/3 The 25th year of Joachin's captivity and 14th from the fall of Jerusalem, Ez 40:1 561-560 Evil-Merodach (Awel-Marduk) 561 Joachin is released from prison 560-556 Neriglissar (Nergal-shar-usur) of Babylon 556 Labashi-Marduk 556-539 Nabonidus ; Belshazzar

THE PERSIAN EMPIRE

538/7 Decree of Cyrus permitting the return of the Jews	559-529 Cyrus
537/6 The foundations of the temple are laid	539 The beginning of the attack on Babylon 538 Cyrus captures Babylon
	529-522 Cambyses 521-486 Darius I Hystaspes
520/19 Work is resumed on the temple
515 Dedication of the temple	485-465 Xerxes I (Ahasuerus) 464-424 Artaxerxes I Longimanus
458 Return under Esdras
445 Return of Nehemias	424 Xerxes II 424 Sogdianus
433 Nehemias goes back to Susa	423-404 Darius II Nothus
433/2 His second visit to Jerusalem	404-358 Artaxerxes II Mnemon 358-338 Artaxerxes III Ochus 338-336 Arsēs 336-330 Darius III Codomannus 333 His defeat by Alexander

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

THE EARLIER SELEUCID KINGS

312-280	Seleucus I Nicator	163-162	Antiochus V Eupator
280-262/1	Antiochus I Soter	162-150	Demetrius I Soter
261-247	Antiochus II Theos	150-145	Alexander Balas
247-226	Seleucus II Callinicus
226-223	Seleucus III Soter	145-139/8	Demetrius II Nicator
223-187	Antiochus III the Great	145-142/1	Antiochus VI Epiphanes
187-175	Seleucus IV Philopator	139/8-129	Antiochus VII Sidetes
175-163	Antiochus IV Epiphanes

THE EARLIER PTOLEMIES

323-283	Ptolemy I Soter
285-246	Ptolemy II Philadelphus (partly co-reign)
246-221	Ptolemy III Euergetes
221-203	Ptolemy IV Philopator
203-181/0	Ptolemy V Epiphanes
181/0-145	Ptolemy VI Philometor
145-116	Ptolemy VII Euergetes

NOTE 1—The first year given for the Hebrew kings is that of their accession, for the Persian kings that of their first regnal year. Two dates separated by a slanting line mean that the accession or other event occurred between Tishri of the first-named year and Nisan of the following year.

NOTE 2—For the chronology of the reign of Nabonidus and end of the Babylonian empire see Babylonian Historical Texts, by Sidney Smith, London 1924, esp. 107-10.

NOTE 3—For the detailed chronology of the Maccabean age see § 560a-b.

INTRODUCTION TO THE PENTATEUCH

By E. F. SUTCLIFFE, S.J.

with a section on

SOME RECENT CATHOLIC VIEWPOINTS

By R. A. DYSON, S.J.

126 Bibliography—R. Cornely, S.J., Introd. in U.T. Libros Sacros II i (Parisii, 1887) 3-169 (CSS); *W. Möller, Are the Critics Right? (London, 1903); G. Hoberg, Moses und der Pentateuch (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1905) = BS X iv; L. Méchineau, S.J., L'Origine mosaïque du Pentateuque (Paris, 1905⁴); E. Mangenot, L'Authenticité mosaïque du Pentateuque (Paris, 1907) and 'Pentateuch' DBV v 50-119; S.T.B., Archbishop Smith and the Mosaic Authorship of the Pentateuch (Aberdeen, 1911); *H. M. Wiener, Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism (London, 1910); and Pentateuchal Studies (London, 1912); *J. Dahse, Is a Revolution in Pentateuchal Criticism at Hand? (London, 1912); F. E. Gigot, The Message of Moses and Modern Higher Criticism (New York, 1915); F. X. Kugler, S.J., 'Zum Alter der wichtigsten bürgerlichen und kultischen Gesetzesbestimmungen des Pentateuch, insbesondere des sog. Priesterkodex' in Von Moses bis Paulus (Münster in Westf., 1922) 36-133; *E. Naville, The Higher Criticism in relation to the Pentateuch (Edinburgh, 1923); J. Goettsberger, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1928) 13-117; A. Bea, S.J., De Pentateucho (Romae, 1933⁴) = Institutiones Biblicae II i and 'Der heutige Stand der Pentateuchfrage' Bi 16 (1935) 175-200; J. Coppens, L'Histoire Critique de l'Ancien Testament (Tournai-Paris, 1938)—English trans. with new material up to 1940, The Old Testament and the Critics trans. by E. A. Ryan, S.J. and E. W. Tribbe, S.J. (Paterson, N.J., 1943); H. Hoepfl, O.S.B., 'Pentateuque et Hexateuque' DAFC III 1883-1920.

127 Names—The five books of Moses are commonly referred to as the Pentateuch, a word which signifies a book composed of five rolls. The second element of the word, viz. τεῦχος, originally meant a container or case for holding a manuscript roll and later came to stand for the roll which the case contained. It is used in this sense in The Letter of Aristaeas, 179. In the Letter to Flora from Ptolemy, a Gnostic of the 2nd cent. A.D., is found the first occurrence of 'the Pentateuch of Moses' (ἡ Μωσέως πεντάτευχος). The letter has been preserved by Epiphanius, Adv. Haereses 33, 4, 1, PG 41, 560. From the Greeks the name passed to the Latin writers and was used by Tertullian early in the 3rd cent., Adv. Marcionem 1, 10, PL 2, 257. The fivefold division itself is attested about two centuries earlier, as Philo, De Abraham 1, speaks of Genesis as the first of 'five books'.

In the NT the Pent. is called 'the book of the Law' Gal 3:10; 'the Law' Rom 3:21; 'the Law of Moses' Lk 24:44. The expression 'the Law of the Lord', Lk 2:23, may be, not the designation of the Pent., but a reference to the legislation it contains. As the Pent. contains much historical material, these appellations indicate which of the two elements, history and law, was most esteemed.

In the OT the Pent. is called 'the book of the Law of Yahweh' 2 Par 17:9; 'the book of the Law of Moses' Neh 8:1; 'the Law of Moses' 2 Par 23:18; 'the book of Moses' Neh 13:1, where the Lucianic recension of LXX has 'the book of the Law of Moses'; and in Neh 8:2 it is simply 'the Law'.

The names of the five books in DV, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy, are either adopted or adapted or translated from Vg, which itself acquired the names in the same way from the LXX; see §§ 136c, 162c, 182b, 196b, 210b. The Hebrew names, which are taken from the opening words of the different books, are added in Vg as transcribed by St Jerome in his Prologus Galeatus or preface to the Books of Kings.

Contents—The Pent. contains the religious history of the chosen people and of their ancestors traced from the creation of the first man to the death of Moses, and secondly, the laws, religious and social, of their theocratic system. Genesis indicates the line of descent from Adam to Abraham, and then narrates at length the history of this patriarch, of Isaac, of Jacob and his sons, and ends with the death of Joseph in Egypt. It is the necessary introduction to the other books, as it relates God's promise that Canaan was to be the possession of Abraham's descendants and explains how the Israelites came to be living in Egypt. Exodus continues the story with an account of the oppression of the Israelites in Egypt, the call of Moses, his liberation of the people, the Covenant at Sinai, and ends with the setting up of the Tabernacle in the first month of the second year after the departure from Egypt. Leviticus contains very little narrative and ends with the people still at Sinai. The Book of Numbers gives the remainder of the story up to the fortieth year. It opens with the numbering of the people preparatory to the departure from Sinai and ends with their encampment in the plain opposite Jericho. Deuteronomy like Leviticus has little narrative. The Covenant with God is renewed before the entry into Canaan, and the history ends with the death of Moses on Mount Nebo after he had seen the promised land he was not allowed to enter.

Of the legislation Genesis contains the law given to Noe after the Flood, ch 9, and the law of circumcision given to Abraham, ch 17. The laws in Ex, Lev and Num up to 10:10 were given at Mount Sinai, Lev 26:45; 27:34. Those in the rest of Num date from various times during the wandering in the desert, and the laws of Deut are a repetition and modification of previous legislation given by Moses in immediate preparation for the passage of the Jordan into the land of promise. This summary does not exclude the addition of laws in post-Mosaic times, cf. § 134d-g.

Certain collections of laws may be distinguished as the Decalogue, Ex 20:3-17, and its repetition, Deut 5:7-21. The initial legislation at Mount Sinai is given in the Book of the Covenant, Ex 24:7, from Ex 20:23 to 23:19. Collections of laws appertaining to the Sanctuary, the sacrifices and the priesthood are given in Ex 25-30; Lev 1-8, 10, 12-16, 21-24, 27; Num 15, 18-19, 28-9. The law of Deut. is given in chh 12-26.

Moses; His Life and Achievements—As Moses was the author of the Pent. (with due allowance for later additions and modifications; see § 134), it will be convenient to gather here the main facts about his life, achievements and character. His birth fell during the period of oppression in Egypt. The fact that his life was saved through the pity of Pharaoh's daughter and that she adopted him as a son, Ex 2:1-10, ensured for him the best home and education possible in Egypt at the time and far superior to what would have been his, had he passed his youth among his own people. The Egyptians were a highly civilized nation. They had a keen eye for beauty and remarkable skill in the arts of 129a sculpture and architecture. They had an abundant literature and were famous in the Near East for their wisdom. It was in the highest circles of this refined society that Moses passed his youth. Thus alone of the Israelites he 'was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians', Acts 7:22. This of itself must have won him pre-eminence among his countrymen, but he had it in him besides to become, as St Stephen put it, ibid., 'mighty in his words and in his deeds'. Not that he had any natural gift of eloquence. On the contrary, as St Paul's speech was called 'contemptible', 2 Cor 10:10, so Moses described himself as 'heavy of mouth and heavy of tongue', Ex 4:10. He suffered in fact from some impediment of speech, cf. Ex 6:12. Aaron, his brother, had to be his 'mouth' and 'speak in his stead to the people', Ex 4:16. But many years were to pass before he had to teach and guide his fellow-Israelites.

127

128

129a

b His life falls into three periods, to each of which are assigned forty years. He was forty years old, Acts 7:23, 'when it came into his heart to visit his brethren'. He was 'eighty years old' when he went with Aaron to speak with Pharaoh, Ex 7:7. And he was 'a hundred and twenty years old' at the time of his death, Deut 31:2. According to these figures he spent forty years of private life, of which little is recorded, forty years as a fugitive in Midian, and forty years as leader of his people, all, except the period of struggle with Pharaoh, spent in the long wandering from Egypt to Canaan. This schematism combined with the Hebrew use of forty as a round and only approximate number shows that the figures are not meant to be exact. It will be recalled that in the same way forty years are assigned to the reigns of the three successive kings, Saul, David and Solomon; see § 124f. It should be added that the records indicate that with all their culture and knowledge the Egyptians do not seem to have had a knowledge of their true ages; see § 161e. The meaning of the figures, therefore, may be taken to be that Moses had reached an age at which he could be expected to act with authority when he attempted to intervene in the struggle between the Israelites, Ex 2:13, that he was long absent in Midian, and had reached an advanced age at the time of his death.

c The second period of Moses' life began with his flight from Egypt to Midian. This was necessitated by Pharaoh's determination to kill him for having slain an Egyptian in defence of one of his fellow-countrymen, Ex 2:11 f., 15. The personal courage he had shown on that occasion led him to defend the shepherd daughters of Jethro, the priest of Midian, against the violence of an unspecified number of men. The sequel of this bold act of kindness was his marriage with Sephora, who was one of the seven daughters. In appearance Moses was at this time an Egyptian and was taken to be such, Ex 2:19. Further, he was not true to the religious practices of his people, as an obscure narration makes it plain that he omitted the circumcision of one at least of his two sons, Ex 4:24-26, perhaps out of a fear of displeasing his wife. The fidelity of the story to fact is illustrated by the mention of Moses' marriage with a foreign woman and his neglect of circumcision. If the story had been written or edited in later ages with the purpose of edification at all costs, these facts, which did not make for the honour of the great lawgiver, would have been omitted. The same is true of his second marriage, which was with an Ethiopian (Cushite), Num 12:1, for this woman can hardly be identified with Sephora. This marriage was resented by Mary, Moses' sister, and by Aaron.

While living in Midian Moses took charge of his father-in-law's 'flock', Ex 3:1, which may have been of sheep or goats or, indeed, of both together. He thus belongs to the list of famous shepherds and goatherds, in which are the names of Jacob, David and Amos. Later, it was on Jethro's advice that Moses eased his burden of government by appointing rulers over sections of the people to judge the easier cases, Ex 18:13-26.

d The third period began with the divine mission to return to Egypt to free his people. This charge was given in the vision of the Burning Bush, Ex 3-4. There is still discussion whether God then revealed his sacred name of Yahweh for the first time, Ex 3:15. The text strongly suggests that Moses knew or suspected that God was known among his countrymen by a name that was unknown to him. He had lived all his life away from them, at the court of Pharaoh's daughter and in Midian. He seems to have foreseen incredulity if he could not tell his people the name of God who had sent him. 'Lo, I shall go to the children of Israel and say to them: The God of your fathers hath sent me to you. If they should say to me: What is his name? what shall I say to them?', Ex 3:13. If, in answer to this question, he had given a name that the Israelites had never heard before, it would have been an obstacle to the acceptance of his mission. If this is correct, it is evidence of what would be expected, viz. that Moses was not well-informed about the religion of his people. Apart from the liberation from Egypt, Ex 5-12, the story of the remainder of Moses' life is that of the forty years' sojourn in the wilderness and its main outline is too well known to be summarized here. But something must be said of his troubles, his faults, and his virtues. His task was certainly a formidable one, for he had to bear the burden of a 'stiff-necked' people, Ex 32:9; 33:3, 5; 34:9; Deut 9:6, 13; 10:16. In spite of the miracles they had seen wrought on their behalf in Egypt they lacked trust in God and were constantly murmuring and complaining, for lack of water, Ex 15:24; 17:3; Num 20:5, of food, Ex 16:3; see also Num 11:1; 21:5. On one occasion the people so far forgot their indebtedness to Moses that he had reason to fear for his life: 'Yet a little more and they will stone me' Ex 17:4. And it was not only the common people who proved so ungrateful. Even those nearest and dearest to him, from whom he had the right to look for support and encouragement, found fault with and gave way to jealousy against him, as did Mary and Aaron, Num 12:1 f. On another occasion there was even open rebellion under the leadership of Core, Dathan and Abiron, Num 16. And although God vindicated his servant by the speedy punishment of the offenders, such ingratitude and opposition must have caused him great distress. Other instances of such opposition and murmuring are related Ex 2:14; 5:21; 6:9; 14:11 f.; Num 14:2 f.

Even more distressing to Moses than these personal affronts were the lack of trust in God and the grave breaches of his commandments. 'The Lord said to Moses: How long will this people contemn me? how long will they not believe in me for all the signs that I have wrought in the midst of them?', Num 14:11. Very soon after receiving the decalogue and with the portents of Egypt fresh in their minds, while Moses was yet in the mountain with God, they violated the precept never to make a graven image, and set up the golden calf: 'This is thy God, O Israel, who has brought thee up out of the land of Israel', Ex 32:4; cf. 20:4. And not only did the people thus transgress, but even Aaron set up an altar before the image and proclaimed 'Tomorrow will be the feast in honour of Yahweh', Ex 32:5. But far worse was to follow. When the people were shortly to enter the promised land, they took to fornication with the daughters of Moab, and when invited to the sacrifices of their gods 'the people did eat and adored their gods', Num 25:2. It cannot have been a surprise though it must have been heartbreaking to Moses, when shortly before his death and the end of the long pilgrimage in the desert God announced to him: 'Behold thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, and this people will rise up and go fornicating after strange gods in the land to which it goeth in to dwell: they will forsake me, and will make void the covenant, which I have made with them', Deut 31:16.

No wonder that the burden on Moses' shoulder seemed at times more than he could bear. He made his complaint to God: 'Why hast thou afflicted thy servant: wherefore do I not find favour before thee: and why 129g hast thou laid the weight of all this people upon me? . . . I am not able alone to bear all this people, because it is too heavy for me', Num 11:11, 14. So intense was his affliction that death seemed preferable: 'I beseech thee to kill me, and let me find grace in thy eyes, that I be not afflicted with so great evils', Num 11:15. So to speak was no sign of virtue in Moses; but the fault, if in the anguish of his soul fault there was, was slight and received no rebuke from God, who on the contrary arranged for the easing of Moses' burden, vv 16 f. On a previous occasion when Moses showed pusillanimity and lack of trust in God in almost refusing the mission to liberate Israel, God was angry with him, Ex 4:14.

h Here it may be remarked how frankly and humbly Moses relates his own weaknesses and shortcomings. In addition to the examples mentioned in the last paragraph there is the confession of his failure to circumcise his son, Ex 4:24 ff., and the offence which so displeased God as to merit Moses' exclusion from the land of promise. To this, allusion is made on several occasions, Num 20:12; 27:14; Deut 1:37; 3:27; 31:2; 32:52; 34:4 (probably post-Mosaic). From Num 20:12 'Because you have not trusted me' and Num 27:14 'because you were rebellious against my command' it appears that the fault of Moses was a failure to carry out the divine command just as it was given to him, the failure being due to a lack of trust based perhaps on the unworthiness of the people. Ps 105 (106) 33 in its allusion to this incident further charges Moses with having 'spoken rashly with his lips', a reference to Moses' reprehension of the people, Num 20:10. God had ordered Moses to 'speak to the rock', Num 20:8. This he did not do. Instead he struck the rock twice. Both in Deut 1:37 and 3:26 Moses tells the people that God was angry with him on their account. That is to say that it was the obstinacy and rebelliousness of the people which occasioned Moses' fault.

i This constant recurrence to his shortcomings is a sign of great virtue in Moses. He was completely devoid of the spirit of pride. His spirit of forgiveness is illustrated by his prayer to God to heal his sister Mary of leprosy although it was inflicted on her in punishment of her envy of him and evil talk against him, Num 12:13. This same forgiving spirit and at the same time unbounded devotion to his people is manifested in his petitions to God to spare them after some of their gravest transgressions. Thus after the worship of the golden calf he prayed: 'Either forgive them this trespass; or if thou do not, strike me out of the book that thou hast written', Ex 32:31 f. The doctrine of eternal bliss with God had not been revealed, and the book of which Moses speaks is 'the book of the living' (cf. Ps 68 [69] 29), that is of those alive in this world. He prays to die if God will not spare his people. He had the same great spirit which led St Paul in the same sense to desire to be an anathema for his brethren, Rom 9:3. See St Jerome, Ep. ad Algasia 121, qu. 9 (PL 22, 1028). Num 14:19 f. records another successful prayer of Moses for the forgiveness of his people.

j On the subject of Moses' virtues a word must be said of Num 12:3: 'Moses was a man exceeding meek above all men that dwelt upon earth'. Accepting this to refer to 'meekness' some have argued that Moses could have written so of himself; others, as A Lapipe, have considered the sentence a later addition. In subsequent usage the word combined the double notion of suffering affliction with patience, but here it seems to refer merely to the multitude of Moses' troubles and afflictions. This is favoured by the context which treats of the hostility of Mary and Aaron, those nearest and dearest to the great legislator. An allied word has the bare sense of 'affliction' in Ex 3:7 and Deut 16:3, and another allied word has the meaning of 'in distressed circumstances' 'needy' in Deut 24:12, 14 f. This is not, of course, to say that Moses was not meek, as his ready forgiveness in this very instance shows that he was. Just anger is not opposed to meekness and Moses often had occasion to manifest it, Ex 11:9; Lev 10:16; Ex 32:19.

Moses' supernatural privileges may be briefly referred to. He was a prophet, that is, one commissioned to speak in the name of, and with the authority of God: 'I shall be in thy mouth', Ex 4:15; see § 409e. And he speaks of himself as a prophet in the passage where he foretells that God will send Israel a succession of prophets to end with Christ: 'The Lord thy God will raise up to thee a prophet of thy nation and of thy brethren like unto me', Deut 18:15. As a prophet God himself set Moses above all others: 'If there be among you a prophet of the Lord, I will appear to him in a vision, or I will speak to him in a dream. But it is not so with my servant Moses, who is most faithful in all my house; for I speak to him mouth to mouth, and plainly and not by riddles and figures doth he see the Lord' (MT 'not by riddles, and the form of the Lord doth he see') Num 12:6-8. So Ex 33:11 'The Lord used to speak to Moses face to face, as a man is wont to speak to his friend'. Moses did not, of course, see God as he is in himself, but in some familiar apparition. When he came forth from these intimate colloquies with God, Moses' 'face was horned', Ex 34:29-35. That is, the effulgence of God's presence caused the prophet's face to shine with beams or rays of light, which are metaphorically called horns. On two occasions Moses was forty days and forty nights alone with God in the mountain, and on neither occasion did he either eat or drink; Ex 24:18 with Deut 9:9 describe the first occasion and Ex 34:28 the second. On Moses' office as a miracle-worker and as a law-giver it is not necessary to dilate, as the last four books of the Pentateuch bear ample witness to his power and authority in both respects.

Such then was Moses—prophet, miracle-worker, legislator, friend of God, leader of his people. He may justly be called the second father of his race and its founder as a nation. He freed them from the bondage of Egypt, ruled them in the wilderness, gave them a religious and social code that bound them in a close federal unity. But even he was not allowed to set foot on the soil of the promised land to which he led his nation. Such is God's displeasure at any breach of his holy law that this great and virtuous man was condemned to die in sight of the land he had so long desired.

Mosaic Authorship—It has long been recognized that the Pent. has not come down to us precisely as it left the hand of Moses and that apart from the errors of copyists it has received additions and modifications. For instance, Cornelius a Lapipe, who died in 1637, wrote in his preface to the Pent. that 'Moses wrote the Pentateuch simply by way of a diary or annals, but Josue or someone similar put these annals of Moses into order, divided them up, and added and inserted some sentences'. So when the Mosaic authorship is spoken of, it must be borne in mind that the authorship meant is that of the work as a whole with allowance for subsequent modifications, for which see § 134.

There are various references in the Pentateuch to Moses' literary activity. Moses is ordered by God to write down an account of the destruction of Amalec, Ex 17:14. This refers to Ex 17:8-13. 'Moses wrote down all the words of the Lord', Ex 24:4, and what these were is made plain in 24:7 'Taking the book of the covenant he read it in the hearing of the people'. The exact limits of this 'book' or document are not easy to define and are variously set, by Hoberg 20-23, by Goettsberger 20:22-23:19, by Bea 20:23-23:33. After the defection of the people in worshipping the golden calf and the subsequent renewal of the covenant God again ordered Moses: 'Write thee these words by which I have made a covenant both with thee and with Israel', Ex 34:27. This refers to 34:10-26. Num 33:2 records that Moses wrote down the places of encampment from the time of the departure from Egypt. The list follows in the same chapter. 'Moses wrote this law', Deut 31:9, 24, and ordered it to be kept c What is to be concluded from these passages? In the first place, Moses is shown to have been not only a legislator but also a writer. But the question is how much did he write? A logical person may argue: as these texts explicitly testify that Moses wrote certain parts of the Pent., so they implicitly testify that he did not write those parts which are not attributed to him. This argument is guilty of the fallacy of interpreting these ancient oriental documents in accordance with our own modern western habits of mind. It is not probable that Moses wrote the whole Pent. in the plains of Moab shortly before his death. It is far more likely that he wrote different parts of it at different times during the course of the forty years' journeyings. In such protracted literary work it is in accordance with psychology that he should think at times of saying what at other times he did not think of saying. Moreover, it is one of the commonest literary devices in biblical style to use the sensus praecisus, that is, a manner of writing which is concerned to express the truth of the statement in hand without any implication as to its being the whole truth or not. Thus it is said that Joseph 'knew her not till she brought forth her first-born son', Mt 1:25, where nothing is implied as to their future relations; cf. Ps 109 (110) 1 'The Lord said to my Lord: Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thy enemies thy footstool', where it is not implied that the place of honour accorded up to the time of victory is thereafter to be withdrawn. In accordance with this mode of expression the explicit attribution of certain passages to Moses does not deny him also the authorship of others.

180b with the Ark, v 26. The Canticle given in Deut 32 is said to have been written by Moses, 31:22, at the command of God, 31:19.

d As regards the Canticle of Deut 32 the previous chapter implies that Moses not only composed it but also inserted it in the book that contained 'the words of this law', 31:24. It was to be a testimony against the children of Israel, who after entering into the promised land would despise God and make void his covenant, 31:19. Moses knew that he was soon to die and that Josue was to lead the people over Jordan, 31:23. Moses therefore completed the writing of his book and ordered it to be kept with the Ark, vv 24-26. This was not to be done immediately as Moses was first to read out to the people the words of the song he had composed, vv 27-30. The order of this narration shows that Moses set down his canticle in his book.

e The next question is what was this book in which Moses wrote 'the words of this law', Deut 31:24. DV following Vg has 'volume' here, that is, strictly speaking a roll, which is an undue narrowing of the meaning. M'gillāh is the Hebrew word for 'roll', and, although the sēper or 'book' had the form of a roll, the two words are not interchangeable, partly because the word sēper is used of any document, however short, and partly because a long book had to be written in several rolls. The book is referred to also Deut 28:58 'the words of this law that are written in this book'; and similar expressions occur 28:61 and 29:21 (MT 29:20). Moses commanded the priests to read 'the words of this law' before the people every seven years 'in the year of remission' at the feast of Tabernacles, 31:9-11. The observance of this law is recorded in the time of Nehemias, Neh 8:18: 'He read in the book of the law of God day by day, from the first day till the last'. Was the reading merely from Deut, or was it from the Pent. as a whole? There is no distinction of meaning between the two expressions 'the book of the law of God' and 'the law', which is used just before, Neh 8:14: 'They found written in the law that the Lord had commanded through Moses that the children of Israel should dwell in tabernacles on the feast in the seventh month'. The feast of Tabernacles is mentioned in Deut 16:13-16; 31:10-12; but there is no mention in these texts of dwelling in tabernacles or booths. This is prescribed exclusively in Lev 23:42 f. In the time, therefore, of Esdras and Nehemias 'this law' and 'the words of this law in a book', Deut 31:9, 24, were understood to refer to the legislation of the Pent. as a whole. In other words these texts were understood to record the writing by Moses of the legislation of the Pent. Moreover, the legislation and the narrative are so closely interwoven that to say Moses wrote the law is practically equivalent to saying that he wrote the Pent. as a whole. Indeed, the name of the Pent. in later times was simply the Law, the designation being taken from what was regarded as the most important element.

f At the beginning of Deut it is said that 'Moses took in hand to expound this law', 1:5. 'This law', or 'this Torah', refers to the laws contained in the previous books, just as the opening words of Deut refer back to all the discourses pronounced by Moses during the previous forty years. The geographical expressions which follow the sentence 'These are the words which Moses spoke to all Israel', 1:1, designate various places in the course of the forty years' wanderings. The word 'these' is retrospective just as it is in Num 36:13; and the opening sentence of Deut in this way joins this book to its predecessors. And just as 'these words' are those reported in the previous books, so 'this law' refers to the legislation there recorded.

g It is, perhaps, worth remarking in connection with the meaning of 'this law' that Goettsberger supposes Moses to have read the law to the people after he had finished writing it in a book, Deut 31:24. But what Moses read to the people was, not the law, but the Canticle of Deut 32: 'I will speak these words in their hearing, and will call heaven and earth to witness against them', 31:28. This alludes to the opening words of the Canticle, 'Hear, O ye heavens, the things I speak; let the earth give ear to the words of my mouth', 32:1. And the reason which Moses gives, 'For I know that after my death you will do wickedly . . . and evils shall come upon you in the latter times', 31:29, is amply illustrated in the Canticle, 32:5, 15 (on the prevarications); 32:20-25 (on the punishments). And finally, 31:30, 'Moses therefore spoke in the hearing of the whole assembly of Israel the words of this canticle', records the carrying out of the purpose mentioned just before, 31:28.

i In the law of the kingdom the king is ordered to have written out for him a copy of the law for his own use: 'After he is raised to the throne of his kingdom, he shall write out for himself a copy of this law in a volume from that of the priests of the Levitical tribe', Deut 17:18. It would be arbitrary to limit this to Deut. The king's office would demand a knowledge of the whole legislation.

j The prescription that 'the words of this law' were to be read publicly every seven years at the feast of Tabernacles, Deut 31:10 f., has been thought by some to imply the reading of something fairly short. But the limitation of the prescription to seven year intervals indicates that the obligation was an onerous one. The reading of the whole Pent. is not prescribed but only of the legislation. The purpose is stated explicitly, 31:12, 'that hearing they may learn, and fear the Lord your God, and keep and fulfil all the words of this law'. Only those parts, therefore, had to be read publicly which concerned the people. Those prescribing the duties of priests and Levites could be omitted. The rest could easily be read within the week of the feast. It is recorded of Esdras that he read before the people 'from dawn (Heb. 'from the light') until midday', Neh 8:3; and the expression 'he read therein' implies that he read only selections. Compare the reading of the following day of fasting, Neh 9:3, when 'they read in the book of the law of the Lord their God'. This refers to the reading that took place on a single day.

k In this connection reference should be made, lastly, to the order given Deut 27:2 f.: 'When you are passed over the Jordan . . . thou shalt set up great stones and shalt plaster them with plaster, that thou mayst write on them all the words of this law';

130k cf. v 8. The execution of this is recorded Jos 8:32-35. Note v 32 'he [Josue] wrote there upon stones a copy of the law of Moses' (cf. Deut 17:18), and v 34 'after this he read all the words of the law, the blessing and the cursing, according to all that was written in the book of the law'. There are two questions here, (1) what was written on the stones, and (2) what did Josue read out to the people. The setting up of the stones was intended, not so much as a memorial of the law, as a public acknowledgement of its authority joined with an implicit undertaking to observe it. The injunction to set them up was given in an address of Moses and the elders of Israel to the people commencing with the admonition to 'keep every commandment that I command you this day', Deut 27:1. There is no reason, therefore, to suppose that among the laws written on the stones were those that did not concern the conduct of the people directly. Neither is it probable that the many laws which are set down twice, and even oftener, like the law concerning the Pasch and the use of leaven, were written more than once on the stones. With these omissions there would be no great difficulty in writing the law of Moses on a number of great stones. The law of Hammurabi was carved on a stone, and as Goettsberger reminds us, 'this was not less extensive than the law of Moses'. The second question, what was read to the people at Josue's command, is secondary, partly because the biblical use of the word 'all' is not so exact as in our usage, and partly because in spite of its obscurity the text seems only to mean that Josue had carried out the law or commandment of Moses recorded Deut 27:11-26, and had the cursings read in the words prescribed in the law there given. To these may have been added the blessings given in Deut 28, or perhaps with Fernandez 'it may be said that the blessings are implied in the curses as contraries', Comm. in Josue (CSS, 1938) 126.

131a Jos and Kings speak of the law of Moses as written in a book—'The book of this law', Jos 1:8, is spoken of as equivalent to 'all the law which Moses my servant hath commanded thee' of the previous verse; 'as . . . it is written in the book of the law of Moses', 8:31; 'all things that are written in the book of the law of Moses', 23:6. Also 'as it is written in the law of Moses', 3 Kg 2:3; and Deut 24:16 is quoted 4 Kg 14:6 as 'written in the book of the law of Moses'. Such texts leave no doubt that Moses drew up a code of law which existed in writing, but they do not of themselves demonstrate that Moses was the author of the whole Pent. They do not amount to a demonstration, but in view of the evidence of the Pent. itself their natural meaning is that Moses was its author, a meaning which should not be rejected in the absence of convincing evidence to the contrary. The correctness of this interpretation is further evidenced by the close connection between the narrative and the legislative parts of the Pent. In a large measure the narrative prepares for the legislation and gives it its setting. The force of these allusions to the law of Moses, it may be added, is illustrated by the endeavour of those who deny the Mosaic authorship of the Pent. to treat them as glosses and later additions. If there had been an attempt to put back into a distant past a late belief in the Mosaic authorship, I think it is safe to say that it would have been carried through rather more energetically and above all in more explicit terms. The very fact that the allusions are not in themselves demonstrations goes to show that they were written by people with no ulterior motive.

b This brings us to the witness of the NT. Mk 12:26 attributes the words 'I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob', to 'the book of Moses'. These occur in the narrative Ex 3:6. Various passages of Lev are ascribed to Moses, Lev 12 on the purification of women in Lk 2:22; Lev 12:3 on circumcision in Jn 7:22; Lev 14 concerning the cleansing of a leper in Mt 8:4; Lev 20:10 on the punishment of an adulteress in Jn 8:5; in Rom 10:5 it is said by Paul that 'Moses wrote' a text of Lev 18:5.

St Stephen in Ac 7:37 attributes to Moses Deut 18:15; the Jews in Mt 19:7 ascribe to Moses the legislation about divorce in Deut 24 and our Lord's answer, Mt 19:8 makes the same attribution. Deut 25:4 about muzzling the ox is 'written in the law of Moses', 2 Cor 9:9. Deut 25:5, which gives the Levirate law, is said to have been written by Moses, Mk 12:19; Lk 20:28.

Philip, Jn 1:45, says that 'Moses in the law . . . did write' about the Messiah; and, more important, Christ himself, Jn 5:46, said to the Jews, 'If you did believe Moses, you would believe me also, for he wrote of me'. (The 'perhaps' of DV in this text is due to a peculiarity of the Vg rendering of conditional sentences, and is best omitted in English.) According to the belief of the Jews, therefore, corroborated by our Lord, Moses was the writer of Messianic passages in the Pent. These are Gen 3:15; 12:3 and parallels 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14; further Gen 49:10; Deut 18:15. Our Lord is here basing his claim to a supernatural mission on the witness borne to him by Moses, not merely, be it noted, on the witness in itself, but on the witness as being the witness of Moses. Christ would not base so important a dogmatic truth on a false premiss. First Christ appealed to the testimony of John the Baptist, vv 32-35, then to that of 'the Father himself', v 37, and finally to that of Moses. He is speaking of the person Moses, in whom the Jews put their trust, v 45, and it is the person Moses who accuses them, ibid.

Among both Jews and Christians tradition has always been in harmony with this testimony of Scripture. On the Jews see Bea 18 f., and on the Fathers Hoberg, 71 f. It must suffice here to mention two prominent Jewish writers of the first Christian century. Both Philo, De Vita Mosi, ed. Cohn 4 (1902) 267 f., and Josephus, Ant. 4, 8, 48, consider Moses to have written even the account of his own death. According to Josephus he was moved to write it out of fear lest the greatness of his fame might lead men rashly to say that he had departed to God.

The Pent. contains internal evidence that it was composed at the time and under the conditions which Mosaic authorship postulates. This is only to be expected from the historical testimony examined above. It also presents not a few texts which taken alone would suggest a later date. Considered, however, in the light of all the evidence such texts show the presence of later additions and modifications.

The writer is more familiar with Egypt than with Canaan. Places in Egypt are mentioned without explanation, as the city of On (Heliopolis), Gen 41:45, the land of Gessen (Goshen), Gen 46:28, Socoth (Succoth), Ex 13:20, Phihahiroth, Ex 14:2. On the other hand, of Qiryath-arba it is added that it is 'in the land of Canaan', Gen 23:2, and similarly of Mambre, where Abraham buried Sara, Gen 23:19. The same information is added about Shechem, Gen 33:18, and about Luza (Bethel), Gen 35:6. The situation of mounts Garizim (Gerizim) and Hebal (Ebal) is described in Deut 11:30. Again, to give an idea of the fertility of the country round about Jordan reference is made to Egypt as better known, Gen 13:10, and the date of the foundation of Hebron is fixed by that of Tanis (Zoan), Num 13:23. The prohibition to act 'according to the custom of the land of Egypt in which you dwell', Lev 18:3, is explicable only if it dates from a time not too distant from the delivery from that country. And the time is further fixed by the accompanying prohibition to act according to the customs of Canaan 'into which I will bring you', ibid. Similarly Ex 20:12; Deut 5:16; 17:14. Some laws are given explicitly to be observed after entry into the promised land, Num 15:2, 18. Other laws again clearly suppose that the people are living in camp. Lev 16:26 f. prescribes what is to be done to the scapegoat outside the camp and what are the conditions of re-entry into the camp. Then there are all the prescriptions laying down what is to be done in moving camp, Num 4:4 ff. The law ordering any ox, sheep or goat that was killed, 181f to be offered 'at the door of the tabernacle an oblation to the Lord', Lev 17:3 f., could only be observed under the conditions of camp life. Once the people were scattered through Canaan its observance would clearly be impossible. On the Egyptian colouring in the Pent. reference may be made to *A. S. Yahuda, The Language of the Pentateuch in its relation to Egyptian I (1933), and by the same author, The Accuracy of the Bible (1934).

182a Characteristics of the Pentateuch—Several important facts tend to be overlooked which are essential for the formation of a judgement of the Pent. as a piece of literature. In the first place, its composition extended over some forty years. Such a long period of time quite apart from differences of subject-matter could hardly fail to introduce differences of language, style and view-point. Then, Moses was not young when he led Israel to Sinai and he was a very old man when he arrived with the people in the country opposite Jericho. Repetition and fullness of style were characteristic of his people, and such characteristics would be emphasized in the style of an old man. Thirdly, not only is the Pent. an ancient and an oriental book, which it is quite unscientific to judge by the standards applicable to modern and western literature, it is further, in its own line, pioneer work. The marvel is that it is as perfect a production as we find it to be. No ancient literature has an historical work of similar compass which can be compared to it. And of course through divine inspiration God made use of human instruments as he found them. He did not interfere with their natural modes of thought, of speech, of style. Considered, therefore, simply on the plane of human achievement Moses wrote a truly remarkable work, which must take pride of place in any history of world literature.

b Perhaps the most striking feature of the Pent. is the mixture of historical and legislative elements. It contains the laws of Israel and yet cannot be called a legal handbook or code. The narrative gives the setting of the legislation and sometimes its historical occasion, Num 27:1 ff.; 36:1 ff. But the narrative does not exist simply to illustrate the historical origin and growth of the legislation. It has, besides, its independent purpose to give a record of God's dealings with his people. The Pent., therefore, has a double thread, of historical narrative and of legal enactment.

c Whereas more often the legislation fits naturally into its historical setting as do the Sinaitic laws, and cf. Num 27 and 36, sometimes there is no apparent connexion and the transition from narrative to law is extremely abrupt; cf. Num 15:1 ff. after 14:45, and 15:37-41 after 15:32-36. Contrary to the principle of grouping, such passages give the impression of having been slipped in without regard to the context. In the narrative portion such an abrupt insertion is found in Ex 9:30 f. This account of what the hail had or had not damaged in the fields of Egypt differs in spirit and style from the rest of the passage.

d In the narrative the primary purpose is not to record history as such. The record aims at giving the religious history of Israel, and there is consequently no mention of much that we moderns would like to know. The governing principle is the religious interest. One result of this is that the story is left with rough edges. For example, Saphira and her sons are with Moses in his journey from Midian to Egypt and are mentioned on account of the mysterious incident connected with the circumcision of one of them, Ex 4:20, 24-26. There is no mention of their having left Moses. This is learnt incidentally from Ex 18:2 ff. Another result is that chronological order is not rigidly adhered to. As in the case of Mt, within a broad framework which is definitely chronological, the details are sometimes arranged according to some other principle, for instance, common subject matter. Num 9:1 ff. is dated in the first month of the second year after the delivery from Egypt, whereas Num 1:1 is dated the first day of the second month of the same year. Num 7:1 ff. is dated to the day that Moses set up the Tabernacle; according to Ex 40:2 this occurred on the first day of the first month, again of the same year. Ex 16:32-35 presents an example of the grouping of matter. First is recorded the command to lay up some manna for a memorial and secondly its execution by Aaron who put the required amount in the Tabernacle. This was in the second month of the first year after the delivery from Egypt, but the Tabernacle was not set up till the first month of the following year, Ex 40:2. Thirdly, it is added that the Israelites eat manna for forty years till they came to Canaan. But at this stage of their journey it was still anticipated that they were to enter almost at once on the conquest of that country.

There is no effort after brevity. On the contrary, repetition would seem to have been a cause of pleasure. In the following examples it is sometimes part only of a verse that is repeated: Deut 7:5, 25 and 12:3; 8:3 and 16; 1:10 and 10:22 and 28:62; 6:7-9 and 11:18-20; 12:6 and 17 f. and 14:23; 12:16 and 23 f. and 15:23; 27:2 and 4; 28:4 and 11; 31:6 and 8; 31:30 and 32:44. An example on a large scale but of a slightly different character is provided by Ex 25-31 and 35-39 which in general treat of the same matters, the Ark, the Tabernacle and the like, the first section as a narration of the divine commands, the second of their execution. Some repetitions may be due to the conflation of two sources or may be later non-Mosaic additions. See the commentaries on the mission of Moses in Exodus and on the rebellion of Core in Numbers.

As an illustration of the repetition and also of the development of laws may be taken those relative to the first-born males of beasts. Immediately after the deliverance from Egypt God claims as his own every firstborn, Ex 13:2. Moses then transmits the divine command to the people, 13:11-16. When they arrive in Canaan the firstborn of the male sex is to be consecrated to the Lord. The firstborn of an ass is to be changed for a lamb or a kid (the word seh is applicable to both); otherwise it is to be killed. And the Israelites must hand on to their posterity the reason for this rite, namely that God delivered his people from Egypt by slaying all the firstborn of the land. The law is next included in the covenant legislation of Sinai with the explicit mention of oxen and the flock or herd. The word sh'n is applicable to both sheep and goats, and both DV and RV unduly limit the meaning by translating 'sheep'. New precision is given by the additional regulation that the animal is to be left with its dam for seven days and then to be given to God. In what manner the gift was to be made is not said. At the time this was general knowledge and did not need to be specified. Probably the owner himself killed it and consumed it at a sacrificial meal with his family. After the violation of the Covenant by the worship of the golden calf it was renewed and the law about the first-born re-enacted, Ex 34:19. In place of the specification of the age at which the animal is to be given to God it is again laid down that the firstborn of an ass is to be redeemed by a lamb or kid. The next mention is in Lev 27:26. This chapter deals with free-will offerings and it is appropriately laid down that no one can make a free-will offering to God of the firstlings as they belong to God by right already. The subject comes up again in Num 18:15-18, this time from the point of view of the priest's rights. All firstlings which belong to God are assigned to the priest. Unclean beasts are to be bought back at the age of one month for five shekels of silver. Presumably the clean animals that could be legally sacrificed were still to be offered on the eighth day. The extension of the time to a month in the case of the unclean animals is probably a condescension to men's unwillingness to buy back very young animals with the greater uncertainty of their survival. If the animal was to die within the month the owner of its dam would be free of any obligation. The firstlings of cows, sheep, and goats may not be redeemed because they are holy to God. The priest is to sprinkle their blood on the altar and to burn their fat as a sweet odour to the Lord.

THE PENTATEUCH

182f But the flesh is the priest's as is the breast of the wave-offering and the right shoulder ; on the breast and the shoulder see Lev 7:30-34, etc.

g The Deuteronomic legislation was given in immediate preparation for the new conditions of settled life after entry into Canaan. In Deut 12:6 it is prescribed that firstlings may be offered only in the central sanctuary, in the place that God should choose out of all their tribes. There the Israelites are to eat them with their families and servants and with the Levites who dwell in their cities, 12:7, 17 f. ; 14:23. In these passages the firstlings are mentioned only incidentally to the law of the unity of the sanctuary. The matter is treated in its own right in Deut 15:19-23. As the offering was to be made only at the central sanctuary and some time might elapse between the birth and an opportunity to offer it there, it is enacted that no work might be done with the firstlings of cattle nor might the firstlings of sheep be shorn. They were entirely the property of God. It is again laid down that they are to be eaten by the Israelite and his household in the one sanctuary that God should choose. The concession is made that if the animal have any defect which renders it unfit to sacrifice to God, then it may be eaten anywhere, and by all, whether clean or unclean, under the one condition that its blood may not be consumed. The blood was to be poured out on the earth like water. The blood as typifying life was specially sacred to God. In Deut there seems to be a definite change in the previous legislation. In Num the flesh of the firstlings was assigned to the priest to be consumed under the same conditions as the breast and right shoulder, the priest's portion of peace-offerings. In Deut all Israelites (who are not labouring under a legal uncleanness) may join in the sacrificial meal provided by the flesh of the firstlings. It does not seem possible with A Lapiere to understand the words of Deut as addressed to the priests. The language is quite general and the laws are addressed to all. Neither does it seem legitimate with Keil to suppose that a share of the sacrificial meal was dependent on the invitation of the priest to enjoy part of what legally belonged to him. The wording of the laws seems to make it plain that the flesh reverted of right to the offerer. Neither does it seem possible to understand Num 18:18 as granting the priest only the breast and the right shoulder. This was Hengstenberg's explanation. Nor again does *H. M. Wiener, Pentateuchal Studies (1912) 294 seem to be correct in saying that Num 18 applies only to heave-offerings and that usually the heave-offering consisted of one or more firstlings. Probably experience had shown that the priests did not require all that had been assigned to them and would stand in even less need of the firstlings in Canaan, as it was foreseen that the animals would be older and more fully grown before an opportunity occurred to bring them to the one central sanctuary.

183a A phenomenon that easily escapes attention in a translation is that connected with the use of the divine names. Sometimes we find Yahweh, the personal name by which God was known to the Israelites, and sometimes Elohim, the general name for God, used also of false gods. The former is rendered in DV by 'the Lord' as Vg has 'Dominus' (LXX κύριος), and the latter by 'God'. The first to comment on the varying usage of these designations seems to have been Tertullian, Adv. Hermogenem 3, PL 2, 199 f. The following table will give an idea of the distribution of the names. It is taken from Bea, 45, and R. Cornely, S.J., Introd. in S. Script. Libr. Compend., edit. A. Merk, S.J. (1927*) 338 (= C-M).

In this list those instances are omitted in which Elohim is used in the construct state or with suffixes. As it is against Heb. usage to employ a proper name such as Yahweh either in the construct state or with personal suffixes, in certain cases the writer practically had no choice. The combination of the two names, Yahweh Elohim is found exclusively in Gen 2 and 3 except for Ex 9:30, where the equivalent of Elohim is not in LXX and is probably not original in HT. The probable explanation of this restricted use was the desire to stress the identity of Elohim, alone named in Gen 1, with Yahweh, named exclusively in Gen 4 except for v 25. It should further be noticed that in Ex up to 6:2 (exclusively) Yahweh occurs 23 times and Elohim 19 times. Thus in Gen and Ex up to this point the number of occurrences of the two names is approximately the same, thereafter Yahweh altogether predominates. This preference must be connected with the revelation of Ex 6:2 f. On this see the commentary and § 129d. If it is true that the name Yahweh was previously unknown, then it follows that its earlier occurrences in the text of the Pent. were not original in the stories of Gen as handed down to the time of Moses. And this would be true also of the proper names, such as Jochabed, that of Moses' mother, in which the Tetragrammaton forms an element ; cf. the case of Eliacim, whose name was changed to Joakim, 4 Kg 23:34. In any case some explanation is called for by the preference shown in different passages for one name or the other. Thus in Gen 10-16 Yahweh occurs 36 times, but Elohim not at all. On the other hand, in Gen 40-45 Elohim occurs 19 times, but Yahweh not at all.

A similar phenomenon occurs elsewhere. In Pss 1-40 (41) Yahweh occurs 272 times (278 including titles and doxology), Elohim 15 times, of which 9 are required by the context. In Pss 41-82 (42-83) Elohim is used 200 times, Yahweh only 44 times including the doxology, Ps 71 (72) 18. Finally Pss 89 (90)-150 have the name of Yahweh 339 times, Elohim 6 times. Of these 6 occurrences 5 occur in Ps 107 (108) which is compiled from two Elohistic Pss, 56 (57) and 59 (60). The other is found in Ps 143 (144) 9. Then, that the present distribution of the divine names is at any rate sometimes due to an editor or editors, not to the original authors, is shown by the fact that though Ps 52 (53) is a rehandling of Ps 13 (14), the latter uses Yahweh where the former has Elohim. The same tendency is to be seen in Ps 69 (70) which is a rehandling of Ps 39 (40) 14-18. The explanation proposed by J. Calès, S.J., from whose work most of the above figures have been taken, is that the intention was to provide a collection of canticles for the use of the Jews dispersed in pagan lands, where it would have been a profanation to pronounce the sacred Tetragrammaton, Le Livre des Psaumes 1 (1936) 20 f.

These examples from the Pss make it clear that the use

	Gen	Ex	Lev	Num	Deut	Total
Yahweh	145 (Bea) 143 (C-M)	393 (Bea) 394 (C-M)	310	387	547	{ 1782 (Bea) 1781 (C-M)
Elohim	165	56	—	10	{ 10 (Bea) 8 (C-M)	241 (Bea) 239 (C-M)
Yahweh Elohim	20	1	—	—	—	21

183^a of the divine names in the existing HT is not always that of the original authors. This is further demonstrated as regards the Pent. by both external and internal evidence. Swete's edition of the LXX shows that in the four books Gen to Num the Greek text differs in the use of the divine names 180 times from the existing HT, Dahse, 9. In Gen 16:11 the reason given for the name Ishmael is that 'Yahweh has given ear'. It is difficult to escape the conclusion that Yahweh has been substituted in this sentence for an original El or Elohim, which latter is found in one Heb. MS.

d It is impossible to explain the choice of one name rather than the other in all cases, just as it is impossible always to assign a reason why we sometimes speak of Jesus, sometimes of Christ, sometimes of Jesus Christ, sometimes of our Lord. To some extent the matter is fixed by usage, as we speak of 'the blood royal' but never of 'the throne royal'. So the Hebrews spoke of 'a man of God' (Elohim), not of 'a man of Yahweh'. On the other hand 'Blessed be Yahweh' is the regular expression (25 times), 'Blessed be Elohim' occurring twice only, Ps 65 (66) 20 and Ps 67 (68) 36 both in the Elohistic section of the Psalter. In general it may be said that Elohim is used where there is question of God's omnipotence and transcendence, Yahweh where he appears as the guardian and protector of his people. In converse with non-Israelites the name Yahweh is as a rule avoided. The narratives of Gen were traditional in the time of Moses, and the name of God will have been left in the form handed down in the case of each story. It is possible that in pre-Mosaic times before special emphasis had been given to the name of Yahweh some tribes favoured the one name and others the other.

184^a Post-Mosaic Elements—These may be either modifications or additions. The modifications may affect both common words and proper names. The remarkable stability of the language from the Mosaic age suggests that copyists may have changed obsolete forms and words for those used in later times. On the other hand, the Pent. presents some linguistic peculiarities which seem definitely archaic. If common significant words were changed in the course of transcription, the process was not carried through consistently. Dan is mentioned as a place-name in northern Canaan, Gen 14:14, Deut 34:1, but this name dates from the conquest of the country, Jos 19:47, Jg 18:29. Similarly the place-name Horma, Num 14:45, Deut 1:44, was given only at the conquest, Jg 1:17. Deut 1:1 speaks of discourses of Moses delivered 'beyond the Jordan'. This phrase suggests some writer other than Moses living on the western side of the Jordan, which Moses himself never crossed. A Lapidé suggested long ago that Moses may have written 'on this side' and that 'Josue or whoever edited Moses's diaries, as he was living in Canaan' changed it to 'beyond the Jordan'. If such a change was made it was not made consistently. The expression is used of the country east of the Jordan, Num 22:1; 32:32; 34:15; 35:14; Deut 1:1, 5; 3:8; 4:41, 46, 47, 49. (In Gen 50:10 f. the topography is uncertain.) On the other hand 'beyond the Jordan' signifies the country west of the river in Deut 3:20, 25; 11:30; and, be it noticed, in Jos 12:7, whereas in Jos 12:1 it signifies the country east of it. More remarkable still in Num 32:19 the phrase occurs twice and denotes first the western side and then the eastern side. DV has translated according to the sense; but HT reads: 'We will not acquire a possession with them across the Jordan and beyond, for our possession has fallen to us across the Jordan eastwards'. The collation of these passages leads to the conclusion that the phrase could be used by a speaker or writer on either side of the Jordan with the sense of 'on this side of the Jordan' or 'on the other side of the Jordan' provided the context made the meaning intended plain.

b Additions to the text, as distinct from modifications of language or alterations of names, might be short glosses or the insertion of longer passages mostly historical or legal in character. Here some examples 184^b only can be given. Many consider as glosses the information given Gen 12:6 and 13:7 that the Canaanite and the Perizzite were living in Canaan in Abraham's time. However, such information is almost necessary to give the reader a correct setting for the narrative and to explain why there was not room for the flocks and herds of Abraham and Lot. Moreover, the wording prescinds altogether from the future state of the country, and, according to the Hebrew idiom, implies nothing as to whether those peoples were or were not there at the time of writing. On the apparent reference in Ex 15:17 to the temple on Mount Moriah see § 170^b. The note that the gomer (omer) is the tenth part of an ephah, Ex 16:36, is a gloss, as the fact was known to contemporaries and Moses could hardly have foreseen that the note would be required by later generations. The measure is not mentioned elsewhere in the Bible. The note that the Arnon was the frontier of Moab, Num 21:13, has been considered a gloss; but it seems gratuitous to suppose that this geographical fact must have been universally known to Moses' contemporaries considering that they had only just made acquaintance with those parts. A Lapidé considered Num 21:14 f. to be a later addition, a view rejected by Hummelauer. Num 27:14 may well contain a gloss written originally in the margin. Deut 2:12 speaks of Israel as already 'in the land of his possession', but this is not a certain sign of a later hand, as in the context it is reasonably taken to refer to the settlement of the two and a half tribes east of the Jordan. The note in Deut 3:9 giving the Sidonian and Amorite names for Hermon may well be a later gloss, and also that about Og in Deut 3:11. Of the phrase 'until this present day' in the LXX of Gen 35:4 and in Deut 34:6 St Jerome wrote 'Certe hodiernus dies illius temporis aestimandus est quo historia ipsa contexta est, sive Moysen dicere volueris auctorem Pentateuchi, sive Ezram eiusdem instauratorem operis, non recuso', PL 23, 190. In this passage which has been misunderstood, St Jerome expresses his belief that Moses was the author of the Pent., but says that the words 'up to the present day' may apply not to his time but to that of Esdras as the restorer of the OT Canon after the troubles of the exile.

Among historical additions that which has attracted 6 most attention is perhaps the account of Moses' death in Deut 34. Alphonsus Tostatus, generally called Abulensis from his episcopal see of Avila (died 1455), restricted the addition to part of the chapter. Jacobus Bonfrerius, S.J., Pentateuchus Moysis (1625) 1062, rightly preferred to consider the whole chapter post-Mosaic, as it is not reasonable to ascribe historical narrative to prophecy in the absence of compelling cause. Another well-known addition is the list of Edomite kings in Gen 36:31-39. The note introducing them as reigning before an Israelite king ruled over Edom (cf. § 156^f) takes the list down to the time of David, who subjugated the country, 2 Kg 8:14. This addition was recognized by Bonfrerius. Num 15:32-36, the account of the punishment of the man found collecting sticks on the Sabbath, is introduced by the remark that it occurred while the children of Israel were in the wilderness. No one would be likely to think of adding this information to the story as found in its present context. It suggests therefore that the whole story is an addition. Deut 10:6-9 is another probable example. Ex 16:35 suggests knowledge of the time when the manna ceased after the death of Moses. Num 32:41 narrates events which took place in the period of the Judges, Jg 10:3 f. There is a repetition of this in Deut 3:14. In Gen the details about the ages of Abraham and the other patriarchs were not part of the original story; see § 140^b-f. On the blessings of Jacob see § 159^b, and on Deut 32-33 § 222^a and f. For other examples see §§ 162^c-f, 181^k.

That there are legislative additions is also not doubted. d The Pent. was the legal code of the nation and enactments required by changed conditions were naturally 184d inserted in it. See § 162e-f and on the law of the king, § 217d. The laws concerning tithes belong to different periods, Lev 27:30-33; Num 18:21-32; Deut 12:6, 11, 17-19; 14:22-29; 26:12-15. It may be doubted whether Hoberg, 66 f., is right in adducing Jos 24:26 as proof of such an insertion: Josue 'wrote all these things in the volume of the law of the Lord'. Hummelauer thought he discovered Josue's insertion in Deut 26:16-27:26, but he has found no adherents. The meaning probably is that Josue added his writing at the end of Deut. The reference seems to be to the contents of the Book of Josue as a whole; so Cornely, II i 192. Nothing in the Pent. represents this writing of Josue, yet written as part of the law it seems extremely unlikely that it should have perished. Moreover, Jos is the natural and almost inevitable complement of the Pent. as it records the attainment of the promise made in the writings of Moses.

6 Hoberg, 67, appeals also to 1 Kg 10:25, 'Samuel told the people the law of the kingdom and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord'. Hoberg himself thinks this law is that of Deut 17:14-20. But if Deut had been meant, it would have been said that Samuel wrote it in the book of the law, and not merely in a book. And the passage in Deut seems to reflect the abuses of Solomon's time.

f It is strange that both Hoberg, 68, and Goettsberger, 57, should lay down as a principle that those laws which suppose a settled population are post-Mosaic, e.g. Ex 23:10 'Six years shalt thou sow thy ground'. When the Israelites left Egypt, it was confidently expected that they would soon take up their abode in the promised land, and all the Sinaitic legislation was enacted without any reason to doubt the speedy fulfilment of this expectation. It was only when Moses was on the point of leading the people into Canaan but met with murmuring and resistance due to their pusillanimity and lack of trust in God that that generation was condemned never to enter the holy land but to die in the wilderness. After forty years their children would see the fulfilment of the promise intended for them, Num 14:28-34. The Deuteronomic legislation also was given when the beginning of settled life was in sight just before the crossing of the Jordan.

g Lev 16:29-34 is perhaps post-Mosaic. This passage gives the law for the perpetual observance of the day of atonement. Hoberg, 48 f., considers it to be probably a later addition based on Lev 23:26-32. A case may be made for the post-Mosaic character of Lev 25:32-34. These laws about the right of redemption of houses in the cities of the Levites and about their fields presuppose Num 35, which contains the regulations about the granting of cities and fields to the Levites. The Levitical legislation is Sinaitic, that of Num 35 Moabitic, and belong therefore respectively to the beginning and the end of the forty years of life in the wilderness. Lev 25:32-34 therefore appears to be a later addition.

185a Sources—From the point of view of Moses' knowledge a distinction occurs at Ex 2:10. From this verse everything narrated fell within his own lifetime and within his own knowledge except for the historical additions, § 134c. The events narrated in the opening part of Ex were recent history when Moses came to years of discretion and will have been learnt by him partly from Pharaoh's daughter and partly from members of his own race. On the other hand the story of Gen refers to times long previous to his own and could have been learnt only from 'sources' whether oral or written; see § 137g-i. When writing is unknown or little used, the power of the human memory is such as to seem to us, the word is not too strong, prodigious. One has only to recall the oral tradition of the Veda and of the Homeric poems. There are references to such oral transmission in Ex 13:14. Moreover, not only is Gen comparatively a short composition, but its contents are for the most part vividly recounted stories which easily impress themselves even on indifferent memories. From constant repetition these stories would readily acquire a comparatively fixed form, which would be handed on in the tents of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob from generation to generation. That the work of different minds is incorporated is clear from the difference not only of style but of outlook apparent in Gen, chh 1 and 2. The question is whether it is possible to dissect the Pent. into parts attributable to definite sources.

The sources together with the dates assigned to them, which have won widest acceptance, have been those of the Wellhausen School. For a sketch of its history and of the variety of opinions maintained one of the books of introduction to the OT may be consulted or Coppens, 3-40, where a fairly exhaustive account will be found with ample bibliography. In particular may be mentioned here J. Wellhausen, Die Composition des Hexateuchs (1899) and The Composition of the Hexateuch (1902) by J. Estlin Carpenter and G. Harford. In general the Pent. is traced to four sources designated respectively J, E, D and P. The origin of these designations being German, J stands for the Yahwist, E for the Elohist, D for Deut and Deuteronomical elements, and P for the Priestly Code. The first two names are derived from the view that the Yahwist writer thought the name of Yahweh to have been known from the beginning and made use of it accordingly, whereas the Elohist writer thought that the name was first made known to Moses, Ex 6:2, and therefore made no use of it in the previous narrative. The former is considered to have written in the kingdom of Judah about 850 B.C. and the latter in the Northern Kingdom about 750 B.C. These two were combined into a single narrative JE by about 650. Deut was written not so long after and hidden in the temple where it was discovered in the 18th year of Josias and being accepted as Mosaic became the starting-point of Josias' religious reformation. The incorporation of D with JE was accomplished by about the middle of the 6th cent. In the meantime the various elements of P came into existence in Babylonia and were finally worked into a unity with JED sometime before 450. This scheme involves much more than a denial of Mosaic authorship. It is designed to fit in with current evolutionary ideas according to which Israelite religion from animism and polytheism passed to monolatry and so finally in the age of the prophets to true monotheism. It supposes that the code of Deut was unknown until late in the 7th cent. and the priestly legislation till later still. It supposes further that the religious history was largely written without regard to historical fact in order to give a supposititious basis for the late priestly system. The Tabernacle, for instance, was an invention designed to throw back the origins of the temple worship into the days of Moses and so to win for it the authority of his name.

For the history of the period preceding his own time 6 Moses must, as already said, have made use of sources, and there is no reason to deny the possibility of his combining matter from different sources into one narrative. The question is whether there actually were two sources, J and E, which could be justly distinguished by the use of the divine names. In a number of passages where according to the criteria one or other source should be recognized actually the HT has the name that does not suit the theory. Such occurrences are explained as due to interpolations from the other source, or it is held that the two sources did not restrict themselves to Yahweh or Elohim respectively but only show a preference for the one name or the other. This latter suggestion, of course, renders the use of the divine names an uncertain basis for the distinction of the sources. Besides, the disagreement of the HT, the LXX and Sam. at times renders the correct reading uncertain. And as we have definite evidence that the divine names have been deliberately altered (see § 133b-c) there is considerable uncertainty what exactly was the use made of them in the original text. In the later parts of the Pent. also some Catholic writers have thought they detected the presence of the docu-

135c ments J and E. In this view the original Mosaic account had a double line of transmission, and in an editorial revision elements from both were incorporated in the Pent. as we know it. This distinction into sources leads at times to grave psychological difficulties. For example, the redactor of Num 22 is supposed to have preserved the same statement from both sources in v 3, 'And Moab was sore afraid of the people, because they were many; and Moab was distressed because of the children of Israel' (RV). Here the first half is said to be from E and the second from J. On the other hand when the whole story is split up into its two components, it is found that the redactor has omitted essential elements. He has preserved the unimportant and omitted the important. It is psychologically much more probable that the original writer indulged in repetition of a kind which the synonymous parallelism of the psalms shows to have been congenial to Hebrew writers. If it is contended that the original author could not have been guilty of tautological writing, then the question arises why should an editor have inserted what he could easily have omitted if it did not suit the genius of his language? Another psychological difficulty arises over the supposed contradictions between the two sources. Balaam is said to have travelled according to E with the princes of Moab, 22:21, but according to J with two servants only, 22:22. Is it more likely that an editor should have inserted such contradictory facts in two consecutive verses or that the original writer with his mind concentrated on the religious side of the story should have left obscure to the reader what was plain to himself? Balaam will have desired to start the journey without the knowledge of his fellow-citizens and gone out with two servants to join the caravan somewhere outside the town. In some such way he will at first have been alone with the two servants; cf. Bi 18 (1937) 439 ff. This of course is only an illustration of the questions that arise when the matter is examined in detail. The small importance of such 'discrepancies' may be shown from Jn 11:19 'Many of the Jews were come to Martha and Mary' and 11:45 'Many of the Jews who were come to Mary'. (DV with Vg has here 'and Martha', but these words are in neither the Gk nor Latin codices.) See *P. Volz u. W. Rudolph, Der Elohst als Erzähler ein Irrweg der Pentateuchkritik, Giessen, 1933.

According to the Wellhausen reconstruction of history Deuteronomy was written in the 7th cent. and found in the temple, 4 Kg chh 22, 23. It purports to be Mosaic and was in fact accepted as such. That the book discovered was Deut has been held by many in the Church including St Jerome, PL 23, 217, and St John Chrysostom, PG 57, 181. Others, as Hoberg, 8 f., rightly hold that the book found was the Pent.; cf. Bea, 98, Goettsberger, 86. However, for our present purpose the question may be discussed as if it were Deut alone. The first thought that strikes the enquirer is how could a book recently written have been taken for a long-lost document? It is not easy to counterfeit antiquity and the very freshness of the roll and its writing would have aroused suspicion, for it is not easy to believe that the supposed fabricators of the document were so clever as in that age and that society to have given the script and the writing-material the appearance of antiquity, nor is it easy to believe that king Josias and his courtiers were so unsophisticated as to have been unable to distinguish new from old. It is moreover hard to believe that men should have accepted as of Mosaic authorship and of divine authority a series of new and burdensome laws if there was no tradition that Moses was the author of such a code—and the theory cannot admit such a tradition without destroying itself. What was read, however, in the newly-found document did inspire salutary fear in king Josias and his counsellors who proceeded without delay to act upon the precepts they read. It is evident that they knew of the law of Moses though they had never seen it. The words of the high-priest Helcias show that the law he had found was known by repute though it had been lost: 'I have found the book of the law in the house of the Lord', 4 Kg 22:8. There is no parallel between a pseudepigraphical work such as Eccl is held to be and Deut. In the former, words of wisdom are put in the mouth of the wise king; in the latter are numerous laws the binding force of which would not have been acknowledged except for the belief that they derived from Moses. Moreover Deut., if composed in the 7th cent., shows a remarkably consistent effort to reproduce the atmosphere and outlook of Mosaic times. The exhortation, 7:17-19, not to fear the inhabitants of the land was meaningless in the days of Josias. And so was the repeated injunction utterly to destroy them, 7:2; 20:13, 17. Certainly the supposed authors 'are credited with quite a fabulous refinement in their work', Möller, 34, when they are imagined to have warned the Israelites that the extermination must be gradual 'lest perhaps the beasts of the earth should increase upon thee', 7:22. The aim of the authors is said to have been the result which the reformation of Josias actually achieved, namely the centralization of worship at Jerusalem. But in the account of the reform this centralization is not stressed at all and appears only incidentally, 4 Kg chh 22 and 23. The whole emphasis is on the elimination of idolatry, which had defiled even the central sanctuary of Jerusalem.

Evidence is not lacking that Deut is older. Ezechias destroyed the high places and broke the statues in pieces, and . . . kept his commandments which the Lord commanded Moses', 4 Kg 18:4, 6. And Rabshakeh, the Assyrian, who fancied this must be displeasing to Yahweh, tauntingly asked the Israelites how they could put their trust in Yahweh: 'Is it not he whose high places and altars Ezechias hath taken away, and hath commanded Judah, and Jerusalem: You shall worship before this altar in Jerusalem?' v 22. This is in virtue of the law of the unity of the sanctuary in Deut 12. If it is suggested that the passage is an insertion of a Deuteronomist editor, and, of course, in a case like this, an insertion means an invention, it may be replied that if Deuteronomist editors had undertaken the revision of ancient texts in the interest of their own views, they would surely have done the work more thoroughly by way of both excision and of addition.

Further it is difficult to believe that men of the high moral and religious standard betrayed by Deut were capable of the grave deception involved in passing off regulations of their own making as possessing the authority of Moses, and worse still, of securing their acceptance on the score of a feigned divine authority and sanction. Whoever wrote Deut, he or they possessed religious God-fearing dispositions and could not have been guilty of so heinous a crime against the reverence due to the Creator. For further evidence see e.g. Möller 44 ff., Bea 110 f.

The Priestly Code or P is said to have been of exilic and post-exilic origin, and to have been either the law-book read by Esdras, Neh 8, or part of that book. Its principal parts are Ex 25-31:18a; 35-40; Lev; Num 1-10:28; 15; 17-19; 25:6-31; 33-36. The same difficulty meets us here. New and grave obligations are supposed to have been accepted as of Mosaic origin without the existence of a tradition attesting such origin. Yet the new code is said to have marked 'a reformation, one might almost say a revolution, in religious worship', HDB ii 370b. On the other hand we are told that 'it is dealing with a dead past—a mere summary composed out of old written records', ibid. It is certainly strange that a document composed to further a reformation or rather revolution in the life of the post-exilic community should be written in a style said to be marked by its 'stiffness, artificiality and conciseness of treatment'. It is also strange that given its alleged purpose, it should devote so much space to such antiquarian information as is found in Ex 25-31 and 35-40 concerning the Ark, the Tabernacle and its furniture. The Ark was lost at the time of the Baby-

135f Ionian exile; and the Tabernacle is not admitted ever to have existed: 'The attitude . . . to the priestly legislation . . . and in particular to those sections of it which deal with the sanctuary and its worship, is patent on every page of this Dictionary, and is opposed to the historicity of P's tabernacle', HDB iv 666b. This is not to attribute a lofty standard of honour to those circles anxious to produce a reformation in the service of God. And it is strange that this reforming legislation should make laws to centre round the Ark and the Tabernacle, as those of the Day of Atonement, Lev 16:2, 33, laws which accordingly could not be and never could have been observed. The same applies to the law, Lev 17:1-6, concerning the offering at the door of the Tabernacle of every ox, sheep or goat killed by any Israelite.

g 'All the people wept when they heard the words of the law', Neh 8:9. They did not weep at the hearing of something new, for no man's conscience reproaches him with not observing obligations of which he has never heard; nor did they weep for having violated precepts, the observance of which was impossible under changed conditions. They wept because it was brought home to them on hearing the law that they had not done what they well knew they could and should have done. The argument from the non-observance of a law to its non-existence is invalid. And the argument from silence may be quite misleading. There is no explicit reference to the celebration of the Day of Atonement anywhere in the OT; but see Heb 9:7, 25, Ac 27:9. If P was written to effect the reformation it achieved, how is it that its prescriptions differ from post-exilic practice? According to P, Ex 30:13-16, half a shekel was to be given for the use of the Tabernacle; after the exile, presumably on account of the poverty of the people, the sum was fixed at the third of a shekel, Neh 10:32. After the exile the Levites began their service from the age of 20 years, Esd 3:8; how is it that in P it begins at 30, Num 4:3, and at 25, Num 8:24?

h The tenets of the Wellhausen school no longer hold the field as they once did. They have been attacked from many quarters and in many points, and various divergent views have been propounded to replace them. No one, however, of these new systems has achieved the popularity formerly enjoyed by the system it seeks to replace. *H. H. Rowley has sketched the situation in PEQ (1946) 52 f.: 'In recent years (the once normal critical views of the compilation of the Pent.) have been much attacked from many sides, and especially from two directly opposed sides. The one side has aimed to carry the sources back to an earlier date, while the other has aimed to carry them down to a later date. Again some scholars have questioned the existence of the once generally acknowledged sources, while others have attempted to carry the analysis further, and isolate still further sources. Never has there been so much fluidity in Pentateuchal criticism. Yet while many scholars would agree that the days of the Graf-Kuenen-Wellhausen theory are numbered, agreement ends as soon as the question what is to succeed is asked'.

*W. F. Albright: 'It is sheer hypercriticism to deny the substantial Mosaic character of the Mosaic tradition', The Archaeology of Palestine (1949) 224. See also §§ 43-6. This article is supplemented by the following account of the opinions of Catholic writers.

SOME RECENT CATHOLIC VIEWPOINTS ON THE PENTATEUCHAL QUESTION

i The decrees of the Biblical Commission of June 27 1906 directed the adherence of Catholic scholars to the substantial (quoad substantiam) Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. It was, therefore, within this framework that they approached the literary problems of the Pentateuch. J. Goettsberger in his Einleitung in das Alte Testament, 1928, while rejecting the Wellhausen hypothesis in its essence, distinguishes between the original Pentateuch and its present form, and admits the valuable contributions of the critical school. P. Heinisch in his commentary on Genesis, 1930, defends the theory of 'supplements'; i.e. the principal document is Mosaic, though it has been increased by inspired sizable additions (doublets) and undergone many alterations of a minor sort. We have already noted the solution suggested by Fr. Vaccari, S.J. (cf. § 46b). In a study of the same question Père Lagrange admits the existence of the documents E J P in Genesis. He believes that Moses either wrote E or put together its already existing material. He makes J also the work of Moses who inspired its composition, tracing out its broad lines to amanuenses and ultimately approving it. He considers P a later précis of the basic lines of the tradition.

A greater modification in the Catholic attitude is to be noted in the recent work of J. Coppens, The Old Testament and the Critics, 1942. He tends to a broader interpretation of the Biblical Commission's quoad substantiam than it has hitherto received. Following a suggestion of Père Lagrange in his article in RB 47 (1938) 48 he feels that the words can be taken in a qualitative rather than quantitative sense. Such a view would see the Pentateuch as the outcome of a lengthy literary process initiated by Moses and continued in his spirit.

The most recent development in this question is the letter of the Biblical Commission to Cardinal Suhard of Jan. 16, 1948; cf. AAS 40 (1948) 1, 2, pp 45-8. It declares that balanced criticism and the results of allied sciences will establish beyond doubt 'the large part and profound influence of Moses as author and legislator'—words that give an indication of how 'Mosaic authenticity' may now be understood. The letter also points to the fact that no one today questions the existence of sources in the Pentateuch, the fact of progressive accretion to the Mosaic laws caused by the social and religious conditions of later times—a development which appears also in the historical narratives.

It is not then difficult to understand that some Catholic scholars believe that three distinct literary strands appear in Genesis, i.e. J E P, that seem to have the character of continuous narratives, although some hesitancy is felt that this can be fully verified in the case of E and, even more so, of P.

The problem of dating these sources is a vexing one, but, in general, they would explain their origin and composition more or less in the following fashion. The narratives of Genesis existed, at least in oral form, long before the activity of Moses. They were handed on by rhapsodists in oral recitation which was the normal method of transmission. Albright says he is 'increasingly convinced that the narrative portions of the Pentateuch swarm with poetic phraseology and are strewn with reminiscences of the original verse form in which they were transmitted for centuries before being written down in prose', JBL 62 (1943) 35. Recited in the evenings before the tent-fires, any notable deviation in the well-known narrative would result in a popular outcry. 'As a rule, poetic sagas are preferable as historical sources to prose traditions concerning the same events, unless the latter are quite recent' (*W. Albright, FSAC, 37), for both their external and internal forms are fixed.

Today competent historical and literary scholarship places something more than half a millennium between the written record and the beginnings of that record; it supports the essential reliability of oral transmission for the period preceding the written documents. Naturally however there would be some variations. According to some recent Catholic scholars (cf. DBV(S) II, 207, Critique Biblique) the patriarchal narratives give historical facts, but adorned here and there with additions serv-

135m ing a doctrinal purpose, written under Inspiration and possessing the truth of the didactic form of writing. In other words, Israelitic faith not only presupposed history but interpreted it, gave it its meaning and flavour, fixed its broad lines, thus favouring an extension to the point of mingling the historical with other genres (ib. p 8). Then, too, one should take into account the poetic modifications that would naturally occur during the long centuries of oral transmission in popular circles. For these reasons the same scholars speak of the literary genre of Genesis as a 'mixed genre', largely historical but partly didactic and poetic, rather than historical in our strict sense of the word. This, however, does not deny the fact that the patriarchal narratives have the character of historical records.

Such then would be the nature of the sources that Moses used for his written account of primeval history and the deeds of the patriarchs. His narrative, which may be dated about 1250 B.C., is the common source of J and E in Genesis. Of the other historical sections, of which Moses was an eyewitness (Ex, Num), he was the responsible author.

■ But for the ordinary Hebrew the written document was of secondary importance; oral recitation remained the norm of transmission. The fall of Shilo, however, Israel's central sanctuary, and, even more so, the division of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, undoubtedly affected the historical rhapsodists. Cut off to a large extent from one another, they gradually introduced into the Mosaic text adaptations which subtly reflected the partisan preferences of their audiences. Geographical influences also played a part. The narrative underwent certain modifications in Judah and Ephraim. The narrators of Ephraim speak not of God (Yahweh), but of the Divinity (Elohim), and retain or stress those details which glorify the house of Joseph and the northern sanctuaries, while the Judaeans school retains the name of Yahweh and an interest in the sacred places of the Southern Kingdom. The suppression of unfavourable details is understandable. The rhapsodists, while preserving the sense, also substituted different literary conventions recognized as such and not touching the substance of the narrative.

● In the ninth and eighth centuries these diverging versions were given a definite written form, which superseded oral transmission as the authentic norm. In this fashion recent Catholic scholarship would explain the origin of J and E. But behind these two documents stands the one Mosaic narrative and unity of source, not multiplicity; hence we have a twofold testimony to the truth of the narrative. They were joined together, in the fashion described in § 46b, after the collapse of the Northern Kingdom with the capture of Samaria by the Assyrians in 722 B.C., perhaps during the reign of Josias (638-609), whose efforts were directed towards both political and religious unity (cf. 4 Kg 23). After the finding of Deuteronomy (621 B.C.) there seems to have been a deuteronomistic revision of the sacred books then existing, which left Gen-Num almost intact, but joined Deuteronomy first with Jos-4 Kg, then with the other books of the Pentateuch to form an account of sacred history from the creation of the world to the collapse of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah (Simon-Prado, 315).

■ The question of Deuteronomy is a more delicate one. H. Junker rightly observes (Das Buch Deuteronomium, 1933, p 14): 'We must agree with Goettsberger who believes that in view of the present state of investigation, one cannot ask a Catholic exegete to propose a definite theory of the origin and evolution of Deuteronomy. Such a theory would only have provisional value. He would do much better were he to point out the general lines that the evolution of the book seems to have followed. The laws given by Moses were the basis on which Israel's religious and social life developed. Moreover, in the OT religion, there existed from the beginning prophecy, which directed this development. No wonder then if there were an evolution of the law under prophetic authority'.

135q That much of the material in Deuteronomy is old, there can be no question (cf. W. Albright, FASC, 241 ff.; G. von Rad, Deuteronomische Studien, 1948; P. J. Hempel, Die Schichten des Deut., 1914, 259 ff.). That there has been an introduction of new laws and a modification and abrogation of others is equally clear. Some Catholics speak of a long and complex evolution of Deuteronomy before it reached its final form. As an example we expound briefly the origin of Deuteronomy according to H. Cazelles in his book, Le Deutéronome, 1950, p 13 f. Moses himself wrote down a certain number of concrete applications of the Decalogue. This work was continued after his death, as he had foreseen, under the authority of the Levites, the guardians of his spirit and his law. In the Yahwistic sanctuaries practical solutions of difficult cases were given (cf. Deut 33:10). Thus the Mosaic law was continually applied to new economic and social conditions, and in certain cases there grew up the practice of setting down in writing the new solutions (cf. Os 8:12). After the fall of the Northern Kingdom in 722 B.C., its Levites fled to Jerusalem, 2 Par 11:14, bringing with them certain collections of this law (a number of laws found in the present Deuteronomy could have had their origin only in the Northern Kingdom). These legislative texts were, like the fifth group of Proverbs (chh 25-29), gathered and compiled in the time of Ezechias (c. 700 B.C.), and a sort of theological commentary to them was placed in the mouth of Moses, the writer of the basic laws and the inspirer of all. In this way the first edition of the book came into being. This was the law found by Helcias during the repair of the temple in 621 B.C. Eventually there came the end of Jerusalem and the exile. The second edition of Deuteronomy was published in the days of Ezechiel. It possessed the same spirit as the first, but placed more emphasis on the exile, deliverance, and sapiential literature; cf. ch 4. This edition added chh 1-4 which emphasize the conquest of Canaan, as symbol of the reconquest for which the exiles hoped. At the same time additions were made to the maledictions of 29, ch 31 was amplified, and 10:6-9 introduced into the text. Such is the solution proposed by Fr. Cazelles, salvo meliori iudicio.

When we come to P (chiefly Leviticus) the problem 1 is even more complex. In view of certain critical arguments, some Catholic exegetes hold to a recent dating for its final composition; nevertheless they consider it Mosaic either because it is only an application to new conditions of Mosaic principles or because its basic elements are Mosaic. They observe that laws in general can receive authoritative complements and modifications; so too, they urge, for the Mosaic law under inspired prophetic or sacerdotal authority. In fact, no part of the Pentateuch was more liable to modification in the course of centuries than the ritual. It will, therefore, be of interest to see the attempt made by J. Nikel in Die Pentateuchfrage, 1921, pp 31-7, to reconcile the lawful demands of criticism with the traditional doctrine of Mosaic authorship of Leviticus.

The 'Code of Holiness', Lev 17-26, he affirms, 5 comes from a time when Israel was already in peaceful possession of the promised land; but it was a codification of an older law adapted to new circumstances. Because of certain points of contact it possesses with Ezechiel, it is possible that its final form was fixed during his lifetime or shortly after (p 48). In the matter of legislation on the tithes, a similar progressive adaptation occurred (p 41). If, however, some elements of the law are only mediately and indirectly Mosaic, they are, nevertheless, the applications to new conditions of the principles promulgated by Moses, and so the legislative evolution always remains organic (p 82). In his Grundriss der Einleitung in das Alte Testament, 1924, Nikel says of the sacerdotal law, Lev, in general that it presents itself 'as the condensation of the cultural life of Israel from Moses till the end of the exile; this legislation, several times codified and revised according to need, was finally collected by the priesthood' (p 55).

THE PENTATEUCH

135s P. Heinisch, also, in his commentary on Leviticus, 1937, admits an evolution whose various steps he attempts to trace.

t In all this matter, the Catholic scholar must keep in mind the directives of the Encyclical Humani Generis. At the same time, there should be no biased censure of the exegete who, while conforming in all docility to the guidance of the 'magisterium ecclesiasticum', abandons a purely defensive attitude to look squarely at the difficulties raised by the theory of Wellhausen. The progress of critical studies has clearly shown that certain conclusions of the new criticism, removed from all compromise with rationalistic evolution, can, without danger and even with profit, be incorporated into Catholic science. On the other hand, a good number of independent critics no longer assign a recent date for the composition of the whole corpus of legislation in the Pentateuch; they admit the reality of the Sinaitic tradition and recognize in the law-code of the Pentateuch a Mosaic, or even pre-Mosaic, nucleus. On the one hand, one must admit that, without Moses, the law of Israel is inexplicable; on the other, that no legislator would give a law that would remain unchangeable through the centuries; cf. RB 45 (1936) 363-4. 135t

GENESIS

By E. F. SUTCLIFFE, S.J.

- 136a Bibliography—T. J. Lamy, Comm. in Librum Geneseos, 2 vol. (Mechliniae, 1883-4); *A. Dillmann, Die Genesis (Leipzig, 1892^a); F. de Hummelauer, Comm. in Genesim (CSS; Parisii, 1895); G. Hoberg, Die Genesis (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1908^a); *J. Skinner, Genesis (ICC; Edinburgh, 1912^a); M. Hetzenauer, O.C., Comm. in Librum Genesis (Graecii et Viennae, 1910); P. Heinisch, Das Buch Genesis (BB; Bonn, 1930); *S. R. Driver, The Book of Genesis (WC; London, 1913^a); *E. König, Die Genesis (Gütersloh, 1919); J. Chaine, Le Livre de la Genèse (Paris, 1948); H. Junker, Genesis (Echter Bibel; Würzburg, 1949).
- b P. F. Ceuppens, O.P., Quaestiones selectae ex Historia Primaeva (Torino-Roma, 1948^a); id., Genèse (no place, 1945); P. Heinisch, Probleme der biblischen Urgeschichte (Luzern, 1947); H. J. T. Johnson, The Bible and the Early History of Mankind (London, 1947^a); C. Lattey, S.J., Back to the Bible (London, 1944); *W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible (New York, 1932); R. T. O'Callaghan, S.J., Aram Naharaim: a Contribution to the History of Upper Mesopotamia in the Second Millennium B.C. (Rome, 1948); *E. A. Speiser, 'Ethnic Movements in the Near East in the second Millennium B.C.', AASOR 13 (1933) 13-54; R. de Vaux, O.P., 'Les patriarches hébreux et les découvertes modernes', RB 53 (1946) 321-48; 55 (1948) 321-47; 56 (1949) 5-36; *H. H. Rowley, Recent Discovery and the Patriarchal Age, reprint from JRB 32 (1949).

c Name—Our English name is taken over from Vg, which itself owed it to LXX, and its meaning is accordingly that of Γένεσις 'becoming, beginning, coming into being'. The word was probably taken from 2:4, perhaps with an eye on 5:1. It is no objection to this origin of the title that it refers only to the beginning of the book. The book of Numbers is similarly named. The Hebrew title, indicated in Vg, is Bereshith, from the opening phrase of the book.

d Contents and Purpose—The book traces the descent of the ancestors of the people of Israel from the beginning of the world down to the twelve sons of Jacob who were the eponyms of the twelve tribes, and to their immediate descendants, ch 46. The story of these ancestors is carried down to the descent of Jacob and his family into Egypt, ch 46, and ends with the death of Joseph, 50:25.

e The main theme of the book is to narrate how the family of Jacob came to be the progenitors of the one race which God chose out of all the nations of the earth to be his own. Cain, the firstborn of Adam, was reprobated by God, 4:11, and the blessing of God then rested on Seth and his descendants, 5:1 ff. But they too corrupted their ways and were visited by the punishment of the Flood. Noe, the just man of his generation, was saved, but his descendants did not remain free from guilt, and the Semites were singled out by God for his especial favour, 9:26. But even among the Semites many fell away from God, 11:1-9, who finally chose Abraham and his line as the recipients of his favours, 12:1-3. With Abraham-God entered into a covenant, 17:4, 7, which he renewed with Isaac, 26:2-5, and with Jacob, 28:13-15. The way is thus prepared for the central fact from which the Old Testament takes its name, the covenant solemnly entered into with the people of Israel, Ex 24.

The Scheme of Genesis—It is important to notice the process of elimination which accompanies the tracing of the descent of Jacob from Adam. Other descendants of the main figures in the line of descent are mentioned as the development of the story requires and are then cut out of the narrative. This process of elimination is at the same time a gradual narrowing of the theme. Thus the Cainites are eliminated, 4:24, and the story proceeds with the Sethites only. After the Flood the descendants of Noe are divided into Japhethites, Chamites and Semites. The two former are cut out of the story at 10:20 and it proceeds with the Semites alone. In 11:27 there is a sharp limitation to the family of Abraham. This patriarch begets Ishmael by Agar and various sons by Cetura (Keturah). Through these the Israelites, descendants of his son Isaac by Sara, are connected with the Ishmaelites, the Madianites, and other Arabian tribes, as through Abraham's nephew Lot they are blood relations of the Ammonites and Moabites. When these connections have been established, the story proceeds with Isaac, the inheritor of the promises. He in his turn is the father of two peoples, the Edomites through Esau and the Israelites through Jacob. The story proceeds exclusively with Jacob and his twelve sons.

All the many peoples mentioned are thus gradually eliminated. None of them did God choose as his peculiar possession though many of them were more ancient, more powerful and more cultured than Israel. The wonder of God's favour and choice is thus strongly emphasized, but, as is the writer's way, such considerations are left to the reflexion of the reader.

This gradual narrowing of the theme and simultaneous elimination of elements foreign to it give important indications of whom the sacred writer is speaking at different stages of his narrative. These indications are the more valuable as the Hebrew habit of using universal expressions at times hyperbolically and at times with reference only to the matter in hand is apt to mislead modern western readers into thinking that the whole world and all mankind are the subject of discourse. Thus universal expressions are used in the narrative of the Flood, but the sacred writer having said all he had to say of the Cainites in ch 4 and then dismissing them from his story proceeds only with the Sethites, of whom these universal expressions are employed. So too in the case of the tower of Babel, 11:1-9, the Japhethites and Chamites having been eliminated from the story the narrative is concerned only with the Semites, and not with all of them; cf. § 149f.

Another important feature in the scheme of the book is the interlocking of its various parts. This will be best explained together with the division of the book.

Division of the Book and Interlocking of its Parts—Considered from the point of view of the periods concerned the book falls into two parts. The first ends at 11:26 and the other occupies the rest of the book. The first deals with prehistory and proto-history whereas the second contains the narrative concerning the patriarchs who lived in historical times. Both parts, however, have fundamentally the same theme, which is that of the origins of the Chosen

1361 People and the divine favours received by their ancestors. The story ends with the death of Joseph while his kinsfolk were still regarded with favour by the Egyptian court.

j The text itself gives no prominence to this division, the formula used to introduce 11:27 being only one of ten which stand at the head of as many sections of unequal length and importance. The characteristic word in these headings is lôl' dōl' (always in the construct state). This word, derived from yālad 'to give birth to', means 'generations' and so by passage from the cause to the effect 'the persons generated' and finally the 'history' of these persons. It consequently tends to introduce the story of the persons generated rather than that of their progenitor. It occurs in the following places: (1) 2:4a, the history of heaven and earth, i.e. of the inhabitants of the newly created world; (2) 5:1, the book of the generations of Adam, his genealogical tree through Seth; (3) 6:9, the story of Noe; (4) 10:1, the generations of the sons of Noe; (5) 11:10, the genealogy of Sem's descendants; (6) 11:27, the generations of Thare (practically the history of Abraham); (7) 25:12, the generations of Ishmael; (8) 25:19, the heading 'the generations of Isaac' introduces the story of his son Jacob rather than of Isaac himself; (9) 36:1, the generations of Esau; (10) 37:2, here the chief figure in the generations of Jacob is his son Joseph.

k In the first instance, 2:4a, the word is used not metaphorically of the production of the world but in the developed sense of 'history'. That this is the meaning is shown by the analogy of the other occurrences in all of which the word is used in a title or introduction. This appears decisive against the view that it is here a subscription to the previous section referring to the creation of the universe.

l These ten sections, which are preceded by the account of God's creative work, 1:1-2:3, are not merely juxtaposed but are interlocked, the whole book being thus formed into a unity not only by its theme but by its form. Thus (1) is linked to the introduction by a brief reference to God's creation of earth and heaven, 2:4b. (2) is interlocked with both the introduction and (1) by the repetition that God made mankind in his image and made them male and female, 5:1 f. (3) resumes from the foregoing that Noe begot Sem, Cham and Japheth, 6:10. (4) links up with the previous narrative by a mention of the Flood, and that Sem, Cham and Japheth were Noe's sons, 10:1. The link in (5) is again the mention of the Flood, 11:10. (6) is interlocked by the repetition from the previous verse that Thare begot Abram, Nachor and Aran, 11:27. (7) repeats the detail of Ishmael's parentage, 25:12. (8) tells the reader what is now well known to him that Isaac was the son of Abraham and the husband of Rebecca, 25:19 f. (9) starts with a renewed account of Esau's marriages, 36:2 f., where, however, see note. Only in (10) is such repetitive interlocking entirely missing.

137a Doctrine—Our book manifests a lofty conception of God. He is one and there is no other beside him. This fundamental truth is taught not by abstract propositions but in more telling fashion. He it was who created the beings elevated by pagan nations to divine rank. As the Creator of all he is the supreme Lord and Master of the world. He is omnipotent: 'Is there anything hard to God?', 18:14. His mere word suffices to effect his will. 'He spoke and they were made', Ps 148:5. These fundamental lessons are taught in ch 1, where the order and details, as of the days, serve only as a framework for the religious teaching; see § 142a-b. As of the material universe, so also he is Creator and Lord of man. This truth is twice expressed, 1:27 and again, in anthropomorphic language, in 2:7. In all this teaching the religious truth must be sharply distinguished from the setting in which it is conveyed. The Bible is not a handbook of physical science, which it was not God's purpose to teach as of itself of no avail for eternal salvation.

So Leo XIII in Providentissimus Deus, Dz 1947. As the world owes its origin to God and the laws of nature are of his ordaining, the working out of these laws is in the Bible spoken of as God's act, as in 2:5. So in the case of the formation of man's body, 2:7, it cannot be concluded from the wording that it was fashioned immediately by God. The possibility of its having been gradually evolved by God's own laws from lower forms is not excluded by the teaching of Scripture; see further § 143k.

God's power is not limited to any one region of the earth as the pagans conceived the dominion of their deities to be confined to the territory of their own peoples. God's power extends to all peoples and countries, Mesopotamia, 12:1; 31:13, Egypt, 12:17; 50:20, the Pentapolis, chh 18-19, Gerar, 20:3. He guides events and draws good out of evil, a truth finely expressed in 50:20. But though the omnipotent Creator of man is able, if he wished, to impose absolute submission to his will as in the case of the lower creatures, he would not have of the human race a forced service. Man's obedience to God's law must be free. He is given a law, but he is left free to obey or to transgress, 2:17 and see on 4:7. But man is not left only to a sense of duty and of gratitude to God to help him to obey. Obedience is rewarded by happiness; punishment is threatened for sin.

Some of these points of doctrine are more fully developed in the commentary on chh 1-3, where also others will be more conveniently dealt with. For a discussion of the religion of the patriarchs the reader is referred to §§ 105-6.

In the time of Moses neither revelation nor religious philosophy had yet brought man to the highly refined and difficult concept of spiritual substance, and consequently there was only a vague idea of the nature of God, of angels, and of the human soul. The way to a higher conception was prepared by the prohibition to make any image of God in the likeness of anything whatsoever known to man, Ex 20:4; and the sublime concept of God's creative power producing its effects by his mere word cannot have rested on any but a vague, though lofty, conception of his nature. The first explicit expression of the belief that whereas man is flesh, God is spirit, occurs in Is 31:3.

It was known that the body does not live by any power inherent in itself. For the body to live God breathes into it the breath of life, 2:7, but there was as yet no developed notion what this imports and the same is said of the life of animals, Ps 103:29 f. It was known however, from the earliest times that man does not cease to exist at death. His body is laid in the tomb or may be devoured by wild beasts, 23:19; 44:28, but he himself goes down to Sheol, the dwelling-place of all the dead deep in the earth, 37:35. Precisely what part of man survived is nowhere stated until the advanced doctrine of Wis 3:1, 'the souls of the just are in the hand of God'. It must be remembered that, though the Israelites were a religious people, they were little given to philosophic thought even on religious topics. For an understanding of the religious background of the time it must also be borne in mind that there was not yet knowledge of the existence of evil spirits. The tempter of our first parents, later known to have been the devil, Wis 2:24, is vaguely represented as a crafty serpent, 3:1. These various points illustrate the slow development of doctrine in OT times.

The Messianic concept has its roots in Genesis. In 3:15 final victory over the powers of evil is promised to mankind, not indeed individually but collectively. But only in the light of later predictions does it become plain that this victory is to be won through the power and under the leadership of a single person, § 145e. Out of all the descendants of Adam God makes a covenant with Noe, ch 9, and of his offspring Sem is privileged to receive God's favour in a special degree, 9:26. Among the Semites Abraham is singled out by God as the recipient of the remarkable promise that 137f through him and his descendants all the nations of the earth are to be blessed, 12:3, and the religious ground for this promise, 18:18 f., shows that the blessing itself will carry with it spiritual benefits. This promise, confirmed to Abraham, 22:18, was not to be shared by all his descendants, for instance the Ishmaelites, but was renewed first to Isaac, 26:4, and then to Jacob, 28:14. Among his sons Judah is chosen out for leadership and promised a sceptre which will not be taken away till one come whose it is by special right, 49:10. And it is thus implied that when he comes, he shall retain it for ever. The previous promises show that the rule symbolized by this sceptre will be a source of blessing to mankind. For Melchisedech's prefiguring of the Christian sacrifice, see on 14:18-24.

g Sources—That Moses required sources for the compilation of Genesis is clear from the fact that the whole period treated was anterior to his time. And these sources can have been either oral or written. The possibility of written sources being available is demonstrated by what is now known of ancient scripts and their diffusion (cf. § 80i). The document quoted in ch 5 appears to be one such source. Written sources were not necessary for the transmission of most of the material of the book. Though writing was used, books were rare. They were days of hearing, not of reading; and the stories of the patriarchs must have been repeated countless times round the camp fires and, during the years of servitude in Egypt, will have kept the hopes of the sufferers alive. The custom of such family history lessons long survived in Israel. 'How great things he commanded our fathers, that they should make the same known to their children; that another generation might know them—the children that should be born and should rise up and declare them to their children', Ps 77:5 f.

h That the whole book is not from the pen of one author is clear from the differences of style to be met in it. Were these confined to the treatment of different themes, the change of style might be explained as due to the requirements of the subject-matter. But in the sections 1:1-2:3 and 2:4-25, which provide a case of this kind, the former having the grandiose theme of the creative power of God and the latter the more personal theme of man's first earthly home, the difference of style is accompanied by the more subtle difference of mental outlook. In the second section this is more intimate, more personal, more simple. But even within this latter section there is one passage, 10-14, that describing the four rivers, which the reader feels to be out of harmony with the tone and spirit of the rest of the account and to be therefore from another mind.

i As yet there is no agreement about the division of the book as a whole, and we must agree with the verdict of Heinisch, Genesis 65, that 'much laborious and minute research is still required before we can form a clearer and more reliable picture' of the sources which have contributed to its compilation. Further, it must not be forgotten that our effort is to understand the book in its final form, in that namely in which it was given to the Church. It is in this final form that the book has its inspired and sacred character. This is important but sometimes lost sight of. Even if it is possible to discern a more primitive form of a narrative behind that contained in the inspired text, this is a matter of only literary and perhaps historical interest. We have no right to read into the existing text what the compiler has carefully eliminated therefrom. And again we have no right to separate what he has combined. For instance, even if it were the case, as some have thought, that behind chh 2-3 are two narratives, one of which spoke only of the tree of life and the other only of the tree of knowledge, this would in no way alter the fact that the inspired text speaks of both as growing in the Garden of Eden. See further § 45n.

138a Historical Character—The narrative ending at 11:26 is concerned with the period of prehistory or proto-history, whereas the patriarchs who are the subjects of the rest of the book lived in the second millennium B.C.

in a period now well-known to history and reaching down almost to the time of Moses. A consideration of the historical character of the book falls naturally therefore into two parts.

The chapters on the first ancestors of the Chosen People from Adam to Thare, namely, 2:4-11:26, carry the story back to the origins of the human race. The remoteness of this origin has become known only in modern times. In earlier ages when there was no reason to suppose the antiquity of the human race to exceed that apparently assigned in the Bible and nothing was known of the remote stone age, it appeared possible and credible that a tradition deriving from our first parents should have survived through the two thousand years which were thought to separate them from Abraham. Such faithful transmission seemed the more probable in that early men were credited with lives extending over hundreds of years. According to MT Adam died in the year of creation 930, when Mathusala was already 56 years old, and therefore of an age to be a reliable witness to the details of stories which would have fallen many times from the lips of Adam. When Mathusala came to die in the year of the world 1656, Noe was 600 years old; and Noe survived the birth of Abraham by 60 years and died only 15 years before Abraham's departure from Harrahan for Canaan. Three lives, therefore, covered the whole of this period of proto-history, and there was no difficulty in accepting the faithful transmission of the scanty records preserved in the Bible. Now, however, the discovery of human bones and artefacts in strata the age of which can be determined with more or less accuracy has completely altered this simple presentment of human history. We do not yet know how long mankind has inhabited this globe, but it is now certain that the period is to be reckoned not in thousands, but in tens of thousands, if not in hundreds of thousands of years. Now it passes belief that detailed stories should have survived by mere human tradition through such immensely long periods of time. God could, of course, have provided miraculously for their preservation through countless generations or he could have revealed them to Moses. But the indications are against such a supposition. Cain and Abel, Adam's two first sons, are said to have been respectively an agriculturist and a shepherd, and there is nothing to suggest that the terms are not to be understood in the sense they bore in the time of Moses in the second millennium B.C. Now the first signs of agriculture discovered in archaeological research place its beginnings long after the first appearance of man, at the earliest in the mesolithic period; and the animal remains found with the earliest beginnings of agriculture show that the domestication of animals was of later origin than the introduction of controlled crops. Similarly the statement that Cain built a city gives no hint that the word is not to be understood as it was in the time of Moses of a collection, however small, of dwellings built of stone or dried mud and mortar. See 'Le concordisme préhistorique ou la fin du concordisme,' by D. Buzy, S.C.J., in Mélanges E. Pouchard (Faculté de Théologie de Lyon, 1945).

It is for such reasons that the Biblical Commission wrote, 'It is impossible to deny or to affirm [the] historicity [of these chapters] as a whole without unduly applying to them norms of a literary type under which they cannot be classed'. And again, 'To declare a priori that these narratives do not contain history in the modern sense of the word might easily be understood to mean that they do not contain history in any sense, whereas they relate in simple and figurative language, adapted to the understanding of mankind at a lower stage of development, the fundamental truths underlying the divine scheme of salvation, as well as a popular description of the origins of the human race and of the Chosen People', § 53l-m, where see the whole passage. Thus we conclude that the sacred author adopted a style of writing, recognizable as such by his contemporaries, by which he clothed c These considerations do not mean that we are yet in a position to answer all the questions which these chapters present, and they do not apply with equal force to the whole of this proto-history of Israel. Certain incidents such as the Flood belong to times much nearer to those of the historical patriarchs and the memory of them had remained alive and vivid. The subject is delicate and complex. It is not yet possible to discriminate sharply between elements which are strictly historical and others which are symbolic or necessary for the completion of the picture as a whole. The Israelites knew that their people must be descended from the first human beings and also that their election by God to be what they were, his Chosen People, was no mere accident of time, but part of God's over-ruling Providence in the government of the world from the beginning of time. This is the lesson which lies behind the genealogies. We have an analogy to such quasi-historical records in the Babylonian tablets relating to prediluvian times, though without trace of the religious significance.

138d important religious truths in the form of a concrete graphic narrative. In a rude and uncultured people such vivid presentment was probably the only means possible for impressing these truths on their minds and hearts.

139a We now turn to the stories of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob who lived only some centuries before Moses in the second millennium B.C. Given the relatively small amount of material and its vivid, graphic character there is no difficulty in admitting its faithful oral transmission aided by constant repetition; cf. § 135a. St Jerome records that the young Jews of his day could repeat from memory all the generations from Adam to Zorobabel with the same accuracy and fluency as they would give their own name, In Ep. ad Tit. 3:9 (PL 26, 595). On the power of memory see also G. Ricciotti, Hist. d'Israël 1 (1939) 200-3. That God could make the promises and prophecies recorded there is no doubt and no reference to them can be expected in any external source. And the fact of actions being attributed to God does not necessarily imply a direct divine intervention. The Israelites spoke of the effects of the secondary causes created by God as being the actions of God himself. This is not incorrect, but is apt to mislead us, with our different way of speaking, into supposing a miraculous intervention where none is intended. Thus 2:5 speaks of God raining on the earth. Similarly there is no adequate reason for thinking that the Lord's opening Lia's womb, 29:31, was a miraculous intervention; cf. 30:22. So, too, the Lord's scourging of Pharaoh and his house, 12:17, was probably providential but not miraculous. Considered in the light of this usage the narrative is seen to be sober and free from any multiplication of the miraculous, such as would be alien to all we know of God's Providence.

b The veracity of the story is attested by the frank simplicity with which the wrong-doing of the patriarchs and others is set down—Jacob's inhumanity and covetousness in refusing food to his exhausted twin brother except at the price of his birthright, 25:29-34; the fraud and lies with which he extorted his father's dying blessing, ch 27; Rachel's theft of her father's teraphim, 31:19; the craft and savagery with which the sons of Jacob avenged the dishonour done to Dina, ch 34; their idolatry, 35:2; Ruben's sin of incest, 35:22; the hatred and cruelty Joseph met with from his brothers, ch 37; the wickedness of Judah's sons, Her and Onan, and their father's fornication with Thamar, ch 38. There is nothing here of which the Israelites would be proud, and the fidelity with which it is recorded is a guarantee of the endeavour of the human author to set down a veracious narrative.

c Mention of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and of their experience is not to be looked for in contemporary records as they played no part in secular history. Joseph was an important personage in Egypt of whom archaeological discovery might have found a mention. But the period of the Hyksos (c 1720-c 1580), under whom he most probably held office, is obscure and little is known of it. The general setting of patriarchal times in the Near East, however, is now known from the abundant information revealed by extensive excavation carried on throughout this region. The more numerous the sites explored and the ancient tablets deciphered, the more evident it has become that the background of the lives of the patriarchs as set forth in Genesis is in full accord with the conditions prevailing in the first half of the second millennium B.C. Thus E. A. Speiser writes: 'There is today no reason to doubt the authenticity of the general background of the patriarchal narratives. In point of fact, recent discoveries have greatly increased our respect for their essential accuracy', 43. And again, 'The minor incidents are demonstrably in keeping with the times, not to say conditioned by them', 45. So, too, W. F. Albright speaks of 'the extraordinary accuracy of the narratives of the patriarchs, when tested by our rapidly accumulating material', Archaeology, 144, and see § 79f.

d The patriarchs lived in tents, wandering from place to place with their herds and flocks. They were not nomads in the strict sense; they remained at times long enough in one place to grow corn. Now these wanderings are always in the mountain country and in the northern Negeb, not on the coastal plains. The country was already populated and had numerous towns, and the movements of the new-comers were conditioned by the geographical disposition of these existing inhabitants. And Albright has pointed out that this description of the lives of the patriarchs 'does not agree at all with conditions in any part of Palestine in the Iron Age', i.e. from 1200 B.C., 131. 'In the Middle and Late Bronze Ages (2000-1600 and 1600-1200 B.C.) the hill-country was still but sparsely peopled, and almost the entire sedentary population occupied the coastal plains, Esdraelon and the Jordan Valley. The plains and broad valleys were dotted with towns. . . . Occupation in these regions was considerably denser than it was in the Iron Age', whereas in the hill-country there was little hindrance to the movements of semi-nomads and their flocks, 131 f. Further, archaeology has established the age of many inhabited sites, and of the towns mentioned in the patriarchal narratives it has been definitely proved that the following were in existence in the Middle Bronze Age, Shechem, Bethel, Ai, Gerar, Dothan, Beersheba. Circumstances have not allowed archaeological examination of Hebron, but there is ample reason to credit its equal antiquity. On the other hand, no one of the Israelite settlements, such as Mizpah and Gibeah, is mentioned, Albright, 133.

e The Israelites could not fail to transmit faithfully the names of their great patriarchs. For external evidence of the names Abraham and Jacob see § 59f and de Vaux (1946) 323 f. That of Isaac has not been found, but it is of regular formation and there is no reason to doubt its authenticity.

f Much is now known of the legal codes of the ancient Near East and in particular of those of the Babylonians, Assyrians and Hurrites roughly contemporary with the patriarchal age. A study of these shows how closely patriarchal customary law in the matters of marriage and inheritance agrees with that prevailing at the time in the neighbouring countries; see C. H. Gordon in The Biblical Archaeologist III, 1 (Feb. 1940) 1-12 and de Vaux, 20-36. The latter writes: 'The Israelites of a later age had no knowledge of the documents we have been using; they lived in another stage of civilization; their customs were partly different. If, as has been said for long, they had reconstructed the past according to what they saw and what they imagined, the result would have been a picture different from that which we have, and it would have been incorrect', 36.

g In judging the reliability of the traditional text we must remember that scribes sometimes feel justified in substituting better-known recent names for ancient as Dan 139h in 14:14. W. F. Albright writes of the Joseph narrative: 'Since the story was so popular, and dealt with Egypt, the temptation for Israelite scribes who were acquainted with the Egyptian language and with life in Egypt to revise the names and details was irresistible', 143. The names may be anachronistic without detriment to the substantial historicity of the narrative.

1 It must also be remembered that the narratives belong to the type of literature which may be called popular tradition. They do not belong to what would now be styled scientific history. In the case of the former, writer and reader are aware that absolute accuracy is not claimed for the details of dialogue. These may be such as the situation would naturally elicit. There is an analogy to this even in the professedly serious history of Thucydides, and, to touch a sacred theme, the words of Consecration pronounced by our Lord once at the Last Supper are differently recorded in various parts of the NT. The inerrancy attaching to any inspired book is that belonging to the type of literature to which it belongs. This has long been recognized, as J. Brucker, S.J., says in L'Eglise et la Critique biblique (1908) 222, 'Provided that the inspiration and historical character of Genesis is loyally maintained, Catholic tradition leaves us great liberty in the interpretation of this venerable document'. And he proceeds: 'In each of the little dramas presented by the stories of Genesis may be distinguished what constitutes their action strictly speaking, and the development of the incidents and the dialogue and even their embellishment. Ordinarily it is only the first of these elements which demands a strictly historical interpretation', 223. Similarly Heinisch, 75, defines the aim of the ancient historian as 'agreement with fact in all essential points, freedom in the form of the presentation'.

140a A special feature of this ancient type of historical writing is the use made of genealogies, the outstanding example of which is given in the table of nations in ch 10. Of this use Heinisch writes: 'The genealogies, which enumerate peoples of regions as "sons" of a person or people or land, like . . . the lists of the posterity of Nachor in 22:20-24, of Abraham by Cetura in 25:1-6, of Ishmael in 25:12-16, also certain parts of the Edomite lists gathered in ch 36, are intended by the author to show that certain relations existed between the peoples named, not necessarily of blood-relationship in every case, but at least the relationship of neighbourhood in the present or the past and trade relations', 83.

b A question which requires separate discussion is that of the ages of the patriarchs. The considerations mentioned (§ 138b-d) render it impossible to suppose that ch 5 presents a genuine historical tradition concerning the actual ages of the antediluvian patriarchs. The date of the postdiluvian patriarchs of ch 11 is in the main much more recent but still belongs to a past so remote that it would conflict with all our knowledge to suppose the figures to be accurate. Even in the second millennium B.C. men in general can have had little more than a rough idea of their age. Even where an era existed, as in Egypt, it would be beyond the ability of any but the learned to reckon by it. And an examination of the information afforded concerning the age of the historical patriarchs at various times in their lives reveals certain facts which strongly suggest that the figures given rest on an artificial scheme appropriate in prescientific history. A number of the figures give the impression of being round or approximate. Abraham is 75 when he travels to Canaan, 12:4. He is just 25 years older at Isaac's birth, 21:5, and 75 years older again at death, 25:7. The exact age of 99 given in 17:1, 24 clearly depends on his age of 100 at Isaac's birth, 21:5, preceded by the announcement of Isaac's coming conception in 18:10. Isaac is 60 years old at Jacob's birth, 25:26, and Esau is 40 at the time of his marriage, 26:34.

c Now Sara was 10 years younger than her husband, 17:17. So at the time of their arrival in Canaan she was 65. Yet some time later when they go down to Egypt, her beauty is so striking that she is taken to 140e Pharaoh's court, 12:15. In 20:2 when she runs the same danger at the court of Abimelech, she appears to be over 90 (17:17). Isaac appears to be close to death when Jacob's ruse secures his blessing in ch 27. Actually according to the figures he was about 137, and survived some 43 years till his death at the age of 180 (35:28). (These ages are given by the following calculation. Joseph was 30 when put in control of Egypt, 41:46. After 7 years of plenty and 2 of famine, 45:11, he summoned Jacob to come to Egypt, 45:9. He was therefore about 39 at the time, and, as Jacob was then 130 [47:9], Jacob was about 91 at the time of Joseph's birth. And Joseph's birth occurred towards the end of Jacob's 14-year service with Laban, 30:25. Therefore when Jacob left Isaac and Rebecca to go to Mesopotamia, 27:43, he was about 77; and as his father Isaac was 60 at the time of Jacob's birth, he was then about 137 years old. And the last link in the argument is that Jacob's flight to his future father-in-law followed quickly after his outwitting Isaac and so gaining his blessing.)

The primary motive of Jacob's flight north was to escape the vengeance of Esau, 27:42, 45. Rebecca preferred to put another reason before Isaac. She feared lest Jacob might follow the example of Esau and marry one of the women of Canaan and suggested that he should seek a wife among his cousins in Mesopotamia, 27:46-28:5. So according to the figures given Isaac and Rebecca become nervous about the danger of their son falling in love with a native woman of Canaan when he is not far from attaining the responsible age of nearly fourscore years. Furthermore, when he reached his uncle's home, he finds two of his female cousins both unmarried and both of marriageable age. In fact, they are both young enough for their father to postpone their marriages for another 7 years, 29:20. Rachel subsequently bore two children and Lia, the elder of the sisters, was still young enough to become the mother of six, 35:23 f.

These combined improbabilities force on the reader e the conviction that the figures are not intended to reflect the actual ages of the historical patriarchs but are schematic and to be considered in relation to those of the ante- and postdiluvian patriarchs. That these were known to be schematic only is indicated by the freedom with which they were altered in early times as is clear from a comparison of the Hebrew, Samaritan and LXX texts. The additions and subtractions are mostly of 100, 50 or 60 years, and the purpose, most apparent in LXX, was to increase the antiquity of the Israelite race. The original numbers are probably those of the Samaritan text, according to which the ages of the antediluvian patriarchs gradually diminished with almost complete regularity in each successive generation from Adam to Lamech: 930; 912; 905; 910; 895; 847; 365 (Enoch); 720; 653. This fits with the ancient conceptions that wisdom comes with years, that wisdom was the special prerogative of the ancients, and that its fountain-head was to be found in the first generation, Job 15:7. According to this scheme Noe, the second father of the stock whence sprang the Hebrew people, must have a life as long as the first father and indeed longer as Adam had incurred the divine displeasure whereas Noe had not. Accordingly Noe lived for 950 years, and after him the ages descend again, much more rapidly now that the list approaches historical times. The figures fall as follows: 600; 438; 433; 404; 239; 239; 230; 148; 145 (Thare). The numbers in MT and LXX are higher, but show in the main the same diminution.

It was fitting again that Abraham, the direct ancestor f of the Chosen People and recipient of the divine promises, should have a longer life than his father, but as a personage of historical times of relatively modest length. He lived to be 175, 25:7. Isaac lived to be 180, 35:28; Jacob 147, 47:28; and Joseph 140f 110, 50:25. (On Joseph see also § 161e.) And Moses, as the great law-giver and deliverer of the people, in his turn has a longer life, dying at the age of 120 years, Deut 34:7. The one disturbing feature in the scheme is the advanced age of Isaac, as there is no apparent reason why his span of life should exceed that of Abraham. It may well be that the number rests on an error in the textual transmission. Ch 27 which represents him as close to death suggests that the original figure was considerably smaller.

141a I 1-II 3 God prepares a Home for Mankind—When God first created the earth, it was without vegetation or animal life, as it was covered by water. Over the waters was only darkness, and the Spirit of God brooded over them preparing the earth and the waters for the production of life, 1-2. The universe was gradually brought into its present condition by successive divine operations extended over six days. The first three days saw the preparation of the fixed setting of the world, and the second three the adornment and peopling of its different regions by the creation of moving beings, inanimate and animate. The first day saw the creation of light and the consequent separation of light and darkness, 3-5. The work of the second day was the creation of the vault or firmament of heaven with the separation of the waters on the surface of the earth from those supported by the firmament which come down on the earth in due season in the form of rain, 6-8. On the third day God gathered the waters on the earth into one gathering which received the name of the seas. Thus a portion of the surface of the earth became visible and was then clothed with vegetation, 9-13. So far all was motionless or rooted in one spot. On the fourth day God created the sun, the moon and the stars, and placed them in the firmament of heaven, 14-19. On the fifth day God peopled the waters and the skies by the creation of the fish and other dwellers in the seas and of the birds, 20-23. On the sixth day God peopled the earth first by the creation of the terrestrial animals and secondly of man. God created man to his own image and decreed that he was to have dominion over the living creatures, whether in the air, in the waters or on the earth. To all the animals and birds as to man God gave the vegetable kingdom for their nourishment, 24-31. Having completed his work of creation God rested on the seventh day and sanctified it, 2:1-3.

b Various doctrinal and other questions are omitted from the following notes, which set down only such remarks as appear necessary on the separate verses; see §§ 137a-d, 142a-g. 1. As the creation of the firmament is recorded in 7f., 'heaven and earth' here stands for the universe, which Hebrew had no one word to express. The verse is thus a summary of what follows. For an alternative translation see § 142f. 2. The earth was 'waste and empty', as it was without its vesture of vegetation and without any living creatures to move about on its surface. In the prescientific era the earth was naturally conceived to have been created in its solid mass and with its contours such as man has always known them. That this is the meaning is shown both by the fact that the earth presented a solid surface on which the waters rested and by Ps 103:6, where the Psalmist treating of the creation of the world says 'above the mountains stood the waters'. The darkness in which the world was created used to be described as 'chaos'. Thus in the breviary hymn for Sunday Vespers the oncoming of night is mentioned in the words 'illabatur tetrum chaos'. And this seems to have been the principal reason for the popularity of the idea that the world was created in a chaotic state. See Sutcliffe, 'Primeval Chaos not Scriptural' in Miscellanea Biblica II (1934) 203-15. The Spirit of God brooding over the waters depicts metaphorically God's loving care for the world and his preparation of it for the living creatures which were to come out of it. There appears to be no reason in the context for the 'powerful wind' 141b which some would substitute as a translation for 'the Spirit of God'. 3. In the form γενέσθω φῶς καὶ ἐγένετο this first divine command is quoted in illustration of its theme in the treatise of Longinus On the Sublime, 9, 9 (ed. W. R. Roberts, 1899, 64).

5. The Hebrew Sabbath began at evening on what we call Friday and ended in the evening of what we call Saturday, and as God's rest on the seventh day after his six days of work is proposed as a model of the Sabbath rest, it seems clear that the days of creation are represented as beginning in the evening. With this agrees the fact that the first day begins with a period of darkness which is followed by a period of the newly created light. 7. Omit the double 'that were', as there cannot have been waters above the firmament before its creation. 11. Three kinds of plants are mentioned, those which appear to have no seed like grass, those which have seeds that may be called naked like wheat and barley, and those which produce fruit with the seed within itself like figs and apples. 14. The heavenly bodies act as signs by aiding men to orientate themselves (the Hebrews fixed the points of the compass by facing the rising sun) and to find their direction when travelling. 20. 'the gliding creature' is from LXX, and also the production of the birds from the waters; MT 'let the waters swarm with swarms of living creatures, and let the birds fly over the earth'. 24. Cattle are domesticated from the beginning; 'the beasts of the earth' are the wild animals. 26. For 'the beasts and the whole earth' read with Syr, 'the cattle and all the beasts of the earth.' 'Man' is used collectively, as is shown by the plural verb 'let them have dominion' (MT, LXX). Note the solemnity with which is introduced the crowning act of creation, namely that of man. All else was created for his benefit.

29. To man for food God gave all plants with naked or covered seed (cf. on 11), but to the animal creation, 30, except the fish which are not mentioned, 'all green herbs'. The suggestion is that peace and harmony reigned in the whole of creation. No animal was in danger from its fellows or from man. And the Messianic age is depicted in Is 11:6-9 as a return to this primitive condition of universal harmony. The underlying idea is to emphasize the state of innocence in which man was created and to prepare the reader for the disharmony which sin was later to introduce into the world. The creatures of the sea, mentioned before together with the birds in 20-22, could not be introduced here, and there is consequently no allusion to the food provided for them. 31. After the various works of the previous days God saw that they were good, 4, 8 (LXX), 10, 12, 18, 21; and so also after the creation of the terrestrial animals on the sixth day, 25. Now when the creation of man had completed the execution of God's design, he saw that the world was 'very good'. This again prepares the reader's mind for the sad fact to become plain later in the story that everything evil which mars the perfection of the world, is due to the sin of man. II:1. 'The heavens and the earth' were completed in the work of the first three days. They provide the fixed setting of the theatre in which the drama of man's religious history is to be played out. The second three days witnessed the creation of their 'furniture' or adornment (LXX, Vg). MT (with 'aleph for yod) speaks of their 'host', the host of the firmament being the heavenly bodies, that of the seas the fish, and so forth. 2-3. God finished his work on 'the sixth day' (Sam., LXX, Syr.). The seventh day (MT, Vg) was introduced here by an incautious copyist misled by its being mentioned later in the verse. DV 'rested' (Vg 'requievit') is a strong anthropomorphism. The word šābat occurs twice in this passage, in both 2 and 3, and in both cases LXX translates by κατέπαυον ἀνὸ 'God desisted from all his works'; and the words are so quoted in Heb 4:4. But the idea of 'rest' is at least implicit in šābat, and is quite explicit in Ex 141d 31:17 'On the seventh day he rested and was refreshed' (RV; Vg and DV omit the second verb). Vg in 3 translates 'cessaverat' though DV reverts to the word 'rested'. Such variety in the choice of expression is characteristic of St Jerome.

142a To understand this account aright it is important to bear in mind certain theological principles of interpretation. The Bible is not a handbook of physical science. Its purpose is religious truth. Consequently the sacred writers, or more correctly 'the Spirit of God who spoke through them, did not intend to teach men what would help no one to attain his salvation'. So taught St Augustine in words made his own by Leo XIII (Dz 1947; EB 106). The Pope goes on to say that the sacred writers consequently speak of the constitution of the visible world and of its phenomena as the men of their time spoke and in language intelligible to their contemporaries. Now it is clear that the account of the way the world was formed could depend only on either reason or revelation. The principle laid down by Leo XIII in Providentissimus Deus just quoted excludes the revelation of the truths of natural science. And it is not credible that in the early prescientific days of the Hebrew people human reason had reached that exact knowledge of the constitution of the universe which it has taken mankind at large some thousands of years to attain. It follows, therefore, that God did not intend to give us in Gen 1 an account of the world in full accord with the actual facts of physical science.

b What we have is a popular account of the world as conceived by the ancient Hebrews in accordance with appearances. This is borne out by an examination of the text. We have light even on dull days when the sun is completely obscured, and it consequently appears to be an independent entity. In accordance with this it existed for three days before the creation of the sun on the fourth day. The earth appears to be flat and to be surmounted by a celestial dome or vault, which we call the firmament, a name which, it may be recalled in passing, implies its solidity. Water descends from above in the form of rain, apparently from a celestial reservoir in which it is stored. This is naturally supposed to be supported by the solid firmament, 6f. It falls when the apertures or 'flood gates' are opened, 7:11. The plants and trees are created on the third day, 12, as part of the fixed scene, and so before the existence of the sun, without which they cannot flourish. The heavenly bodies appear to be set on the under surface of the firmament, 17, and the sun and moon seem to be of greater size than the stars, 16. That the days of creation are proposed as natural days seems evident from the following facts. They are set forth as a model of the Hebrew week which culminated in the Sabbath rest, 2:3. Each has an evening and a morning, and the day is ruled by the heavenly bodies, 16. These days are part of the popular account and not intended to specify the time actually occupied in the work of creation. St Athanasius, PG 26, 276, and St Augustine, PL 34, 231, understood this and taught that all things were created at one and the same time; cf. Sutcliffe, The Six Days of Creation (CTS, 1945).

c This schematic and artistic presentation of the truth that the world belongs to God, that it was made by him and designed by him precisely as the home of man stands most suitably at the head of the OT, which in sum is the history of the covenant entered into by God with the people of Israel. From the first page the Israelite was reminded that the God whom he worshipped and who had condescended to make the children of Abraham his own chosen people out of all the nations of the earth was the one, true, only God, the Lord and Master of the whole world. The chapter contains besides other important heads of doctrine. This one, true God is depicted as alone creating and adorning the world. The sun and moon worshipped as divinities by the Babylonians are simply creatures, and so far from having any dominion over the human

142c race were made by God for the service of man. So too the beasts and birds adored by the Egyptians are the work of God's hands and put by him under the control of man. This implicit repudiation of polytheistic creeds is more effective than any explicit denial of their validity. Moreover, everything being made by God is good, even very good; and this inherent goodness of all God's creatures serves to emphasize in the later development of the story the wicked use man so often makes of them, as of the power and rights of marriage here instituted and blessed by God. Man is the special object of God's care. All else is designed for him and he is made the lord of all; cf. Ps 8. But though all else is subordinated to him, he is himself subordinated to his Maker and owes obedience to his commands. And this obedience is made the lighter by the loving condescension by which God deigned even to make man in his own image and likeness. It is to be noted that man as such, composed of body and soul, is made in the likeness of God, not one part of him only, and the immediate context suggests that the likeness is to be found primarily in man's lordship of created things, which bear a relation of subordination to him analogous to that which he bears to his Creator. But this lordship is founded in man's exclusive possession of intellect and will without which this lordship would be impossible. And it is therefore in these faculties of the spiritual soul that man's likeness to God ultimately rests. This explanation goes beyond the meaning which the text would have conveyed to the early Israelites at a time when they had not yet arrived at the concept of spirituality. On this question see the full discussion in Petavius, De Opificio Sex Dierum, Lib. 2, cap. 2. (The angels too were created in the likeness of God, but Gen 1 treats only of the visible world.)

The doctrine of creation out of nothing is explicitly stated in 2 Mac 7:28. Gen 1:1 speaks of 'creation', but does not say in so many words that the creation was out of nothing. Hence the question arises whether the doctrine can be proved from these opening words of Scripture alone. The word bārā' 'create' or 'make', which is used exclusively of divine operations, does not of itself include the idea of making out of nothing. It is used three times in 1:27 of the making of man, whose body was formed out of pre-existing matter. If 'in the beginning' is understood of the absolute beginning of time or of created things (both began together), then clearly, before God made the world, there was nothing out of which it could have been made. Petavius, however, De Opificio Sex Dierum I, i, 19 (Paris, ed., 1866) points out that the word 'beginning' can be understood to include all the six days. These six days are the beginning in which God made the world and all that is in it. He therefore maintains that as far as the strict meaning and import of the words is concerned, it cannot be deduced from the opening sentence of Gen that God made all things out of nothing (ibid. n. 9). He adds, however, that the doctrine being known from other sources illustrates the full meaning of the words 'In the beginning God made heaven and earth'. This is the translation of LXX and Vg. The Hebrew even with massoretic vocalization (cf. GK 130d) can be rendered 'In the beginning when God created the heavens and the earth and the earth was desolate and void and darkness was on the face of the abyss and the Spirit of God was hovering over the face of the waters, then God said "Let there be light"'. According to this rendering of the text God's first recorded act was the creation of light, though, and this is important, it is not implied that God did not create the world out of nothing, and the statement sometimes made that an eternally existing mass is supposed, is incorrect. Hebrew style often emphasizes one truth without implying a denial of what is not explicitly stated.

The biblical account of creation is independent of all pagan cosmologies. Not only is its religious outlook incomparably superior to the gross polytheism of 142g Israel's neighbours, the whole tone is far more lofty. The frame-work of six days followed by a day of rest is found nowhere else. There are, as would be expected, cosmological conceptions common to the Semitic world, such as the solid firmament and the waters above it, and t'hôm, the word used of the primeval ocean, recalls Tiamat, its personification in Babylonia. But speaking of Enuma elish, the Babylonian epic of creation, Sir Frederic Kenyon rightly says 'There is almost nothing to link the narrative to that of Genesis', Archaeology and the Bible (1940) 47. The question is one of literary and historical, not of theological, interest. For the Babylonian accounts see Sir E. Wallis Budge, Babylonian Legends of the Creation (1931), R. Labat, Le Poème babylonien de la Création (1935).

143a II 4-25 The Creation of the First Man and Woman—With this section begins a narrative written in a simple homely style quite different from the elevated tone characteristic of ch 1. According to the plan of the book it is dove-tailed with the preceding section which leads up to the creation of mankind in general without reference to particular persons. The present section sets forth the creation and condition of the first human pair. It is not a second account of the creation of the world, though the production of plants and animals is introduced at those points of the story where their relation to man requires it.

b In a certain region of the earth, probably Babylonia, there was as yet no vegetation of the smaller kinds which require surface water for growth as there was neither rain from heaven nor man to irrigate the soil, 5. There was, however, a source of water which man would be able to turn to good account, 6. God now formed the body of a man and made it to live, 7. God then placed him in a lovely oasis in Eden, 8, in which grew all manner of pleasant and fruitful trees, two in particular being called the tree of life and the tree of knowledge of good and evil, 9. The growth of these trees had been possible without the help of man as the undersoil received moisture from a river which ran through the oasis and on leaving it divided into four, 10-14. This oasis, which we call Paradise, was to be man's home. He would have pleasant occupation in looking after it, 15, and abundance of food from its variety of fruits, 16. In these surroundings there was nothing to test his loyalty to God. So God made the continuance of his happy state, including the privilege of immortality, dependent on the observance of one command. Man must not eat of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and of evil, 17. Now the man was alone and God intended him to have a consort, but he must first understand his need, as he did when he came to see and know the animals in the oasis. No one of them was fit to be his companion, 18-20. God then formed the first woman from his side, and in her the man recognized one of the same nature as himself and understood God's purpose in the institution of marriage, 21-24. And having reason in complete control of their lower nature, although naked they had no cause for shame, 25.

c 4. 'This is the history of the world'. The word tôl' dôt, lit. 'begettings' came to mean 'generations (of a family)', 'genealogy', and so 'history'. It is noteworthy that the history of a person is introduced as the history of his progenitor, as that of Abraham as 'the history of Thare', 11:27. So here the story of the first human beings is introduced as the history of the world out of which they were formed, 7. For the occurrences of the word, always as introduction to the following narrative, cf. § 136j-l. 'When the Lord God made heaven and earth, 5, there was as yet no herb of the field on the earth and no plant of the field had as yet sprung up, for the Lord God had not rained upon the earth'. The actions of secondary causes tend to be ignored by biblical writers and their causality to be attributed directly to God who created them. This was in part due to ignorance of these causes, an ignorance which, indirectly, had the happy effect of putting into prominent relief the reality of God's ever-continued government of the world. Note too the Hebrew use of universal expressions limited only by the context. The writer has in mind not the whole earth, but the particular region of Babylonia, where the rainfall is negligible and the soil fruitful when irrigated by man from the rivers. 'and there was no man to till the ground, 5, and raise the flowing waters from the earth to irrigate the whole surface of the ground'. The word 'ed' is explained by the Sumerian id 'stream, canal' and by extension the water they contain; see further Bi 30 (1949) 77 f. 7. God now formed the body of man out of the soil and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and 'the man became a living being'. At the time of Moses it was not yet known that the body of man is animated by a spiritual soul; cf. Sutcliffe, The Old Testament and the Future Life (1947¹) 152-9. The most obvious difference between a living and a dead body is that the latter has ceased to breathe. Accordingly life is spoken of as God's gift of breath, and death as his withdrawal of it as in Ps 103:29 f., where the phrase is used of the animals. There is consequently nothing in the expression to distinguish between the life of man and of brutes. 8. Events are not all narrated in chronological order but as the course of the story requires. God as a suitable home for man planted with trees 'a garden in Eden'. The familiar name 'Paradise' is derived from LXX παράδεισος, itself of Persian origin and denoting originally an enclosed park. Eden may be Bit-Adini on the middle Euphrates or, perhaps more probably, may represent the Assyrian word edinu meaning an open plain or desert, as that is what the territory was in which the garden was situated. The word 'pleasure' is due to the existence of a homonym with that meaning and the fact that the garden was a most delectable home. 9. The trees had been able to grow because the undersoil was moistened by the water which seeped through from the river, 10. Some of the trees were purely ornamental, others also fruit-bearing. The tree of life is probably to be conceived as having fruit of preternatural power capable of entirely restoring human energy and vitality and so of preserving the strength of youth. By its means Adam and Eve, though mortal by nature, would have enjoyed the gift of immortality. Unlike this tree, the tree of knowledge of good and of evil would have no unusual powers in its fruit. But it was the subject of the one divine prohibition to which Adam was subjected, 17. If he transgressed this prohibition and ate of its fruit, he would learn by bitter personal experience how transient is the enjoyment of sin and how bitter and enduring its consequences. He knew already the distinction between good and evil; unless he had known that it is sinful to disobey the commands of God, there could be nothing morally wrong in his disobedience. He was plainly warned of the unhappy consequences of transgression, but before his sin he did not know them by experience. At the same time, the name could be interpreted to mean omniscience according to the Hebrew idiom by which totality is expressed by means of the conjunction of opposites. Of this possibility the powers of evil were ready to take advantage, as the sequel shows, 3:5.

The passage, 10-14, interrupts the narrative and is marked by an entirely different style and outlook. Its purpose is to give a more exact geographical indication of the site of Paradise. This is done by the statement that a river watered the garden and after leaving it divided into four rivers, the names of which will have been well-known at the time when the narrative was written. As the Euphrates and the Tigris both gird Mesopotamia, various attempts have been made to identify the other two with confluent or canals in their upper, middle or lower courses. No such proposal bears the marks of probability. A more radical solution was current in the early Church. It must be remembered that geography is a science like astronomy, and, although scientific knowledge about the earth is more easily acquired than about 143g the stars, nonetheless its acquisition presented formidable difficulties which it took many generations to overcome. Exact statement of geographical fact must not be expected in the Bible any more than of astronomical; cf. § 142a. Now according to St Augustine, whereas the Tigris and the Euphrates have retained their ancient names, the Phison and the Gehon have not, their new names being respectively the Ganges and the Nile, De Gen. ad lit., Lib. 8, cap. 7 (PL 34, 378). These were the four great rivers known to the ancient world and the ideal site of the home of our first parents would be at the central point where these four rivers separate to water the four quarters of the earth. So too Josephus, Ant. Jud. 1, 1, 3, identifies the Phison with the Ganges and the Gehon with the Nile. This former identification is suggested by St Jerome, Quaest. Hebr. in Gen. (PL 23, 941) and the latter is made also in LXX Jer 2:18. The historian Arrian provides a good illustration of geographical knowledge as late as the 4th cent. B.C. When Alexander the Great reached the Indus, he thought he had found the source of the Nile, Anabasis, 6, 1, 2f.

b The thread of the narrative is picked up again in 15 by the repetition from 8 that God placed man in this garden 'to dress it and keep it', or 'tend it' (not 'to guard it'; there was nothing and no one to guard it against). 16. 'thou mayest eat'. 17 has been understood in two ways—as a threat either of immediate death which God did not carry out as the sinners were not obstinate, or of subjection to the law of death as they would no longer have access to the tree of life, 3:22. The Hebrew suggests the former. 19. The animals in question are only those of Paradise; see on 2:5. Being concerned with the story of Adam, and not with the creation of the world, this is the first time the writer has had occasion to mention them, and he does not mean that they were created now after man. The Hebrew mode of speaking does not warrant the idea that God miraculously brought all the animals before Adam; see on 2:5. In the natural course of things Adam came to see and know the various kinds of animal in the garden and the adequacy of his knowledge is emphasized by the statement that he gave them names and did so correctly ('the same is its name'). The point of this is that for the Hebrews names were not thought of as mere labels but as denoting the nature, character or office of the thing or person named. 20. It is thus brought home to Adam that surrounded as he is by living creatures, he is yet alone. 21. God now proceeds to give him a consort. The 'deep sleep' is expressed by the same word (tardēmāh) as is used for the natural slumber that overcame the weary Jonas, 1:5. There is no reason to doubt the translation 'rib' which is supported both by the ancient versions and by the cognate word in Arabic. 23. In the other living beings he had seen Adam had recognized no similarity of nature, but in the newly formed woman he recognized the very same nature as his own. This is an important point of doctrine against the view that woman is of a nature inferior to man. At the same time the manner in which her formation is described is designed to teach that in the institution of the family the husband and father is the natural and divinely instituted head to whom all the other members are subordinate as good order requires a central authority in every society. 24. It is not clear whether these words are Adam's or the sacred writer's. In either case they can be attributed to God as our Lord appears to do, Mt 19:4 f. In the former case they are conceived as a divine prophecy put into the mouth of Adam and in the latter as due to the divine inspiration of the hagiographer. The Council of Trent attributes them to Adam, but does not pretend to settle a point of this kind, Dz 969. The words teach the indissolubility of marriage as one flesh cannot be divided. And that marriage by divine institution is between one man and one woman was made more plain by Christ when he referred to this passage and added, 'Therefore now they are not two but one flesh', Mt 19:6. 25 in the light of 3:7 signifies that in the state of innocence the lower powers of human nature were entirely subordinated to the rule of reason. Our first parents were thus placed in conditions of physical and spiritual felicity. Their bodily needs were supplied by the trees of the garden, the care of which was designed to supply pleasant occupation. As they were created in adult life, God will have given them that knowledge which was necessary to their state, a knowledge that human beings have normally to acquire through the years of childhood and adolescence. Though by nature mortal, they had in the tree of life the means of preserving health and strength indefinitely. In other words, they had the gift of immortality. They had moreover the preternatural gift of integrity. That is, by a special privilege their nature was 'whole' and without internal conflict, as their bodies with their physical powers were entirely under the control of reason, which had not therefore to control the spontaneous impulses of their lower nature. This gift of integrity is also called the absence of concupiscence, and is indicated by the fact that, though naked, they had no cause for any sense of shame. That they were created in the state of sanctifying grace and were destined for the beatific vision cannot be deduced from the OT, but is learnt from the NT.

The theory of evolution or transformism, which figures so largely in modern text-books of biology, was unknown to the Hebrews and the animals are represented as created according to 'their kinds' or their species, such as they were known to have at the time Genesis was written. What the book offers is a popular account suited to the mentality of the age, and directed to a purely religious purpose. It was not the wish of the Holy Ghost in inspiring the sacred writers to teach men such matters of purely secular knowledge; cf. § 142a. This applies also to the theory—it is nothing more than a theory lacking proof—that the human body has been evolved from lower forms. If it should ever be established, the religious teaching of Genesis would remain the same, namely, that the world was created for the sake of man, who is himself the work of God's hands no matter what path the divine wisdom chose to follow in the production of man's bodily frame. That man has a spiritual rational soul is established by philosophy as is also the fact that such a spiritual substance could not have its origin in anything material. And it is due to man's spiritual soul that his mental powers differ essentially from those of even the highest of the brute creation. The refined concept of spiritual being, however, was not attained till many centuries after the time of Moses.

Pius XII reminds us that the question does not belong exclusively to the field of natural science and that the sources of revelation impose caution and moderation. It is one that may be freely discussed, provided we are prepared to accept the decision of the Church, to whom Christ committed the charge of interpreting Holy Scripture and of guarding the doctrines of the Faith (Humani generis AAS 42 (1950) 575 f.).

In the same Encyclical the Pope goes on to say that as regards polygenism Catholics do not enjoy the same liberty. For the faithful cannot embrace the opinion that after Adam there lived on this earth true men not derived from him by natural generation, or that Adam signifies a plurality of first parents 'since it is not at all clear how such an opinion can be reconciled with what the sources of revelation and the acts of the Church's teaching authority put forward concerning original sin' (ibid. 576).

III 1-24 The Temptation, Fall and Punishment of Adam and Eve—1. Adam and Eve had no source of temptation in their own lower nature on account of the absence of concupiscence, and the incitement to evil came from without. At the time when Genesis was composed the existence of wicked spirits, angels fallen from their high estate, had not yet been revealed—the name Satan first occurs in the book of Job and 144a then not as that of a wicked spirit—and the power urging to evil is introduced under a symbolical form. The choice of the serpent was suitable for several reasons. The temptation to be proposed was subtle and the serpent was reputed to be crafty and cunning, Mt 10:16. As the narrative explains how the existing state of the world came to be, and God was to set enmity between the human race and the power that had incited to the first sin, 15, the animal chosen had to be one between whom and men hostility as a fact exists. This condition excluded all the domestic animals between which and Eve a friendly conversation might appear less surprising. But in Paradise peace and harmony existed between all creatures. The choice may also have been influenced by ideas current in the Semitic world. In the epic of Gilgamesh it was a serpent that deprived the hero of the precious plant of immortality. The choice may also have had a polemical purpose. Serpents were associated with Canaanite worship (J. Goppens, La Connaissance du Bien et du Mal, Louvain, 1948, 93 f., 123), and the part played by the serpent in procuring the downfall of mankind would tend to lessen the attractiveness of the cult. This supposition is strengthened by the consideration of the various polemical motives in ch 1. With the progress of revelation it came to be understood that the serpent is a symbol of the devil, Wis 2:24, Apoc 12:9.

b The conversation starts with the untrue suggestion: 'Has God really commanded you not to eat of any of the trees in the garden?' 8. Omit 'perhaps' which is due to the Latin idiom of Vg. 4. Now the serpent boldly lies, and even, 5, dares to attribute God's prohibition to a jealous desire to prevent his creatures from acquiring a knowledge which would make them like to himself. The serpent plays upon the name of the tree as suggesting omniscience; cf. on 2:9. 6. Thus 'the serpent seduced Eve by his subtlety', 2 Cor 11:3, and she saw that the tree was 'a delight to the eyes and desirable for the gaining of wisdom'. 7. The words of the serpent in 5 had been true but not in the sense it had insinuated. The knowledge immediately won was that of the power of their lower nature, now no longer under the complete control of reason, and their eyes were opened only to see their nakedness. 8. They heard 'the sound' of God's steps approaching. 10. Again it is emphasized that the knowledge acquired was a knowledge of guilt and shame. 12. Instead of humbly confessing his sin Adam attempts to throw the blame on his wife, who, in her turn, 13, tries to make the serpent responsible. 14. St Basil points out that a change is implied and that the serpent had previously walked on legs and feet, PG 30, 68. This, however, is dubious and in any case it is not intended that the change should be understood as an historical fact. The idea is probably polemical suggested by the pagan representation of the serpent standing erect. There is no evidence of an ancient popular belief that serpents do eat dirt (Is 65:25 is a reference to our passage) and the thought will have been suggested by the serpent's crawling gait and the metaphorical expression of abject humiliation as 'licking the dust', Ps 71:9, Is 49:23.

c 15a. The friendly terms that existed between Eve and the serpent are not to last. There will be hostility between them and between their respective descendants, signified by the word 'seed'. It is unusual that this should be used of a woman though it is also used of Rebecca, 24:60, with the same sense of 'posterity'. The hostility foretold is manifest in the relations normally existing between men and serpents. 15b. It can hardly be doubted that the feminine pronoun had its origin in the error of an early copyist of Vg. In his Lib. Quaest. Heb. in Gen. St Jerome quotes the Old Latin version of this text with the masc. (ipse) and translates the Hebrew with the same, PL 23, 943, and ipse is the reading of various Vg MSS. It is therefore highly improbable that he translated ipsa here; see Sutcliffe CR (1931) 151-3. As the word refers to the 'seed', it may be replaced in English by 'it'. The translation of the verbs requires discussion. Both of the seed and of the serpent the word used is šūp. This occurs besides only Jb 9:17 'he breaketh me with a tempest' (RV) or 'he overwhelmeth me with a storm', LXX ἐκτρέφω, Vg 'conteret', and Ps 138 (139) 11 'darkness shall overwhelm me' (RV), LXX κατακρήσσει, Vg 'conculcabunt'. (To speak of darkness crushing or overwhelming is not out of keeping with Heb. diction, and there is no need to emend to šūkkēnt 'will cover me'.) In our passage LXX took the word as a parallel form of šā'ap and translated κρήσσει . . . κρήσσεις 'be on the watch for'. Syr. translates, first, ndūš 'crush' and, secondly, temhe 'wound, strike'. Vg conjoins these two with 'conteret' and 'insidiaberis'. AV RV have 'bruise' in both places. This cannot be considered satisfactory. The word is unsuitable for the serpent, and is not in harmony either with the strength of the concept manifest in Jb 9:17 or with the antecedent probabilities of the outcome of an attack on the serpent's head. The outcome of enmity set by God between the two parties will not be a mere 'bruise' on either side. The sense 'crush' which the context suggests is supported by LXX, Syr. and Vg with the renderings quoted above. This meaning is clearly suitable to describe the action on the serpent but not that taken by it. That the word is used with this sense of the first action is not likely to have induced its use, though unsuitable, of the second. The most likely explanation is that the linguistic sense of the Hebrews, while rejoicing in the assonance, recognized that here the word is used in the other sense 'to be eager for' attested by LXX and Vg. The allied form šā'ap has this sense, and that it is common to both is further suggested by the fact that both forms have in common the meaning 'crush'. Hence the translation: 'It shall crush thy head and thou shalt lie in wait for its heel'. On the meaning of the prophecy see § 145d-e.

16. 'I will multiply the sorrows of thy conceptions': a hendiadys. 'thy longing shall be to thy husband'. The proper subordination of the wife to her husband (see on 2:23) is now changed, as often in the ancient Orient, to one of subjection. There is, of course, no moral objection to measures for the mitigation of the pains of childbirth any more than there is to facilitate, 17, the labours of man in the production of food. In the garden no arduous toil was required to provide food. That is now changed. 18. The word 'herbs' is that used in 1:29 and includes those of which man eats only the seeds like wheat and barley. 19. Note that the introduction, 7, and improvement, 21, of clothing is mentioned expressly, which shows that 'bread' here does not denote baked flour. If this had been intended, there would have been a reference to its invention; cf. 4:17-22. The word lehem is used of food in general, both of man, Jg 13:15 f., and of beasts, Ps 146 (147) 9. From this verse come the words with which the Church reminds the faithful on Ash Wednesday of man's frail tenure of life adding the symbolic signing of the Cross with ashes on the forehead of each one. 20. The name 'Adam' means 'man' and first occurs definitely as a proper name in 4:25. In all previous occurrences wherever Hebrew admits of the use of hē (= the def. art.) it is found in MT; and, against MT, was certainly intended with the preposition in 2:20 and 3:17. Thus here and elsewhere up to 4:25 Adam is spoken of simply as 'the man'. The name 'Eve' denotes the source of (human) life. The position of this verse rather interrupts the easy flow of the narrative. 21. On the omission of reference to secondary causes see on 2:5. The omission here, however, is probably due to the fact that life, which was created by God, is sacred to him. Man's diet is still spoken of as purely vegetable, 17-19, and permission to eat flesh is first given in 9:3. 22. The construction of the sentence remains unfinished, but is readily understood. The foolish pride of the ambition to become like to God merited the severe irony of this sentence, which is in no way surprising in this strongly anthropo-

144d morphic passage. The irony is manifested by the context and not by any special form of speech. God determines that Adam shall not (again) eat of the tree of life. It is not implied that he had not previously done so. 23. 'out of the garden of Eden'; cf. 2:8 'a garden in Eden'. 24. The Cherubim are interpreted by Christian tradition as Angels. The word is of uncertain derivation; the Assyrian karibu and kuribu mean 'great, powerful'. A Mesopotamian analogy is provided by the twin figures of winged bulls guarding the entrance to temples.

145a The narrative is direct and objective and reflections such as the folly and ingratitude of Adam and Eve's conduct are left to the reader. Similarly there is no analysis of the nature of the first sin. It had various elements, but first and foremost it was a sin of pride by which they irrationally desired to rise above their nature and attain a divine prerogative, 5. 'Pride is the beginning of all sin', Ecclesiastes 10:15. It was also a sin of disobedience, Romans 5:19, and a sin of grave irreverence against God in that they believed the serpent rather than God, and even its suggestion that God's prohibition was motivated by jealousy, 5. That Adam as well as Eve believed the serpent is implied in the statement made by God about his attainment of divine equality, 22.

b The further question now arises whether the sacred author under the symbol of the tree of knowledge and its fruit had some particular species of sin in mind. Such a possibility was indicated by St Augustine: 'If any wish to understand the tree not literally as a real tree having real fruit but figuratively, let the application be consonant with the faith and the demands of verisimilitude', De Gen. ad lit., Lib. 11, cap. 41, n. 56 (PL 34, 452). The interpretation St Augustine had in mind is that which understood the eating of the fruit to signify the use of matrimonial rights. This was the teaching of Julius Cassianus, leader of the Docetae, who held such use to be sinful. He argued that the tree was the tree of knowledge and knowledge stands for sexual relations, 4:1, Clement of Alexandria, Stromata, 3, 14 (PG 8, 1193 f.). It was also the view of St Zeno, Bishop of Verona, though he does not explain wherein the malice of the act lay, Tract., Lib. 1, 13, n. 5 (PL 11, 348). It is also urged that the close connexion established in the story between the eating of the fruit and the knowledge of concupiscence suggests a sexual interpretation. But the openness with which Scripture speaks of sexual relations is alone sufficient to show that if the sacred writer had had anything of the kind in mind he would not have hesitated to speak with some plainness. Moreover, the meaning attaching to the phrase 'to know' a wife cannot be separated from the object of that knowledge and transferred to knowledge in general. The knowledge of concupiscence which followed the sin is adequately explained whatever the nature of the sin, for, on any hypothesis, it was an act of rebellion against the dominion of God, who in just punishment withdrew the gift of integrity and allowed our first parents to suffer the rebellion of their own lower nature and to know its influence anticipating the control of reason. God had blessed the union of the sexes; he had created Eve precisely to be the necessary counterpart of Adam; he wished the human race to increase and multiply. St Augustine pours scorn on the idea: 'ridiculum illud est', loc. cit. The fact is that the story presents no satisfactory basis for any sexual interpretation. It is true that there are allusions to matters of sex just as there are to the procurement of food and eating. Both being fundamental in human life and both being adversely affected by the first sin, neither could be omitted from the account. The punishment of pain in childbirth affects the woman only whereas a sexual sin would have been common to both. These pains are the outstanding characteristic of woman's lot as the labour of procuring bodily nourishment in the sweat of his brow is characteristic of that of man. Each is punished according to natural disposition. As regards the trees, given the general interpretation proposed, § 143f, there does not seem to be any cogent reason for looking beyond the surface suggestion of the narrative (see on 2:9) for any specific symbolism. It appears that the sacred writer had received no revelation as to the exact nature of the first sin, and, it being difficult to conceive to what sin but pride and disobedience man in a state of innocence, with his lower nature entirely subject to reason, could be exposed, he represented the moral fall of man in a way suggested by the paradise in which he lived. The gravity of the sin lies in the fact that it is equivalent to the proud refusal 'I will not serve', Jer 2:20.

c In view of the apparent connection of the story with Mesopotamia it might be expected that some similar account would be found in that region. Actually no such story in Sumerian or Babylonian literature has been found among the tens of thousands of tablets recovered. The story of Paradise and the Fall appears to have been unknown among those peoples. Certain elements of the story, however, are found among the Babylonians. This is not surprising as the sacred writer uses for his own sublime purpose symbols and ideas current in his time. The Babylonians were familiar with a tree or plant of life. There is, however, no moral purpose in Gilgamesh's being deprived of this plant by a serpent. A scene depicting Adam, Eve, a tree and the serpent was once supposed to be engraved on a certain cylinder seal. Such sensational interpretations are not uncommon when archaeological discoveries first become known. The scene probably represents two gods standing by the tree of life together with a serpent associated to their cult. See A. Condamine, S.J., DAFC I 339-42, esp. 341; also E. A. Wallis Budge, The Babylonian Legends of the Creation (1931) 74; A. Deimel, S.J., 'De Serpentinibus in Religione Babyloniorum' VD 4 (1924) 342 ff.; J. de Fraine, S.J., 'Paradisus apud Sumeros?' VD 25 (1947) 161-71.

d The punishment inflicted by God for the sin of Adam and Eve was accompanied by a promise of victory over the powers of evil. This first announcement of good tidings to fallen man is commonly called the Protoevangelium, 15. The force of the prediction is not exhausted by the hostility foretold between the human race and the race of serpents. The serpent symbolized the power of evil (see on 3:1) and God promises that he will put enmity between it and their respective seeds. The initiative is therefore taken by God, which is itself a guarantee of continued divine help and of final victory. The words were spoken in the presence of Adam and Eve and were intended to be understood by them, though not necessarily in the fullness of their signification. In the circumstances as they knew of no other woman, they could not understand by 'the woman' any other than Eve herself. Similarly the readers for whom Genesis was originally intended could have understood no one else, as no other woman is mentioned in the context either before or after. (It is true that Hebrew uses a definite form of speech, where we use the indef. art., as in Jg 4:21 where MT has 'the peg', obviously not the only peg holding the tent but made definite as the peg used by Jahel; but this construction is only possible where the context does not indicate exclusively one person or thing.) In the case of the devil 'seed' is doubly metaphorical as his 'offspring' are the spiritual beings who follow his leadership. Now as the seed of the serpent is collective, so also is the seed of the woman; and Eve 'was the mother of all the living', 3:20. God promises enmity, therefore, between the human race on the one hand and the devil and his spiritual accomplices on the other. God promises further that the seed (see on 3:15) shall crush the head of the serpent-devil, which denotes complete and final victory for the human race. The promise is made to the race collectively and not individually. It is for each one with the help of God and his own free will to ensure that he shares in the blessing promised to all. Then to the serpent God says that it will wound the heel of the seed or offspring of the woman. It will be able 145d to inflict minor but not fatal injury. This, therefore, is a most consoling promise of final victory for all unless they chose freely to rank themselves among the seed of the devil, Mt 3:7, Jn 8:44. But how and by what means and under whose leadership this victory was to be achieved was not yet revealed and became clear only with the gradual progress of revelation; see J. Corluy, S.J., Spicilegium Dogmatico-Biblicum I (1884) 367.

It is clear, however, in the full light of later revelation that what has been said does not exhaust the full meaning of the prophecy. For Jesus Christ was not only part of the human race to whom victory was thus promised, he was not only its leader in the victorious struggle, the victory was rendered possible solely by him. 'For this purpose the Son of God appeared that he might destroy the works of the devil', 1 Jn 3:8. So too St Paul teaches that Christ became man that 'he might destroy him who had the empire of death, that is to say, the devil', Heb 2:14. But the victory is ours with Christ. So St Paul alluding to the Protevangelium: 'The God of peace crush Satan under your feet speedily', Rom 16:20. But we are one with Christ, he the head and we the members. 'He saith not, And to his seeds, as of many, but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ', Gal 3:16. Yet after this emphatic statement that the seed is one and is Christ, Paul goes on to say that if they are Christ's, the faithful are also the seed, 3:29; cf. Rom 9:7f. This rests on the doctrine of the spiritual union of all in Christ's Mystical Body. In this true sense, as St Paul teaches, Christ is the seed. And from this it follows that the Woman is his Blessed Mother. This follows also from the typical relation existing between Eve and Mary, a relationship on which the Fathers loved to dwell and which is summed up in her title of the Second Eve. As Eve was the mother of all the living in the physical order, so Mary is the Mother of all the living in the spiritual order, just as Christ for an analogous reason is the Second Adam having in the first Adam 'a figure of him who was to come', Rom 5:14. These considerations explain, as it seems, why the prophecy is addressed, not as we should have expected to Adam, the head of the race, but to Eve, and why use is made of the unusual expression of the seed of the woman. Cf. Sutcliffe, CR 2 (1931) 149-60.

146a IV 1-16 Cain's Murder of Abel—1. There are many popular etymologies of names in Gen. In the present instance the name seems rather to have been chosen as having a suitable assonance with Eve's utterance (Qayin, prob. 'smith', qānīft, 'I have got'). Eve sets an example to parents in gratefully acknowledging her indebtedness to God. 2. Abel's name is the same in form as hebel 'breath' and metaphorically 'what is evanescent, worthless', but it is likely that this word was chosen to express the shortness of his life before it had acquired a disparaging sense. 4. 'of their fat'; cf. Num 18:17. On similar occasions God showed his favour by consuming the offering by fire from heaven, Lev 9:24, Jg 6:21. 5. We may deduce from God's displeasure that Cain had already been guilty of sin, as in fact St John teaches saying that Cain killed his brother 'because his own works were wicked and his brother's just', 1 Jn 3:12; cf. Heb 11:4. 7. 'If thou do well, will there not be forgiveness?'; cf. 18:26 for the meaning of the verb. Sin is represented as an animal crouching at the door and ready to spring. 'It shall lust after thee, but thou canst have the mastery over it'. Note that man has free will and can overcome all appeals of evil; also that one sin not repented prepares the way for other and greater sins, as actually happened in the case of Cain. 10. For the other sins which cry to God for vengeance see 19:13, Ex 2:2, 33:9; Jas 5:4. 14. Cain is driven forth from the area of cultivated ground. In biblical language when God is angry, he hides his face, Ps 29:8. Cain speaks as if he would no longer be under God's protecting care. The murder took place when there was already a large population. Seth was born after the murder, 25, when Adam was 130 years old, 5:3. God had blessed the race and commanded them to increase and multiply 1:28, and Adam begot unnamed and unnumbered sons and daughters, 5:4. As the story is told, therefore, in 130 years the number of men and women would have increased very considerably. 15. 'sevenfold' means 'severely'. The mark set on Cain showed that he belonged to God, was under his protection, and therefore could not be touched. It was an ancient custom for slaves attached to a temple to be marked with the emblem of their deity; cf. Herod. 2, 113. 16. 'and dwelt in the land of Nod', which is otherwise unknown. The name suggests a land of wanderers or nomads.

This narrative shows how quickly after the first transgression sin gained a hold in the world. It teaches how hateful to God the sin of murder and in particular of fratricide is; how smaller sins, if neglected, lead on to greater; that man is always master of and responsible for his actions; that God is the just ruler of the world who cannot allow evil to go unpunished. On the historical character of the episode see §138c-d. 17-24 The Story of the Cainites—Biblical narratives do not always follow chronological order. Matters are sometimes grouped according to subject, independently of whether they are in part earlier than events narrated earlier or later than others set forth subsequently. Thus the birth of Henoch, 17, will have occurred before the murder of Abel. Similarly, as the sacred writer wishes to put down here all he has to say about the Cainites and to leave them out of his story, part of the account may well refer to events after the Flood. This will be the case with the invention of metal-working.

17. 'As there were no human beings except those born (of Adam and Eve) men took their sisters in marriage. This practice owes its early origin to necessity and its later culpability to the prohibition of religion', St Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xv, 16. The 'city' denotes a collection of dwellings surrounded by some defensive work; cf. §138c. Cain was not accompanied in his banishment by his family and he feared that an attempt might be made to take revenge on them. 19. The beginning of polygamy, a departure from strict morality on the part of the Cainites. 20. Abel had been a shepherd; Jabel introduced the nomadic life of herdsmen. His name in the older tradition of LXX was Jobel (Yobel) and denotes him as one leading his flocks in their migrations. 21. 'pipe' (DV 'organs'). The name Jubal (Yubal) is prob. connected with yōbēl 'ram's horn, cornet', whence our 'jubilee'. 22. Cain signifies 'smith', the name again being chosen to suit the invention. The discovery of metal-working long antedates the 'Ages' named after them (Early Bronze ending c 2000 B.C., and the Iron Age beginning 1200 B.C.). According to Prof. Henry Louis, 'it appears to be generally held that iron was first produced in workable quantity on the southern flanks of the Caucasus, and the date assigned is usually somewhere about 3000 B.C.', Nature (18 May 1929) 762. But before the metal became available in any quantity the method of working it will for long have been preserved as a strict family or clan secret, as is implied in this story of Lamech. That with Lamech we reach proto-historical times after the Flood (see §146c) is also indicated by the mention of Noema. The apparently pointless insertion of this name is explained if it rested on an ancient tradition which was set down as remembered. 23. 'Ada and Sella, hear my voice; ye wives of Lamech, hearken to my speech; for I kill the man who woundeth me and the youth who striketh me; for sevenfold vengeance is taken for Cain but for Lamech seventy and sevenfold'. This most ancient verse is already marked by the parallelism so characteristic of Heb. poetry. Lamech is in possession of new and formidable weapons far superior to the clubs and stones at the disposal of possible aggressors. As it was God himself who had promised vengeance

146d to Cain, Lamech's words are tinged with blasphemy, as well as a spirit of unbridled vengeance.

- Two characteristics stand out in the history of the Cainites. Nothing morally good is told of them, only evil—murder, polygamy, contempt of human life, the spirit of vengeance, irreverent speech about God. On the other hand, they excel in the arts of material human progress. To them is attributed the first 'city', the craft of the herdsman leading a nomadic life, the invention of musical instruments, and the discovery of metal-working. These are not condemned; they are good uses of the creatures put by God at man's disposal. But the lesson is clear. The more man gives himself to his material needs and temporal betterment, the greater the danger of his losing sight of his moral obligations. And in the extreme case, a life of luxury is unlikely to be one of virtue.

f 25-26 The History of Seth—25. The connection of this section with the preceding is that Seth was the first to be born to Adam after the murder of Abel. His name (Sheth) seems to be chosen to give the required assonance with shath (DV 'hath given'). In this verse 'Adam' is used for the first time as a proper name. Previously he has been spoken of as 'the man' = hā'ādām. The massoretic vocalization is faulty in 2:20 and 3:17. 26. 'Enosh' means 'man'. 'Yahweh' here has prob. supplanted original 'God': 'then men began to be called by the name of God'. So probably. This refers only to the Sethites whose genealogy is traced back to God in ch 5 and who in 6:2 are called 'the sons of God'. For the construction cf. Is 44:5.

g V 1-31 The Genealogy of the Sethites—The entirely new start which repeats even the creation of Adam shows that the Cainites are now dismissed from the story and that it is concerned now solely with the Sethites. On the numbers see § 140b-e. The Babylonians similarly listed ten antediluvian kings with immensely long reigns. The first, Alulim, is credited with 67,200 years, and his successor Alagar with 72,000; see B. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien, 2 (1925) 439. The names were chosen for reasons which escape us. The meaning of most is conjectural and the vocalization is sometimes uncertain. Malaleel means 'Praise of God'.

h 1. 'Document' or 'register' (DV 'book'). 'Adam' is here 'man, mankind', as is shown in 2 where it is said that God created them male and female and 'called their name man'. In 3 it again occurs as a proper name. The likeness to God which Adam himself received he passed on to Seth, who, it is implied, transmitted it to his descendants. This is not said of the race of the Cainites. 22. Henoch was a man of markedly virtuous life, which is the meaning of 'he walked with God'; cf. 6:9. See Eccles 44:16; 49:16; Wis 4:10-14. 'By faith Henoch was translated that he should not see death', Heb 11:5. He and Elias are commonly understood to be the two witnesses of Apoc 11:3-14. 29. 'This same shall give us rest', so LXX in agreement with the name Noe 'rest', prob. an allusion to Noe's cultivation of the vine, 9:20. 31. Noe's three sons were not necessarily all born in the same year.

i VI 1-8 The Wickedness of the Sethites calls for Divine Chastisement—The narrative continues exclusively with the Sethites, whose genealogy has just been given, ch 5; cf. § 136f-h. As this traced their line back to God, whose likeness was transmitted by Adam to his offspring, Seth, this exclusive reference is indicated also by the title 'sons of God' given to his descendants, 2. Universal expressions are here again, according to Heb. idiom, to be understood only of the subject-matter in hand.

j 1. 'after that' is a conjunction. 2. 'Sons of God' is used of the Angels in Job, chh 1-2, but it is illegitimate to introduce this late use into this passage against the context both immediate and remote. Here it signifies the Sethites; see just above. Women are styled 'the daughters of man', not because they do not figure in the genealogy but because the Sethites in their licentious polygamy took to wife whosoever pleased their fancy. 3. The reference cannot be to the length of individual lives because the sentence of mortality had already been passed on man and many are reported later to have lived much longer than 120 years. The word 'man' is here collective = 'mankind', and the 'spirit of God' = the breath of life, 2:7, Ps 103:29 f. The 120 years is the period allowed to man for repentance before the divine chastisement of the Flood is to come upon him; cf. Jon 3:4. The number of 120 years as a respite for repentance is prob. to be explained as 2×60 , the Babylonian ross being = 60 (whence our 60 minutes and 60 seconds). 4. 'The Nephilim were upon the earth in those days, and also after that, when the sons of God. . .'. The Nephilim are mentioned Num 13:34 (MT 33) as a Canaanite race of giants in Moses' time; hence the clause 'and also after that', which is in origin a marginal gloss. The meaning and etymology of the name are unknown. They are referred to in Wis 14:6, Eccles 16:8, Bar 3:26-8, etc. The term 'giants' does not imply more than unusually tall stature, and its import is relative to the average height of the race using it. The Hebrews were not a tall nation. Tradition of old preserved stories of their exploits but these have long since perished. 6. God does not change, Num 23:19, and the phrase is anthropomorphic. In like circumstances a man would regret what he had done. 7. If men perish in a flood, the animal life of the region perishes also. 8. Noe was the one man untouched by the corruption of the age.

VI 9-VIII 14 The Flood—9. 'perfect man among his contemporaries'. 11. Men were corrupt in the sight of and in the judgement of God. 13. 'with the earth', with all that lives and grows on the earth, as in 11 'the earth' stands for the men living upon it. 14. 'of gopher wood', occurring only here. Pitch is still used in Iraq for making vessels water-tight, as of course elsewhere. 15. The cubit is a natural measure of length = the forearm; cf. foot. 16. The opening for light and air was to be a cubit in height and to run round the sides of the ark (broken by the beams supporting the roof) high up under the projecting roof and so protected from the rain. So prob., though some for 'window' translate 'roof'. 17. 'from under heaven . . . on the earth'. 19. 'pairs' (DV 'two'); also in 20. VII:8. 'pairs' (DV 'two and two'). The distinction between clean and unclean animals is of great antiquity and was incorporated into the Law as already sanctioned by custom, Lev 11:47, and cf. § 189b. 11. LXX: '27th day'. The subterranean ocean broke through its vents and the upper waters, 1:7, were given free passage through the sluices in the firmament. There appears to be an ocean under the earth since water gushes out in many places as at the sources of the Jordan. This invasion of the land by subterranean waters implies not the inroad of the ocean, but the rising waters of the rivers, the Tigris and Euphrates, flooding the country. 12. '40' is often used in the Bible for a large indefinite number; see § 124f. 14. 'all birds and all that fly' is not in LXX and is prob. a marginal gloss. 17. 'And the flood broke upon the earth'. 'forty days' is another marginal gloss to which LXX add 'and forty nights'. VIII:2. Chronological order is not always observed by Hebrew writers. The flood gates were shut up after forty days, 7:12. 3. 'Little by little' the waters diminished (DV 'coming and going'), 'and they were abated' after 150 days, which counted from the 17th (LXX 27th) day of the 2nd month, 7:11, lead to the day, 4, when the ark came to rest on the 17th (MT; 27th Vg, LXX) day of the 7th month. MT 'the mountains of Ararat', Accadian Urartu, a region corresponding to Armenia but extending further to the South. The reference is to the country and not to the mountain called Ararat today. 'Mountain' is a relative term and varies in its application in different countries. In a flat country like Mesopotamia, the 147b word could be used in cases where it would be inadmissible in English just as most English mountains would not be so called by the French. The ark rested on top of a hill, as, 5, the waters 'decreased gradually' and allowed the tops of the hills to appear only in the 10th month. 6. According to Heb. idiom the sense may be either 'the window' or 'a window' (= the window which he actually opened; cf. § 145d). The word hallôn used here = 'window' is not subject to the doubt mentioned on 6:16. 'a raven to see whether the waters were abated'; with LXX. 7. It 'went forth to and fro'. The negative, absent in MT, was added in Vg from the Old Latin. Ravens and crows were used by ancient mariners to find the direction of land in case they were driven out of their course. See H. Heras, S.J., "The Crow" of Noe' CBQ 10 (1948) 131-9. 8. The original text prob. stated that Noe waited first for 7 days, as is implied by 10. 11. 'a twig' of olive. Noe now knew that the waters had largely drained away. 13. 'the waters were dried up from off the earth'. After the waters had disappeared from the surface of the earth, Noe had still to wait till, 14, the earth itself had dried. Counting the day on which Noe entered the ark and the day he left it, the flood lasted a lunar year (= 354 days) + 11 days, which make a solar year of 365 days. 20. In holocausts the whole victim was consumed by fire.

c The Extent of the Flood—The universal expressions used in the narrative referring alike to men, beasts, and sky, and even it was thought to the earth, long gave the impression that the flood covered the whole of the earth's surface and therefore necessarily involved the destruction of the entire human race and of the whole of the brute creation. This is called the theory of geographical universality. It arose at a time when the idiomatic usages of Hebrew speech were unfamiliar and the facts about the extent of the earth and the vast number of animal species were unknown. At the beginning of the 19th cent. it still held the field largely owing to the support of eminent geologists like Buckland who found in erratic blocks and striated rock-surfaces evidence of a worldwide deluge. Sea-shells high up on mountains, as on Moel Tryfaen in N. Wales, were also brought into the argument. But later the geologists, including Buckland, came to recognize that the boulder formation, the 'diluvium' as it was called, and the striated rocks were due to the action of glaciers. It was also recognized that no flood, however severe, but only changes in the level of the earth's surface could account for the deep deposits of marine shells found high on certain mountains. The idea of a world-wide deluge was then gradually abandoned by all. A series of unheard of miracles would have been required to bring the animals from all over the world, to house them, to keep them alive in a climate strange for most, to return them to their natural habitats. For such miracles the sacred text affords no evidence, as universal expressions in the Bible are used with reference to the subject matter in hand as in the case of 'all the beasts of the earth', 2:19, by which is meant all those in Paradise.

d A new theory then arose called that of mixed universality. According to this a limited region of the earth's surface was inundated but all mankind perished except those in the ark, as the race was supposed not yet to have spread beyond the boundaries of that region. The universal expressions were thus interpreted in a double sense. Those referring to the sky, the earth and the animal kingdom were taken to signify relative universality, whereas those referring to mankind were understood absolutely. As there is nothing in the text to warrant this distinction, it gradually became plain that the norm of relative universality must be applied in both cases.

e It has thus become ever more widely recognized that all the sacred writer's expressions in this narrative were intended in the sense of relative universality. Of this he has given some clear indications. 'Noe was a just and perfect man', but 'all flesh had corrupted its way', 6:9, 12; Noe and his family were safe, yet 'all men' perished in the waters, 7:7, 21; even after 'the tops of the mountains appeared', 'the waters were upon the whole earth', 8:5, 9. Moreover, from 5:1 the narrative is concerned with the Sethites alone (cf. §§ 136f-h, 146g) the Cainites having been dismissed from the story. And the attribution of certain inventions to the Cainites in ch 4 implies that these did not perish in the flood. Indeed, in the case of metal-working it is probable that the invention in the mind of the sacred writer dates from after the flood and that his mention of it before that event is due simply to the desire to group in one section all that he had to say about the Cainites and their eponym. In either case it follows that the Cainites did not perish in the flood. Further, in view of the insistence shown by the sacred writer on the multiplication of the race by the repeated declaration that each of the patriarchs begot 'sons and daughters', and that he allows so long a period between Adam and the flood (MT 1656 years, Samaritan text 1307, LXX 2256), it is hardly to be assumed that he thought all men could still be living in one region. In fact, the text indicates the contrary, for God not only gave the command to increase and multiply, but also to 'fill the earth', 1:28. This argument is not weakened by any theory about sources for the reason that we are concerned with the book as finished by its compiler and therefore with the sense which he has impressed on the whole. The mind of the sacred writer as thus manifested by himself is in agreement with discoveries in the field of anthropology as human remains have been discovered in various parts of the world, from China to South Africa, dating from times long anterior to any date which can be assigned to the flood.

See further Al. Motais, Le Déluge biblique (Paris, 1885), E. F. Sutcliffe, S.J., Who perished in the Flood? (CTS 1943, reprint 1947), Hummelauer, who gives a full historical account of the question, 223-56.

The Ark as Type of the Church—It was a commonplace among the Fathers that the ark was a type or figure of the Church; and see 1 Pet 3:20. As the ark was the divinely appointed means of temporal salvation for Noe and his family, so the Church is the divinely appointed means of eternal salvation; cf. St Cyprian, De Unitate Ecclesiae 6 (PL 4, 503), St Jerome, Epist. 15 ad Damasum 2 (PL 22, 355); St Augustine, Contra Faust. Man. 12, 14 (PL 42, 262). The fact that the Church is appointed by divine providence as the ordinary means of grace does not exclude God's extraordinary providence by which all who are not members of the visible Church but sincerely desire to do God's will as far as it is known to them also receives his grace and all that is necessary for salvation. This significance of the ark is not invalidated by the relative universality of the flood as in both figure and antitype the means of salvation has reference to all exposed to danger, in the one case physical and in the other spiritual. The outstanding difference between the type and the antitype is that in the type the means of salvation were offered only to a few, in the antitype they are offered to all.

The Purpose of the Flood—This was twofold. It was the punishment of the wicked, 6:12f., to whom a period of time had been allowed for repentance, 6:3 and 1 Pet 3:20 'when the patience of God waited in the days of Noe'. Unlike the Ninevites to whom also a time for repentance was allowed, Jon 3:4, the sinners of Noe's time paid no heed to the warning available to them at the sight of Noe's prolonged labour in the construction of the ark. The flood was likewise the means of freeing 'the sons of God' from the danger of the corruption which surrounded them. To apply the words of Wis 4:14, God 'hastened to bring (them) out of the midst of iniquities'. The ancestors of the Chosen People were thus given the opportunity to bring up a new generation in virtuous surroundings. With this we may compare God's order to Abraham to leave his home and restart life in a new land, 12:1. Literary Criticism—The question whether the biblical 148b narrative of the flood is conflated out of two separate accounts has been answered in the affirmative, e.g. by Heinisch, Ceuppens, Chaine, and in the negative by, e.g. Hummelauer, Hoberg, Bea. There are numerous repetitions which make it possible to disentangle at least the main outlines of two stories. At first sight this is itself convincing. But when it is noticed that even after the dissection has been carried through, the repetitions are still numerous, the conviction begins to grow that the repetitious style was deliberately chosen to heighten the dramatic effect. That the Hebrews had a predilection for repetition is clear from the parallelism characteristic of their poetry. In the parts assigned to P by Chaine it will be found that in 6:9-12 (after the heading of the section) each verse falls into two halves marked by parallelism, and that there are repetitions in 6:11 + 12; 13 + 17; 19 + 20; 7:18 + 19 + 24; 19 + 20 (the covering of the mountains); 8:17 + 9:1 + 7; 9:9 + 11. Again though 7:13 seems to us to follow strangely on 7:12, neither does it follow easily on 7:11 (both P), nor does 8:24 on 8:1 (both P). Moreover, there are no contradictions. In 6:19 pairs of all animals are to be taken into the ark: in 7:2 this is made specific—there are to be 7 pairs of clean and one pair of unclean. The rain of 7:4 does not exclude the irruption of subterranean waters of 7:11. This mode of not excluding but of prescinding from some fact is distinctively Hebraic; cf. the one and the two blind men at Jericho in the Gospels, where one does not exclude two. These ancient oriental writings have too often been judged by modern western ideas. 'It often happens that they do not at once set forth the whole of a narrative as the laws of logic and historical sequence would require, but they proceed with it as by stages, almost in the manner of concentric circles. Details which chronologically belong earlier, are "supplied" later in the narrative or another part or other circumstances of the same fact are added', Bea 78. This trick of going back on the story to add new information is called by the Germans 'Nachholung' and is acknowledged by Heinisch 176. The exact dating by years, months and days is probably due to the editor who added the years of the lives of the later patriarchs.

147e

148a

e The Babylonian Flood and its Date—In Babylonian tradition a great flood was recognized to have caused a break in the history of the country, and in the list of kings the first ten are recorded to have reigned before it. It is described in the 11th tablet of the Gilgamesh epic. See R. Campbell Thompson, The Epic of Gilgamesh (1928); Brit. Mus., The Babylonian Story of the Deluge; A. Deimel's Lat. trans. in VD 7 (1927) 186 ff. There are striking similarities and there is no doubt that the event is that of the biblical narrative. The boat is smeared with pitch and grounds on Mt Nizir. Birds are sent out, though in a different order, and after the flood the gods smell the sweet savour of the sacrifice offered. But there are also striking differences. The Babylonian story is crassly polytheistic and has no moral purpose. The gods are at variance among themselves; they are stricken with terror at the deluge; they assemble like flies round the sacrifice. The flood last for seven days only; numerous persons are saved with the hero Utanapishtim. Neither account is dependent on the other, but both go back to a common source.

d Excavations in Mesopotamia have revealed the traces of several severe floods; cf. H. Peake, The Flood: New Light on an Old Story (1930); E. Burrows, S.J., 'The Discovery of the Deluge' in DbR 186 (1930) 1-20. At Kish S. Langdon discovered three dated provisionally 3400, 4000 and 4200 B.C. respectively. At Ur Sir Leonard Woolley found 8 feet of water-laid material, witness of a flood so prolonged that its identification with that of tradition at once suggested itself. Peake considered this flood to be identical with the most ancient found at Kish. E. Burrows dated it some 400 years later, c 3800. A date much more remote than this appears unlikely for the flood of biblical and Babylonian tradition, the memory of which remained so fresh. The identification suggested, if correct, would provide the first, though only approximate date in biblical history. Opinion, however, has moved away from that first adopted. *J. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past (Princeton, 1947) 24, speaks with reserve: 'It is difficult to say'. *Millar Burrows, What Mean these Stones (New Haven, 1941) 70 writes: 'The lower one [at Kish] is ascribed by Langton to about 4000 B.C., and it is this one which he equates with the Ur inundation. None of the inundations at Kish, however, is contemporary with any at Ur, and none at either place marks a division between two different civilizations. . . In Woolley's own excavation at Tell Obeid, only four miles from Ur, there was no silt at the levels corresponding to those at which it was found at Ur'. The further argument that 'representations of Gilgamesh were found at a lower level than the "deluge" at Kish, showing that the Babylonian flood-story was of more ancient origin than this', seems to overlook the fact that the two traditions may have become fused at a later date.

IX 1-17 God's Covenant with Noe—This covenant was followed by that with Abraham which again was succeeded by that with Moses and the people of Israel. These three covenants are three great landmarks in the history of God's providential preparation and election of Israel. Noe was saved out of a mass of corruption to raise up a new people pleasing to God. Abraham was taken from the pagan enticements of Mesopotamia to the isolation of nomadic life in Canaan. Moses with the people was delivered from Egypt to enter as a nation into the land destined to be their home.

3. Now for the first time permission is explicitly given to eat meat. The suggestion seems to be that as the thought of man's heart is prone to evil from his youth, 8:21, he would not acquiesce in that respect for the lives of brute creatures demanded by vegetarianism.

4. An animal that loses its blood loses its life, 'for the life of all flesh is in the blood'. Lev 17:14; and life is made by God and is sacred to him. Therefore, although man may kill animals for his needs, he is to pay tribute to God's overlordship by abstaining from blood. This prohibition, re-enacted in the Mosaic law, was rigorously observed in NT times, Ac 15:20 f. 5. The sanctity of human life is inculcated by the provision that any animal killing a man is itself to be destroyed, Ex 21:28. 6. So, too, permission is given to take the life of a murderer: 'by man shall his blood be shed'. 13. The rainbow is aptly chosen as sign of the covenant as rain from heaven had been one of the causes of the flood. It is now given a new significance.

18-29 The Blessing of Sem and the Curse on Canaan

21. The Fathers excuse Noe on the ground of his ignorance of the effect of wine. 24. The detail of the story seems to have been discreetly passed over in silence. 'his youngest son': from the order of the names Cham appears to be the second in age, and this 'son' must be Noe's grandson, Canaan, who is the one actually cursed. 25. 'a servant of servants' = the lowliest of servants, according to this Heb. idiom for expressing the superlative; cf. king of kings, canticle of canticles. (The origin of the papal title 'Servant of the servants of God' is different, Sutcliffe CR 6 [1933] 378-86.) The curse figures the condition of the Canaanites on the completion of the Israelite conquest of their land. 26. The second Messianic prophecy by which the line of Sem, as distinct from those of Cham and Japheth, is marked out for God's especial blessing and protection. 'Lord' stands for 'Yahweh' by which God was known only to the Israelites, the descendants of Sem, whereas in 27. as the Japhethites had no part in the worship of Yahweh, the word used is 'God'. 'enlarge' is in Heb. a play on the name of Japheth and refers to his prosperity in general just as 'straitened circumstances' denotes the opposite. 'Dwelling in the tents of Sem' denotes friendly relations and a willingness on Sem's part to share his privileges.

X 1-32 The Table of the Nations—The sons of Noe d

140d are enumerated in the order, Sem, Cham, Japheth, 5:31; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18; 10:1; but in this list of their 'descendants' the order is reversed, Japheth, Cham, Sem. The explanation is provided by the compiler's scheme of gradual elimination. The Japhethites and Chamites are to have no place in the main thread of the story which hereafter is to be narrowed down to the Semites only. These are therefore placed last in order to establish a connexion with the sequel of the narrative.

e The purpose of the list is to emphasize the privilege conferred on Israel in its election by God as his special people. Other nations might have been chosen. On any human estimate others had a far stronger claim in virtue of their greater antiquity, population, political power and more advanced culture. Israel was a newcomer among the nations. Jacob had gone down to Egypt with only a few score of his descendants when the civilization of that country was already ancient. Yet of all these peoples God cast his eyes on Israel. It is in the manner of Genesis to state the facts simply and to leave the reader to draw the conclusions which the story suggests.

f In the form of a genealogy the list contains the names of countries as Egypt (Misraim) and Canaan; of peoples as the Jebusites and the Amorites; and even of a city, Sidon, 15, 19, begotten by Canaan, the country in which it lay. Nations are not normally descended from a single ancestor, and even the Israelites, whose dominant stock rightly claimed Abraham as their ancestor, were of mixed race, for it is noted in Ex 12:38 that when they left Egypt there went with them 'a mixed multitude'.

g The principle of division is largely geographical. The Japhethites living in the farther north and west, the Chamites in the south including Canaan, and the Semites the intervening regions and the east. Some of the names cannot be identified with our present knowledge, others only conjecturally, and for a full discussion the reader is directed to one of the recent larger commentaries. The peoples of farther Asia and of America being unknown to the Israelites have no place in the list, nor have several peoples mentioned in Gen, as the Emim and Zuzim.

h 2-5 The Sons of Japheth—2. Cimmerians (Gomer), Medes (Madai), Ionians (Javan). 4. Perhaps Cyprus (Elisa), Tarshish = Tartessus (in Spain), Dardanoi (MT Dodanim) or Rhodians (LXX, Sam, Rhodanim).

i 6-20 The Sons of Cham—6. Ethiopia (Kush), Egypt (Misraim), Canaan. 7. Prob. all near the Red Sea and Gulf of Aden. 8. Nemrod prob. = Nimurta, god of war and hunting, identified by Witzel with Gilgamesh, a deified king of the second postdiluvian dynasty, and by Deimel with Lugalbanda, another king of the same dynasty. 10. Babylon was famous already in the time of Sargon I, c 2850 B.C. Uruk, today Warka, on the Euphrates. Akkad was the name of N. Mesopotamia (Sumerian, Agade) and also of the capital of Sargon I. Shinar (Sennaar) = Babylonia. 11. Prob. 'out of that land he went forth to Assyria'; cf. Mic 5:6 where 'the land of Nemrod' = Assyria. Nineveh, Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah which is now the ruined site called Nimrud at the confluence of the Upper Zab with the Tigris. 12. Nineveh is 'the great city'. The gloss is misplaced. 8-12 is an insertion in the original text and also apparently misplaced, since, if Kush in 6 is territory S. of Egypt, as it seems to be, there can hardly be a connection with the origins of Babylonia and Assyria. And Kush (Chus) in 8 would rather refer to the Kashshu or Kassites who conquered and ruled Babylonia in the 2nd millennium B.C. 14. The Philistines (§ 120h-i) came from Caphtor, Mic 9:7, which is Crete. The Chasluim are unknown, and if they were a larger unit of which the Caphtorim were a part, the mention of the Philistines in their present position would be explained. 15. Canaan here in its wider sense embracing Phoenicia, the most important town of which in the earlier period was Sidon. The term Hittite is prob. used to signify also the Hurrians (§ 118i-j). 16-17. Cf. § 57d. Arka, Sin, and 18, Arvad and Semar on the Phoenician coast. Hamath on the Orontes. 19. The W. boundary of Canaan ran from Sidon to Gaza, which the traveller would reach first as he went S. to Gerar, and the S. boundary from Gaza to Leshan in the direction of Sodom and Gomorrah (prob. at the S. end of the Dead Sea). Cf. 14:2.

21-31 The Sons of Sem—21. The expression 'all the children of Heber' suggests that the term 'Hebrews' had a wider significance than 'Israelites' and that the Israelites were part of a larger group of Hebrew peoples. 22. Elam, in the earliest times inhabited by Semites, was later conquered by a non-Semitic people. Lud, uncertain, but not the Lydians. The Aramaeans were widely spread N. of Palestine. In the OT modern Syria is always called Aram. 15. Phaleg denotes 'division'. The reference is to 11:8 f. 26-30 give the names of Arabian tribes and regions. Asarmoth, today Hadramaut. Solomon carried on a valuable trade with Ophir, 3 Kg 9:28; 10:11, 22.

XI 1-9 The Tower of Babel—In accordance with the scheme of elimination already explained (§ 136f-h) this narrative is concerned only with Semites, and not with all of them as at the time (indicated vaguely in 10:25) of the dispersal here recorded there is no reason to doubt that the Semites were already widely distributed, and the universal expressions used must by Hebrew idiom be understood with the restrictions imposed by the narrative itself. See on 2:5, 19 and §§ 146i, 147e. S. H. Langdon wrote: 'The kings of Kish in the age of Mesilim left written records at Nippur, Lagash and Adab, which prove that these Sumerian cities belonged to a Semite kingdom in the north as early as 3650 B.C.', CAH I 373. Meissner dated this 2nd dynasty of Kish about 3250. The age of Babylon itself can be estimated from its sacred character in the time of Sargon about 2850. He took soil from this holy city of Marduk therewith to consecrate his new capital city of Agade, CAH I 407. Such veneration shows that Babylon was already ancient in Sargon's time and points to a date well in the 4th millennium. There the inhabitants started to build a great stage-tower or ziggurat, which they raised to some considerable height and then were unable to complete. The massive remains were a visible reminder of the ineffectual attempt which tradition recorded to have been accompanied by discord and consequent migration of many of the population. This meagre historical record explains why the sacred writer did not mention the nature of the sin which led to the frustration of the grandiose design. But his deep conviction of God's overruling government of the world taught him that the attempt had been displeasing to God and the narrative suggests that the sin was one of overweening human pride and self-sufficiency.

The text does not say that the ziggurat was actually in the city of Babylon and is probably that at Borsippa, today Birs-Nimrud, some 7 m. from the site of Babylon. Of this Nabuchodonosor (Nebuchadnezzar) records that an earlier king had raised it to the height of 42 cubits (about 60 ft.) without, however, having managed to complete it. In this state it had suffered great damage from the weather and water which had seeped through its cracked encasing bricks. His heart being moved by the great lord Marduk the king undertook and completed its restoration, KIB III ii 52 f.

The story has been widely understood to tell of a miraculous intervention by which different languages were introduced and the population thus became unable to understand one another. But it must be noted that the different groups among not only the Japhethites and Chamites, 10:5, 20, but also among the Semites, 10:31, are already recorded to have had their various languages, and as the two former groups are already out of the story, the origin of languages is not recorded here. Moreover, the word for 'languages'

140n is lāḥn which is that used in 10:5, 20, 31. In our passage this word is not found. That used is šāpāh 'lip', which also signifies 'utterance'. The natural meaning here is that the people at first in complete harmony 'all saying the same thing' fell out among themselves and could not agree upon a common policy; and as a result of the discord (and possibly of fighting) there was a migration. Already in the 4th cent. St Gregory of Nyssa was quite emphatic that God did not miraculously impose different languages on mankind, PG 45, 992 ff.

- o 1. All lived together in harmony. Lit. 'all the earth was one lip and the same words'. 2. The Heb. is ambiguous and could mean 'to the east'. Sennaar = Babylonia. 3. Babylonia does not provide stone for building, and bitumen (DV 'slime') was used for binding bricks together. 4. Babylonian inscriptions speak hyperbolically of buildings reaching to heaven; cf. A. Pohl, S.J., Bi 12 (1931) 109 and our modern 'sky-scraper'. 'lest we be scattered': other peoples would be deterred from attacking them and trying to seize their lands when they learnt of their power. Incidentally this is another indication that 'all the earth' in 1 is to be understood in a restricted sense. 7. 'that they may not listen each to what the other says'. Again secondary causes are neglected. 9. The Babylonians by another popular etymology said the name Babel (Babylon) = the Gate of God.

p 10-26 The Lineage of Sem—On the decreasing ages see § 140c. 10. In 5:31 Noe is 500 years old at the birth of Sem, in 7:6 600 at the beginning of the flood, which lasted one year (see on 8:14), and Sem is 100 here. The writer seems to have intended to give round numbers only. Arphaxad, 12, Sale, 14, Heber, and, 16, Phaleg are named also 10:22-25. 22. Nachor, the name of Abraham's grandfather, is also that of one of his brothers, 26.

- q Harran in N. Mesopotamia, for a time the home of Abraham and his father, 31, remained the home of their relatives, 27:43, and in 24:10 it is called 'the city of Nachor'. Geographical names in the region of Harran closely resemble those of Abraham's three immediate ancestors: Til-Turahi, Til-Nahiri, Sarūgi; cf. § 79j. It would be strange if this were accidental, but it would also be strange if Abraham and his family did not know the names of their immediate ancestors for some ten generations. Love of family genealogies is characteristic of the Semites. Arabs of today know by heart even the genealogy of their horses for as many generations.

150a XI 27-XXV 11 The History of Abraham

27-33 The Migration from Ur to Harran—27. Once more this section is linked to the preceding by a repetition from 26. 28. Ur, a famous and ancient city in S. Babylonia. 29. Jescha is not mentioned again and the insertion of her name points to a desire to preserve whatever was known of Abraham's family. 31. The first stage in the separation of the Chosen People is accomplished by the migration of Thare and his family from their kindred in Ur to Harran, the second by the migration of Abraham and Lot to Canaan, 12:4, and the final stage by the separation of these two, 13:11. The reason for Thare's journey is explained by St Stephen, Ac 7:2-4. The command to leave his home and go to a new land was given to Abraham while yet in Ur, though recorded in Gen 12:1 only after the arrival in Harran—another illustration of the important fact that biblical narratives do not always follow chronological order. No reason is given why the journey to Canaan was interrupted and a sojourn made in Harran. The death of Thare in that city suggests his failing health as the cause. Josue admitted as a well-known fact that the ancestors of the people had worshipped false gods when living beyond the Euphrates and includes Thare among the polytheists, Jos 24:2. We are left to infer that Abraham was the restorer of true religion in his family. It was to him that God appeared, Ac 7:2, and the migration to Canaan was to be the means of segregating him and his from the pagan surroundings of their first home. See § 309f. Abraham may have been an Aramaean or a Babylonian. Laban, 28:5, and Jacob, Deut 26:5, are spoken of as Aramaeans, but the term may have been used on geographical grounds. The Testament of Nephtali, 1:10, calls Abraham a Chaldaean. 32. According to the Samaritan text Thare died aged 145. This is probably the age intended, as Abraham thus leaves Harran in the year of his father's death, 11:26 and 12:4; cf. Ac 7:4.

XII 1-12a Abram journeys to Canaan—1. The language suits Ur better than Harran; see on 11:31. 2. Abram's faith is already tested as Sarai was sterile, 11:30. 3. This great promise that a blessing is to come on all nations through Abram is repeated, 18:18, and in 22:18 it is added that the blessing is to be through his seed. History has shown that the source of the blessing was his descendant Christ. The prophecy is confirmed to Isaac and Jacob, 26:2-5; 28:14. 4. Lot's father was dead, 11:27f. Abram's brother Nachor remained in Harran, 22:20; 24:10. 5. 'The souls' are those in the service of Abram and Lot. Together they made a numerous caravan. Abram alone was able to muster 318 men of fighting age, 14:14. 6. Shechem lay between Ebal and Garizim; today called Nablus. 'as far as the Teacher's Terebinth'; evidently a well-known tree (the species is not certain) where oracular answers were given to inquirers. 'The Canaanite was already then in the land'; so in our idiom. Hebrew prescinds from whether the Canaanite was also in the land later emphasizing only the point in hand. The remark indicates that it was a Canaanite oracle. The tree is mentioned again 35:4. 8. Bethel is proleptically so called. The name was changed from Luza only later, 28:19.

10b-20 Abram in Egypt—10b. He went down not alone but with his followers. For a reproduction of the Egyptian picture at Beni Hasan of such a Semitic caravan entering the country, see DBV II opposite 1067. 13. Sarai was his half-sister, 20:12. In the circumstances he was not obliged to tell the whole truth as that would have meant his own death without saving Sarai. 16. Horses are not mentioned. These were introduced into Egypt by the Hyksos (§ 118k-1); cf. A. Mallon, S.J., Les Hébreux en Egypte (1921) 61, n.4; 74. Camels were not in general use in Egypt before the Greco-Roman period, but were known there from predynastic times, before 3000 B.C. They were brought into Egypt by traders, 37:25, and were a suitable gift for a nomad sheikh such as Abram. See de Vaux, 7-10, with references, against *W. F. Albright, whose view may be read in The Archaeology of Palestine (1949) 206f. 17. Sarai had not been molested, but the punishment was deserved, as it is right to infer, for the evil disposition that would not have stopped short of killing Abram to secure Sarai. 18. Pharaoh associated his calamity with his taking Sarai, made enquiries, and discovered the full facts. The incident illustrates the sanctity of marriage and God's providence in guarding Sarai to be the mother of Isaac the heir of the promises.

XIII 1-18 The Separation of Abram and Lot—2. d 'in herds, in silver and in gold'. 3. 'He went by stages from the south'. 7. Abram and Lot's great herds had not the whole country to themselves as it was already inhabited by others; see on 12:6. 8. The word 'brother' is used in Heb. to cover a wide range of relationships, here that of uncle and nephew, 11:27. 9. Abram, though the older, magnanimously leaves the choice to Lot. 10. 'in the direction of Segor', one of the towns of the Pentapolis, 14:2. It is not implied that Lot could see as far as the S. of the Dead Sea from near Bethel. 11. 'to the east'. 12. 'and pitched his tent as far as Sodom'. 15. In Heb. 'for ever', when used of human affairs, signifies a period of unforeseen and indefinite duration which may be no longer than a lifetime, Ex 21:6. Such divine promises and threats are always conditional on continuance in good or evil respectively even when pronounced 150d absolutely; cf. § 417d. 18. 'dwelt by the terebinths of Mambre at Hebron', or oaks. Mambre is the LXX form, Heb. Mamre. Hebron, some 20 m. S. of Jerusalem, known to the Arabs as El-Khalil, the town of Abraham, 'the friend' of God, 2 Par 20:7.

• XIV 1-16 Abram's Victory over the Invading Kings

—1. If it were possible to identify one of these kings of known date, we should have evidence from profane history by which to fix the time of Abram. Unfortunately even the immensely increased knowledge of the Near East in the 2nd millennium B.C. acquired of recent decades has not solved this question. And the opinion, once popular, that Amraphel is Hammurabi, the great law-giver of Babylon, is now abandoned by most scholars. The name Hammurabi-ilu 'H. is my god' has been found as that of a private citizen, but the king himself could not bear such a name. The LXX form Amraphal suggests an original Amar-pi-el 'The mouth of god has spoken' or 'commanded'. Sennaar = Mesopotamia or Babylonia. Ariok of Ellasar has been identified on very doubtful grounds with Rim-Sin of Larsa. A prince of Mari bore the name Arriwuk, which is of Hurrian stamp. Kedorla'omer 'Servant (?) of Lagamar', otherwise unattested, is of genuine Elamite formation; cf. Kudur-Nankhundi 'Servant (?) of N.'. Lagamar was an Elamite divinity. Tid'al seems to be the Hittite name Tudchalia, perhaps called 'king of nations' as leader of a band of international mercenaries. 8. 'into the Vale of Siddim', not mentioned elsewhere, apparently the shallow, southern part of the Dead Sea below the Lisan. There is some support for the idea that this was once dry in the fact that a ford existed in the early 19th cent. A.D. from the Lisan to the W. shore. This has long since ceased to be practicable. The Dead Sea existed long before the 2nd millennium B.C., and the reference here can be only to a part of it which was once dry. 4. The Elamite king is leader of the expedition. There is evidence of Elamite power about this time. Mari texts speak of a strong Elamite force sent to Upper Mesopotamia in the time of Hammurabi, now commonly but not universally dated 1728-1686. And a little earlier Kudur-Mabuk ruled in Babylon and successively installed his two sons as kings of Larsa. 5. The line of march was S. through the country E. of Jordan to Edom, then W. towards the Wilderness of Paran, then NE. to Qadesh-barnea, and finally to the S. of the Dead Sea. At the time of this expedition there was a sedentary population in Transjordan. There was an abrupt break in the urban civilization of the country about 1800 and this may have been caused by the military operations of the Elamites and their confederates. Ashteroth-carnaim, in the Hauran; the Zuzim 'in Ham', prob. modern Ham in 'Ajlun; Shave of Qiryathaim E. of the Dead Sea not far from Machaerus. 6. The inhabitants of Seir at this time are now generally identified with the Hurrians, § 118i-j. Their country later fell to the Edomites. 7. Hasason-tamar is identified with 'Ain Jidi (Engedi) on the W. shore of the Dead Sea in 2 Par 20:2. As this seems to indicate an impossible line of march previous to the encounter at the S. end of the Dead Sea, some have attempted to locate Hasason-tamar S. of the sea. But this overlooks the ancient method of grouping material. The writer has inserted the mention here in order not to interrupt afterwards his main theme which is the battle and Abram's subsequent pursuit of the invading kings. 10. In the Vale of Siddim there were many bitumen cavities, and bitumen still oozes out of the bed of the Dead Sea. The local kings chose this terrain for the battle as they were familiar with its dangers but were defeated in spite of this advantage. The kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, however, saved their lives by means of these bitumen pits: 'they fled and threw themselves in' and so escaped the enemy. Thus the king of Sodom survived to congratulate Abram, 17. 13. The designation of Abram as 'the Hebrew' makes it prob. that this ancient document was taken over from a non-Israelite source. 14. Originally prob. 'to Laish which is Dan'; cf. 2, 3, 7, 17 (the ancient names explained) and Jg 18:29. 150g Abram did not pursue alone with his own contingent of 318 men but aided by the forces of his three confederates, 24. 15. 'on the north of Damascus'; the points of the compass being taken facing the E., the left hand stands for the N. 17. The Vale of Shave is not mentioned elsewhere. Its later name 'the King's Vale' occurs 2 Kg 18:18—in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

18-24 The Sacrifice of Melchisedech—Melchisedech 151a

'King of Justice' is a remarkable figure. A non-Hebrew he is a worshipper of the true God whose service had been abandoned even by Abram's father, Jos 24:2. David proclaimed his priesthood as the type of that of the Messias, Ps 109:4. Given the nationalistic exclusiveness of the Hebrews, this was humanly speaking a most improbable, if not impossible, choice, but David spoke under divine inspiration ('in spirit', Mt 22:43). And St Paul insists on the superiority of his priesthood to the Aaronic, for Abram was greater than his son Levi, but inferior to Melchisedech who blessed him, and 'that which is less is blessed by the better', Heb 7:1-7. Instructed by these texts the Church has always recognized in his sacrifice of bread and wine a figure of the Christian sacrifice. So St Cyprian speaks of 'the image of (Christ's) sacrifice in bread and wine', Epist. 63, n. 4. 18. Salem was an ancient name of Jerusalem preserved in poetry, Ps 75:3; cf. on 17. HT = 'and he was' but DV rightly 'for he was', this being a recognized value of the conjunction, BDB 253b. The essential function of the priestly office is to offer sacrifice, Heb 5:1, and in antiquity a similar meeting in celebration of such a victory would always be accompanied by a sacrifice of thanksgiving. 20. Abraham gave tithes to the priest of all he had rescued from the invaders. 23. Perhaps the reason for Abram's refusal was the disinclination to receive any benefit at the hands of the ruler of the wicked city of Sodom. 24. The young men are the warriors who had taken part in the pursuit and victory.

XV 1-6 God's Promise to Abram of an Innumerable •

Posterity—1. 'Thy reward is exceeding great'. So Abram understood the words as shown by his complaint in 2 that further riches are of no use to him: 'for I go childless'. Then prob.: 'and the heir of my house is Eliezer the Damascus'; cf. Syr. He is not named again. 4. Adoption tablets found at Nuzu in NE. Iraq and dating from the 15th cent. B.C. show that an adopted son designated as heir lost his right to the chief inheritance should a son subsequently be born to the adopter, BA III i (1940) 2 f. 6. Sara was sterile; cf. Rom 4:3. 7-14 Further Promises: God's Covenant with Abram d —8. He does not doubt God's promise; see 6. He asks what signs he may expect to show that the fulfilment of the promise is imminent. To this request he receives no direct answer but is instructed to prepare the ceremonial of a covenant. 9. 'a heifer . . . a turtle-dove'. 10. An ancient mode of making a covenant was for the parties to pass between the parts of a divided animal, the original symbolism being apparently that they called down on themselves a similar fate should they violate the treaty; cf. Jer 34:18 f. and the similar symbolism of 1 Kg 11:7. The prevalence of this or similar rites is shown by the current expressions, kāraf b'rif, ὄρκια τέμνειν, 'foedus ferire', all meaning 'to make a covenant'. Such ceremonies survive after the thought which gave them origin has faded or been forgotten. And it is no objection to this interpretation that here the principal contracting party is God. In his condescension he would adopt the ritual usual among men. The act of passing between the pieces would be a solemn adjunct to the ceremony rather than essential to its significance. It is difficult to conceive the slaughtered animals to have represented the contracting parties or the standing between the pieces to have symbolized that they were taken within the mystical life of the victim. See further, e.g. *C. F. Keil on Gen 15:7-11, *W. Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites (1927) 480 f. with S. A. Cook's note, 691 f.

151d The birds were possibly for a sacrifice but this is not mentioned. 11. Abram's driving away the birds of prey symbolized the frustration of human attempts to hinder the fulfilment of the divine promises. 12. The same word for 'deep sleep' as in 2:21. 400 years: but in 16 the return is put in the 4th generation. Hence the 400 is prob. a gloss (so Heinisch) based on Ex 12:40, where MT gives 430 years as the period of the sojourn in Egypt whereas the Samaritan text gives it as the whole time elapsed between Abram's arrival in Canaan and the Exodus; cf. LXX. 16. Abram therefore learns that he is not to possess the land in his own person but in that of his descendants. 17. A case of hendiadys: one object only passed through the divided parts. This was an oven from which issued flame and smoke. The ancients, and the Arabs today, prepare the portable oven for baking by first lighting a fire in it. Once it is well heated, the fire is removed and the dough inserted. The fire and smoke symbolized God, the flame as bright and almost immaterial and the smoke as impenetrable to the eye representing God's invisibility; cf. Ex 3:2; 19:18; 24:17. 18. The River of Egypt is prob. the Wady el-'Arish. All such promises are conditional, and that the territory of Israel reached the Euphrates only in the days of Solomon, 3 Kg 4:21, will have been due to the frequent infidelity of the people. 19-21. The Qenites (Kenites) seem to have had their principal seat in Sinai. They were kinsfolk of the Madianites, Num 10:29, Jg 4:11; and they or part of them associated themselves with the Israelites, Num 24:21, Jg 1:16. On the Hittites see § 119. The Rephaim (to be distinguished from the shades of the dead known by the same name) were an ancient people relatively of great stature who inhabited Transjordan and Canaan before the Semitic invasion, Gen 14:5, Deut 2:10f.; 3:11 (DV 'giants' in both places), Jos 7:15. It is noteworthy that in the region where they dwell are found numerous megalithic monuments. The territory of Amurru, the home of the Amorites, as so called by the Babylonians, comprised all the territory W. of the Euphrates, of which the chief part was Syria. The Amorites penetrated S. into Canaan, where they lived especially in the mountainous regions, Num 13:30 (MT 29). The Jebusites still dwell in Jerusalem in the time of David, 2 Kg 5:6. For the Qenizzites, Qadmonites, Perizzites and Girgashites cf. F.-M. Abel, O.P., Géographie de la Palestine I (Paris, 1933) 274, 320-5.

g XVI 1-16 The Birth of Ishmael—1. St Jerome, like other Latin writers, sometimes omits the aspirate. Her name is Hagar. 2. Secondary causes omitted; see on 2:5. Sarai's offer was in accordance with the customs of the time; cf. the Code of Hammurabi 144-6. 5. Abram is reproached by Sarai for doing just what she had suggested. 7. 'The Angel of Yahweh' is identified in 13 with Yahweh himself; so also 31:11 and 13. 'The Israelite did not ask himself how Yahweh can also be called the Messenger of Yahweh. It is one of the obscurities in which the OT abounds', Heinisch. Rather Yahweh is said to speak because the Angel spoke in his name. Hagar fled towards her home in Egypt. 11. Ishmael = 'God hears'. 12. 'over against' prob. = to the E. of Israel. 13. 'Thou art the God of Vision', who allows himself to be seen. Then perhaps: 'Have I even seen God and live after my vision?' 14. Barad, unidentified.

h XVII 1-27 Circumcision the Sign of the Covenant—The removal of the foreskin is a ritual practised both in ancient and modern times by other peoples besides the Hebrews. The custom is in use among the Arabs, the Christian Abyssinians, American Indian tribes such as the Caribs, tribes of Central Australia, and others. The operation is commonly performed at puberty as a tribal initiation ceremony and as a preliminary to marriage. Among the Hebrews it was (and still is) performed on the eighth day after birth and has a definitely religious character as a mark of belonging to the people of God. By this mark the source of life, the natural means whereby the race was propagated, was consecrated to God.

1. 'Almighty God': El Shaddai, of uncertain meaning; cf. Ex 6:3. 4. Father of the Israelites through Isaac, of the Ishmaelites through Ishmael, of the Edomites through Esau, and cf. 25:2-4. 5. The Arabic ruḥām means 'a large number'. 7. 'to be a God to thee' = to take thee under my special protection. 8. 'perpetual': see on 13:15. 10. Circumcision, here called the covenant, in 11 is more accurately called the sign of the covenant. The covenant itself was made earlier, 15:18. 14. Any man violating the prescription will have no part in the blessings reserved for the people of God. 15. The meaning of Sarai is uncertain: Sara signifies 'princess', for she, 16, is to be the mother of kings. Names were considered to denote character, function or nature; cf. 5. 17. Abraham's spirit of faith is praised, 15:6, Heb 11:8, and yet some strangely think that here he is represented as doubting. It is not true to his character to understand that he 'fell upon his face [before God] and laughed' in derision at the divine promise. Nor would a play on his son's name (cf. § 139f; 'he laughs' = yishaq = Isaac) be here introduced as a perpetual memorial of a fault of his father's. To quote St Augustine, 'The laughter of Abraham was the exulting of joy, not the derision of disbelief', De Civ. Dei 16, 26. And if he had disbelieved, he would not at once, 18, have expressed the hope that the birth of a son to Sara would not prejudice the fortunes of Ishmael. 20. The exact mention of 12 chiefs is foreign to the style of prophecy (cf. § 418b) and is a later gloss inserted on the strength of 25:13-16.

XVIII 1-15 Abraham entertains Angels—1. See on 13:18. It is difficult to know whether Yahweh appeared in person or through the intermediary of an Angel; see on 16:7. 2. 'he saw and lo! three men'. This act of reverence was used to superiors in rank, as to Joseph by his brothers, 43:28, where the Heb. word is the same. 3. He addresses directly only the one who was clearly the leader of the party. 8. 'curds and milk'. 10. 'I will return when this season comes round again; and Sara thy wife shall have a son. Now Sara was listening at the door of the tent which was standing behind him'. 12. Sara's laugh is again a play on the name of Isaac, but this time it is a laugh of disbelief. 14. A profound truth simply expressed—God is omnipotent. See on 10.

16-33 Abraham intercedes for the Men of Sodom—b 18. See on 12:3. 19. 'For my regard for him is to the end that he may command his children'. God has a great design for Abraham. It is through him that a people is to arise who shall preserve the true worship of God. 20. The cry is one that calls to heaven for vengeance; see on 4:10. 22. Two of the Angels go on to Sodom. 23-32 presents a wonderful scene—illustrating at once God's justice and his clemency. For the sake of ten just men he would spare a whole city whose iniquity cried aloud to heaven. 25. 'Shall he who ruleth all the world not act with justice?' 28. 'Wilt thou for lack of five destroy the whole city?'

XIX 1-29 The Destruction of Sodom and the Deliverance of Lot—1. It is now revealed that the two who had gone to Sodom, 18:22, were Angels. 2. The proposal to sleep 'in the square' or open space near the city gateway is prompted by courtesy. The visitors are unwilling to be a burden to Lot. 8. Lot cannot be praised. He chose what he considered the less of two evils. 11. They were struck not with total blindness but with inability to see the entrance to Lot's house; see 4 Kg 6:18-20. The Sodomites have failed in the test, 18:21, and the doom of the city is sealed. 17. He must not look back for there is not a moment to spare. 24. On the direct attribution to divine action of the effects of natural causes see on 2:5. The cause of the disaster was probably the escape through earthquake action of compressed gases and petroleum from the subterranean deposits in the neighbourhood of the doomed cities. Spontaneous combustion is apt to occur in such circumstances and domestic fires would quickly ignite the escaping gases and oil. Such a fire would cause immense heavy clouds of smoke, 28. The district is also rich in sulphur (brimstone) and I have picked

1511

152a

b

c

- 152e up pellets of it and pieces of bitumen lying on the shore of the Dead Sea. That the destruction of the cities was caused by these natural forces does not mean that it was not a divinely sent chastisement. God can obviously make use of the agencies he has created.
25. An account of the widespread destruction to the countryside caused by such a disaster may be read in d The Wide World Magazine (Aug. 1932) 382-6.
26. Lot's wife lingered to watch the spectacle. Her disobedience, 17, and recklessness, 19, cost her her life. She was overwhelmed probably by the fumes, and later her body became encrusted with salt. It is not true that everything in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea is so encrusted. But the casts of human bodies preserved in the museum at Pompeii suggest what happened to Lot's wife. These casts preserve the exact form of the victims who were overwhelmed by the eruption and became encased in the falling ashes. 28. 'and lo the smoke rose up'.
- e For the results of archaeological exploration at the S. end of the Dead Sea cf. W. F. Albright AASOR 6 (1926) 54-62 and in popular form M. G. Kyle, Explorations at Sodom (1928); for some account of the sea and its surroundings E. F. Sutcliffe, 'A Week on the Dead Sea' Mn (Aug. 1929) 108-16.
- f 30-38 The Birth of Moab and Ammon—31. All her acquaintances having been destroyed, she thought the future held no prospect of marriage. She cannot have thought that all mankind had perished as Segor was still standing undamaged, 23. 32. The wickedness of the incest was mitigated by the intention, in itself excellent, of bearing children. This strong desire to have children is further exemplified in the lengths to which it led Thamar, ch 38.
- g XX 1-18 Sara saved from Danger in Gerar—This incident is probably not recorded in its chronological place as in 18:11 Sara is already beyond the age of childbearing. It illustrates again like the similar story in ch 12 the sanctity of marriage and the importance of keeping the patriarchal line of descent free from contamination.
- h 7. The first mention of a prophet; cf. § 409c. Note the value of intercessory prayer. In early times the sense of family and tribal solidarity was very strong. The individual tended to be regarded only as part of a larger unit; and God Almighty accommodated himself to this strongly rooted sentiment. 8. 'in the morning'. 10. Prob. 'What didst thou fear'. 16. The king gives 1,000 pieces of silver to Sara and puts them in Abraham's safe keeping. This generous gift will make her forget the dishonour of having been taken from her husband. Abimelech concludes: 'and thy honour is vindicated before all'. This present will show all that the king acknowledges that he did an injustice. 18. This shows that Sara was in the royal harem some considerable time.
- i XXI 1-8 The Birth of Isaac—6. For the play on Isaac's name cf. 17:17; 18:12. 8. A child might not be weaned till the age of three, 2 Mac 7:27.
- j 9-21 Dismissal of Hagar and Ishmael—9. The sons of slave wives could be given the same rights as those of the first, chief wife as in the case of the sons of Jacob. No distinction was made between the sons of Bala and Zelpha and those of Rachel and Lia. Hence Sara feared that Isaac's interests might suffer. The conduct of Ishmael, apparently on the occasion of the weaning festival, aroused Sara and determined her to action. This cannot have been merely harmless play and St Paul, Gal 4:29, explains it as some form of persecution (ἐδίωκεν). The word m'sahēq which is used of 'joking', 19:14, 'playing' and 'making sport', Ex 32:6, Jg 16:25, cf. Gen 26:8, is also used of 'mocking', 39:14, 17 (with a special application). The preposition (b') used in the last-mentioned passages may have stood in our text which in MT stops abruptly with m'sahēq and the word 'with' of LXX and Vg may be a translator's addition to an already mutilated text. 10. According to an attractive suggestion of Junker's Sara's harsh words conceal the fact that technically her proposal was to give Hagar her liberty. But this is hard 153j to accept in view of an adoption contract among the Nuzu tablets (15-14 cent. B.C.) which stipulates that the son of a slave wife shall not be sent away (edited by E. A. Speiser in AASOR 10 [1930] 31 f.). 12. God knew that no harm would come to Hagar and Ishmael as the sequel shows and it was arranged by providence that the chosen people should have Isaac but not Ishmael among their ancestors. 14. According to the schematic presentation of ages Ishmael was now over 14 years old, 16:16 and 21:5; but on this see § 140b-f. He was certainly older than Isaac and apparently capable of mischief, 9. 'a skin of water', such as is still used by the Arabs. 15. 'She cast' just as the sick were 'cast' at the feet of our Lord, Mt 15:30, clearly 'laid'. This does not necessarily imply that Hagar was carrying the boy. Indeed the contrary is implied by 18. 20. 'and became an archer'.
- 22-24 Pact between Abraham and Abimelech—22. k Abraham was such a powerful sheikh and could put so many fighting men into the field, 14:14, that even the king of Gerar found it advantageous to make a treaty with him. 25. Wells are so precious in dry regions that they have been the occasion of many strifes between Arab tribes. 26. 'I know not'. 31. Beersheba means lit. 'well of seven', seven being a sacred number with the Hebrews. From it is derived the word for 'to swear' used in 23 f. 33. 'a tamarisk tree', designed to serve as a memorial of the patriarch's rightful claim to the well. The Philistines, to whom Palestine owes its name, did not make their chief settlement in the country till c 1200 B.C., but from earlier times had smaller trading stations there.
- XXII 1-19 The Sacrifice of Isaac—By his command 153a to sacrifice Isaac God Almighty proclaimed his absolute dominion over the lives of men who are the work of his hands. By the revocation of the order he manifested that he did not wish this dominion to be acknowledged by the actual sacrifice of human life. The double lesson was necessary as the Canaanites offered such sacrifices to their gods. On later idolatrous human sacrifice in Israel cf. Sutcliffe, The OT and the Future Life, 175 f. The command was a severe test of Abraham's obedience and also of his faith, since God had promised him posterity through Isaac. The Church has always seen in the sacrifice of Isaac a figure of the Eternal Father delivering his Incarnate Son to the Sacrifice of Calvary, Rom 8:32.
1. 'God made trial of Abraham'. 2. 'into the land of the Amorites', so the Syr.; MT 'of Moriah'. In 2 Par 3:1 the place is identified with the temple mount at Jerusalem, but this does not settle the original form of name. 3. 'in the morning'. 4. The distance from Beersheba to Jerusalem is 45 m. in a straight line, a journey which would be completed within 3 days. 5. Omit 'with speed'. 5. Like Caiaphas Abraham uttered an unconscious prophecy. St Ambrose: 'prophetavit quod ignorabat', PL 14, 447. 18. In the royal cemetery at Ur dating from late in the 4th millennium B.C. were found two elaborately decorated figures of goats standing on their hind legs, each 'with a silver bond, apparently a chain, round his front fetlocks attaching him to the branches of a tree'. The two were supports for some lost object, possibly a tabletop. They are not caught by the horns and there is no apparent connection of symbolism with the story of Abraham. 'The "heraldic" composition of two animals facing each other and reared up on their hind legs against a bush of tree is a commonplace of Sumerian art at this period'. See C. L. Woolley, Ur Excavations II (1934) 264-6 and plates 87-90. 14. 'The Lord provideth', as in 8. Hence the proverb 'In the mountain the Lord will provide' for the needs of his suppliants. 17. The gates stand by synecdoche for the fortified towns, and so the power of their enemies as in Mt 16:18. 18. See on 12:3.
- 20-24 The Family of Abraham's Brother Nachor— c The list provides an introduction to Isaac's marriage to Rebecca in ch 24. 20. Cf. 11:29. The list is drawn 153e up on the same lines as the table of nations in ch 10 and stresses the relationship of various tribes to Israel. Elihu, Job 32:2 was a Buzite.

d XXIII 1-20 The Death and Burial of Sara—2. 'Abraham went in to mourn'. 3. 'he rose from the presence of his dead (wife)'. In Palestine on account of the heat the obsequies generally take place the day of death. The Hittites, § 119a-d, were already widespread and had a colony in S. Canaan. 6. 'in the choicest of our sepulchres'. Omit 'have power to'. 9. 'the cave of Machpelah', the name of the place in which the cave was, 17. The transaction took place according to custom in the open space near the city gate. This offered the publicity necessary to safeguard contracts. 11. 'the children of my people' = my compatriots. 15. This is only oriental courtesy, as Abraham knew. 16. Coined money was not introduced till after the exile. 17. 'Ephron's in Machpelah'. 19. 'in the cave in the field of Machpelah'.

e XXIV 1-67 A Bride for Isaac—2. This significance of this rite in the taking of an oath (again in 47:29) lay apparently in reverence for the source of life. For the euphemism see 46:26. 12. 'grant me good fortune today'. 22. 'a golden ring half a shekel in weight and two golden bracelets'. The ring was for the nose, see 47. 24. Cf. 22:23. 25. 'straw and fodder'. 27. 'his favour and his faithfulness'. 28. The part of her father's dwelling where the womenfolk lived apart from the men. 29b comes logically after 30a. 30. 'the ring and the bracelets on his sister's arms'. 32. 'straw and fodder for the camels'. 43. 'the maiden'. 47. 'So I put a ring in her nose'. 48. 'my master's kinsman': Bathuel was Abraham's nephew. 50. Bathuel has no part in the story outside this verse and here it is prob. a corruption of béjô 'Laban and his household'. 51. The Lord had manifested his will by the providential turn of events. 53. Bathuel was evidently dead. 'brother'; in the singular. 60. 'gates'; see on 22:17. 62. Cf. 16:14. 65. 'to meet us'. She covered herself with a veil, it being customary for the bride to be veiled in the presence of her betrothed till after the nuptial ceremony.

f XXV 1-6 Other Descendants of Abraham—This genealogical list is to be compared with those in ch 10 and 22:20-24. The names represent tribes with whom the Israelites claimed kinship. The best known are the Medianites, whose home was near the Gulf of Aqabah. To this tribe belonged Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, Ex 3:1. Bildad, Job's friend, was a Shuhite, Jb 2:11. The camels of Median and Ephra are mentioned together, Is 60:6. 6. The two secondary wives were Hagar and Cetura.

g 7-11 The Death of Abraham—9. 'in the cave of Machpelah' which he had bought of Ephron the Hittite, ch 23. 11. The well is mentioned 16:14; 24:62. Isaac inherits the divine favour shown to Abraham.

h 12-18 Final Notice of Ishmael—18. Perhaps the Nabataeans. 15. The city Teima is in NW. Arabia. Jetur and Naphish were tribes against whom the Israelites had later to fight, 1 Par 5:19. 16. The Ishmaelites were partly nomadic and partly settled. They dwelt in 'villages and encampments'. 18. Perhaps 'towards Sur'. Or the people named in 3 may be meant. 'He settled over against all his brethren', as in 16:12.

i XXV 19-XXXV 29 The History of Isaac—As the history of Thare is almost entirely that of his son Abraham, so that of Isaac is principally concerned with his son Jacob.

j 19-26 The Birth of Esau and Jacob—22. The struggle portended the future hostility of Israel and Edom. 'If things are so, what is to become of me?' She went to a shrine, perhaps at Beersheba. 23. Israel is to be a more mighty people than Edom. 25. Perhaps the pronunciation originally intended was Eshau meaning 'hairy'. Jacob, the cunning, 'the overreacher' even from the womb, tried to prevent Esau from being the firstborn and caught hold of 'his brother's heel'.

k 27-34 Esau sells his Birthright—27. 'hunter, a man of the open spaces, but Jacob a quiet man, a stay-at-home'. 30.

Edom, a play on the name of the dish he asked for. 153k 31. Jacob wrongfully takes advantage of Esau's exhaustion.

XXVI 1-5 The Promises renewed to Isaac—1. Prob. I another king of the same name as in 20:2. For the Philistines see on 21:33.

6-11 Rebecca escapes Danger in Gerar—7. 'my kinswoman', the Heb. word covering a range of relationships; see on 13:8; 24:48. Isaac followed the policy he had learnt from his father, 12:13; 20:2.

12-22 Trouble over Wells—A recurring source of quarrels among nomads; cf. 21:25. 12. Isaac was semi-nomad, semi-sedentary. The hundredfold stands for a very rich harvest. 14. A great family of men in his service. 19. 'running water'. 20. He called the well 'Contention'.

23-33 The Covenant with Abimelech at Beersheba—o Abraham had already made a covenant at Beersheba, prob. with a predecessor of this Abimelech, 21:27. 33. This new well Isaac called 'Seven' or 'Oath', both of which names would have much the same meaning for a Hebrew; see on 21:31. Just as the wells, 18, retained the names given them by Abraham, so also Beersheba (= Well of Seven, or, of the Oath) with a new confirmation from the name of the new well.

34-35 Esau's Wives—34. Both his wives were of Hittite stock according to MT, but the second according to the Samaritan text was a Hevite. 35. Isaac's dislike of these women facilitated Jacob's departure for Harran, 27:46 f.

XXVII 1-40 Jacob by Fraud wins Isaac's Blessing—q

19. Jacob was guilty of false pretences and of several lies. This is in no way glossed over in the text. See H. Lillie, S.J., 'Did Jacob tell a Lie?' CR 10 (Aug. 1935) 97-108. There is no doubt what Isaac and Esau thought of the trick, 35 f. That Jacob knew of the prophecy, 25:23, that he, the younger, was to supplant his elder brother does not excuse his conduct. The proper course was to wait for Providence to bring the prophecy to fulfilment. For this wrongdoing Jacob had to pay heavily during his long years of hard toil with Laban, 31:40. 23. 'And he blessed him'. The blessing comes only in 28 f. These anticipatory remarks are disconcerting to the modern reader, but are characteristic of Hebrew narrative; cf. 31:46; 42:20, and *S. R. Driver, Hebrew Tenses (1892*) § 75. By some they are considered a sign of the fusion of two documents. 28-29. In Palestine where there is no rain from April till November the heavy night dews are of the greatest importance. The blessing is stamped by the this-world outlook of Hebrew religion. They had no idea of rewards after death till the last centuries before the Christian era. 30. 'abroad' is an archaism for going out of a dwelling (here, a tent). 33. Omit 'of all'. 'He shall be blessed': Isaac had pronounced his blessing under a misapprehension, but it did not occur to him that it could be invalid on that account. 34. Esau 'cried out with a great and very bitter cry and said . . .'. 37. Omit 'more'. 39. Edom being regarded as less fertile than Canaan, the translation should prob. be: 'Away from the fat of the earth and from the dew of heaven above shall thy dwelling be'. The peaceful pursuit of agriculture is not suggested by 40, 'Thou shalt live by the sword'. The Edomites had the reputation of being a fierce race, Jos. Bell. Jud. 4, 4, 1. Edom revolted and obtained its independence under Joram, 4 Kg 8:20-22.

41-XXVIII 5 Jacob's Escape to Mesopotamia—Esau 154a having been twice 'overreached' by Jacob determined to kill him. Whereupon Rebecca counselled him to take refuge with her brother Laban in Mesopotamia. This reason she hid from Isaac and persuaded the old man to let him go to obtain a wife of their own kindred. 45. She would lose both her sons, Jacob by death, and b Esau because he would be obliged to fly after the murder. 46. Cf. 26:34 f. XXVIII:1. Isaac's speedy forgiveness of Jacob's misconduct will have been influenced by his recognition of the overruling provi-

- 154b dence of God. 2. 'Mesopotamia of Syria'—so Vg and LXX for MT Paddan Aram, in which region lay Haran. Aramaeans dwelt not only in Syria but also E. of the Euphrates. 3. 'God almighty' = El Shaddai; cf. 17:1.
- c 6-9 Esau marries the Daughter of Ishmael—6. See on 2. 7. 'to Paddan Aram'. 9. Nabajoth; cf. 25:13. Maheleth: only here; see on 36:1-8.
- d 10-22 Jacob's Journey: the Promises renewed—12. The vision of Angels, God's messengers as denoted by their name both in Heb. and Gk, is a reminder of God's constant care for his creatures. The Angels descend to earth bringing God's counsel and help; they ascend to heaven carrying man's aspirations and prayers to the throne of God. The vision thus assured Jacob of divine help. The text is alluded to in Jn 1:51. 13. See 12:7. The promise made to Abraham and confirmed to Jacob sets the divine seal on the blessing he had received from Isaac. 14. See on 12:3. 16. He knew that God had brought Abraham out of Mesopotamia and that his presence is not narrowly circumscribed. This was a specially holy place where God manifested his presence. 18. 'title': a standing-stone, often trans. 'pillar', but no English word exactly corresponds. Such sacred stones were prominent in Semitic cult. The Israelites were ordered to destroy those of the Canaanites, Ex 23:24. The unction was a form of consecration, used e.g. in the institution of kings, 1 Kg 10:1. 19. Bethel = 'House of God'. 20. 'and shall protect me on this journey'. 21-22. Passages like 'I the Lord will be their God', Ez 34:24, meaning 'will take them under my special divine protection' show the meaning here. The apodosis begins with 22: 'and Yahweh will have been my God, then . . .'. If Yahweh brings Jacob back safely, he will have proved himself to be his protector and Jacob will make the place a shrine and pay tithes there; see § 105d-e. Omit 'called'. For the fulfilment of the vow see 35:6f. The ark was at Bethel (today Beitin) for a time; see on Jg 20:18.
- e XXIX 1-11 Jacob meets Rachel—1. Actually NE. The ancients were not precise about the points of the compass. 7. Jacob wants the shepherds to depart so that he can be alone with Rachel. 10. Jacob manifested unusual strength in removing the stone which normally required the effort of several men. He wished Rachel to see and tell her father what a useful help he would be, for he wanted to take refuge for some time from Esau's anger. 11. On western standards oriental weeping is loud and demonstrative. Jacob wept for joy at the happy ending of his journey and he had already fallen in love with Rachel, 18.
- f 12-30 He serves Fourteen Years for Rachel and Lia—12. Jacob was Laban's nephew; see on 13:8. 14. A customary mode of expressing consanguinity; cf. 2:23. 15. True to his character Laban delayed a month before offering wages for Jacob's work. 17. Rachel was 'beautiful in form and feature'. 18. It was customary to make payment for a bride, 34:12; 1 Kg 18:25. Rich gifts had been paid for Rebecca, 24:53; but Jacob having been obliged to depart stealthily for fear of Esau had no such gifts. His toil is a further retribution for his deceit. 22. 'made a feast'. 27. The marriage celebrations lasted a week; cf. Jg 14:12. 28. This time he obtained his bride in advance of his seven years' service in payment for her.
- g 31-35 Lia bears Four Sons—31. The Heb. word is 'hated' used as in Lk 14:26 with the meaning 'loved less than another'. Each of the four names is linked by assonance to a word in Lia's utterances.
- h XXX 1-13 Jacob's Sons by the Handmaids—For the custom see on 16:2. 2. Jacob recognizes that God alone is the author of life. 3. To receive a new-born child on one's knees was to acknowledge it as one's own; cf. 50:22, Job 3:12. 8. 'I have fought a mighty fight with my sister'.
- i 14-24 Other Sons by Lia and Rachel—14. The mandrake or love-apple (Mandragora vernalis) is a comparatively rare plant believed by orientals, both ancient and modern, to possess qualities favourable to conception. Lia's new conception is nonetheless ascribed both by the sacred writer and by herself to God's favour, 17f. 18. There is a double play on the name Issachar, 'hired' in 16 and 'reward' here. 20. 'now my husband will dwell with me'; so probably. 25-36 Jacob's New Contract with Laban—Jacob asks for nothing except unusually coloured sheep and goats born of normal-coloured dams and sires. Abnormally coloured animals would be more likely to have such offspring, but as he does not ask for their young, the offer is at once accepted by Laban as highly advantageous to himself. The flocks are separated, the abnormally coloured being put in the charge of Laban's sons and the normal (white sheep and black goats) being left with Jacob. To make quite sure that Jacob is not dishonest Laban puts three days' journey between the two flocks. Then, as far as he is able, Jacob is to build up a flock of his own consisting only of dark-coloured sheep and variegated or speckled goats. 29. 'how thy cattle have fared at my hands'. 31. 'But he said "Thou wilt not have to give me anything"'. 32. 'separate all the dark-coloured sheep and the variegated and spotted goats and [all such born thereafter of the remaining animals] shall be my wages'. Note the displacement in MT and LXX. 33. Jacob's own flock, when he comes to own one, must not number a single white sheep or black goat. 35. 'And the same day he separated the spotted and variegated he-goats and she-goats, all that showed any white, and all the dark-coloured sheep and put them in the charge of his sons'. Laban was making his position quite secure, and as a final measure he put a three days' journey 'between them and Jacob'; so Sam.
- 37-43 How Jacob grew Rich—Laban had outwitted Jacob over his marriage. It is now Jacob's turn. On the method he used interesting information may be read in Bochart, Hierozoicon in Opera Omnia II (1692¹) 543-7. St Jerome mentions that similar technique was said to be used in the Spanish horse-breeding industry, PL 23, 985A. 41f. Jacob made sure that his particoloured goats and black sheep should be conceived only when the flocks were most vigorous and healthy. At other times young could be born for Laban. 43 underlines the success that attended his manoeuvres.
- XXXI 1-21 Jacob's Homeward Flight—1. Jacob had not taken what was Laban's, but by his methods Laban's flocks had diminished and his own increased. 5. God had been with Jacob giving success to his work. 7. Nothing was said of this in the summary account of ch 30. 8. LXX also has 'white', but MT 'striped'. 19. These idols (teraphim) are called his 'gods' by Laban, 30. These were small, 34, whereas that mentioned 1 Kg 19:13, 16 was large and of human form. They were used for divining, Zach 10:2, and were perhaps household gods. It has been suggested on the evidence of the Nuzu tablets that Rachel in stealing the teraphim had an eye on a claim to Laban's property. In the circumstances it is more likely that she treasured them in the hope of thereby securing help and protection. 21. The Euphrates was spoken of by the Hebrews as 'the river'.
- 22-43 Laban's Pursuit—22. The third day corresponds to the three days' journey of 30:36. 23. Jacob had seven days' start. He took his kinsfolk and set out in pursuit seven days march behind him'. Jacob lay nearer the Euphrates than Laban, and the seven days are accounted for by the 3 days of 22, the 3 others of 30:36, and 1 day of preparations. The distance to Galaad was about 350 m. 28. Laban speaks of his grandsons as his sons. 42. 'The fear of Isaac' signifies God whom he revered. 'away empty-handed'. 43. 'What can I do for my children'; cf. 50. It seems to be rather a way out of the awkward position in which he has involved himself than genuine solicitude for his daughters.
- 44-55 The Pact between Laban and Jacob—45. 'for a memorial'; see on 28:18. 46. This friendly meal sealing the pact is mentioned here by anticipation.

1540 It followed the solemn oath, 54. See on 27:23. 47b is an explanatory gloss of St Jerome's. In MT Laban names the mound in Aramaic, Jacob in Hebrew Gal'ed, which is a play on Galaad (Gilaad) the name of the region. 48, 'The name thereof was called Galaad', and Mispah, because he said "May the Lord keep watch between us". Again a play on the name. Mispah means 'watch-place'. The place cannot be identified. 50, 'besides them'. 51. Though Jacob had set up the stone, 45, Laban had provided the occasion; but the word is suspect also on philological grounds. 53, 'fear': see on 42. 54. They eat a sacrificial meal together. 55, 'in the morning'. This verse is 32:1 in MT which consequently has its verse-numeration one higher than DV throughout ch 32.

p XXXII 1-2 Jacob is greeted by Angels—1. As Jacob had been comforted by a vision of Angels when he left the land of promise, 28:12, so now is he greeted on his return. He will not be deprived of God's protection. 2. A play on the name of Mahanaim, later one of the Levitical cities in the territory of Gad, Jos 21:37. Perhaps = Khirbet Mahneh.

q 3-23 His Preparations for the Meeting with Esau—6. Omit 'with speed'. 10. Omit 'of the least'. Jacob had had to escape to Haran and could say that he had set out with nothing but his staff. 11. That is, ruthlessly slaughter us all; cf. Os 10:14. 15, 'ten bulls . . . and ten he-asses'. 16. True to his character Jacob has calculated exactly what should be done. 21. In one of the camps; cf. 7; a Hebraism. 22, 'And rising in the night'. This was part of his precautions. He did not wish Esau to come upon him while engaged in the difficult task of taking flocks and herds over the River Jabbok.

155a 24-32 Jacob wrestles with an Angel—This mysterious struggle took place on the S. side of the Jabbok, 22, during the later hours of the night after the whole caravan had passed over. It is possible that Jacob remained behind to show stragglers of his large company the way to follow. The 'man' who wrestled with him was an Angel; see on 28 and Os 12:4. It was only by divinely given strength that he could hold his own, and from this achievement he was to learn that God's blessing and protection would be with him in all the difficulties of the future. In particular it was a guarantee of a successful outcome of his meeting with the redoubtable Esau and his armed band.

b 24. Jacob did not yet know that his assailant was not a man as he appeared to be; cf. 18:2. 25, 'and Jacob's thigh-bone was sprained as he wrestled with him'. He touched not the sinew but the curved part, generally understood to mean the socket. This was to prove to Jacob the reality of his experience. 26, 'it is break of day' = We have struggled long enough and it is useless to continue, as neither can gain complete mastery. But Jacob will not let him go unless he first gives a sign that he departs without further evil intent. 27. Jacob did not know that the 'man' knew his name. 28. A good example of a relative truth expressed in an absolute form. He is frequently called Jacob in later passages. Israel, like Ishmael, is compounded of a verb and El 'God'. The verb is of uncertain meaning, but in the light of the context and of Arabic most prob. = 'to contend', the name being understood = 'Striver with God'. 'for thou hast striven with God and with men and hast prevailed'. 'God' here is Elohim, a name applicable to any supernatural being, 1 Kg 28:13, but so frequently used of God himself that without contrary indication it cannot be otherwise understood. Prob. therefore = 'thou hast striven with God in the person of his representative, the Angel' rather than 'with a supernatural being'. The new name with its explanation is a presage of future success. 30, 'my life'. 31. The halting is explained by 25. Its purpose being to assure him of the reality of the struggle, there is no reason to suppose that it was permanent. 32. There is no legal prescription to this effect. Omit 'and it shrank'.

XXXIII 1-16 Meeting of Jacob and Esau—8. Oriental politeness imposes a preliminary refusal; cf. 23:11. 10, 'for I have been received into thy presence as into that of God, and thou hast been gracious to me'. 'God' is in Heb. Elohim; see on 32:28. For the phrase, to our ideas exaggerated, cf. 1 Kg 29:9. 11, 'The blessing' is the gift, the concrete expression of good wishes. 12. Esau wished to provide an escort and was glad to be with his brother again. It is remarkable that he, the representative of Edom, hereditary foes of Israel, is depicted in so noble a light in this meeting. 13. But Jacob is suspicious and would rather see his brother's back. He has not forgotten his fear of being attacked. 14, 'the cattle and the children'. Whether he ever meant to go to Seir may be doubted.

17-20 Jacob reaches Shechem—17. Jacob stayed some years in Succoth, later in the territory of Gad, Jos 13:27, during which his children grew up to manhood, ch 34. 18. There is a village called Salim N. of the plain E. of Shechem (= modern Nablus). But some, supported by Sam., take Salim as an adj. 'unharmful', which makes a suitable ending to the narrative of his long and dangerous journey. 'returned from Paddan Aram'; see on 28:2. 19, 'lambs': so LXX, Vg; Syr. 'sheep'; modern commentators, pieces of metal of unknown weight. The second plot of ground acquired in Canaan; see 23:17 f. Here were buried the bones of Joseph, Jos 24:32. 20, 'he named it "Mighty is the God of Israel"': so prob., using the new name conferred upon him. Other names of altars, Ex 17:15, Jg 6:24.

XXXIV 1-31 Vengeance on the Shechemites—8. Omit 'whereas she was sad'. 10, 'Remain, you may move around the country and settle in it'. 12, 'Set the price of the bride high'. 21, 'let them wander about in the land, which is large and wide enough to take them'. 25. Simeon and Levi did not attack alone but at the head of their numerous followers. It is the wont of biblical writers to leave even important circumstances to be supplied by the reader's intelligence. Why Ruben, the firstborn, took no part it is impossible to say. The others may have been too young. 27. The word 'other' is an explanatory gloss of doubtful authenticity. 28. Omit 'wasting'. The universal expression is to be understood with the qualification suggested by the context, viz. they took all they wished and could transport. 30. Jacob here condemns only the imprudence of the slaughter. In 49:5-7 he condemns its immorality.

XXXV 1-15 Jacob again at Bethel—2. This proneness to idolatry was to be Israel's curse for centuries. Rachel has the teraphim, 31:19, and see Jos 24:14. The cleansing through washing was a sign of reverence and a symbol of interior purity and perhaps had reference to the blood-shedding of ch 34. As a further sign of reverence they were to put on their best clothes, 27:15. 4. The earrings, adorned with some pagan symbol, served as amulets or talismans. 'the terebinth by Shechem' is prob. that of 12:6, Jg 9:37. 7. Jacob confirms and publishes the name (Bethel = 'Habitation of God'), which he had previously given when alone, 28:19. Alternatively, it is possible that the name is mentioned in 28:19 by anticipation. 8. Rebecca's nurse, who had accompanied her from Haran, 24:59, must have joined Jacob since his return. He had been back a considerable time (see on 33:17) and had certainly paid an unrecorded visit to his father. Possibly Debora joined Jacob on that occasion. She will have been about 80. 9-10. It is not said that Jacob's name was changed at Bethel or that there the change made near the Jabbok, 32:28, was confirmed. It is said to have occurred 'after he returned from Paddan Aram'. This vague phrase would not have been used, had the intention been to relate an experience subsequent to that near the Jabbok. The present passage therefore seems to be a misplaced repetition of the incident related in ch 32. Possibly too 11-13 belong chronologically after 32:29, where the expected mention of the departure of Jacob's celestial visitant is

- 155f not found. 'God Almighty': see on 17:1. 14. On the view of the passage here proposed, according to which 14 resumes the narrative of 6-8, the words 'where God had spoken to him' refer to the divine utterance of 28:13f. The 'monument' set up by Jacob on his outward journey was a rough stone, 28:18, and was probably no longer standing. He therefore sets up another. A drink-offering or libation of wine became a regular part of the Mosaic liturgy. 15. See on 7.
- g 16-20 Birth of Benjamin and Death of Rachel—16. 'After their departure from Bethel, when still at some distance from Ephrata'. 18. Omit 'for pain'. Jacob does not wish his son to have a name reminiscent of sorrow and calls him Benjamin 'Son of Good Fortune', the right hand (yāmīn) being associated with success and prosperity. 19. Rachel's burial-place was some distance N. of Bethlehem, 16, and near the border of Benjamin, 1 Kg 10:2. This border touches Jerusalem, Jos 18:16, which is c 5 m. N. of Bethlehem. Jer 31:15 gives no indication of the site of the sepulchre. On the Tomb of Rachel situated on the Jerusalem road about a mile from Bethlehem see DBV v 926 f., HBD iv 193.
- h 21-29 List of Jacob's Sons and Death of Isaac—21. The Flock Tower seems to have stood between Bethlehem and Hebron. 22. LXX has preserved the words 'and it was displeasing in his eyes'; cf. 49:4. 26. Benjamin was born in Canaan, 17 f., yet it is said that all the sons were born in Mesopotamia. The difficulty is not removed by suggesting an incorrect gloss. No Hebrew scribe could have failed to know the circumstances of Benjamin's birth. The fact is that the ancient oriental did not set store on exactness as does the modern western mind; cf. the apparently exact enumeration of kings in Mt 1 although three are omitted. 29. There was no occasion to mention Jacob's having greeted Isaac after his return and this is left to the intelligence of the reader to supply. His death is not necessarily recorded in strict chronological order. On his age see § 140b-f. As Isaac and Ishmael had met at the grave of Abraham, 25:9, so now Jacob and Esau at that of Isaac—a lesson in filial piety.
- 156a XXXVI 1-43 Esau and the Edomites—As after the death of Abraham Ishmael was to disappear from the story and an account of him and his family was inserted after the record of his father's burial, 25:12-18, so now after the mention of Isaac's death and burial there follows a notice devoted to Esau and the Edomites who looked to him as their forefather. The chapter is compiled from various documents. 1-8 Esau and his family; 9-14 clans descended from Esau; 15-19 governors of provinces; 20-28 and 29-30 the Horrites or Hurrians, who dwelt in the land before the Edomites, and their rulers; 31-39 list of the kings of Edom; 40-43 governors of Edom (after the conquest of Edom by David).
- b 1-8. This account of Esau's family and fortunes differs from that already given. It does not seem possible to reconcile the list of his wives with 26:34 and 28:9 or to account for the discrepancies by scribal errors. The account is introduced in 1 as a document and the explanation is probably that the compiler of Genesis, fully aware of the differences, preferred to set it down as he found it without making himself responsible for the accuracy of all its details. (In 2 read 'Ana, the son [Sam., LXX, Syr.] of Sebeon the Horrite'; cf. 24 f.) The same explanation seems to apply to 6-7 which suppose Esau to have left Canaan for Seir (= Edom) only after the return of Jacob from Mesopotamia whereas in 32:3 Esau is already established in Seir before Jacob's return. 7 is based on 13:6 and is prob. an addition to the document.
- c 9-14. This document repeats the names given in 1-8 and on the analogy of ch 10 adds the names of clans claiming descent from Esau. 11. Theman was celebrated for wisdom, Jer 49:7, and Eliphaz, one of Job's wise friends, was a Themanite, Job 2:11. The Kenizites (Cenezites) or a branch of them later became part of the tribe of Judah, Jos 14:6, 14. 12. The Amalecite clan here mentioned will have arisen through the fusion of elements of the ancient people of that name, Num 24:20, with Edomite stock (Heinisch).
- 15-19. In this list of Edomite princes omit Core in 16 with Sam. The names are the same as in 9-14. Note that in both 16 and 12 the son of the secondary wife Thamna is credited to Ada; cf. 16:2.
- 20-30. This genealogical table of Horrites (Hurrians) 20-28, and list of their princes or sheikhs, 29-30, are inserted because the Horrites dwelt in the land before the Edomites and intermarried with them, 2, 14, 22. These princes will have been contemporary with the Edomite, 15-18. In 28 Vg with LXX has 'Aram', MT 'Aran'.
- 31-39. With the unification of the country Edom passed under the rule of kings. The kingship was not hereditary; in no case is a king succeeded by his son. In 81 DV, in agreement with AV + RV, gives a possible translation, but the context requires 'before the kingship of the Israelites', before the Israelites ruled over Edom, 2 Kg 8:14. 27. 'Saul of Rehoboth by the River'; unidentified.
- 40-43. The kings were succeeded, 1 Par 1:51, by governors of provinces. Those listed here, 40, 'by their clans, their provinces and names', were probably of David's appointment.
- XXXVII 1-11 Joseph's Dreams—2. MT, LXX and Sam. have 'seventeen'. 8. Benjamin is not taken into account as still too young. 'he used to make him [i.e. have made for him] a long sleeved tunic'; so Vg in 23 'tunica talaris'. The ordinary working tunic was sleeveless and reached only to the knees. 5. Omit the last clause with LXX. It has been inserted here from 8. 10. 'bow down to the ground to honour thee?'
- 12-36 Joseph is sold into Egypt—13. As indicated already by his special tunic Joseph ordinarily stayed at home, though his first dream, 7, shows that he did join in the common tasks. The leading of the flocks to distant pastures combined with agriculture, 7, illustrates the semi-nomadic, semi-sedentary life led by the patriarchs; cf. 26:12. 14. Hebron to Shechem is about 50 m. 15. 'wandering in the open country'. 17. Dothain is about 13 m. N. of Shechem. 20. 'into a cistern'. So also in 22: 'but do not raise a hand against him'. Ruben intends to rescue him from the cistern when the others are at a distance; they mean to leave him to die there. 23. 'of the long sleeved tunic that he was wearing'. Omit 'that . . . colours'. 26. By letting Joseph die in the cistern they would kill him but with no trace of his blood to cry for vengeance, 4:10; Job 16:19. 28. The traders, called Ishmaelites in 25, 27 and 39:1, are here called Madianites. This is not a discrepancy or proof of diversity of sources. The names were used indifferently as may be seen in Jg 8:22, 24, 26. The two tribes were closely related, 25:2, 12, and intermingled. For the price cf. Lev 27:5. 'They drew him out', namely Joseph's brothers. Such changes of subject are characteristic of Hebrew. Of Joseph's agony at the brutal treatment we learn explicitly 42:21. 29. When the others had moved camp, Ruben returned to the cistern in order to rescue Joseph, as he had planned. For this purpose he had found an excuse for absenting himself and so was not present at the time of the sale. 35. 'into Sheol', the name given by the Hebrews to the subterranean abode whither all the dead were thought to go irrespective of the moral value of their lives; cf. Sutcliffe, The Old Testament and the Future Life, 1947². 30. 'captain of the guard'.
- XXXVIII 1-5 Judah's Marriage—1. This chapter interrupts the story of Joseph with which it has no connection. The introductory phrase 'at that time' is a vague literary link with the preceding and affords no chronological information; cf. Mt 3:1. Adullam was a city of Judah, Jos 15:35. 2. Unlike his father and grandfather Judah marries a Canaanite. 5b. 'She was in Kezib [= Achzib, Jos 15:44] when she bore him'. So MT emended after LXX, but the sense renders this doubtful.
- 6-10 Death of Her and Onan—7. On account of his 156k wickedness Her died a premature death. On the omission of secondary causes see § 139a. 8. 'and marry her as her husband's brother'. This custom of Levirate marriage was afterwards incorporated in the Mosaic law, Deut 25:5-10. 9. According to Deut 25:6 the firstborn son took the dead brother's name and, it is clear, succeeded to his rights. Her was Judah's eldest son, and Onan wished to secure the right of inheritance for himself. 'He knowing that the seed'. 10. It is explicitly said that Onan was punished for his wicked act. There was a strong social custom in favour of the Levirate marriage, but it was not a moral obligation, Deut 25:7-10.

I 11-30 Birth of Phares and Zara—12. Timnah (Thamnās), perhaps the town of that name near Hebron mentioned Jos 15:57. 'the Odollamite his friend'. 14. 'and covered herself with a veil and wrapped herself up. She then sat in the entrance to Enayim, which is on the way to Timnah'. Thamar was now convinced that Judah did not mean to marry her to his third son Sela. 15. Omit 'lest . . . known'. She had dressed herself to look like a harlot. 18. 'thy seal with its cord', by which it was worn hung round the neck. 20. 'by his friend'. 21. 'that sat at Enayim by the wayside'. 22. 'Let her keep them, lest we be put to shame', by its becoming known that the woman has played a successful trick. What she had was worth more than the promised kid. 24. Thamar was betrothed to Sela. The later law was less severe, Deut 22:23 f., and the penalty of burning was reserved for the daughters of priests, Lev 21:9. 25. 'whose seal and cord'. 26. 'She is more in the right than I, because this is the result of my not giving her to Sela my son'. 28. 'came forth'. 29. Phares was an ancestor of David's, Ru 4:18-22. Hence through him Thamar has a place in the genealogy of Christ, Mt 1:3.

157a XXXIX 1-23 Joseph is unjustly cast into Prison—1. 'captain of the guard'. Some think that Putiphar is here called a eunuch in accordance with the extension of the term to men in high offices generally held by such. 5. Yahweh (DV 'the Lord') is no territorial god. His rule is exercised, as in Canaan, so in the land of the many gods of Egypt. 16. Omit 'for . . . fidelity' which is an explanatory gloss. 19. Omit also 'and giving . . . words'.

b XL 1-23 Joseph interprets the Dreams of Two Prisoners—1. The butler and baker were two high court officials. They were probably arrested on suspicion of treason. 3. 'the commander of the guard'. 7. 'Why do you look sad today?' 8. In the prison they could not consult a professional interpreter of dreams. Joseph replies that if God sends dreams they cannot be interpreted by human art but only by divine illumination. 13. 'Pharaoh will put an end to thy disgrace'; lit. 'will lift up thy head', a phrase used also 4 Kg 25:27. 15. He was not stolen in the literal sense, but he was spirited away out of the country and the fact was kept secret from his father. Our word 'stealthily' is akin to this Hebrew use of 'steal'. 16. 'baskets of white bread'. On his head according to Egyptian custom. 19. 'on a tree'. After execution he was to be suspended as prey for birds—for an Egyptian a most severe sentence on account of the national belief that the preservation of the body is essential to a happy existence after death. 22. 'according to the interpretation Joseph had given'.

c XLI 1-37 Joseph interprets Pharaoh's Two Dreams—1. The river is the Nile. 2. 'and they grazed among the rushes'. 3b. 'and halted by the (other) kine on the bank of the river'. 7. 'Pharaoh awoke and lo! it was a dream'. 8. 'all the diviners of Egypt'. 10. 'the captain of the guard'. 14. Egyptians shaved the beard and some also the head. 16. 'Not I'. 18. 'And they grazed among the rushes'. 34. As the years were to have extraordinary yields, there was no hardship in a tax of one-fifth to provide for the coming lean years. 37. 'and all his ministers'.

d 38-46 Joseph appointed Viceroy of Egypt—42. 'and put it on Joseph's hand'. 43. Cf. the honour paid to Mardochai, Est 6:11. Heralds in advance of Joseph's chariot called out 'Abrek', probably some Egyptian word but of uncertain meaning. 45. His new Egyptian name Sāfnat-pa'nēah has been variously interpreted. It would seem that it must have had a meaning like 'Feeder of the Land'. On = Heliopolis (= 'City of the Sun'), NW. of modern Cairo, had a great temple dedicated to the Sun-god. The priesthood was very influential and powerful. The marriage, arranged by Pharaoh himself, was one most honourable in Egyptian eyes. There was at this time no law forbidding the members of the patriarchal family from marrying foreigners; cf. 26:34 (Esau), 38:2 (Judah), 38:6 (Thamar). (There was, however, a traditional feeling against so doing; cf. 24:3 [Abraham], 26:35 and 28:1 [Isaac and Rebecca]; and experience was already showing the evil effects that might be expected from such marriages, 38:7, 10.) 46. 'To stand before the king' = to be appointed a royal minister.

47-57 The Years of Abundance and of Famine : e

Joseph's Two Sons—51. Joseph does not mean that he had lost all affection for or wished literally to forget his kindred. Cf. Ps 44 (45) 11 'forget thy people and thy father's house'—an idiom expressing contentment and happiness in a new state of life. 52. 'God hath made me fruitful in the land where I suffered'. 54. Lit. 'in all lands'. The universal expression is to be understood, as always, in accord with the context, and here signifies all the neighbouring lands, the conditions prevailing in which could be known by report and by their people flocking to Egypt for corn.

XLII 1-5 Jacob sends his Sons to Egypt for Corn—1

1. 'Why are ye so helpless?' MT 'Why are ye gazing at one another?' 4. 'Benjamin, the brother of Joseph', by the same mother (Rachel).

6-25 Joseph's Treatment of his Brothers—11b. 'We are honest men; thy servants have not been acting the spy'.

14. 'It is as I said'. 15. Joseph had some ground to fear that they might have treated his brother German in some such way as they had treated him and wished to assure himself of Benjamin's safety. After his own experience his caution was fully justified and his treatment of his brothers in no way vindictive. 16. 'till what you have said be tested'. 17. According to idiom the 'three days' comprised one full day and parts of two others. 18. 'he brought them out of prison' is an explanatory addition. 19. 'honest men . . . and take corn to relieve the need of your households'. 20. 'They did as he had said', though the actual execution of Joseph's command is related only in 26; see on 27:23. 22. Omit 'one of them'. 25. Joseph retains not the oldest, for Ruben had striven to save him, but Simeon, the oldest of those who had treated him treacherously.

26-38 Nine Brothers return to Jacob—27. 'where they rested for the night'; DV 'in the inn'. It was probably in the open. 30. 'and put us in prison as though we were spying out the land'; cf. LXX. 31. 'We are honest men and we have not been playing the spy'. 34d. 'and afterwards you may move freely about the country'. 38. 'befall him on your journey'. 'Hell', see on 37:35.

XLIII 1-15 Jacob's Sons take Benjamin to Egypt—5. I

'as we have often said' is an addition of Vg made to ease the style. 6. 'Why did you do me this wrong by telling him'. 8. 'both we and thou and our children'. 9. I take responsibility for the boy. 11. Storax is a resinous gum. The same word is translated 'spices' in 37:25.

The exact meaning is uncertain. In 35:4 'the turpentine tree' translates Vg 'terebintus', the word which Vg has also here. This is the tree called by Linnaeus

Pistacia terebinthus*, and its product 'pistachio nuts', said to be still a delicacy in Egypt, is that suggested here by Jacob. 12. 'double money, for you must take back what you found in your sacks', i.e. money for the new purchase as well as the price of the old. 14. 'And if I am to be bereaved of my children, well I shall be bereaved'.

Jacob is now resigned; cf. 4 Kg 7:4.

16-34 Joseph, still unrecognized, gives a Feast to his Brothers—16. Omit 'victims'. The steward was to provide fresh meat for the meal. Beef and goose were favourite dishes. 21. 'to where we spent the night'.

157] 23. 'The money you owed came into my keeping'. 26. 'the presents they had brought'. Again Joseph's dream came true. 30. 'his brother, and was on the verge of crying'. 31. 'he restrained himself'. 32. The Hebrew guests have no difficulty in eating the Egyptian dishes. Contrast Dan 1:8, but the strict food regulations of later times did not yet exist. The Egyptians were extremely exclusive in regard of foreigners; see Herod. 2, 41, Diod. Sic. 1, 67. 33. By silently demonstrating that the details of their family history were known Joseph prepared his brothers for further developments.

k XLIV 1-13 Benjamin is made to appear Guilty of Theft—2. 'the sack of the youngest'. 5. Joseph was thought by the Egyptians to use and to excel in such means of divination and he uses this reputation for his plan to test the dispositions of the others towards his own full brother Benjamin. In view of Joseph's virtue, 39:9, and his conscious reception of supernatural revelations from God, 40:8 and 41:16, it is not probable that he made use of a divining cup. On this method of divination see Varro in St Augustine, De Civ. Dei 7, 35. 6. The first sentence is an addition of Vg to make the narrative run more smoothly. 12. It is noteworthy that there is no word of accusation or explanation about the money which had been secretly placed in all the sacks, 1 f. Despite a certain diffusiveness of style these narratives leave much unsaid, and the reader is left to understand that the apparent theft of the cup showed all the baser in view of the generosity with which they had been treated.

l 14-34 The Subsequent Interview with Joseph—14. Judah takes the lead as he had made himself responsible for Benjamin's safety, 43:8 f. Again Joseph's dream comes literally true. 15. 'Do ye not know that a man like me practises divining?' See on 5. 16. Judah, speaking in the name of all, accepts responsibility for all. There is no attempt to fix the blame on Benjamin. He must have known that Benjamin was not guilty, but he saw no means of proving him innocent. 18. Omit 'boldly'. Judah recognizes that Joseph might resent his words 'for thy authority is that of Pharaoh himself'. 21. 'that I may set my eyes on him'. 22. Jacob would die. 23. 'You shall not enter my presence again'. 29. On 'hell' see on 37:35. 30. Lit. 'his soul being bound up with his soul'.

m XLV 1-15 Joseph reveals himself to his Brothers—1 gives a glimpse of Joseph's dignity and the number of his attendants. 'And no stranger was present when he made himself known to his brothers'. 4. Omit 'mildly'. 5. 'Be not distressed'. Joseph magnanimously recognizes the over-ruling providence of God in his being sold by his brothers into Egypt. 7. 'to give you posterity in the land and to preserve your lives by a wonderful deliverance'. 8. Joseph calls himself a father to Pharaoh as helping him by his counsel and by guarding his interests; cf. Is 22:21. 10. Goshen (Gessen) was the district lying nearest to Canaan on the NE. frontier of Egypt. Through it ran the fertile valley of the Wady Tumilat. This territory provided suitable pasture for Jacob's flocks and herds and also had the advantage of rendering departure comparatively easy should the need ever arise. 12. 'My mouth': Joseph was now alone with his brothers and speaking in his native tongue, not as before, 42:23, through an interpreter.

n 16-23 Pharaoh invites Jacob to come to Egypt—16. 'The brethren of Joseph': the Egyptians will have called Joseph by his Egyptian name. 'Pharaoh with all his ministers'. 20. 'Have no regret at leaving your belongings behind': lit. 'Let not your eye take pity on your furniture'. 22. 'To each and all he gave festal garments . . . and five festal garments'. 23. 'And to his father in like manner he sent ten he-asses to carry choice products of Egypt and as many she-asses with wheat, wine, and provisions for his journey'. 'Bread' (MT, Vg) would not have been a suitable provision for a journey which could not be begun for quite a time; Syr. has 'wine'. 24. Joseph foresees the danger of their falling to quarrelling about the guilt of having sold him into Egypt. They should let bygones be bygones. 26. 'But Jacob remained unmoved for he did not believe them'. 157n Lit. 'his heart grew cold'. He did not become benumbed at news which he thought incredible. 28. Jacob's love for Joseph had not dimmed with time.

158a XLVI 1-7 Jacob goes down into Egypt—1. 'with all his dependants came to Beersheba'. He started his journey from Hebron, 35:27. 8. Isaac had built an altar at Beersheba, 26:23-5, and lived there, 28:10. 'I will make a great nation of thee there'. This promise is the culmination of the introductory character of Genesis and prepares the reader for the subsequent history narrated in Exodus. 5. 'from Beersheba'. 6. 'And they took their cattle and all the substance which they had gained in the land of Canaan'.

b 8-27 List of Jacob's Family—The list presents various difficulties. It purports to give the names of those who entered Egypt with Jacob, 8, but includes Her and Onan, who died in Canaan, 12. It also gives the names of ten sons of Benjamin, 21, but he has just been described as a young boy, 44:20. The sum of the numbers given, 33 + 16 + 14 + 7 (15, 18, 22, 25) add up to 70 (and if Jacob is added, the total is 71), but the total is given in 26 as 66. To this are added in 27 Joseph, his two sons, and Jacob, the sum being again 70. The wives of Jacob's sons are explicitly excluded, 26, and Jacob's own wives are not counted either. The total 66 in 26 is partially explained by the omission of Joseph and his two sons (mentioned in 20 and counted in the 14 of 22). This leaves one to account for. Dina is not counted in the total of 33 in 15 and her name, which fits awkwardly in MT, may be a later addition. Sara, another woman, 17, is included in the total of 16 in 18. A plausible explanation is that Her and Onan are also excluded as having died in Canaan, and that Dina is added. In 17 for 'Jesua and Jessuri' MT has 'Yishwah and Yishwi' but Yishwah is missing from the parallel list in Num 26:44-6, and it is perhaps a case of dittography. It is also possible that Ahod is an erroneous addition in 10. His name does not occur in the lists of Num 26:12 f. and 1 Par 4:24. A comparison of our list with those in Ex 6:14-6, Num 26 and 1 Par 2-8 presents further difficulties about the forms of names and the degrees of relationship. For instance, Jamuel's name occurs in the same form in Ex 6:15, but as Namuel (Nemuel) in Num 26:12 and 1 Par 4:24 both in MT and Vg. For a discussion the larger commentaries must be consulted, e.g. Hummelauer 570-4. The artificiality of the list recalls the remarks made on 35:26. Besides his family there went down also with Jacob the members of his large household. For the number cf. the total of Abraham's fighting-men, 14:14.

c 28-34 Meeting of Jacob and Joseph—28. Jacob sends Judah, his fourth son. Ruben, Simeon and Levi had all incurred their father's displeasure, 35:22; 34:25-30. 34. The Egyptians had flocks and herds of sheep and cattle, 47:17, Ex 9:3, and Pharaoh's own herds of cattle are mentioned in 47:6. They were tended by men of the lowest class who were despised apparently because the nature of their calling prevented that high standard of personal cleanliness cultivated in Egyptian society. Still greater would be the contempt for foreign shepherds and herdsmen.

d XLVII 1-13 Jacob and his Family settle in Egypt—1 2. Omit 'the last'. The number five seems to have been favoured by the Egyptians, 41:34; 43:34; 45:22. 6. 'able men'. 7. 'Jacob blessed Pharaoh', i.e. saluted him with wishes for his welfare; cf. 1 Kg 13:10, where the same Heb. word is translated 'salute'. So also twice in 4 Kg 4:29. 9. 'The days of my sojourning'. The Heb. word does not convey the pious connotation of the English 'pilgrimage'. 10. 'Blessing': see on 7. 11. 'in the land of Ramesses', that is, the territory of which the town of the same name, Ex 1:11, was the capital. This was in the eastern part of the Nile delta on the site known today as San el-Hagar. The territory will have been part of the land of Goshen (Gessen). On the city of Ramesses see § 163b. This was built by Ramses II, 1300-1233. The name is therefore pro-

158d leptic for the time of Joseph; cf. the use of the name Dan in 14:14. Whether or not the name is anachronistic for the time of Moses depends on the further question whether the Exodus fell in the 15th or the 13th cent.; cf. § 125b-c.

• 13-26 Political Effects of the Famine in Egypt—13.

'In the whole world there was want of bread, for the famine was very grievous, and the land of Egypt and the land of Canaan were exhausted thereby'. For the meaning of the universal expression 'the whole world' see on 41:54. 22. 'Except that the land of the priests he did not buy, for they had an allotted portion from Pharaoh and they ate the portion which Pharaoh gave them'. 26. The ordinance does not appear to have been wholly equitable. The people had first to surrender a fifth of their produce during the years of plenty, 41:34, and during the years of dearth were forced to buy it back until their resources were exhausted. On the other hand, in view of the fertility of Egypt the tax of one-fifth was not oppressive. Contrast the heavier taxes paid by the Jews, 1 Mac 10:29 f. The land of Egypt, according to Herod. II 109, 141, 168, Diod. Sic. I 54, 73 f., belonged to the king and the priests, and each of the military caste received his portion tax-free.

f 27-31 Jacob's End draws Near—27. 'Israel' is here used collectively of all Jacob's descendants. 'they grew and were multiplied'. 28. 'And Jacob lived'. 29. For the rite see on 24:2. 'this kindness and fidelity'. 30. For the burial-place see 23:17-20; 25:9; 35:27-29. 31. LXX has 'on the top of his staff', implying the same consonants but different vocalization. This Greek reading is quoted Heb 11:21, where Vg omits the preposition. MT is supported by 48:2; and a different word is used for Jacob's staff in 32:10. Moreover, 'his' is lacking in MT and, though not required with 'bed', appears necessary with 'staff'.

g XLVIII 1-22 Jacob adopts Ephraim and Manasses, setting the Younger before the Elder—2. 'gathering his strength together'. 3. Omit the stylistic gloss of Vg 'when . . . to him'. Luz = Bethel, 28:19. 4. 'a company of peoples', as in 28:3, referring to the twelve tribes. 'to thee and to thy seed': so LXX and Vg. MT only 'to thy seed'. But it was given to Jacob in the person of his descendants; cf. 12:7 with 15:7. 'everlasting': see on 13:15. 5. 'And now thy two sons'. Ephraim and Manasses were to become the heads of two tribes, taking the place of their father Joseph among Jacob's other sons. 6. Joseph's other sons and their descendants were to be part of the tribes named after their two eldest brothers. 7. 'Canaan while I was on my way and yet at some distance from Ephrata'. Rachel was the wife of Jacob's predilection and she had borne him two sons only, Joseph and Benjamin. To do her honour he adopts two of Joseph's sons as his own and secures a larger inheritance to her descendants. At the same time, the memory of his beloved wife leads him, as is natural in an old man, to a digression about the circumstances of her death and burial. 8. Jacob will have seen them before but his eyes were dim with age, 10. According to 2 only Joseph had been announced. 11. 'I did not expect to see thy face again, and lo! God hath granted me to see thy seed also'. 12. This act of deference to his father betokens real humility in one of Joseph's exalted rank. 13. He thus put Ephraim, the younger, on Jacob's left, and Manasses, the elder, on his right. 15. The metaphor in 'feedeth me' is that of a shepherd; cf. Ps 22:1 'The Lord is my shepherd' (the same word). 16. The Angel, in whom God appeared to Jacob, stands for God himself, 31:11; 32:24-30. 'and let them bear my name'—they are to be reckoned as Jacob's own sons and so directly to inherit the blessings promised to him by God and before him to Isaac and Abraham. 18. Joseph thought that his father's failing sight, 10, had misled him. 'He too shall become a people'. Manasses had territory both E. and W. of the Jordan and was a populous tribe. 'and his seed shall be the most numerous in the nation'; lit. 'the full one of the nations'. The word used, gôyim, became later a technical expression for Gentiles. Here it is used as in 35:11, of the tribes of Israel. Ephraim became in fact the most powerful tribe in Israel and its name is used, as in Is 7:2, to signify the whole Northern Kingdom. 20. 'By you shall Israel utter a blessing'. The prosperity of Ephraim and Manasses was to become proverbial and the ideal of happiness. Cf. the similar form of blessing in Ru 4:11 f. 22. The firstborn had a right to a double portion, Deut 21:17. Ruben had lost his right, 35:22, and Joseph as the saviour of his family merited it. Jacob by putting Joseph's two sons on a level with his own secured to Joseph a double portion, the territory, namely, of Ephraim and Manasses. At the same time he gave to Joseph personally the plot of ground which he had bought from the Canaanites for 100 qesitas, 33:19. This was near Shechem, and there Joseph was eventually buried, Jos 24:32. This seems to be the meaning and the text to have suffered early in the course of textual transmission. The corruption of qesita led to the introduction of the similar word for 'bow', and the phrase was completed from Jos 24:12 (Hummelauer, Hoberg). There is probably corruption also in the first half of the verse, lit. 'I give thee one shoulder', the Heb. word for which is the same as the name of the city Shechem.

XLIX 1-28 Jacob foretells the Future of his Sons—

The title 'Jacob's Blessings', which is found already in the superscription added in Syr., is based on 28. But the words concerning Ruben, Simeon and Levi are an expression of displeasure and do not announce a happy future. As noted also in 28 the predictions concern not so much the sons in person as the tribes named after them. Nonetheless the twelve names are those of Jacob's twelve sons. Joseph is not replaced by Ephraim and Manasses. Contrast Num 1:5-15; 2:3-31.

The language of the blessings is elaborate and poetic, and it is agreed that they cannot have been pronounced by the aged and dying Jacob in their present form. They must have been recast and embellished at some later time. Besides the elevated diction such an inspired poet may well have also been responsible for certain additions to the substance. God could, of course, reveal the future to Jacob in all its details, but it is not in accord with God's ordinary providence to reveal in advance the geographical location of the territory to be allotted to a tribe, as is the case here with Zabulon, 13. The date at which this editor did his work cannot now be fixed. The age of David has been suggested on account of the hegemony of Judah; but against this may be urged the omission of a reference to the beginning of kingship in the tribe of Benjamin. Moreover, and this is a more weighty consideration, the utterances about Dan, Gad and Benjamin reflect a period when the tribes were still more or less independent units and there existed no central authority. The number of unusual expressions also points to an early date. That this editor worked on an existing source is shown by the reprobation of Levi which would have been unthinkable after the time of Moses, when this tribe received the honour of being entrusted with the care of the sanctuary and of liturgical worship.

The brothers are mentioned in the following order. First are named the six sons of Lia, with Zabulon placed before Issachar. Then come the four sons of Bala and Zelpha with the two sons of the latter inserted between the two sons of the former. The list closes with the two sons of Rachel. The order is therefore that of age with the exceptions indicated.

Characteristic of the blessings are the plays upon the names which were so favoured by the Hebrews. Some have found also allusions to the signs of the zodiac claimed to have been allotted to the twelve tribes. The fullest presentment of this theme is given by E. Burrows, S.J., The Oracles of Jacob and Balaam (London, 1939). It is founded on Joseph's dream in 37:9.

3-4 Ruben. 3. 'Ruben, my firstborn art thou, my strength and the firstfruit of my vigour, pre-eminent in majesty and pre-eminent in power, 4, uncontrollable like flowing water, thou 159a shall not have pre-eminence, for thou didst go up on thy father's bed; to my sorrow thou didst defile my couch'. Ruben seems to have suggested raḥ 'captain, chief'—if so, a hidden allusion to the name. The reference to water is explained as an allusion to Aquarius. As the firstborn Ruben should have inherited the leadership, but this right he had forfeited by his disgraceful conduct, 35:22. For 'ālah read 'ālay, as in 48:7.

f 5-7 Simeon and Levi. 'Simeon and Levi are brethren; tools of violence are their weapons. 6. Into their council shall my soul not enter; to their company my spirit shall not be united. For in their fury they slew a man, and in their wilfulness they lamed an ox. 7. Accursed be their fury for its violence and their rage for its harshness. I will scatter them in Jacob and disperse them in Israel'. 6. All were brothers, and Simeon and Levi are here called brethren as being companions and partners in the deed of violence and cruelty so displeasing to their father, 34:25-30. 'Man' and 'ox' are singulars used collectively. The killing of the Shechemites, 34:25; the maiming of the oxen is not mentioned in the prose account, but may well have been part of their vengeance. 7. The possessions of Simeon were scattered in the territory of Judah, Jos 19:1-9. The tribe of Levi was assigned cities and land in the territory of all the other tribes, Jos 21:1-40. This was not in fulfilment of this prediction but in honour of the priestly dignity. The Levites had merited a blessing at the time of the worship of the golden calf, Ex 32:26-29, and thus deserved to be released from Jacob's sentence.

g 8-12 Judah. 'Judah, thee shall thy brethren praise; thy hand shall be against a fleeing foe; the sons of thy father shall bow before thee. 9. A lion's whelp is Judah; from the prey, my son, thou goest up. He lies crouching like a lion; who will dare to rouse him? 10. The sceptre shall not be taken from Judah nor the staff from between his feet till he comes to whom it belongs and his shall be the obedience of the peoples. 11. He bindeth his ass to a vine and his ass's colt to a choice vine. He washeth his garment in wine and his vesture in the blood of grapes. 12. His eyes are dark with wine and his teeth are white with milk'. 8. The Heb. opens with deliberate assonance, y'hūdāh . . . yōdūkā. 9. On the zodiacal hypothesis the language describing Judah's strength and bravery is chosen with reference to the constellation Leo. 10. The conduct of the three elder brothers had been gravely displeasing to their father. They are now passed over and supremacy is promised to Judah, the next in age. Most MSS of MT have šlōh with the meaning 'till he comes to Shilo' or 'till Shilo comes', and the Rabbis saw in this latter a designation of the Messias as the one whose characteristic was to be a reign of peace. But this is unknown to the ancient versions, which nonetheless (except for the vocalic yod) represent the same Heb. text, viz. šlh except Vg where 'mittendus est' represents šlh, but this reading cannot be right against the other textual witnesses especially as the confusion between the two aspirates could easily occur. LXX MSS have both τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῶ and ὁ ἀποκείμενος, to which correspond the translations of the Old Latin 'quae reposita sunt ei' and 'cui reposita sunt'. Syriac has 'he whose it is', and Targum Onkelos paraphrases 'till the Messias comes whose is the kingdom' or 'the kingship' (malkūtā). The Samaritan text supported by many Heb. codices also has šlh without the intrusive yod. This evidence leads us to šlōh for the original Heb. (the h representing the affixed pronoun as in 11): 'till he comes whose it is'. And see the similar phrase in Ez 21:27 (MT 32). The parallelism suggests that sceptre and staff are two names for the same emblem of authority, the early sceptre being in the form of a staff, which is the original meaning of σκήπτρον. Illustrations of such Assyrian sceptres may be seen in B. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien I (1920) plates 18, 19. 11 f. describe the peace and prosperity that will mark Judah's supremacy—a land so bountifully covered with vines has not known the ravages of hostile armies; cf. 4 Kg 3:19.

h The royal sceptre passed to the tribe of Judah in the person of David, and to him it was promised through the prophet Nathan that 'Thy throne shall be firm for ever', 2 Kg 7:16, a prophecy taken up in Ps 88 (89) 30-38 'I will not lie unto David; his seed shall endure for ever and his throne shall be as the sun before me'. His descendants lost the temporal throne at the Babylonian conquest in 587 through their manifold infidelities, Ps 131 (132) 12 f.; 4 Kg 24:20. But the promise of an eternal kingdom remained, and its fulfilment was announced by the Angel Gabriel 'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of David his father; and he shall reign in the house of Jacob for ever and of his kingdom there shall be no end', Lk 1:32 f. There is an echo of this prophecy in Apoc 5:5 with its mention of 'the lion of the tribe of Judah'. 11. The parallelism indicates that two animals are not intended; cf. sceptre and staff in 10.

13 Zabulon. Nothing is said of Zabulon except its fortunate position in being able to draw on the wealth of the sea; see also Deut 33:18 f. Josephus likewise mentions that the territory of the tribe touched the sea, Ant. 5, 5, 22. This maritime position does not appear in Jos 19:10-16, and the tribal boundaries must have varied at different periods.

14-15 Issachar. 'Issachar is a strong-built ass lying between the shelters. He saw that rest is sweet and the land delightful; he bent his shoulder to the burden and became a band of labourers'. The territory of Issachar, Jos 19:17-23, lay largely in the plain of Esdraelon noted for its fertility, Jos. B. J. 3, 3, 2. The ass was and is esteemed for its utility in the Near East. The hero Ajax is likened to an ass by Homer, Iliad 11, 557 f., and the Caliph Merwan II was called 'the ass of Mesopotamia', König. On 'the shelters' see Zorell's Lex.; generally translated 'sheepfolds'. The idea is that of ease joined with security. Issachar is praised in Jg 5:15 for its warlike spirit and Josephus, B. J. 3, 3, 2, says that the Galileans were warriors from their youth. The word mas is normally used of a forced labour-gang, but here rather contemptuously of the lucrative service rendered largely by asses to the mercantile traffic which passed along the trade routes through the plain of Esdraelon.

16-18 Dan. 'Dan shall vindicate the rights of his people like the other tribes of Israel. He must be a snake by the way, a horned serpent by the path'. The sentence begins with a play on the name, dān yāḏīn. The snake's power lies in the cunning suddenness of the attack rather than in open force. We are reminded of the strategems used in his exploits by Samson, who was of the tribe of Dan. The ancient chariots were open behind, and the rearing or shying of a terrified horse would easily throw the driver and warrior down backwards. 18, which makes a half-line only, may be a gloss.

19 Gad. 'Gad raided by raiders himself raids their rear'. The Gadites dwelling in Galaad were exposed to the attacks of the Ammonites and of raiding Arab tribes, Jg chh 10-11; 1 Par 5:18-22, and inflicted heavy defeats on them. Here it is implied that they routed and pursued the retreating enemy.

20 Asher. 'Asher, rich in food, provides the dainties of a king'. The territory of Asher (Aser) lying along the coast from Carmel northwards, Jos 19:24-31, was very fertile, Deut 33:24. The tribe owing to its proximity to Phoenicia will have had a large share of the trade with that country, Ez 27:17.

21 Nephtali. 'Nephtali is a spreading terebinth; he puts forth boughs of beauty'. So prob. after LXX; perhaps 'oak'. Perhaps with MT: 'N. is a free-roaming hind' with reference to branched antlers. The allusion would then be to Nephtali's spirit of freedom and eagerness to defend it.

22-26 Joseph. 'A young fruit-tree is Joseph, a young fruit-tree by a spring, with tendrils climbing over the wall. 23. In bitterness they shot at him and the archers persecuted him. 24. But his bow remained firm, and supple were the muscles of his arms, through the help of the Mighty One of Jacob, through the power of the Shepherd of Israel, 25, through the God of thy father, may he help thee! and with the aid of Shaddai, may he bless thee! with the blessings of the 160g heavens above, with the blessings of the deep beneath, with the blessings of breast and womb. 26. The blessings granted to thy father are mightier than the blessings of the eternal mountains, than the desire of the everlasting hills. May they come upon the head of Joseph, upon the crown of the head of the prince among his brethren. 22. The allusion is to Joseph himself and his two tribes, Ephraim and Manasses. The vigorous vine, with all the advantages of abundant moisture and a protecting wall, is unhampered in its growth, and suggests the numerical strength of the two tribes. At the same time the pleasing picture presented recalls Joseph's comeliness of face and form, 39:6. 23. Again a double allusion both to Joseph's persecution at the hands of his brothers and to attacks on the tribes. The Arabs were noted for their archery, 21:20, which suggests an allusion to their attacks on both sides of the Jordan, Jg 6:3 ff., 1 Par 5:18 ff. 24. Both Joseph and his tribes triumphed through the help of God. Strong arms are needed for the handling of bows suitable for war. 25. The blessings of the heavens are sunshine, rain and dew; those of the great subterranean ocean are the springs and rivers which ancient thought conceived to be fed from it. To these blessings so necessary in Palestine is added the prayer for abundance of herds and flocks. 26. The blessings of the eternal mountains and the 'desire', the desirable things, the choice products, of the everlasting hills are described in Jl 3:18, Am 9:13, Ex 3:8, streams of sweet wine, milk and honey. The mountains are eternal because immovably fixed and existing from the beginning of the world; see on 1:2. But Jacob had received blessings more wonderful than these, the promise of continual divine help, of the possession of the land of Canaan, of a multitude of descendants, that in him and his seed all the tribes of the earth should be blessed, 28:3-4, 13-15.

1 27 Benjamin. 'Benjamin is a ravening wolf. In the morning he devoureth the prey and in the evening he divideth the spoil.' He is at all times lustful of booty and ready for the attack. It is not meant that different activities are confined to special times. For an excellent example of this type of sentence see Prov 10:1. Benjamin, though small, was one of the most warlike tribes, Jg 5:14; 20:18 ff.; 2 Kg 2:15.

28 shows that the pronouncements refer primarily to the tribes.

161a 29-32 Jacob's Death—29. Omit 'double'; see ch 23. 30. 'in the cave which is in the field of Machpelah, over against . . .' 31. 'and there I buried Lia.' This verse is a parenthesis, 30 being continued in 32: 'the field and the cave therein bought from the Hittites', lit. 'the sons of Heth'. This is omitted in Vg + DV.

b L 1-3 Mourning for Jacob—1. 'And when Joseph saw this' is a stylistic addition of Jerome's. 2. Embalming was an Egyptian, not an Israelite, custom, but it was necessary in the case of Jacob if he was to be honoured as the manners of the country required and his body to be transported for burial to Canaan. 8. At a later date according to Herodotus II 86, 88 embalming took 70 days. According to Diodorus the Egyptian mourning for a king lasted 72 days, I 72. The honour paid to Jacob was for Joseph's sake. The Israelites mourned for Aaron and Moses for 30 days, Num 20:30, Deut 34:8.

4-13 The Burial of Jacob—4. Joseph asks for the intervention of Pharaoh's 'household'. For the chief minister of the crown to leave the country may well have required the assent of the other advisers of Pharaoh. 5. Jacob may have prepared himself a resting-place in the cave of Machpelah, 49:29 f., before he left Canaan. It is also possible that Joseph expressed himself in accordance with Egyptian custom. The Pharaohs and other persons of high rank prepared themselves burial-places during their lifetime. 7. A large number of the responsible officials of the royal court accompanied the funeral procession. This was primarily to do honour to Joseph. Universal expressions are used with latitude. 9. A guard was necessary on such a long journey. 10. The threshing-floor of Atad, or the bramble threshing-floor, is otherwise unknown. A threshing-floor is mentioned as a place of meeting in the MT of 3 Kg 22:10 (DV 'court'). The one here in question was east of the Jordan. Political reasons will have dictated the long march round the Dead Sea instead of the direct route through Beersheba. The mourning ceremonies there lasted 7 days in accordance with Hebrew custom, 1 Kg 31:13. 11. The place was called (MT) Abel Misraim, 'Egyptian brook' or 'meadow', a name reminiscent of 'ēbel 'mourning'. The site is unknown. 12. The Egyptian caravan did not cross into Canaan for the same reason that had imposed the easterly route, 10. 13. 'in the cave of the field of Machpelah'.

14-21 Joseph's Magnanimity—15. Omit 'were afraid'. d 19. 'Fear not. Am I in place of God?' As 20 shows, the meaning is, can I take umbrage at what God's Providence manifestly has turned to the common good? 20. Omit 'exalt . . . see'.

22-25 Joseph's Last Days—22 (MT 23). Joseph saw e the children of the third generation in descent from Ephraim, that is, his own great-grandsons, grandsons being the third generation, Ex 20:5. Machir was Manasses' eldest son, Jos 17:1. For 'to be born on the knees' of someone, see on 30:3. 24 (MT 25). For the execution of this wish see Ex 13:19, Jos 24:32. 25 (MT 26). It is possible that the age of 110 assigned to Joseph is due to the Egyptians. A. Mallon, S.J., Les Hébreux en Egypte (Rome, 1921) 72 note, quotes with approval a remark of E. Naville's that it is not probable that the ancient Egyptians knew their true ages and that various inscriptions indicate that for them 110 was the extreme limit of old age. On this hypothesis the 110 years assigned to Joseph would mean that he had reached that advanced age.

EXODUS

By E. POWER, S.J.

162a Bibliography.

(A) Commentaries :

*Keil-Delitzsch, tr. J. P. Lange, Edinburgh 1868 ; *H. C. Strack (Strack-Zücklers Komm.), München 1894 ; *Dillmann-Ryssel, Leipzig 1897 ; F. de Hummelauer (CSS), Paris 1897 ; *H. Holzinger (Marti's Handkomm.), Tübingen 1900 ; *B. Baentsch (Nowack's Hand-Komm.), Göttingen 1903 ; J. Weiss, Graz 1911 ; *S. R. Driver (CBSC), 1911, reprinted 1918 and 1929 ; *W. H. Bennett (CBI), Edinburgh undated ; *A. H. McNeile (WC), London 1918 ; H. J. Grimmelsman, Cincinnati 1927 ; B. Ubach, Monserrat 1927 ; *F. M. Th. Böhl, Groningen 1928 ; *J. H. Hertz, Pentateuch and Haftorahs II, Oxford 1930 ; F. Ceuppens, Bruges 1932 ; *W. H. Gispen, Kampen, chh 1-15, 1932, chh 16-40, 1939 ; P. Heinisch (BB), Bonn 1934 (most useful) ; *G. Beer, Tübingen 1939.

b (B) Special Subjects :

A. Mallon, Les Hébreux en Egypte, Rome 1921 ; F. X. Kortleitner, Israelitarum in Aegyptio Commoratio, Tongerlo 1930 ; *H. H. Rowley, Israel's Sojourn in Egypt, Manchester 1938 ; P. Montet, 'Tanis, Avaris et Pi-Ramses' RB 39 (1930) 5-28 ; B. Stein, 'Der Engel des Auszuges' Bi 19 (1938) 286-97 ; *H. Bauer, 'Die Gottheiten von Ras-Schamra' ZATW 51 (1933) 81-101 ; *O. Eissfeldt, 'Neue Zeugnisse für die Aussprache des Tetragramms als Jahwe' ZATW 53 (1935) 59-77 ; A. Vaccari, 'Iahve e i nomi divini nelle religioni semitiche' Bi 17 (1936) 1-10 ; C. Bourdon, 'La route de l'Exode de la terre de Gessé à Mara' RB 41 (1932) 370-92, 538-49 ; A. Mallon, 'La mer rouge et l'Exode' Bi 6 (1925) 396-400 ; *H. M. Wiener, 'The Date of the Exodus' Bs 73 (1916) 454-80 ; *J. W. Jack, The Date of the Exodus, London 1925 ; A. Mallon, 'Exode' DBV(S) 2 (1934) 1333-42 ; *T. H. Robinson, 'The Date of the Exodus' ET 47 (1935-6) 53-5 ; *H. H. Scullard, 'The Passage of the Red Sea' ET 42 (1930-1) 55-61 ; *T. H. Robinson, 'Der Durchzug durch das Rote Meer' ZATW 51 (1933) 170-3 ; M.-J. Lagrange, 'Le Cantique de Moïse' RB 8 (1899) 532-41 ; J. Linder, 'Das Siegeslied des Moses' ZKT 44 (1920) 43-77 ; S. Garofalo, 'L'epinicio di Mosè' Bi 18 (1937) 1-22 ; *C. L. Woolley and *T. H. Lawrence, The Wilderness of Zin, London 1935 ; *R. Weill, Le séjour des Israélites au désert et le Sinai, Paris 1909 ; L. Prévost, L. Dennefeld, M. David, D. Gorce, M. Lejeune, Le Sinai hier . . . aujourd'hui, Paris 1937 ; *F. S. Bodenheimer und *O. Theodor, Ergebnisse der Sinaiexpedition 1927, Jerusalem 1929 ; K. Miketta, 'Wo lag der Berg Sinai?' in Weidenauer Studien 3, (1909) 77-123 ; 4, (1911) 47-145 ; J. Gabriel, 'Wo lag der biblische Sinai?' WZKM 39 (1932) 123-32 ; L. H. Vincent, 'Un nouveau Sinai biblique' RB 39 (1930) 73-83 ; *W. J. Phythian-Adams, 'The Mount of God' PEF 62 (1930) 135-49, 192-202 ; P. Karge, Geschichte des Bundesgedanken im AT (AT Abhandlungen II 1-4), Münster 1910 ; *W. Staerk, 'Zum AT Erwählungsglauben' ZATW 55 (1937) 1-36 ; A. Vaccari, 'De praeceptorum Decalogi distinctione et ordine' VD 17 (1937) 317-20, 328-34 ; N. Peters, Die älteste Abschrift der zehn Gebote, Freiburg 1905 ; Anon., 'Le papyrus Nash' RB

13 (1904) 242-50 ; *W. F. Albright, 'A Biblical Fragment from the Maccabean Age: The Nash Papyrus' JBL 56 (1937) 145-76 ; A. Eberharter, 'Décalogue' DBV(S) 2 (1934) 341-51 ; K. Fruhstorfer, 'Der Dekalog' TPQ 77 (1924) 92-101, 216-24 ; P. Heinisch, 'Alter und Eigenart des Dekalogs' SC 10 (1933-4) 24-39 ; F. Feldmann, 'Das Alter des Dekalogs' Bonn Zts. f. Th. und Seelsorge 1 (1924) 213-31 ; I. Verquerre, 'Le Décalogue, code universel et éternel' RA 63 (1936, 2) 149-66 ; *H. J. Flowers, The Permanent Value of the Ten Commandments, London 1927 ; J. Hehn, Der Israelitische Sabbath (Bibl. Zeitfragen 11, 12) Münster 1912 ; id., 'Zur Sabbathfrage' BZ 14 (1917) 198-213 ; *J. Herrmann, 'Das Zehnte Gebot' in Sellin-Festschrift 1927, 69-82 ; F. Prat, Le Code de Sinai: sa Genèse et son Evolution (Science et Religion) Paris 1907 ; W. Stoderl, Das Gesetz Israels nach Inhalt und Ursprung, Marienbad 1933 ; *A. Jirku, Das weltliche Recht im AT, Gütersloh 1927 ; *A. Alt, Der Ursprung des israelitischen Rechts, Leipzig 1934 ; *W. Nowack, Das Bundesbuch (ZATW Beiheft 34) Berlin 1920 ; P. Cruevilhier, Introduction au Code d'Hammourabi, Paris 1937 ; id., Commentaire du Code d'Hammourabi, Paris 1938 ; id., 'Le Code d'Hammourabi et la législation civile des Hébreux' RCF 69 (1912) 641-73 ; *S. A. Cook, The Laws of Moses and the Code of Hammurabi, London 1903 ; *G. R. Driver and *J. C. Miles, The Assyrian Laws, London 1935 ; M. Witzel, Hehitische Keilschrifturkunden (Keilinschr. Stud. 4), 1 (1924) 132-73 ; J. Nikel, Das AT und die Nächstenliebe (Bibl. Zeitfragen VI 11-12), Münster 1913 ; P. Heinisch, 'Das Sklavenrecht in Israel und im Alten Orient' SC 11 (1934-5) 201-18 ; N. Peters, Die soziale Fürsorge im AT, Paderborn 1936 ; *C. Schick, Der Stiftshütte, der Tempel in Jerusalem und der Tempelplatz der Jetztzeit, Berlin 1896 ; *E. Sellin, 'Das Zelt Jahwes' Beiträge zur Wissenschaft des AT 13 (1919) 168-92 ; G. Orfali, De Arca Foederis, Paris 1918 ; L. Dürr, 'Ursprung und Bedeutung der Bundeslade' Bonn. Zts. f. Th. und Seelsorge 1 (1924) 17-32 ; *G. von Rad, 'Zelt und Lade' Neue Kirchl. Zts. 42 (1931) 476-98 ; H. Lesêtre, 'Tabernacle' DBV 5 (1912) 1951-61 ; *A. R. S. Kennedy, 'Tabernacle' HDB 4 (1902) 653-68 ; P. Dhorme et L. H. Vincent, 'Les Chérubins' RB 35 (1926) 328-58, 481-95 ; A. Eberharter, 'Das Horn im Kult des AT' ZKT 51 (1927) 394-9 ; J. Gabriel, 'Untersuchungen über das AT Hohepriestertum mit besonderer Berücksichtigung des hohepriesterlichen Ornates' (Th. St. der österreichischer Leogesellschaft 33), 1933 ; S. Landersdorfer, 'Das Problem der Priestersalbung im Gesetze' TQ 107 (1926) 185-97 ; *M. Löhr, Das Rauchopfer im AT, Halle 1927 ; A. Eberharter, 'Das Weihrauchopfer im AT' ZKT 50 (1926) 89-105 ; A. Van Hoonacker, 'La date de l'encens dans le culte de Jahve' RB 23 (1914) 161-87 ; F. Steinmetz, 'Das heilige Salböl das Alten Bundes' BZ 7 (1909) 17-29 ; P. van Imschoot, 'Le veau d'or' Collationes Gandavenses 14 (1927) 113-16 ; A. Eberharter, 'Die Verehrung des goldenen Kalbes' Pastor Bonus 41 (1930) 103-9 ; *G. K. Berry, 'The Ritual Decalogue' JBL 44 (1925) 38-43 ; A. Eberharter, 'Besitzen wir in Ex 23 und 34 zwei Rezensionen eines zweiten Dekalogs?' BZ 20 (1932) 157-67 ; F. Nötscher, Das Angesicht Gottes schauen, Würzburg 1924 ; J. Götsberger, 'Die Hülle des Moses nach Ex 34 und 2 Kor 3' BZ 16

162b (1924) 1-17; H. Cazelles, Le Code de l'Alliance, Paris 1946.

c Name—The Greek name of the book, Exodos, latinized Exodus, is generally derived from the LXX rendering of 19:1: In the third month of the Exodus of the children of Israel from the land of Egypt. It refers directly only to the first part of the narrative, not to its climax, the Sinaitic Covenant, by which Israel became the chosen people of Yahweh. Typically, however, it indicates also the ultimate object of the Covenant, since the Exodus, by which Israel was delivered from the bondage of Egypt, is a type of the Redemption, by which mankind was freed from the slavery of sin. The Hebrew name of the book is W'illeh S'mot, the opening words of MT.

d Contents—Exodus is a religious history. It narrates the first and fundamental steps in the fulfilment of the promises made by God to Abraham that his descendants should become a great nation and that in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed. The opening chapter, which represents the Israelites as already a numerous people and cruelly oppressed by their Egyptian masters, shows that the time is ripe for the execution of God's designs in their regard. The call of Moses, the aggravated oppression of the people, the plagues of the Egyptians and the deliverance of the Israelites are first described. The march through the desert to Sinai follows, during which God miraculously provides for his people's bodily needs. Then comes the climax of the narrative, the Theophany and the Sinaitic Covenant with its necessary consequences, the Decalogue, the Book of the Covenant and the Ritual Legislation. The fall of the people into idolatry, necessitating the renewal of the Covenant, ends the narrative. The last six chapters are a kind of appendix, describing the execution of the directions already given for the organization of cult.

e Composition and Authorship—The remarkable unity of plan which characterizes the book is a strong confirmation of its substantial Mosaic authorship, already discussed. The principal narrative is interspersed, however, with passages, shown to be additions by their interruption of the context or their want of harmony with it in content or in date. Since the original narrative was not a diary, but received its literary form at a period subsequent to the events recorded, most of these additions are most probably Mosaic. Some, however, are of post-Mosaic origin and were inserted by an inspired editor who had other traditional sources at his disposal. There are, moreover, here as elsewhere, a few uninspired glosses and interpolations, introduced into the text in the course of transmission. As it is necessary for the better understanding of the narrative to determine these additions as far as possible, an attempt has been made to do so in the commentary, the results of which, summarized here, are not all equally well established and naturally make no claim to finality or completeness. The supplement to the ritual legislation (chh 30-1) and the appendix which supposes it (chh 35-40) as well as the homiletic additions to the decalogue (20:4-6; 9-11; 12b; 17b) may be ascribed to Moses himself. Legislative additions (12:15-20 in whole or in part; 12:43-51; 22:21b; 27:20-21; 29:29-30; 34:20; 24) may be Mosaic or editorial. The historical additions, practically all editorial, are: the second account of the call of Moses with an insertion on the family history of Moses and Aaron (6:2-7:7), some elements in the plague narrative, in particular the third and sixth plagues (8:15-19; 9:8-12), some elements in the Manna narrative probably Mosaic (in particular 16:33-34), the second account of the Theophany (19:20-25), the second account of the ascent of Sinai (24:1-2; 9-11b), the tent of meeting (33:7-11). It will be noted that the historical additions refer to events of major importance about which various traditions would be current among the people. It is remarkable too that the later traditions, when properly interpreted, are not at variance with the principal narrative. Glosses and interpolations are few (4:19; 11:3b, 10; 16:36; 19:13a; 38:25-28). The attempt to distinguish definite sources JEDP throughout the entire book, which encumbers so many commentaries, is avoided here as conjectural and profitless, since our object is to explain the contents of the sacred text, all parts of which, except unauthorized glosses and interpolations, are equally inspired and authoritative.

Date—The numerical indications of the Bible are too uncertain in text and interpretation to determine the date of the Exodus either in the 15th cent. B.C., 480 years before the building of Solomon's temple (3 Kg 6:1), or in the 12-11th cent., 645 years after Abraham's arrival in Canaan (Gen 12:4; 17:17; 25:26; 47:9; Ex 12:40) according to the latest but still uncertain determination of Abraham's date. The contents of the sacred narrative and the historical data obtained from Egyptian texts and excavations offer more solid arguments for a solution of the problem. The Pharaoh of the oppression, very probably a single individual, had a long reign. He has therefore been identified with Thutmose III of the XVIII dynasty (1484-1450) and Ramesses II of the XIX dynasty (1298-1232) and the Pharaoh of the Exodus with their respective successors, Amenophis II (1450-1421) and Merneptah (1232-1224). The Pharaoh oppressor (the last, if there was more than one) is distinguished as a builder of cities in the Delta region where the Hebrews dwelt. This characteristic is definitely verified in Ramesses II, but there is no trace of building in the Delta region on the part of Thutmose III, since northern Egypt at that period was still insecure on the Asiatic side. The Pharaoh, builder and oppressor, had also his royal residence in the Delta near the Hebrews, a fact again definitely verified in Ramesses II, but not in the Pharaohs of the XVIII dynasty, residing at Thebes in Upper Egypt. Finally the cities built by the Hebrews, Ramesses and Pithom, and the site of their encampment in their flight, Migdol, excavated and identified, still more definitely attach the Exodus to the Ramesses-Merneptah period. Ramesses, the royal residence of Ramesses II, has been identified, more or less probably, by Montet's excavations in 1929 with the ancient Tanis on the Tanitic branch of the Nile, 4 m. S. of Lake Menzaleh. We find the same identification suggested in the Bible by juxtaposing the field of Tanis, scene of the plagues (Ps 77:12), Ramesses, starting-point of the Exodus (Ex 12:37) and the land of Ramesses, allotted to the Hebrews (Gen 47:11). Ramesses was a store city (Ex 1:11), provided with granaries for military expeditions and commanding the northern route to Asia. The name, Ramesses, first appears in the XIX dynasty and, if the Exodus occurred two centuries earlier, it would be strange to find only the later name of the city in the Mosaic narrative.

Pithom is either Tell el-Artabi or Tell el-Maskhuta, neighbouring sites in the Wady Tumilat, excavated by Naville in 1883, both containing a pi-thom, temple of Thum, as well as granaries and commanding the southern route to Asia. The identification of Succoth (Ex 12:37) with Theku, ancient Egyptian name of Tell el-Maskhuta, is probable, but not definitely established. Migdol (Ex 14:2), identified with Tell Abu-Hasa, excavated by Clédat in 1904, was the southern of two frontier forts, both called Migdol (fort) of Merneptah, another name of Seti I, predecessor of Ramesses II. It guarded the route to Sinai, had a temple of Hathor, patroness of the Sinai mines, and inscriptions of Seti I and Ramesses II. All the sites mentioned attest by their inscriptions building operations of Ramesses II. Against this accumulated evidence the stele of Merneptah has been objected as proof of an earlier date; cf. § 78a. If Israel was already in Palestine in the fifth year of Merneptah's reign, the Exodus must have occurred at least a generation earlier. Of the various explanations proposed it may be first noted that Israel is preceded in the text by the sign for foreign people, but not like the other names by the sign for foreign land. The 163d Israelites thus seem to be still nomads four years after the Exodus. The text may refer to the crossing of the Red Sea and may exemplify a well-known tendency of ancient recorders to register defeats as victories, with some show of reason in this case since the Hebrews fled from the Egyptians. Other explanations, not without support in this and other texts, interpret Israel either as Israelites detached from the main body, or as a tribe of similar name.

• The indirect evidence of Palestinian excavations is still disputed. As it refers directly to the date of the settlement in Canaan, it will be discussed more conveniently in the commentary on Josue. The Habiri of the Tell el-Amarna tablets, formerly identified with the Hebrews by upholders of the earlier date, are now better known as a people or class much more ancient and more widespread than Israel, cf. §§ 78b and 120a-b. We conclude, therefore, that the 13th cent. is the only date of the Exodus solidly, if not certainly, established by the existing evidence.

f Teaching—Exodus teaches us, in the first place, that God chose the Hebrew nation as his special instrument in the execution of his plan for the redemption of mankind. The freedom of this choice is clearly manifested. I will show favour to whom I will show favour and I will show mercy to whom I will show mercy (33:19). He first makes known to them his exalted nature by the revelation of the divine name, Yahweh. He then shows his goodness and his omnipotence by the prodigies through which he delivers them from the bondage of Egypt. The same attributes are manifested in his solicitude for their temporal needs by the miraculous provision of water, quails, and manna in the desert. He manifests to them his majesty at Sinai and makes a covenant with them, securing them his constant favour and protection and exacting from them special holiness of life and obedience to his commands. His wisdom and holiness appear in the ethical and religious precepts which he imposes on them, surpassing immeasurably the laws of other ancient peoples. When they revolt from him he manifests his detestation of their sin and threatens punishment, but finally, when they show repentance, yields to the intercession of Moses, admits them to pardon and renews his covenant with them. In all this the nature and attributes of God are abundantly revealed and our duties towards him are clearly manifested.

g Three undeniable historical facts narrated in Exodus prove that God's choice of Israel for the execution of his merciful design is not a patriotic fiction but a sublime reality: the divine name Yahweh, the miraculous provision of food in the desert, the unique character of the moral and religious laws. The nature of God, as revealed by the name Yahweh, implies the doctrine of Monotheism, a religious truth unknown to all ancient peoples and unattained even by such enlightened philosophers as Plato and Aristotle. The History of Religions thus supports the divine origin of the name, affirmed in the sacred text. The survival of the Hebrews for so many years in so destitute a region as the Sinaitic peninsula would have been impossible without divine intervention. The figure of the population given in 12:37 may be disputed, but the increase recorded in 1:7 ff. and the conquest of Canaan supposes a number many times superior to the 5,000 half-starved Bedouin whom Sinai supports with difficulty today. The prohibition of evil desires in the Decalogue, the special laws of charity and consideration for the poor and unprotected in the Book of the Covenant and the religious laws in general are unparalleled in antiquity and far surpass all that the lessons of history entitle us to expect from any ancient people. Their unique character can only be adequately explained by the divine origin which is claimed for them.

h St. Augustine's pronouncement on the relation between the Old Testament and the New: Novum in Vetere latet, Vetus in Novo patet, the New is hidden in the Old, the Old is manifest in the New, is particularly true of Exodus. The Sinaitic Covenant or Testament is a type of the New Testament. Its mediator, Moses, is a type of Christ. The priestly people and holy nation of Israel (19:6) is a type of the members of the Church, the holy priesthood (1 Pet 2:5), who enjoy the fulfilment of the promise. The sacrifice of the Pasch is a type of the sacrifice on Calvary. Its sacrificial commemoration is a type of the Eucharistic sacrifice. The Manna is a type of the sacrament of the Eucharist, also prefigured by God's visible presence among his chosen people. The typical character of the Tabernacle and the various ceremonies connected with it is developed in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Church calls our Lady the Ark of the Covenant. Many rites of the old revealed religion are incorporated in our liturgy. The precepts of the Decalogue are still as actual as on the day when they were first promulgated. The principles of justice and charity inculcated in the Book of the Covenant still cry out for application to heal the wounds of the world of today. It may be said that the teaching of Exodus surpasses that of any other book of the OT in variety, extent and permanent value.

(A) Israel in Egypt (1:1-13:16)

I 1-22 Increase and Oppression of the Israelites— 164a

1-5. All the sons of Jacob with their families descended into Egypt (Gen 35:23-25), seventy (MT) or seventy-five (LXX) in number. 6-7. After their death their descendants increased mightily and spread over the land, the Delta region. 8-10. A new Pharaoh, Rameses II, or possibly one of his predecessors, who knew not Joseph, had no experience or appreciation of the services rendered by Joseph to the Egyptians and consequently no friendly regard for his kinsfolk, saw a danger to the nation in this rapidly increasing horde of foreigners and proposed to his people: 'Let us deal craftily with them lest they increase and it come to pass, when a war breaks out, that they fight with our enemies against us and go up out of the land'. 11-14. The first measure of oppression was forced labour under Egyptian task-masters, more particularly the building of store cities, of which two, Pithom and Rameses (cf. § 163b-c) are specified. The corvée, still in force at the time of the plagues, did not break the spirit of the Hebrews or lessen their increase. It included 'hard service in mortar and in brick and all manner of service in the field, all their service wherein they made them serve with rigour'. 15-21. The second measure of oppression was the charge laid on the midwives to kill the male children at birth. MT has Hebrew midwives, the versions midwives of the Hebrew women—a better reading as the midwives were more probably Egyptians. Pharaoh would scarcely entrust Hebrews with the execution of such orders, and the midwives attended Egyptians as well as Hebrews (19). The Hebrew words: Sephora (Šiprah) 'beauty' and Phua 'brightness' may be variations of Egyptian names. The second part of 16a is rendered by some: When you see (them) on the stones, as Egyptian women knelt on flat stones in giving birth. But this does not agree with text or context, which require: look to the sex. The excuse given by the midwives to Pharaoh is that the Hebrew women, unlike the Egyptians, are animals, give birth quickly and easily like animals. God rewarded the midwives by building them houses, giving them husbands, children and descendants. 22. Pharaoh now orders all his people to drown the male children of the Israelites in the Nile. Without excusing his ruthlessness we must not judge him by modern standards. Slave-labour and exposure of unwanted children were common enough in ancient times. The Egyptians in general were mild in character, not cruel like the Assyrians.

II 1-22 Moses' Birth, Upbringing and Sojourn in e

Madian—1-3. Moses was born soon after the edict of 1:22, which did not affect his three year old brother Aaron. His parents were both of the tribe of Levi. It is not implied that he was their eldest son. Aaron's birth is not mentioned because he has no part in the 164e narrative. His mother's love and faith (Heb 11:23) induced her to conceal him for three months when she saw that he was vigorous and likely to reach maturity. The canoe (DV basket, cf. Is 18:2) was a kind of chest, constructed of the pithy strips of the papyrus plant and made watertight by coats of asphalt, imported from the Dead Sea, and pitch. 4-7. No doubt the mother knew where Pharaoh's daughter used to bathe and counted on her compassion to save the life of the child. The sister was left to watch and offer her services to provide a nurse. A Hebrew would naturally be sought since the edict of extermination made it easy to find one. 8-10. After the child was weaned in his fourth year (cf. 2 Mac 7:27) he was taken to the royal palace and adopted as a son by the princess, who named him Moses and had him educated according to his position so that 'he was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians' (Act 7:22).

d Moses is an Egyptian word, as appears from such names as Thuthmosis, Ahmosis, Ramesses, where the first element is a divine name and the second a verb with an active or, more probably, passive meaning, 'gives a son' or 'is born'. In the latter alternative Moses means 'child' and Mes 'child', without preformative, is attested in the monuments as a proper name. The derivation from the Hebrew māšāh 'draw' is based on assonance and exemplifies popular as opposed to scientific etymology. The story of the birth of Moses only superficially resembles fabulous tales of the birth of great men like Sargon of Agade. It is not, like them, an isolated episode, but is firmly anchored in the account of the Egyptian captivity (Heinisch). It explains the origin of his undoubtedly Egyptian name and shows how he was providentially prepared to be the leader of his people. Hebrews would not invent so long and intimate an association of their deliverer with their oppressors.

e 11-14. In Pharaoh's court Moses remained a Hebrew at heart and, on reaching man's estate, visited one of the labour gangs and, seeing a Hebrew workman beaten by an Egyptian taskmaster, slew the Egyptian. This act of reprisal, which its author no doubt considered justified, must not be judged by the standard of Christian morality. It is recorded, not for imitation, but to explain Moses' flight to Midian when he discovered that surely the thing is known. 15-22. However highly placed, the slayer of an official could not remain unpunished. Canaan was under Egyptian rule. Hence Moses fled to Sinai where the Kenites, a Midianite tribe, then resided. Water-drawing in the East is a woman's task, and the first step to a marriage is often a meeting at a well (Gen 24:11; 29:9). Women too tend the flocks among the Bedouin. Moses met the daughters of a Midianite priest at a well, courteously defended them from bullying shepherds and watered their flock. He thus became their father's guest, was content to dwell with the man, and married his daughter, Sephora. The name (Šippōrah) means 'little bird'. Cf. the names of the Midianite chiefs: Oreb 'raven' and Zeb 'wolf' (Jg 7:25). The explanation of Gersham (Vg Gershom) 'an alien there' is suggested by assonance. The more probable derivation is from geres 'sprout'. The new Vg edition, with MT and most Greek MSS, omits 22b as an interpolation from 18:4.

f II 23-IV 17 Call of Moses—23-25. In those many days, during the long period of oppression, the Pharaoh died and Moses could safely return. The protracted sufferings of the Israelites prepared them to welcome a liberator. God saw their sorrow and prayers and made himself known to them (LXX 25b). III:1-16. Moses herding the sheep of Jethro and seeking at a higher level the grass which had disappeared from the plain, drove his flock to the back (farther side) of the desert and on to the slopes of Mount Horeb. Horeb and Sinai, like Sarion and Sanir (Deut 3:9), are different names of the same mountain, called here by anticipation the mountain of God who would manifest himself thereon. The two names: Jethro 'excellence' and Raguel 'friend of God' probably represent a personal name 164f and a by-name or official title.

The Angel of Yahweh designates Yahweh as manifesting himself (cf. Gen 16:7) or less probably an angel sent by Yahweh. The substitution of an angel for Yahweh as the leader of the people is a threatened punishment of sin (32:34; 33:3). God, being a pure spirit, reveals himself by fire as the least material of the elements (cf. Gen 15:17). A thorn-bush attracts the attention of Moses by burning without being consumed. God speaks to him from it, ordering him to take off his shoes through reverence according to Eastern custom and declaring himself the God of his father, of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. Moses hides his face in fear lest he should see God and die (cf. Jg 13:22). 7-10. God announces his intention to liberate his people and settle them in Canaan and appoints Moses their leader. A land flowing with milk and honey is an earthly paradise, producing abundantly all kinds of excellent food; cf. VD 2 (1922) 52-5.

h 11-12. Moses, reluctant to accept the mission, raises various difficulties. Firstly he humbly pleads his unfitness for so formidable a task. Moses has faith but needs encouragement. God replies therefore by promising him the aid of his Omnipotence and assuring him in advance of success. The sign is the proof of God's intervention but may be given before, or, as here, after the event (cf. 1 Kg 2:34; Is 7:14). 13-22. Secondly Moses asks what he is to say to the Israelites when they ask him the name of the God of their fathers who sent him to them. The Israelites felt that the name Elōhim, being generic, did not sufficiently distinguish their God from other gods. They desired a particular and distinctive name which would reveal his nature and by which they, his people, could more confidently invoke him. God replies by revealing his name, Yahweh (discussed in next paragraph), and then informs Moses how he is to execute his mission. He must first assemble the elders (heads of families and clans) who represent the people and tell them that God has appeared to him and declared that he has taken notice of their affliction and determined to deliver them. He must then go with the elders to Pharaoh, inform him that their God has met them and ask three days' leave of absence to offer him sacrifice in the desert. God's meeting with the people is his meeting with Moses, their representative. Three days is a conventional period. The demand is moderate and is to test the dispositions of Pharaoh, who will not let them go until forced by the plagues (19-20). But or except (LXX, Vg) is preferable to no, not (MT 19b). The Hebrews also who live among the Egyptians shall ask for jewels of silver and gold and raiment to take with them and so despoil the Egyptians. These objects, the wages of their labours (Wis 10:17), might also be regarded as the spoils of victory, assigned by God to the Hebrews. IV:1-9. Thirdly Moses objects that the people will refuse to believe him. God replies by promising three signal miracles to prove his mission: change of his rod into a serpent and vice versa, production and removal of leprosy in his hand and conversion of Nile water into blood. Only by divine intervention can these prodigies be worked. The Egyptian magicians did not reproduce two of them (7:11, 22), but only deceitfully pretended to do so. 10-17. Fourthly Moses represents to God his lack of oratory, needed by a prophet. God replies that he alone can and will make him eloquent. Moses, still reluctant, asks God to send someone else. God is offended and punishes him by leaving him without eloquence and appointing his brother Aaron to speak on his behalf. Moses remains God's envoy to whom the divine communications are made. He imparts them to Aaron, who announces them to the people. 'Aaron is as mouth to Moses and Moses as God to Aaron'. The same comparison is made 7:1, where nābī 'prophet' takes the place of 'mouth'; God speaks through his prophet to the people. The reluctance of Moses shows clearly that he became the leader and liberator of his people 1641 not by personal initiative, but by divine appointment.

165a The Divine Name Yahweh (3:14-15)—The name has two forms: Ehyeh 'I am', used by God or an envoy speaking in his name, and Yahweh 'He is', used by his worshippers. It is therefore the impf. 1 sg and 3 sg of the Hebrew verb hāyāh or hāwāh 'to be', and might grammatically be a present or a future. But the latter tense is excluded by the fact that absolute, not relative, being is expressed. God is, eternally and unchangeably, though his relations with his creatures may change. The name therefore expresses essential existence or aseity, the radical attribute of God by which he is most adequately distinguished from created beings. The fuller explanation of the name (14a) has been variously interpreted: (a) I am who (or what) I am, My being is mysterious and unutterable. This interpretation is incompatible with the fact that a name is actually given. (b) I am because I am, in me is the sole reason of my existence. This is a possible rendering and explanation of the name, but it interprets after in a less usual sense as a conjunction, not a relative. (c) I am who am, I am the existing one. I am therefore to be called Yahweh 'He is', since that name best expresses my nature as essential existence. This rendering suits text and context best and is traditional, Ἐγώ εἰμι ὁ ὢν 'I am the existing one' (LXX).

b It is objected that so exalted an idea of God, which none of the ancients attained, is incompatible with the stage of religious evolution in which the Hebrews then were. The objection by showing the difficulty of a human origin of the name only confirms its divine origin. It is based on a theory of religious evolution amply refuted by W. Schmidt's recent researches in the religion of primitive peoples. We need not suppose that all the Hebrews grasped immediately all the implications of the name. In the post-exilic period Adonai 'Lord', or less frequently Elohim 'God', was substituted through reverence for Yahweh, which was retained in the text but not read. Hence the LXX Κύριος, the Vg 'Dominus' and the hybrid form Jehovah, an erroneous combination of the consonants of one word and the vowels of another. The name appears in the Bible in contracted forms: Yahu, Yau, Yo, Yah, always (except Yah) as an element of proper names. It is now admitted by sound philologists that the longer form is the original one, since the contractions are regular. The regularity of the contractions of Yahweh is evident. Weh becomes u, as yīstahweh becomes yīstahū. Yahu becomes Yau by omission of h as in the article combined with certain prepositions. Yau becomes Yō as mauf becomes mōf. But there is no philological explanation of the derivation of Yahweh from Yah, Yau, etc. The name is almost as unique in form as in content. It is a purely verbal form. The hundreds of names of Semitic deities known to us are all nominal forms, except two Arabic names which occur in the Koran, Yağūt ('he helps') and Yanūk ('he hinders'). It is therefore quite improbable that the alleged Yau of the Rās-Shamra tablets, the Yau and Ya which appear as initial or final elements of geographical and personal names in the Tell el-Amarna tablets and similar forms in Babylonian personal names of the pre-Mosaic period, have any connection with Yahweh.

c Biblical evidence for a Hebrew pre-Mosaic Yahweh is not convincing. In Gen 4:26 the emphasis is on the cult rendered to God, not on the name Yahweh which appears earlier (chh 2-3), to show that Yahweh, the Hebrew God, is the world God. Ahijyah (1 Par 2:25) is probably a corruption of ahaiu 'his brothers'. The explanation of Bityah (1 Par 4:18) as daughter of Yahweh is very unlikely. In Ahijyah (1 Par 7:8) the Yah may be an exclamatory ending as in the Hittite name Uriyyah (2 Kg 11:3) or a later modification. The name of the mother of Moses, Yōkebed (6:20), may have been originally Elkebed, just as Y'hōyakim was originally Elyakim (4 Kg 23:34). It seems therefore most probable that the name Yahweh was unknown before it was revealed to Moses on Mount Sinai. If, however, it was previously known the new revelation would be made in view of the Sinaitic covenant. The theory that Yahweh was the god of the Kenites to whom Moses transferred his allegiance is expressly excluded by the sacred writer, who repeatedly identifies Yahweh with the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob.

IV 18-31 Return of Moses to Egypt—18-23. Moses, warned by the anger of Yahweh, makes no further difficulties and immediately undertakes his mission of which the first step is to obtain Jethro's permission to return to Egypt. He does not reveal the principal object of his journey, as he would have done had Jethro been a worshipper of Yahweh, since no opposition from him could then be feared. The narrative is interrupted by 19, originally connected with 3:22a (which LXX repeats here after 18). Against MT and the versions we must read son for 'sons' (20), since only one son accompanied Moses and Sephora and the birth of the second son has not yet been narrated. The rod of God is the instrument by which God works wonders (2, 17, 30). God now gives a last instruction and assurance of success beginning: When thou goest back into Egypt. He foretells the effect of the wonders on Pharaoh and particularly mentions the last wonder which produces the desired result. The hardening of Pharaoh's heart is more usually attributed to God, the primary cause, because the sacred writer desires to emphasize the execution of God's designs. He does not, however, ignore the role of man's free-will and attributes the hardening also to Pharaoh himself, the secondary cause (8:15, 32; 9:34). The first-born son has a privileged position by right of birth. Israel, God's chosen people, has a similar position among the nations of the earth.

24-26. The general sense of the event narrated is clear. The words of Sephora, however, are obscure as recorded in MT and Vg but intelligible in LXX: 'Here is the blood of the circumcision of my son' (25b) and 'Here is the blood of the circumcision' (26b). Youths were circumcised among the Arabs when they attained manhood and, originally at least, at the time of marriage, since the similar Arabic and Hebrew words for father-in-law and bridegroom mean literally circumciser and circumcised. Hebrew males on the other hand, according to the covenant made with Abraham, were circumcised on the eighth day after birth. Moses violated this law by conforming to the Arab custom at the instigation of his wife and father-in-law. For this he is threatened with death by Yahweh who appears to them in visible form at the night-hall. Moses can do nothing, but Sephora, aware of the cause of her husband's plight, quickly circumcises her son with a flint and prostrates herself at the feet of Yahweh saying: 'Here is the blood of the circumcision'. Yahweh on hearing her words desists from his attack on Moses. The whole event is a very emphatic warning to Moses at the beginning of his mission that he must not neglect any of the commands of Yahweh. 27-31. Aaron is ordered by God to meet Moses and the meeting takes place at Mount Sinai. It is not surprising that Jethro's residence was more than a day's journey from the mountain, since shepherds like Moses drive their sheep considerable distances in search of grass. Moses informs Aaron of the revelations he has received. The elders are assembled when Egypt is reached, are informed of everything by Aaron the spokesman, see the signs (2-9) worked by Moses and believe that God intends to deliver them. Sephora, after the meeting with Yahweh, must have been informed by Moses of the real object of his journey and returned with her son to Jethro.

V 1-VI 1 Unsuccessful Appeal to Pharaoh—1-4. Moses and Aaron appear before Pharaoh and announce the will of Yahweh: 'Let my people go to hold a feast to me in the desert'. Pharaoh refuses. Who is Yahweh? is an expression of contempt. The petitioners insist: 'The God of the Hebrews has met us; let us go three days' journey into the desert and offer sacrifice to Yahweh'. Pharaoh 166a dismisses them after accusing them of encouraging idleness among the workers. 5-9. Pharaoh's words (5) seem to be addressed to higher officials present at the interview. He reminds them that the people of the land—a contemptuous expression for the Hebrews—are too numerous and that forced labours are necessary to prevent their increase (cf. 1:9). Vg has two renderings of 5a. Pharaoh now increases the labours of the Hebrews. He orders the Egyptian taskmasters and the Hebrew foremen to let the workers find straw for themselves and yet exact from them the same number (DV 'task') of bricks. Nowadays as in antiquity bricks are made in Egypt of two different materials: reddish soil of the desert and black soil of the inundated regions. Sand in the former case, straw in the latter is needed for cohesion. The necessary quantity of prepared clay is rolled on a layer of sand or straw, sprinkled with water and thrown into the brick mould. This is a wooden frame, open at top and bottom, with a handle at one end. With the aid of the hand the brick takes the shape of the mould which is then removed and the operation recommences. The bricks are left undisturbed to dry and harden in the sun for about a week when they are fit for use. The bricks unearthed at the two suggested sites of Pithom are almost exclusively made of desert soil and sand. The bricks here mentioned were made in the vicinity of the royal residence at Tanis and thus in an inundated region where straw was absolutely necessary. 10-18. The orders of Pharaoh are executed. Vg renders taskmasters by 'overseers' (6, 10, 13) and foremen by 'taskmasters' (6, 10). The foremen are beaten because the number of bricks is incomplete and complain to Pharaoh, but without result. In 16c MT reads: thy people (the workers, not the foremen) is guilty, but the reading of LXX and Vg is preferable. 19-VI:1. The foremen now reproach Moses and Aaron. Moses appeals to Yahweh who reassures him. The mighty hand and the strong hand (6:1) indicate God's Omnipotence by which Pharaoh will be forced to yield.

d VI 2-VII 7 Mission and Family History of Moses and Aaron—This section is not a continuation but a repetition of the preceding narrative (3:1-6:1). It makes no mention of minor details, omits to indicate where the various events occurred and follows a logical rather than a chronological order. It is never in contradiction with the longer narrative, though apparently written by a later hand, and is interrupted in the middle by a piece of family history (6:13-28).

2-8. The events recorded are already known. Render: And (by) my name Yahweh I was not made known to them (3b); whom the Egyptians keep in bondage (5b); from under the forced labours (6b) and for Vg 'high' outstretched (6a). As the hand was lifted up in swearing, 8a means: I solemnly promised. 9-12. The apparent contradiction between the disbelief of the Israelites (9) and their belief (4:31) is explained by the fact that the summary omits all reference to the signs worked for the people and their favourable effect and only considers the final attitude of the people as manifested by the foremen (5:21). The mission to Pharaoh and the appointment of Aaron are located at Horeb in the longer narrative. Here there is no explicit indication of place. Similarly the statement that the children of Israel have not hearkened to me (12b) like the disbelief (9) supposes the situation indicated in 5:21. 29-VII:7. After the interruption (13-28) the objection of Moses (12c) must be repeated to explain the appointment of Aaron. Uncircumcised lips does not imply a physical defect but unpreparedness to speak, since circumcision prepared people to belong to God. The nābī or prophet is clearly defined as the spokesman of God. This is also the usual and etymological sense of προφήτης. The charge to Moses is similar to that of 3:18-20, but the order to ask leave to sacrifice in the desert (3:18) and its execution (5:1) are omitted. The age assigned to Moses is difficult. The number of years is schematic and apparently calculated on a lifetime of three generations passed one in Egypt, one in Midian and one in the desert. It supposes (a) that the Pharaoh of the oppression reigned more than eighty years which is excluded by the records; (b) that Moses, a Hebrew at heart, ignored his afflicted brethren until he was forty years old, which is improbable; (c) that he spent forty years in Midian and yet left it before his second son Eliezer was born, which is still more improbable. As numbers are often altered and interpolated in the sacred text, it seems better to leave the age of Moses an open question.

The Genealogical List (6:14-28) is Levitical but begins with Ruben and Simeon (14-15 = Gen 46:9-10) to introduce Levi as the third son of Jacob. The heads of families, literally heads of their fathers' houses, are referred exclusively to the descendants of Levi at the end of the list (25). For Vg 'kindreds' (15a, 17, 20b, 25b) read families and for 'kindreds' (16a) and 'families' (19b) read generations. On Levi's family tree cf. Gen 46:11; Num 3:17-20; 26; 57-61; 1 Par 6:1-38. Moses and Aaron belong to the fourth generation after Jacob here, but Aaron's wife, Elizabeth, was of the sixth generation (Ru 4:18-20; 1 Par 2:4-10). The stay in Egypt was still longer. Omissions, however, are common in such lists. Son may be used for grandson or descendant. Amram married his aunt (cousin LXX). Such marriages were subsequently forbidden (Lev 18:12). Elizabeth, Aaron's wife, was sister of Nahason, one of the princes of Judah (Num 1:7). The descendants of Aaron and Core are specially mentioned, the former by reason of their priestly character, the latter because of their part in the ritual of the temple. The progeny of Moses is not mentioned, perhaps because of their unworthiness (Jg 18:30). Note the contrast of the order of age, Aaron and Moses (26), with the order of dignity, Moses and Aaron (27). The list is preceded by an introduction or, more probably, marginal note (13) and is of later origin than the passage in which it is inserted, but the presence of Egyptian names like Phutiel and Phinees, guarantees the antiquity of its contents.

VII 8-13 Pharaoh sees a Wonder—This passage is best regarded not as part of the second tradition (Heinisch) but as the continuation of the principal narrative. It contains a new and essential element of the history and introduces the plagues. Pharaoh must have a proof of Yahweh's Omnipotence before he is punished for resistance to his will. His first words are: Shew a wonder for yourselves, to support your demand. 10b. For Vg 'took' read cast down. Aaron turns his rod into a serpent, tannin, a reptile of any size. 11b. And they also, the Egyptian magicians [cf. Gen 41:8] did in like manner with their enchantments. The fact that Aaron's rod swallowed their rods had no effect on the hardened heart of Pharaoh. He is therefore punished by plagues and gradually forced to yield. The modern Egyptian magicians also turn rods into snakes. This is sometimes done by pressing a certain part of the neck of a real snake which thus becomes cramped into rigidity and stretched out like a rod, but when thrown to the ground, after the pressure is removed, resumes its natural form and movements. At other times rods are substituted for snakes by the performer when he has distracted the attention of the spectators from his movements. Jewish tradition gives the names of the magicians as Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim 3:8).

VII 14-X 27 The Plagues of Egypt—The tenth plague is not included in these general remarks. It differs from the others in its character and in its connection with the institution of the Pasch and the departure from Egypt. The plagues are obviously connected with natural phenomena occurring in Egypt between July and April either regularly each year or sporadically at longer intervals. The disappearance of grass in the plains (3:1) and the completion of the harvest when the Israelites collected the lower parts of the cornstalks left in the fields by the reapers (5:12) place the return of Moses in the month of April. The plagues could therefore have begun in July and occurred at the time of the natural phenomena. They were not, 167b however, merely natural phenomena since the effects produced were sometimes entirely new and always unusually intensive. Otherwise they would neither have impressed Pharaoh, nor manifested the Omnipotence of Yahweh. They were therefore miraculous, not in themselves since they did not surpass the powers of nature, but in the manner in which they occurred with unusual intensity and providential preordination of the circumstances of time and place. Their Egyptian character was not however a mere coincidence. God condescends in his manifestations to the customs and experiences of those to whom he manifests himself. It is for this reason that the rod is used in producing the plagues since every Egyptian magician had a magical rod. There is undoubtedly a crecendo movement in the narrative. The first four plagues produce annoyance and distress; the next four inflict serious damage to property and person; the ninth is mysterious and terrifying. Moses, at first courteous, becomes more and more outspoken; Pharaoh, at first indifferent, shows an increasing inclination to temporize and to yield; his magicians confess their impotence at the third plague and are unable to appear at the sixth; d his courtiers advise surrender at the eighth. A study of the style and contents of the narrative suggests that the sacred writer had a second account of the plagues at his disposal which he partially incorporated in his text. The author of this account views the plagues, sent to manifest the Omnipotence of Yahweh, in the light of a contest between Yahweh and the Egyptian deities represented by the magicians. The third and sixth plagues, so distinctive in style and brevity and especially in their disregard for the human protagonists, Moses and Pharaoh, belong to this source. The principal narrator omitted them as hampering the dramatic movement of his narrative, but the final editor was inspired to include them in his work. Both are mentioned elsewhere in the poetical descriptions of the plagues, the third in Ps 104:31 and the sixth in Ps 77:50.

e VII 14-25 First Plague: Water turned Into Blood—So extraordinary a miracle as the conversion of water into animal or human blood need not be supposed. Natural phenomena are described according to sensible appearances. The waters became red in colour and appeared to be blood. The Red Nile is the Egyptian counterpart of the plague. When the inundation is in full force in July the waters are reddened by the soil which they gather in their course. The colour which lasts during the inundation period varies with the impetus of the current and the turbulence of the stream but never attains the vivid hue of blood. The water remains potable, the fish uninjured. The plague therefore differs in two important respects from the phenomenon of the Red Nile. Elsewhere however waters have been found red in colour and lethal to fish owing to invading organisms (cf. Heinisch). 16. Vg 'sacrifice to' is literally serve or worship. 17. The action of striking the waters with the rod is attributed directly to God to show that he is the real author of the prodigy. 18b. 'The Egyptians shall loathe to drink.' 19c. 'And blood shall be in all the land of Egypt' (in all the region near the capital). We are not informed how the magicians imitated the prodigy. Their audience was uncritical and favourably disposed. 23b. Pharaoh remains unmoved. 'Neither did he lay even this to heart.'

f VIII 1-15 Second Plague: Frogs—Frogs are numerous in Egypt, but cause no annoyance except by their croaking. We may conclude perhaps from the mention of fields and heaps (13-14) that the inundation was already on the wane and assign the plague to the second half of October. Its miraculous character is shown by the number and ubiquity of the frogs and especially by their simultaneous destruction at the precise time assigned beforehand by Pharaoh. Here too the magicians appeared after the cessation of the plague since they would hardly have pretended to increase the frogs when Pharaoh only desired their disappearance. 3. Read, team with for 'bring forth an abundance of' (Vg, LXX), thy kneading-troughs for 'remains of thy food'. 9. Moses addresses Pharaoh: Assume the honour over me to decide when the plague is to end. The courteousness is not merely assumed, but the real reason for leaving the decision to Pharaoh is to manifest more clearly the Omnipotence of Yahweh as appears from 10b. When the plague ceases Pharaoh hardens his heart and refuses to obey as Yahweh had foretold (4:21-23).

16-19 Third Plague: Mosquitoes—This plague followed closely that of the frogs. Mosquitoes infest Egypt all the year round, but are most numerous and active after the inundation begins to decline since the quiet waters are their breeding ground. The ancients believed that they had their origin from the earth. The crust of the earth is therefore struck with the staff and thus commanded to produce them. Even allowing for rhetorical exaggeration in 17c, the mosquitoes must have been unusually numerous and troublesome to constitute a plague, since the natives are inured to their attacks. The only effect of the prodigy is the defeat of the magicians who recognized the finger of God. Pharaoh remains unmoved as Yahweh had foretold.

20-32 Fourth Plague: Flies—21. It is difficult to determine what species of flies is meant since 'ārōp literally means 'swarm' (DV 'all kinds', divers sorts of flies). Ordinary flies are so numerous in Egypt as to be a pest. But native indifference to them is incompatible with the effect produced on Pharaoh. It is stated moreover (Ps 77:45) that the swarm devoured the Egyptians. A more annoying species of flying insect such as the dog-fly seems indicated. The plague is miraculous in time, intensity, and restriction to Egyptian territory. 22a. 'I will make a distinction as regards the land of Gessen.' 23a. Redemption (MT) by changing one letter becomes distinction in agreement with context and versions. 25-29. Pharaoh asks Moses to offer sacrifice to Yahweh in order to end the plague. Moses replies, 'It is not fitting to do so', because sacrifice to Yahweh in Egypt would be an abomination to the Egyptians and so endanger our lives or, less probably, understanding abomination as object of heathen cult, sacrifice of animals which Egyptians venerate would endanger our lives. He insists therefore on the three days' journey in the desert. Pharaoh agrees, but asks him not to go too far and to intercede for him with Yahweh. Moses assents, but reminds Pharaoh of his broken promise and warns him against further deceit. 30-31. Moses prayed to Yahweh 'and Yahweh did according to the word of Moses'. 32. But 'Pharaoh made his heart heavy this time also and did not let the people go'.

IX 1-7 Fifth Plague: Murrain—This plague is called a grievous pestilence which destroys all kinds of domestic animals. Of these the horse was introduced in the Hyksos period and the camel was known, but not in use except in the outlying desert regions and in trading caravans which visited the country (cf. Gen 12:16). Cattle pests are rare in Egypt. 4. Omit 'wonderful' and read beasts for 'possessions'. The difficulty arising from the death of all the beasts of the Egyptians, since some were afterwards killed by hail, is usually solved by referring all to the classes enumerated, not to individuals. The pest, however, attacked the animals in the field, where they graze from January to April. If, therefore, it occurred in the beginning of January, the date suggested by its position in the narrative, animals not yet driven to pasture would be spared. The distinction assumed here between animals in the field and animals in the houses was in the author's mind since it is explicitly mentioned in the account of the hail plague.

8-12 Sixth Plague: Boils—Boils breaking out into ulcers afflicted man and beast. It was not the bubonic pest, excluded by 9:15, nor the comparatively harmless Nile-scab, an irritating eruption occurring earlier at the beginning of the inundation period and unlikely to alarm Pharaoh or affect the movements of his magicians. Only by its effects do we know this 'Egyptian boil' with which the Israelites themselves

167f

g

h

168a

168b are threatened if they violate the covenant (Deut 28:27). The ashes of the furnace or kiln are sprinkled towards heaven before Pharaoh, to show that the plague is sent by Yahweh. 8-9. 'And they shall become fine dust over all the land of Egypt, and the dust shall become a boil breaking out into ulcers on man and beast.'

e 13-35 Seventh Plague: Hail—Hailstorms accompanied by thunder and lightning occur in Lower Egypt not every year but occasionally in January, February, March or April. Hailstones have been gathered as big as tennis balls. The indications given (31-32) assign the plague to February. It was miraculous in its intensity and in beginning and ending at an appointed time. The land of Gessen is again exempted, and Egyptians who believe in the Omnipotence of Yahweh may escape its effects. Pharaoh confesses his sinfulness, offers to let the people go without condition, but again breaks his promise when the plague ceases. 15-16. 'Had I put forth my hand and smitten thee . . . with pestilence, thou hadst been cut off from the earth; but truly for this cause have I let thee live to show thee my power and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth.' Pharaoh could be punished at once by death but is spared in view of prodigies which proclaim the Omnipotence of Yahweh. Vg and LXX, cited Rom 9:17, render: have I raised thee up (given thee life, 16a). This rendering does not affect the argument of St Paul since God's purpose is the same in giving Pharaoh life and in letting him continue to live. 17a. For 'hold back' read exalt thyself against. 19a. For 'gather together' read bring to shelter. 23b-24a. 'And the lightning [lit. fire] ran down to the earth. And there was hail and continually flashing fire in the midst of the hail.' 27. Omitt 'also'. 28. Pharaoh says: 'Intercede with Yahweh; there is enough voices of God [thunder] and hail; and I will let you go and you shall stay no longer'.

d X 1-20 Eighth Plague: Locusts—There is a most graphic description of the havoc wrought by locusts in Jl 1:2-2:17. They rarely appear in Egypt and at irregular intervals but cause enormous damage. The plague therefore in which the ordinary damage was greatly intensified (6, 14) was a terrible calamity. The time was in late February or early March. The exemption of Gessen may perhaps be assumed. Pharaoh, unmoved by the threat, is prevailed upon by his advisers to recall Moses and Aaron and make some concession to avert the calamity. He will let the men go to celebrate the feast, since men only were usually bound by such observances. Moses' answer reveals to him the full scope of the demand which he refuses to consider. The envoys are rudely expelled only to be recalled in haste after the locusts arrive, to intercede for Pharaoh.

e 1. Read among them for in him, a necessary textual correction. 5. 'And they shall so cover the face of the earth as to make the earth invisible; and they shall eat the residue of that which is escaped, which remains to you from the hail.' 7a. 'How long shall this man [Moses] be a snare to us?' 10. Pharaoh means: I swear by Yahweh that I will not let you go. 'Look out for you are in danger of evil' (lit. for evil is before your faces). 13. For 'burning wind' read east wind, usually a hot wind. 15a. 'And the land was darkened' (MT), ravaged (LXX). 19a. 'And Yahweh made a very strong sea wind blow from the opposite direction.' The sea wind is the west wind from the Mediterranean for a Palestinian but the north wind for an Egyptian. Here a north-west wind seems indicated, since the Red Sea was south-east of the infested region.

f 21-27 Ninth Plague: Darkness—The local element is the sandstorm, called Khamasin or Khamassin (Mallon), a hot and sometimes violent wind from the desert which blows in March or April, lasts generally about three days and in its darkening effects resembles a London fog, but is much more oppressive owing to the sand and fine dust which it spreads everywhere. The staff or hand is raised towards heaven (10:22; 9:23) because the plagues come from above. 22b.

Read thick for 'horrible'. 23-27. That the Israelites are not affected by the darkness is obviously miraculous. Pharaoh now allows them to go and offer sacrifice with their children but without their flocks and herds. Moses replies that Pharaoh must let them take victims for slaughter-offerings and burnt-offerings 'that we may sacrifice them to Yahweh our God', nay even that all the flocks and herds must accompany them since they do not yet know what Yahweh desires to be offered. Pharaoh again refuses to let them go.

X 28-XI 10 Tenth Plague announced: Death of the Firstborn—The last two verses of ch 10 belong to the final interview between Moses and Pharaoh (11:4-8). They are needed after 8 to explain the anger of Moses. As the departure is to follow the plague immediately, and after that he will let you go and when he lets you go altogether he will drive you out (11:1b), preparations must be made quickly since the firstborn will be slain at midnight. 3b is a marginal gloss suggested by 3a. 4. 'I will go through Egypt.' 5. The plague will smite the firstborn of all the Egyptians from the highest, the king on his throne, to the lowest, the maidservant behind the mill, and also of their domestic animals. 7a. 'But against the children of Israel not even a dog shall bark [lit. whet his tongue] against either man or beast.' No alarm, not to say harm, will come to them. The Egyptians will then prostrate themselves before Moses and beg him to depart with his people and after that I (not we) will depart. 10:28-29. Pharaoh now dismisses Moses rudely, forbidding his reappearance under pain of death. Moses replies that this is the last interview before the catastrophe (11:9-10) and leaves Pharaoh in anger at the rude dismissal and accompanying threat. Yahweh consoles him by explaining why Pharaoh never hears him. The summary of the plague narrative is probably an editorial insertion.

Pasch and Azymes: Introductory Remarks—The paschal sacrifice, which saved the Israelites from the exterminating angel of the tenth plague, and the unleavened bread, which they ate in the haste of their departure, are the essential elements of two annual religious observances by which the deliverance from the Egyptian captivity was to be perpetually commemorated. The Pasch and the Azymes have thus a definite historical origin and are of divine institution. They are inseparably united in Hebrew tradition as they were in the first paschal meal of which the flesh of the victim and the unleavened bread were the principal ingredients. An effort, however, has been made to separate them, based on the observation that the Pasch is a nomadic, the Azymes an agricultural feast. It is supposed that the Israelites, when nomads, celebrated the Pasch in the spring and later, a settled people, borrowed the Azymes, an agricultural feast, from the Canaanites. The Israelites however were not originally nomads. It was a corn famine in Canaan which brought their ancestors to Egypt. There they at first tended flocks and herds but rapidly intermingled with the native agricultural population and shared their mode of life. They were employed during the period of the oppression in agricultural labours (1:14). The Sinaitic legislation inaugurated their brief nomadic existence in the desert, but naturally presupposed their proximate settlement in Canaan for which it provided them with agricultural feasts. The institution of the feast would be accompanied by a description of the ritual to be observed at its first celebration, which however could be modified and supplemented at a future period. Thus, for instance, the offering of the first fruits of the barley harvest (Lev 23:10 f.) is not mentioned. Certain rites, revealed later, might also be included in the description, since the Hebrew historian does not always follow the chronological order of events. The words: 'You shall observe the Azymes, for on this same day I brought forth your host out of the land of Egypt' (12:17) clearly indicate a subsequent revelation. We may assume therefore that such matters as the determination of the conditions under which non-Hebrew sojourners in the d The name of the feast, pesah, is derived in the text from a verb meaning 'pass over', which is contrasted with another verb meaning 'pass through'. The destroyer passed over the houses of the Hebrews, sparing the inmates, but passed through the homes of the Egyptians, slaying the firstborn. The rite of smearing the lintel and doorposts of a house with sacrificial blood to avert evil from the inmates by divine protection is very ancient. It was practised by the Babylonians and is still in use among the Palestinian Arabs. Our use of holy water is a somewhat similar manifestation of the natural religious instinct to seek divine aid against manifold evils. The rite, however, was a particular observance of the first Pasch to avert a particular danger. Subsequently the blood of the victim, like all sacrificial blood, was poured on the altar. The Pasch in general by freeing the Israelites from slavery in Egypt and saving their firstborn from temporal death was a type of our liberation from the slavery of sin and salvation from eternal death. The Pasch as a sacrifice was a type of Christ's sacrifice on Calvary and his Eucharistic sacrifice. It belongs to the first class of the older division of sacrifice, slaughter-offerings and burnt-offerings, already mentioned (10:25). This class was subdivided into expiatory and pacific in the Sinaitic legislation.

169c land could participate in the feast and the obligation of repose on the first day of the Azymes, on which the departing Hebrews made their longest day's march, though narrated here, are subsequent developments of the original ritual.

e XII 1-20 Institution of Pasch and Azymes—The institution of the feast in Egypt is emphasized. The month Abib when the corn ripened, March-April, afterward called by its Babylonian name, Nisan, is to be the new beginning of the year which previously began in autumn. The selection of the lamb on the tenth day of the month was impossible at the first Pasch and was not observed for practical reasons in NT times. 3b. Read: by their households, a lamb for each household. 4. Render 'souls' by 'persons'. 'According to every man's eating you shall reckon the lamb.' Remember that children and old men eat less than able-bodied men in reckoning the number required to eat the lamb. The minimum was later fixed at ten persons. 5b. 'You shall take it from the sheep or from the goats.' Lamb or kid may be selected. As the day began in the evening the paschal meal was on the fifteenth of the month, the first day of the Azymes. The time of sacrifice was at eventide (6) or more precisely in the evening at sunset (Deut 16:6). A different vocalization of the Hebrew expression for at eventide gave rise to the later rendering 'between the two evenings', either from 3 p.m. to sunset according to the Pharisees and Talmudists, or from sunset to darkness according to the Samaritans, Sadducees and Caraites. Roasting was prescribed as the quickest way of preparing a hasty meal. The bitter herbs, later identified as wild lettuce and wild endive, were in memory of the bitter oppression (1:14). The lamb was not to be eaten raw to avoid consumption of prohibited blood. Stewing was prohibited as a slower method of cooking though it seems prescribed in Deut 16:7, possibly by some new law later abrogated; cf. §216d. 10b. 'And that which would otherwise be left until morning you shall burn with fire.' 11. The girding of the loins, the sandals on the feet and the staff in the hand indicate preparations for an immediate departure. 12. The judgements executed against the Egyptian gods are the deaths of the firstborn whom they could not save. 15. The feast of Azymes lasted seven days during which no leavened bread could be eaten, no leaven kept in the house. Whoever violated this law was cut off from Israel, originally put to death, later excommunicated. 16. There was a holy convocation, religious gathering, on the first and last day on which also no work was allowed except cooking. 17. Correct Vg 'I will bring forth' to I brought forth. 19. The prohibition of leaven affects the stranger as well as the Israelite since there must be no leaven in the land.

21-42 Tenth Plague and Exodus—21-28. The means by which the Israelites will escape the plague are first indicated. The blood in the basin (Vg 'at the door') is applied to the lintel and door-posts with hyssop, a herb frequently used in purification ceremonies. All must remain within the house. Yahweh seems to be identified with and yet distinguished from the destroyer owing to the custom of attributing directly to God what is done by his instrument. The Pasch is a perpetual institution and must be explained to children when they ask 'What do you mean by this service?' as 'the sacrifice of Yahweh's passover'. 29-33. The death of the firstborn and its effect on the Egyptians are described. 29. Omit 'woman'. Not only may the Hebrews depart with their flocks and herds but they are pressed to leave at once and thus unable to leaven their dough. 34b. 'Their kneading-troughs being bound up in their mantles on their shoulders.' 35b. The Egyptians 'grant their request for jewels of silver and jewels of gold and raiment'. The distance from Ramesses (Tanis) to Succoth (Theku?) is about 30 miles. 37. The 600,000 g'barim on foot are interpreted by some as the fighting men, which implies an absurd total number of about three millions, by others more correctly as the vigorous people strong enough to walk and contrasted with the tap infants in arms. Usually a group is described as consisting of men, women and tap 'children' (Deut 2:34; 31:12; Jer 40:7; 43:6). 'We cannot suppose that the women and old men are tacitly included among the children. The infants in arms and the mixed multitude (omit 'without number') would raise the total to practically the normal population of Palestine before the Jewish immigration of the present century, 757,182 according to the census of 1922. So large a number of persons with their cattle and belongings could scarcely cross the Red Sea by a ford in a single night (14:22, 27). Elsewhere moreover we are definitely informed that the Hebrews were too few to occupy the whole of Canaan and that some Canaanites would remain to prevent injury to the land from partial disoccupation until they became numerous enough to fill it (23:29-30). The number given is therefore doubtful and may be due to textual corruption. 40. We find 'in Canaan' interpolated before in Egypt (LXX), after in Egypt (Sam), apparently to abbreviate the stay in Egypt. 42a. 'This was a night of watching on the part of Yahweh to bring them forth', on which they in return must keep watch.

43-51 Additions to the Paschal Legislation—This new ordinance of the Pasch determines more precisely who shall observe the feast. Aliens, temporary sojourners, hired servants presumed to be aliens and uncircumcised persons are excluded. The purchased slave, a member of the family, must be circumcised and take part in the feast. The resident alien who wishes to remain in the land and celebrate the Pasch must be circumcised with all the males of his family and then let him approach and keep it. The order not to break a bone of the lamb, here first recorded, was observed in the Antitype (Jn 19:36).

XIII 1-16 Azymes and Firstborn—1-10. The legislation on the Azymes is similar to that of 12:15-20, but omits the special solemnity of the first day when recording that of the seventh. 2. Sanctify means 'separate, dedicate'. 7b. 'No leavened bread shall be seen with thee, neither shall leaven be seen with thee in all thy borders.' 11-16. The law of the firstborn, attached to the Exodus by the tenth plague, ordains that every male firstborn of men or domestic animals shall belong to Yahweh. The male firstborn of men must be ransomed, those of clean animals sacrificed, that of the one unclean domestic animal, the ass, may be ransomed with a lamb or have its neck broken. 16. The laws of Azymes and Firstborn must be perpetual reminders of the deliverance of Israel: as a sign on thy hand and a memorial between thy eyes (9). 'Memorial' here becomes 169] 'bands,' intended figuratively in the same sense, but later literally interpreted as phylacteries.

B) From Egypt to Sinai (13:17-18:27)

170a XIII 17-XIV 31 The Crossing of the Red Sea— To understand the narrative and determine the site of the crossing a knowledge of the Egyptian boundary between Suez and Ismailia at the time of the Exodus is required. Before the construction of the Suez Canal there was between these two cities first a land barrier called Shaluf et-Terrabe immediately north of Suez, about 16 feet above sea-level at its highest point, then a long stretch of water called the Bitter Lakes, then a second land barrier called Serapeum, reaching a height of 26 feet above sea-level, and finally another lake, Timsah. At the time of the Exodus the Red Sea certainly extended northward to the Bitter Lakes, but it is almost certain that it did not reach Lake Timsah or cover the Serapeum. A caravan road passed by Theku in the Wady Tumilat and crossed the Serapeum into the desert. 17-22. The Israelites were forbidden to take the more direct route, called the way of the Philistines, along the shore of the Mediterranean into Canaan, because they were too dispirited by long oppression to be ready as yet for hard battles with the Canaanites. Moses moreover had been already informed that he was to return to Sinai (3:12). Accordingly the first stage of their journey as free men (read hopsim instead of h'musim 'armed' 13:20), not necessarily accomplished in a single day, was from Tanis to Succoth, probably Theku, whence they followed the caravan road to Etham on the edge of the desert. Etham was probably an Egyptian fortress (helem) at the northern end of the Bitter Lakes. God manifested his presence by a pillar of cloud by day and pillar of fire by night, symbolizing respectively his mysterious and spiritual nature. XIV:1-4. The Israelites could now continue their march through the desert along the eastern shore of the Red Sea to Sinai, but God ordered them to return (into Egypt) or perhaps to change the direction of their march and, remaining in Egypt, to encamp between Migdöl (Vg Magdalum) and the Red Sea opposite Phihahiroth and Baalsaphon. God wished, by miraculously delivering them when their situation was desperate and by overthrowing their pursuers, to manifest his Omnipotence to both. Neither Phihahiroth nor Baalsaphon (Baal of the north) has been identified, but both were evidently near Migdöl which is most probably Tell Abu-Hasa, c 5 m. W. of the southern end of the Bitter Lakes where the route to Sinai crossed the Red Sea by a ford. The site was suited for a large encampment. The Israelites also crossed the Red Sea by a ford since the shallow waters were naturally divided by a particularly strong and continuous east wind (21). 5-9. Pharaoh, meanwhile, informed, probably by his official at Etham, that the fugitives had lost their way, determines to pursue them and bring them back. He sends chariots and charioteers, picked men (7b Vg 'captains') as the speediest and most effective force, who overtake the Israelites at their encampment by the sea, 'with all his [Pharaoh's] chariots [MT chariot horses], his charioteers and his host'. 10-20. The Israelites are dismayed and murmur against Moses who tells them to stand still and see the salvation of Yahweh. God orders them to advance to the Red Sea and promises deliverance and victory. The Angel of God and the pillar of cloud change their position from before to behind the Israelites to protect them. 20b. 'And the cloud was darkness and the night passed without any contact between one party and the other during the whole night.' 21. Moses now stretches his hand over the sea (as ordered 16) 'and Yahweh made the sea go back by means of a strong east wind which blew the whole night so that the sea became dry ground and the waters were divided'. 22a. 'The Israelites passed through the sea on dry ground.' 23-25. The Egyptians enter the sea in pursuit. But Yahweh observes them in the morning watch through the pillar of fire and cloud and throws them into confusion. Moreover 'he clogged the wheels of their chariots so that they drove with difficulty'. 26-31. 170d Moses now receives and executes the order to stretch his hand over the sea and bring back the waters to their wonted flow. 'The Egyptians fled against it [the returning sea] and Yahweh overthrew the Egyptians in the midst of the sea' so that not one of them escaped. The effect produced on the Israelites by their marvellous deliverance is attested by many OT passages. The crossing was not miraculous in itself since the natural force of the wind divided the waters of the ford. Scipio's capture of New Carthage was similarly facilitated by a wind which drove back the waters of a lagoon. But it was miraculous in the intensity and continuity of the wind, in the circumstances of time and place and in the pillars of cloud and fire by which the Israelites were accompanied. There is no indication that Pharaoh himself perished or took part in the expedition. The poetical allusion (Ps 135:15) is not a historical statement to be strictly interpreted.

XV 1-21 Epinela: The Canticle of Moses—This magnificent psalm celebrates two different victories: that over the Egyptians in the immediate past and that over the Canaanites and the surrounding nations in the future. Some maintain the unity of the Canticle considering the prophetic vision of future triumphs appropriately suggested by the glorious victory of the immediate past. Others regard 12-18 as a liturgical addition made by an inspired writer with the object of celebrating in a single ode the two paramount exploits of Yahweh. For the second view it is argued that 12-18 is less lyrical in tone and lacks the terseness of expression, vigour of thought and boldness of imagery so conspicuous in 1-11. It has however a beauty of its own and actual victory would naturally be celebrated more lyrically than prospective victory. The second view offers moreover no plausible interpretation of 12. We prefer therefore the first, as proposed in NP, in which 11-13 are satisfactorily explained as a middle or transition strophe. If, however, it were established that the Philistines did not settle in Canaan till after the Exodus, the second part, in which they are mentioned, would be a liturgical addition. That the canticle was sung by the men soon after the victory is indicated by the word then (1) and confirmed by other OT records of the immediate celebration of a victory by song and dance.

1-2. The introduction celebrates the majesty and the power of God: 'I will sing to Yahweh because he is exalted, exalted; the horse and the chariot [LXX, driver MT] he hath cast down into the sea. My strength and my force is Yahweh; and he has become to me salvation. He is my God and I will praise him; my father's God and I will exalt him.' 3-5. The first strophe summarily describes the destruction of the Egyptians: 'Yahweh is a warrior; Yahweh is his name. Pharaoh's chariots and his host hath he cast into the sea; and his chosen captains are sunk in the Red Sea. The deeps covered them; they went down into the depths like a stone' [quickly]. 6-8. The second strophe shows more fully how the Omnipotence of Yahweh destroyed his foes: 'Thy right hand, Yahweh, excelleth in power; thy right hand, Yahweh, dasheth into pieces the enemy. And in the greatness of thy exaltation thou overthrowest thy adversaries; thou sendest forth thy wrath, it consumeth them like stubble. And with the breath of thy nostrils [the east wind] the waters were piled up; the waves stood upright as in a heap; the deeps were congealed in the midst of the sea.' The figure of the wall (14:22, 29), here poetically developed, does not necessarily imply more than that the waters protected the Israelites like a wall on both sides. 9-10. The third strophe depicts the Egyptians greedily expectant of carnage and booty as they are suddenly destroyed: 'The enemy said: I will pursue, I will overtake; I will divide the spoil, my desire will be sated on them; I will draw my sword, my hand will despoil them. Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them; they sank like lead in the mighty waters.' 11-13. The transition strophe extols the Omnipotence of Yahweh in its recent manifestation a pledge of future protection: 'Who is like thee, Yahweh, among the gods?'

170g Who is like thee, excelling in holiness? Fearful in praises, doing wonders? Thou stretchedst out thy right hand, the earth swallowed them. In thy mercy thou hast led the people whom thou hast redeemed; in thy power thou hast led them to thy holy habitation. Gods are the objects of heathen worship called gods by their worshippers. Fearful in praises means inspiring fear by the exploits for which thou art praised. The earth includes land and water and here indicates the latter element. It is impossible to refer 12 to the punishment of Dathan and Abiron (Num 16:32) and it is out of place here as a description of destruction in general. 14-16. The next strophe describes the fear of the neighbouring peoples as the Israelites journey through the desert: 'The peoples have heard, they have trembled, pangs have taken hold of the inhabitants of Philistia. Then were the princes of Edom terrified, trembling took hold of the leaders of Moab. All the inhabitants of Canaan melted away, terror and dread fell upon them. By the greatness of thy arm they have become still as a stone; until thy people, Yahweh, hath passed through; until thy people whom thou hast gotten hath passed through.' The perfects are prophetic representing future events more vividly. 17-18. The last strophe describes the settlement of the people in Canaan where Yahweh will be their eternal king: 'Thou hast brought them in and planted them in the mountain of thy possession; in the place, Yahweh, which thou hast prepared for thy dwelling; in the sanctuary, Yahweh, which thy hands have founded. Yahweh shall reign for ever and ever.' The mountain and the sanctuary refer to the mountainous region of Canaan, the holy land of Yahweh. 19a. 'The horses of Pharaoh and his chariots' (mistranslated in Vg). The women now play their part led by Miriam, sister of Aaron (the elder brother) and a prophetess, divinely inspired. And Miriam answered them (the men, 21a) by singing either the psalm which they had sung or its refrain.

171a 22-27 March to Mara and Elim—The Israelites were now in the desert of Sur ('wall'), probably so called from the fortifications built on the eastern boundary of Egypt. They marched towards Sinai in a SSE. direction, and after three days reached Mara ('bitterness'), identified by some with the wells of Hawwāra, c 70 m. from the place of crossing, by others with 'Ain Mūsā ('Well of Moses') only 24 m. from it. As the way was difficult and haste unnecessary the latter identification is more probable. The water at 'Ain Mūsā is abundant but bitter. The miraculous sweetening was temporary. The subject in 25b is Yahweh and him is collective for the people. Elim ('terebinths') is identified with the well-watered Wady Gharandel, over 50 m. from 'Ain Mūsā, a regular halting-place for caravans between Egypt and Sinai.

b XVI 1-36 Food in the Desert: Quails and Manna—The Sinaitic peninsula is a very barren region and supports with difficulty a nomadic population of about 5,000. The Hebrew immigrants could not therefore have subsisted on the natural resources of the country. A divine intervention was necessary and God fed his chosen people with quails and manna. The quails are mentioned only here and Num 11 (§201d). In the springtime quails from the interior of Africa fly over the Sinaitic peninsula in large numbers. Their first appearance to the Israelites in May was therefore later, their second in June considerably later, than the ordinary period of migration. They came at the moment willed by God and so numerous on the second occasion as to provide a month's food for all the people. The food was natural, the circumstances preternatural.

c The manna differed from the quails in being supplied constantly during the whole period of the wandering in the desert. This continuous and miraculous provision of food was a signal prodigy worked by Yahweh on behalf of his people. The bread from heaven was thus a most fitting type of the true bread from heaven, the sacrament of the Eucharist, our spiritual food during our journey to the promised land. The manna however was not entirely preternatural. A substance found beneath the tamarisk trees in Sinai in late May,

June and July is called manna by the natives. In an expedition to Sinai in 1927 two professors of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem discovered that it was produced not by the tamarisk tree itself but by two species of cochineal which feed on its leaves. The viscous substance falls to the ground during the night and appears in the morning in the form of little balls never bigger than a hazel-nut and usually of a yellow-brown colour and transparent. It must be collected early since ants appear after 8.30 a.m. and devour or carry away what they find. Once hardened it neither melts under the heat of the sun or becomes in any way corrupt. As its content is mainly sugar it is very nourishing. The present annual output in Sinai is about 6 cwt., but the ancient yield was greater since there were more tamarisks. The biblical narrative here and Num 11:7-9 agrees with this description. The manna is food from heaven (4) as coming from above and also miraculously multiplied since the natural supply was altogether insufficient. It fell by night around the camp and was gathered in the morning (14; Num 11:9). It is like hoar-frost in its white colour and fineness when it first exudes, like the coriander-seed in its clear brown colour and granular formation, like the bdellium gum in its colour, its viscous character and its pleasant odour (14, 31; Num 11:7). The corruption of the manna (20) was a miracle by which the people were warned to obey God and trust in him. Its melting when the sun grew hot cannot be explained by the ravages of the ants, since 'melt' and 'disappear' are not equivalent, but the drops which fell from the trees during the daytime would melt in the sun before they solidified (21). The manna was eaten either raw or cooked. In the latter case it was apparently mixed with meal and is thus compared in taste with honey-cakes (30) and oil-cakes (Num 11:8). An 'omer (Vg gomor) is c 6½ pints, an abundant daily ration. While the manna was certainly not the only food of the Israelites in the desert it is not stated whether it was provided all the year round or only during its season in May, June and July. The former view is more probable. A miracle is necessary to explain the extraordinarily large amount provided and also the double supply on the eve of the Sabbath. There is some confusion here as elsewhere caused by the insertion in the text of traditional material, belonging to a later date. The order to place a pot of manna before Yahweh, that is, in the tabernacle, as Vg rightly interprets, and its execution (33-34) suppose the tabernacle, not yet built. The order to appear before Yahweh (9) is better referred to the Tent of Meeting (33:7-11). The narrative becomes more intelligible if 11-12 are read after 3.

Read congregation for 'multitude', as the word has a religious connotation. The desert of Sin is Debbet er-Ramle 50 m. NW. of Mt Sinai. 3. For 'why' read because. 5a. 'Let them order aright what they bring in.' 7. The glory of the Lord refers to the miraculous appearance of the manna but seems to be explained in 11 by the pillar of cloud in the desert. This verse however may have been altered by substituting desert for the original tent since the glory of the Lord appeared in a cloud at the Tent of Meeting (33:10). 14. 'And when the dew had lifted behold on the face of the desert was something fine, granular [?], fine as the hoar frost on the ground.' M^huspās only occurs here and is variously rendered granular, round, scale-like. 15. The derivation of manna is popular not scientific. 16b. 'Gather you of it, each according to his eating, an 'omer a head according to the number of persons, every man for those who are in his tent shall you take it.' The words according to his eating imply, as in the case of the paschal lamb, that some naturally eat more than others. The sense therefore of 18 is that this order was carried out, not that those who gathered more or less had ultimately the same amount. 22-30. The observance of the Sabbath is here first imposed. The people collect a double quantity on the eve as ordered by Yahweh. The rulers of the congregation seek an explanation from Moses and are told to keep the 171g Sabbath. 23b. 'Bake what you will bake and stew what you will stew.' 34. The pot of manna was kept before the testimony, the Ark, which contained the tables of the Testimony (25:22). 36 is a gloss.

h XVII 1-7 Water in the Desert: Massah and Meribah—On reaching Raphidim, most probably the modern Wady Refāyid 8 m. NW. of Mt Sinai, the congregation of the Israelites suffering from thirst strove with Moses and tempted God. Moses at God's command struck a rock with his rod and the water gushed forth. The place is called Massah 'Temptation', and Meribah 'Strife'. Vg omits Meribah. At another Meribah near Kadesh (Num 20:1-13) Moses sinned and was punished by exclusion from the promised land. 6. Horeb is unintelligible and probably an interpolation.

i 8-16 Battle with the Amalekites—The Amalekites were an ancient people (Gen 14:7; Num 24:20) residing in the south of Canaan and the north of the Sinaitic peninsula. Those who attacked the Israelites (Deut 25:17-18) had pushed farther to the south, whether permanently or temporarily, to find pasture for their flocks, and had very probably encamped in the Feiran oasis. By the prayer of Moses the Israelites triumph. An altar is built and called Yahweh is my banner and perpetual enmity between the people of Yahweh and the Amalekites is solemnly proclaimed. Here for the first time Moses is ordered to write this for a memorial in a book. This explains why Josue and Hur are mentioned incidentally since a short record would merely give their names and activities. 11. Omit 'a little'. Hands should be read with Sam. and all versions, not 'hand' (MT). Raising one hand would be here the gesture of command but raising the two hands is the gesture of prayer. 16. The hand (raised) up to the throne of Yahweh indicates an oath or solemn declaration of perpetual war with Amalec (cf. Jg 6:3, 33; 1 Kg 15:2 ff.; 30:1 ff.). For MT kēs'yāh read with the versions kissē' Yah, throne of Yahweh, i.e. heaven.

j XVIII 1-27 Jethro visits Moses: Institution of Judges—The events narrated in this chapter are not in chronological order. The visit of Jethro is located at Mount Sinai (6) but the Israelites are still at Raphidim (19:2). The judges were naturally instituted at Mount Sinai (Deut 1:6, 9 ff.), after the laws were revealed. Both events are narrated here by anticipation to avoid an interruption in the history of the Sinaitic legislation.

1-6. Jethro hearing of the return of Moses sets out with Sephora and her sons Gersam and Eliezer (born after the departure of Moses) and is met by his son-in-law to whom he has previously announced his visit. Moses' separation from Sephora was temporary for practical reasons, not a divorce. 7. 'And he [Moses] went out to meet his father-in-law and bowed down before him and kissed him; and they inquired about each other's health and entered the tent.' 8-11. Moses relates the great deeds of Yahweh on behalf of his people. Jethro rejoices and recognizes that Yahweh is supreme: 'Now I know that Yahweh is greater than all gods: yea in the very thing wherein they [the gods of Egypt identified with the Egyptians] dealt proudly against them' (the Hebrews). 12. In thanksgiving he offers holocausts and victims for a sacrificial meal before God (i.e. given by God to his worshippers) to which Moses, Aaron and the elders of Israel are invited. As the sacrifices were offered to the true God the invited could partake of the sacrificial meal. Jethro now asks why Moses passes the whole day in giving audience to the people. 15-16. Moses replies: 'The people come to me to inquire of God [Moses is God's interpreter] and in disputed matters I judge between a man and his neighbour and I make known to them the statutes of God and his laws'.

k 19-23. Jethro rejoins: 'Hearken to my words, I will give thee counsel and may God be with thee: Represent thou the people with God and bring their disputes before God' and instruct them in their duties but appoint good men as judges in ordinary cases to share thy burden, and reserve only the more important cases to thyself. 23a. 'If thou shalt do this and God command thee so, then thou shalt be able to endure.'

24-27. Moses therefore appoints judges. Jethro returns to his own land.

(C) Sinaitic Theophany, Covenant and Legislation 172a (19:1-40:36)

XIX 1-25 Theophany on Mount Sinai—Christian tradition from the end of the 4th cent. (Pilgrimage of Aetheria) has located Mt Sinai in the Sinaitic peninsula. Recently other sites have been proposed, but none of these is as well supported by the texts as the traditional Mt Sinai, the modern Gebel Mūsā or Mountain of Moses in the interior of the southern part of the peninsula. Those who seek Mt Sinai east instead of west of the Gulf of Aqabah rely mainly on three arguments: (a) Madian is in northern Arabia, not in the Sinaitic peninsula; (b) Moses fled for safety from the lands subject to the Pharaoh of which Sinai was one; (c) the theophany implies a volcanic eruption and there are volcanoes in Madian but not in Sinai. To (a) may be answered that Madian is a region of nomads, some of whom raided eastern Palestine for seven years (Jg 6:1) and that the Kenites with whom Moses took refuge (Jg 1:16) were living among the Amalekites in the Sinaitic peninsula in the time of Saul (1 Kg 15:6). To (b) one may reply that Egyptian influence in Sinai was confined to the region of the mines, considerably to the NW. of Gebel Mūsā, and that Egyptian troops only guarded the miners in their occasional expeditions but did not permanently occupy the district. As regards (c) a volcanic eruption is excluded by the fact that the people took up their position on the lower slope of the mountain while Moses ascended to its summit, that there is no mention of lava, and that the smoke (18) is only a figurative equivalent of the dark storm-cloud (10). In the description of a theophany in Ps 17 the smoke and fire of 9 are similarly identical with the dark stormclouds and lightning of 12 ff. Of the other sites suggested Kadesh is excluded by the encampment at the Red Sea before reaching the desert of Sin (Num 33:10); Petra is an unsupported hypothesis arising out of Nielsen's moon-god speculations; Serabit el-Chadēm is most unlikely as an Egyptian outpost and sanctuary of the goddess Hathor, and Grimme's reading of Sinai on two ancient inscriptions there discovered has been shown to be erroneous by Ryckmans (Bi 9 [1928] 119 note); Gebel Serbal, NW. of Gebel Mūsā, is difficult to climb and has no open space beneath, where the Israelites could encamp in sight of it. The large plain of Er-Rāḥa north of Gebel Mūsā, on the other hand, formed a suitable encampment and water was provided by the four valleys which meet in the plain. The northern and lower peak of the mountain, Ras eṣ-Ṣafāf, 6,830 ft high, is reached in an hour and a half and is visible from every part of the plain underneath. The southern and more distant peak, 7,363 ft high, is hidden from the plain by the northern one on which the Decalogue was promulgated.

As the exact day of the arrival at Sinai is missing from the text, we cannot definitely connect the Sinaitic legislation with the subsequent feast of Pentecost. Jewish tradition of such a connexion is not ancient but some of the Fathers, SS Augustine, Jerome and Leo, seem to suppose it when they compare the promulgation of the Old Law on Mt Sinai with that of the New Law on the first Christian Pentecost.

3-6. Moses first ascends the mountain and receives the announcement of a solemn covenant to be made between God and Israel. The eagle metaphor is more fully developed in Deut 32:11. The covenant will make Israel God's chosen possession above (or among) all peoples, a specially favoured people. They on their part must heed his words and keep his laws, and be holy and a kingdom of priests, specially remarkable for piety and morality as nearer to God than other nations, just as priests, being nearer to God than laymen, should be distinguished by holiness of life. 7-8. Moses makes the announcement to the people

172d who assent. He then brings back the answer of the people to Yahweh. As the ascent is made in an hour and a half, that of Gebel Serbal in five hours, two ascents in the same day confirm the traditional site. 9-12. God then announces the theophany for the second next day with the object of convincing the people that Moses is his prophet. He will appear in a storm of thunder and lightning. The people must prepare themselves by sanctification keeping apart from anything that profanes and by washing their garments, symbol of interior clearness. A limit must be assigned which the people may not pass, since to touch the holy mountain during the theophany is a profanation punished by death. 13. Death in such a case would be an act of God, and 13a is a gloss suggesting methods of execution by man without personal contact. Read : no hands shall touch it (the mountain, not 'him', the profaner, a false interpretation which gave rise to the gloss). A trumpet, lit. ram's horn, will summon the people to the lowest slope of the mountain (cf. 1 Thess 4:15 ; Apoc 8:8). 14-15. Moses gives the message to the people and explains the sanctification order by the words : approach no woman. 16-19. The theophany is described. The people are on the lowest slope of the mount. In their sight Moses speaks to God on the summit of the mount and God answers him with voices (loudly or amid thunderclaps). The tense of the verbs 'speak' and 'answer' implies a continued conversation. The law is thus communicated to Moses in the sight and probably in the hearing of the people. The people (LXX) rather than the mountain (MT) tremble. 20-25. We seem to have another traditional account of the facts narrated with some unimportant variations in the order of events and a new element in the mention of Aaron and the priests. The latter were apparently the sons of Aaron (cf. 24:1), called priests by anticipation, since their institution belongs to a later period. There is no mention of pre-Aaronic priests in the texts.

f Introductory Remarks on the Decalogue—The text is in Ex 20:1-17, Deut 5:6-21, and the Nash Papyrus (cf. § 77a and RB 13 [1904] 244 f.), which is certainly earlier than MT and assigned to the 2nd cent. B.C. by Albright (JBL 56 [1937] 145-76) ; cf. also Mt 19:18 f. ; Mk 10:19 ; Lk 18:20 ; Rom 13:9. It is certain that the decalogue contained ten distinct commandments (Ex 34:28 ; Deut 4:13 ; 10:4). It is generally believed that these were originally more lapidary in form, more similar in style and therefore in some cases briefer than they appear in the texts. The additions, chiefly concerned with the reason for a precept, the reward for observing it, and particular applications of it, may well have been made mostly or entirely by Moses himself when instructing the people on their observance. They are not always identical in Ex and Deut.

g Two divisions of the commandments into ten are still found among Christians, both derived from different Jewish divisions, one preferred by the Greeks and the other by the Latins. At the Reformation the Lutherans kept the Latin, the Calvinists adopted the Greek division. English Protestants took the Greek division from the Calvinists while Catholics retained the Latin one. The Hellenist Jews, Philo, Josephus, etc., so divided the commandments as to make the prohibition of images a distinct precept and combined the two prohibitions of evil desires into one precept. Origen who introduced this view into the Church attests the previous existence of a different one in which two precepts forbidding evil desires were recognized and one and the same precept forbade the worship of images and of strange gods. The Palestinian Jews, on the other hand, whose view is clearly defined in the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan, regarded Ex 20:2 'I am Yahweh thy God who brought thee out of the land of Egypt and out of the house of bondage' as the first precept, the prohibition of the worship of strange gods and images as the second and the two prohibitions of evil desires as the tenth. The Christians therefore rightly rejected their first precept as an introduction to, not a part of the decalogue, retained their second as the first and divided their tenth into two forbidding two kinds of evil desires. St Augustine's exposition of this division secured its universal acceptance in the Latin Church.

The exegetical determination of the original division is complicated by a problem in textual criticism. In Ex 20:17 we read : Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house : Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife ; in Deut 5:21 : Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife : Thou shalt not desire thy neighbour's house. Sam. has the reading of Ex, LXX that of Deut in both passages. But Pap. Nash, though generally agreeing with Ex against Deut, has the reading of Deut in this passage. The intrinsic reasons in favour of Deut and two precepts of desire are still stronger. As two acts of adultery and theft are forbidden in two separate precepts and as adultery precedes theft in all texts, versions and NT allusions, so we expect the two corresponding desires to be mentioned in the same order and to be forbidden in two distinct precepts. The argument is strengthened by the fact that the indulgence of two distinct evil passions, licentiousness and covetousness, is proscribed and that thou shalt not covet appears twice in both texts. The passage in Ex moreover contains further evidence of textual corruption in the omission of his field, found in Deut and Pap. Nash and required by the parallelism of pairs : house and field, man-servant and maid-servant, ox and ass.

The case of the first precept is very different. Only images of strange gods were prohibited as appears not only from the words : Thou shalt not adore them ; thou shalt not serve them (Ex 20:5a ; Deut 5:7) but also from the cherubim (Ex 25:18) and the brazen serpent (Num 21:8) which Yahweh ordered to be made and from the mural decorations of the Jewish synagogues in the early Christian period as excavations abundantly attest. There is question therefore not of a separate commandment which forbids the worship of all images but of an application of the precept forbidding the worship of strange gods. The prohibition of idols is found in the Book of the Covenant (20:23). It appears here in an amplified form (20:4-6) most probably as a later addition to the decalogue to illustrate and safeguard the first commandment. The Latin division of the commandments is thus the more reasonable one and the more likely to be original.

The antiquity and divine origin of the decalogue are explicitly and repeatedly affirmed in the sacred text. The Mosaic legislation in general and the decalogue in particular are moreover the direct and necessary consequence of the Sinaitic covenant. The chosen people must be a kingdom of priests and a holy nation (19:6). The laws by the observance of which this holiness could be acquired must therefore be revealed to them. The prophet Osee recognizes the connexion between the covenant and the law when he says : They have transgressed my covenant and violated my law (Os 8:1). The prophets in general presuppose the law when they reproach the people for not observing it.

Six precepts of the decalogue are listed together in ancient Babylonian, four in ancient Egyptian texts. Against the antiquity of these therefore no particular difficulty can be raised. The four peculiar to the Hebrews are the first, third, ninth and tenth. Of these the Sabbath has been particularly objected to by many critics as an exilic institution. It supposes the continuous division of time into weeks, unknown outside Israel. The Egyptians divided the month into ten-day periods, the Babylonians into irregular periods corresponding to the phases of the moon. Two theories of a foreign origin have been proposed. According to one it was originally a full moon feast, the Babylonian šapattu, and was so understood in pre-exilic texts when coupled with the new moon feast, but became a weekly feast during the exile. This theory ignores several pre-exilic texts which mention a weekly Sabbath, gives no indication of a full moon feast in Israel except the coupling of new moon and Sabbath, equally 172k natural in the sense of monthly feast and weekly feast, and has no plausible explanation of the change from full moon to seventh day. The second theory finds the origin of the Sabbath in the dies nefasti of the Assyrians, who regarded the 7th, 14th, 21st and 28th days of the month as days of ill-omen on which the gods should be propitiated and certain actions should not be done. But their 7th day was not marked by abstinence from servile work, nor was the Hebrew Sabbath a dies nefastus. Neither theory explains the continuous time division into weeks essential to the Sabbath. The chief objection to the first, ninth and tenth precepts is based on their exalted character at variance with the theory of religious evolution previously refuted (§163g). The monotheism of the first precept, already indicated by the divine name Yahweh, and the prohibition of evil desires in the two last show the definite religious and moral superiority of the Hebrew decalogue over the laws of all ancient peoples. This superiority cannot be explained away or adequately accounted for without divine intervention.

173a XX 1-21 The Decalogue (cf. Deut 5:6-22)—Though the decalogue sets forth the obligations imposed on Israel by the covenant, it is not nationalistic but universal in its outlook and expounds briefly and clearly the fundamental principles of all religious and moral obligation. The first three precepts prescribe man's duty to God, the last seven his duty to his neighbour. 3. The first commandment forbids the worship of any other god but Yahweh. Before me means in my presence, not in preference to me. 4-6. The prohibition of image worship, already discussed, (§172i), does not contemplate the case of an image of Yahweh, most probably forbidden in the Book of the Covenant (23). Deut 4:16 ff. insists, however, that he did not appear in material form lest the people should be led to make an image of him and misapprehend his spiritual nature. 7. The second commandment forbids all misuse of the divine name Yahweh, not only perjury but cursing, incantations, etc. The later Jews exaggerated this precept into a prohibition of even a reverent use of the sacred name. 8-11. In the third commandment Sabbath-day instead of 'seventh day' and perhaps also remember (Deut, observe) imply that the Sabbath was already instituted and known (16:23 ff.). The fundamental object of the feast was to segregate a portion of man's time from his own uses and consecrate it to God as an acknowledgement that all his time belonged to God. The special reason for observing it given in Ex is that God rested on the seventh day after the creation. It is assumed that man's actions must be in harmony with God's. A different and more humanitarian reason is given in Deut, quite in accord with the general character of Deuteronomic legislation. The repose and religious observances on the Sabbath commemorate God's deliverance of the Hebrews from the hard labours of the Egyptian captivity. The fact that the two reasons are different, though not mutually exclusive, suggests that they are later additions. Pap. Nash agrees here with Ex.

12. The fourth commandment begins the second list of obligations, since the family comes before the state and parents have the first and strongest claim to their children's regard. The reward promised is probably a later addition. 13-15. The fifth, sixth and seventh commandments safeguard the three main bulwarks of human society: the sacredness of life, the purity of marriage and the right of property. The distinction between the sixth and seventh commandments shows that the wife is not regarded as merely the property of her husband. 16. The eighth commandment is directed against sins of the tongue and forbids all false testimony as to the neighbour's person, property or good name. 17. Finally, licentious and covetous desires are prohibited as evil in themselves and leading to the actions already forbidden. The tenth commandment may have ended originally with house in the general sense of possessions. 18-19. God himself announced the decalogue to the people (Deut 5:4 ; 22 ; 10:4 and probably Ex 19:19 ; 20:18 voices). 173e This is clearly the chief reason of their terror and their request that Yahweh should not speak to them himself but through Moses, his interpreter.

XX 23-XXIII 19 The Book of the Covenant—d The first principles of religion and morality revealed in the decalogue did not sufficiently indicate the obligations of the Israelites as the holy people of Yahweh. They had to be developed into a code of laws, not exclusively cultural but ethical and religious like the decalogue, to attain their full object. These laws were not all new but combined approved customs already established with fresh legislation suited to the occasion. God's condescension to national customs and local circumstances, already exemplified in the plagues, is here abundantly manifested. His foresight also appears in adapting the legislation less to present nomadic conditions than to the proximate settlement in Canaan. The Israelites were in fact, as already remarked (§169b), familiar with agriculture and only temporarily nomads. The composition of the Book of the Covenant by Moses has recently been attached by H. Cazelles to the settlement of Reuben and Gad in Transjordan, RB 52 (1945) 173-91. This theory finds an appropriate setting for the agricultural legislation at the cost of detaching the Mosaic code from the Sinaitic Covenant to which it naturally belongs.

The original order of the text seems to have been e disturbed. While the section on cult comes last, two cultural laws appear (20:23-26) before the introductory formula (21:1). Laws of religion and charity are intermingled (22:18-23:9), possibly because such precepts of charity, peculiar to the Hebrews, were regarded as religious obligations. Kidnapping intervenes between two offences against parents (21:15). The law of charity to one's enemy interrupts practical applications of the eighth commandment (23:4-5). In the law of first-fruits wine and oil (22:19a) are separated from corn (23:19a). The admonition not to appear empty-handed before Yahweh (23:15c) interrupts the context and naturally follows 23:17. The concluding formula (23:13a) appears earlier. As the examples show, these disarrangements are accidental and do not affect the character or interpretation of the code. A later addition (22:31b) incorporates the law of Lev 17:15 ; Deut 14-21, excluded by 21:34-36. f Legislation is never static and additions by which codes are brought up to date must be expected. The different forms in which the laws are expressed indicate according to some critics strata of different date. But such diversities of expression are common to all classes of literature. Ancient laws moreover when codified would retain their original form. Heinisch compares the Salic Law which exhibits five different forms of expression in the five laws of its first title.

Much light has been thrown on the Mosaic Code g (MC) by the discovery in the last half-century of four more ancient collections of laws : the complete Babylonian Code of Hammurabi (CH), an Assyrian lawbook (AL), Sumerian laws (SL) and Hittite laws (HL). The antiquity of Eastern codes is thus established and a Hebrew code in the 13th cent. B.C. is no longer an apparent anachronism. A comparative study of the collections reveals in all a common element and a distinctive character. Babylonian law which spread early over the whole East was adopted by different peoples and modified according to their national customs and character. MC shows most contacts with CH but sometimes agrees with other collections against it and has naturally many distinctive features. Pre-Mosaic law in Genesis has a precisely similar character. There is no indication of literary dependence. The contacts are adequately explained by the origin of Abraham from Babylonia, the spread of Babylonian civilization, and the mixture of races in ancient Palestine. The main difference between MC and the h other collections is twofold. MC is more elementary and accommodated to a primitive state of society—

173h another indication of its antiquity. The other codes are more developed and suppose a more advanced stage of culture. MC has a higher standard of religion and morality, not precisely as including cultural laws, but because the religious spirit pervades the civil enactments, as appears in particular from the rights accorded to slaves and the special consideration shown to the poor and depressed. The other codes are chiefly concerned with the maintenance of property rights, show little regard for the poor, and favour the rich as the important members of the community. In the penalties imposed AL is the severest, HL the mildest and closest to MC. Illustrations of these remarks will be found in the commentary where the relations between the codes are studied in detail.

174a XX 22-26 Public Worship—23. Two distinct prohibitions are implied by the two verbs of which the second refers to idols, the first most probably to other gods suggested by beside me (MT). 'You shall not make (other gods) beside me; gods of silver and gods of gold you shall not make for yourselves.' The second prohibition seems to include images of Yahweh. 24. 'An altar of earth thou shalt make to me and thou shalt offer on it thy holocausts and thy peace-offerings, thy sheep and thy oxen, on every place [or, on all the place] where I cause my name to be remembered.' On all the place is supported by the article with 'place', on every place by LXX, Vg and Gen 20:13 where the article also appears but every place is meant. In the first view we have the law (Deut 12:5) allowing only one place of sacrifice but all is difficult to explain. According to some it implies permission for more than one altar only in the court of the tabernacle or temple. But such a permission is not supported by later usage or intelligible here before the tabernacle is mentioned. The legislation regards sacrifice in general, not exceptional cases. The same objections hold against the view that the law authorizes private altars at which animals can be ritually slaughtered, as opposed to the one altar of holocausts for public sacrifices. This interpretation moreover ignores the word holocausts and the need of special authorization for the erection of the altar. Thus the rendering in every place seems preferable. Altars may be erected only at such places as are duly authorized. This was the practice of divinely guided persons like Elias, Samuel and David. The law of Deut is of later, but not necessarily post-Mosaic origin, and visualizes the new situation created by the settlement in Canaan. 25-26. The altar was to be simple, made of earth or unhewn stones, and not reached by steps for the reason given which implies that the priest wore a single short garment. The legislation is primitive. Practical experience of a single altar in the desert would prepare the way for the subsequent legislation of Deut.

c XXI 1-11 Slaves—1-6. A Hebrew could be enslaved by a father's act (7) or through inability to pay a fine (22:3) or a debt (4 Kg 4:1). After six years he becomes free with his wife, if enslaved with him, and also receives raiment and other gifts (Deut 15:14). If he has taken a wife from his master's slaves, she and her children remain slaves. The slave may thus prefer to remain with his family. 'In that case his master shall bring him before God [the altar or sanctuary where he attests his decision, not the judges] and he shall bring him to the door or door-post (of his house) and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl.' The ear indicates obedience, the nailing to the door permanent attachment. 7-11. The case of a maiden sold into slavery to become the slave-wife of her master is considered. If she displease her master who has determined her for himself, he may not sell her to foreigners but must either let her be bought back by her father or, if he give her in marriage to his son, treat her as a daughter, or 'if he take another slave-wife, her food, her raiment, her marriage intercourse he shall not diminish'. Any infraction of these three rights sets her free. In CH and AL a free citizen enslaved served only three years, but had no rights and belonged entirely to his master. Even the milder HL imposes various forms of mutilation for offences punished by a fine

when committed by free citizens. The more humanitarian character of MC is evident. 174a

12-32 Injuries to Person—12-14. As all life belongs to God deliberate shedding of blood is an offence punished by shedding of blood (cf. Gen 9:5). The executioner was near kinsman of the slain (Num 35:19; Deut 19:12). In a more highly organized society public good requires that the state punish the murderer. Substitution of a member of the murderer's family or clan is not allowed in MC. It is not clear whether killing which God brought about through his (the slayer's) instrumentality includes manslaughter or refers only to inculpable homicide, but such killing was not punished and cities of refuge were subsequently appointed where the slayer might find asylum. Later legislation provides for hearing of witnesses and establishment of motive in doubtful cases (Num 25:20 ff.; Deut 19:4 ff.). A case of extenuating circumstances where the blood-price is substituted for the death penalty is mentioned (31). The altar was a temporary place of refuge for the slayer, who, however, if found guilty, was removed and put to death. CH has no law on murder except that a wife who murdered her husband should be impaled. AL only mentions homicide resulting from wounds inflicted and punished by fines. HL distinguishes between wilful murder and killing like MC, but imposes only money fines in both cases.

15-17. Grave offences against father or mother by act or word are punished with death (by stoning, Deut 21:18 ff.). The other codes ignore the mother and chiefly discuss offences of an adopted son. CH allows a father to cast out his son for a second grave offence and cut off his hand if struck by him. The greater severity of MC shows its higher estimate of the importance of obedience to parents. 16. Death is the punishment of kidnapping, whether or not the person kidnapped be sold into slavery (cf. Gen 37:26 ff.). CH prescribes the same penalty. HL distinguishes various cases but never assigns the death penalty.

18-19. Injuries inflicted in a fight with a stone or club (LXX fist?), which, though not fatal, temporarily incapacitate the injured, entail compensation for time lost and payment of medical expenses. CH imposes only the second obligation, HL adds to both a pain-compensation of six silver half-shekels (7s 6d). 20-21. A man who beats his slave to death with a rod is punished, not with death since the weapon is not lethal and homicide is presumably not intended, but apparently by a fine. If the slave survive two days, the connection of the death with the beating is not evident, and the loss of the master's property (DV 'money') is considered sufficient punishment. CH also, by punishing a slave's disobedience with ear-mutilation, implies that a master could not put his slave to death at will. 22. Injuries inflicted in a fight on a pregnant woman, resulting in the premature birth of a dead child, are punished by a fine, determined by the woman's husband. 'And he shall pay for the miscarriage' (MT slightly corrected). The foetus is not regarded as a person, but if the woman dies the lex talionis is applied. The other codes agree with MC in imposing a fine but have a more developed legislation and distinguish different cases.

23-25. The lex talionis is a very ancient and widespread law which makes the punishment agree with the offence. It checks passion and moderates the desire of vengeance. Except in the case of murder, the penalty was usually replaced among the Hebrews by a money compensation, more agreeable to the offender and profitable to the injured. The application of the penalty to innocent persons, like the son or wife of the offender, is a grave defect of justice in CH and AL, which also only impose a fine if the injured be inferior in rank. HL imposes a fine in all cases. The lex talionis holds only for free-men. 26-27. Injury to a slave, even so slight as the loss of a tooth, sets him free. This humane law is peculiar to MC. Injury to a slave from an outsider was punished by a fine paid to his master in CH and HL. 28-32. Death caused by an animal like the ox h b XXII:1. The stealer of a domestic animal not recoverable must make fourfold or fivefold restitution, twofold if recoverable. 3b. If insolvent he is sold as a slave. 2-3a. A thief caught in the act may be slain with impunity by night, but not after sunrise. CH punishes similar offences with death in some cases and tenfold or thirtyfold restitution in others and allows a thief in flagranti delicto to be slain with impunity by day or by night. Death sometimes, but more commonly mutilation, is the punishment of theft in AL. HL is in almost complete agreement with MC, but exacts fuller restitution. 5-6. Injury done to a neighbour's field or vineyard by letting one's beast loose on it must be made good. Injury caused by fire, catching in brush-wood (Vg 'thorn') and spreading to a neighbour's land, must also be made good. Negligence is presumed in both cases. CH and HL agree with MC, but are more precise in estimating damage and compensation in the first case.

174h entails his slaughter (Gen 9:5), because he has failed in his end by being hurtful instead of useful to man. His flesh cannot be eaten because of the material blood-guilt attached to it. The owner, if culpably negligent, is subject to the lex talionis, usually commuted to a fine. Since the fine is substituted for the life of the offender the age or rank of the victim is irrelevant and the full blood-price, thirty silver shekels (nearly £4), must be paid if the victim be a slave. CH agrees with MC except in sparing the life of the ox and making the fine the blood-price of the victim, thirty shekels for a free man, twenty for a slave.

175a XXI 33-XXII 17 Injuries to Property—33-36. The loss of a domestic animal which falls into a neighbour's cistern or is gored by a neighbour's ox must be made good if the cistern was left uncovered or the ox was known to be ferocious. The owner receives the price of the animal, the neighbour retains the carcase. Cisterns for the preservation of rainwater are common in Palestine where springs are rare. If there was no culpable negligence, both persons share equally in the price of the ox which is sold and the carcase of the dead animal. Thus the flesh of an animal not ritually slaughtered was eaten at this period. Parallel cases of loss of property are similarly decided in CH and HL, though the latter once imposes double the restitution.

c 7-8. If a deposit be missing the thief must make twofold restitution. If he be not discovered the depositary must establish his innocence before God, possibly by an ordeal, more probably by an oath (LXX) which the guilty would fear to take. CH agrees with MC in imposing twofold restitution on the thief and making the depositary responsible if culpably negligent, but requires absolutely for the validity of the deposit a written contract attested by witnesses. Deposits were the usual means of safeguarding property during the absence of the owner. 9. Cases of lost things alleged to be found in possession of another are to be decided before God as in 8. 'He whom God shall condemn shall pay double to his neighbour.' The fine is for theft in one case, for false accusation in the other. CH and HL also regard appropriation of things lost as theft and CH obliges the possessor to prove by witnesses that the object was honestly purchased.

d 10-13. The case of an animal injured or lost in a neighbour's keeping is considered. If there are no witnesses to the death or injury or hostile seizure of the animal the neighbour must attest his innocence by oath; if it was stolen from him he is bound to restitution; if it was torn by a wild beast he must exhibit the torn carcase. CH also orders restitution if the animal was stolen, but not if it was seized by a wild beast or perished by lightning or pestilence when innocence can be established by oath. HL agrees with MC in the case of seizure by a wild beast. 14-15. An animal may be lent to another gratis or for hire. In the first case injury to the animal must be made good, since neglect is presumed, unless the owner was present. In the second no compensation is exacted, since if it was hired it came for its hire. Others render: If a hired servant

(was present) it comes on his hire (is taken out of his wages). CH and HL only consider the case of an animal hired out to another, who must compensate the owner for damages, unless the beast perish by an act of God, when innocence must be established by oath. In the more primitive and humane MC such services were usually given gratis.

16-17. The seduction and violation of a virgin not betrothed is considered here as affecting her father, who guards his daughter's interests and will find it difficult to get her a husband and thus lose the môhar, purchase-money (DV 'dowry'). The seducer must pay the môhar and also marry the maiden unless her father objects. It is uncertain whether the father at this period kept the môhar or gave it in whole or in part as a dowry to the bride. AL has a similar enactment, but exacts a threefold môhar from the seducer.

XXII 18-XXIII 9 Religion and Charity—18-21. f Sorcery, bestiality and worship of other gods are punished with death. Sorcery was similarly punished in CH and AL, not for a religious motive as in MC, but as causing injury to person and property. Bestiality was a capital offence in HL, but not in all cases.

21-24. Oppression of resident aliens, widows, orphans and the poor is particularly prohibited. The poor and defenceless are under God's special care. 25-27. The creditor must be considerate and merciful to his debtor. In particular the mantle of the debtor, if pledged as security, must be returned before nightfall, since it is the poor man's only coverlet. 25. 'If thou lend money to any of my people with thee that is poor, thou shalt not be to him as a creditor, neither shall ye lay upon him interest.'

Lending at interest to a poor Israelite is here forbidden as contrary to charity, but not as wrong in itself. Deut 23:20 expressly allows exaction of interest from foreign traders. CH allows interest in all cases of loan but seeks to regulate the rate and forbids exploitation of the temporary needs of a poor debtor. 28. Thou shalt not curse God, etc. Vg has 'gods' understood as judges, but 'lôhim does not mean judges and Naboth was falsely accused of blaspheming God and the king (3 Kg 21:13). The mild HL punishes cursing the ruler with extermination of offender and family. 29-30. The offering of the first-fruits of thy fulness (wine Num 28:27) and thy tear (oil) is prescribed. The first-born sons, originally consecrated by this law to the service of Yahweh, were subsequently ransomed when replaced by the Levites. The eighth day does not designate the exact time of the offering, but the beginning of a period in which it was made (Lev 22:27) as in Gen 2:17.

31. This prohibition, as already explained (§ 173f), is a later insertion. XXIII:1-9. Practical applications of the eighth commandment are considered. Strict adherence to truth is inculcated on witnesses, and judges are warned not to take bribes or pervert justice especially when the poor and resident aliens are concerned. Some correct 'poor man' (3) to 'great man', since false testimony on behalf of the poor is unexpected. No penalty is here imposed on offenders but the lex talionis is applied to false accusers and lying witnesses (Deut 19:16-21) as in CH and SL. 4-5. Charity to one's enemy by helping him in difficulties is enjoined. This precept is not opposed to the words of Christ on the character of the Old Law (Mt 5:43). He refers to the general spirit of the legislation manifested by the lex talionis and contrasted with the New Law of universal charity and forgiveness.

XXIII 10-19 Public Worship—10-11. The Sabbath 1 year, more fully described (Lev 25:2-7; Deut 15:1-3), like the Sabbath day was the same for all. Its object was not economical, to increase the fertility of the soil, but religious, to acknowledge God's ownership of the land by renouncing its use every seventh year. Tillage and harvesting were forbidden and the spontaneous produce of the corn-land, the vines and the olive trees was assigned to the poor and after them to the beasts of the field. Lev, however, allows the proprietors a share of it and Deut prescribes a moratorium on debts, usually paid from harvest returns. 13b.

- 175f This prohibition explains the substitution of bōšēf, 'shame' for ba'al 'master' in proper names. The originally inoffensive ba'al became notorious as the name of the chief Canaanite deity. 14-17. The three annual feasts, usually called Pasch, Feast of Weeks (Pentecost in NT) and Feast of Tabernacles, are here named according to their agricultural character, Feast of Unleavened Bread, Feast of Harvest and Feast of Gathering. On the first cf. 12:15-20. The second was the feast of the wheat harvest and occurred seven weeks after the offering of the first-fruits of the barley harvest. The third began on the fifteenth of Tishri and lasted eight days. It celebrated the products of the fruit harvest, of which wine and oil were the most important. The corn, strangely associated with this feast in DV, is a mistranslation of Vg fruges. Read 15c after 17. 18. Nothing leavened could be offered on the altar, probably because changed from its natural condition; cf. the similar prohibition of hewn stones (20:25). The fat, considered the most precious part of the victim, must be offered while still fresh and unspoiled. 19b. The cooking of a kid in its mother's milk is forbidden, as a pagan sacrificial rite, according to an addition in Sam here and in some Greek MSS (Deut 14:20). The rite is now known from the Rās-Shamra tablets as pertaining to the cult of Asherah, the Canaanite goddess of fertility, and represents symbolically the nursing of a god by the mother goddess (cf. A. Casey VD 16 [1936] 142-8; 174-83). The legislation may have ended with 13a.
- 176a 20-33 Promises and Warnings for the March to Canaan—This passage does not interrupt the history of the Covenant, but suitably precedes its ratification, as the similar discourse (34:11-16) subsequently precedes its renewal. Yahweh promises to guide, assist, nourish and multiply his people, to inspire fear and discouragement in their enemies, to make them victorious in battle and to give them possession of all Canaan, not immediately lest the land suffer from partial disoccupation, but gradually as they become numerous enough to fill it (cf. 12:37). He warns them on the other hand against all acts of disobedience, especially worshipping the gods of the Canaanites, imitating their evil actions, neglecting to destroy their Massebas and concluding alliances with them. The Massebas (DV 'statues') were idolatrous emblems of Baal, consisting of detached stone pillars erected in the Canaanite sanctuaries. 28. The Hornets (cf. Deut 7:20; Jos 24:12; Wis 12:8) are usually interpreted figuratively in the sense of discouragement. Garstang sees in them the Egyptians whose destructive campaigns in Palestine in the 15th cent. B.C. made the land an easy prey to the invading Hebrews c 1406 B.C. (Joshua Judges [London 1931] 112-5; 258-60). But the symbol of Lower Egypt which he assumes to be the hornet is more usually regarded as the bee by Egyptologists, and his dating of the conquest and identification of the Habiri with the Hebrews are improbable. 31. The boundaries of the promised land from the Gulf of Aqabah (Red Sea) to the Mediterranean (Sea of the Philistines) and from the desert of Sur to the river Euphrates are to some extent ideal and include subject nations.
- g XXIV 1-11 Ascent of the Mount and Ratification of the Covenant—The order to ascend the mount (1-2) and its execution (9-11b) interrupt the context and register another tradition in which the accompaniment of Moses part of the way by the three future priests and seventy elders and the pediment on which Yahweh manifested himself were described. 3-8, 11c. The ratification of the Covenant immediately follows the Book of the Covenant. Moses first communicates to the people all the words of Yahweh, viz. the judicial decisions. The people undertake to observe them and Moses commits them to writing. Next morning an altar is built on the lower slope of the mount and twelve Massebas (DV 'titles') are erected, not as idolatrous emblems, but to commemorate the twelve tribes. Young men, probably first-born sons, slaughter the victims, both holocausts and peace-offerings in whose blood the Covenant will be ratified. Half of the blood is sprinkled on the altar and half is kept in sacrificial bowls and subsequently sprinkled on the people after Moses has solemnly read aloud the Book of the Covenant and they have again solemnly promised to observe it. The sacrificial banquet on the flesh of the peace-offerings given by Yahweh as host to his worshippers strengthens the bond between him and them and ends the ceremony of ratification. Since the blood represented the life of the victim and the altar represented Yahweh, the pouring or sprinkling of the blood on the altar was the offering of the life of the victim to Yahweh, the essential element in every Hebrew sacrifice of a living victim. The sprinkling of part of the blood on the people was a special rite of the covenant sacrifice which expressed the special union between Yahweh and his people effected by the covenant. The sacrifice of Christ was also a covenant sacrifice by which the New Testament or Covenant was ratified. It is in the consecration of the chalice that this character is emphasized in its Eucharistic continuation.

12-18 Moses again ascends the Mount—The object of this ascent is to receive from Yahweh firstly the two tables of stone containing the law commanded in the decalogue and secondly the instructions on the organization of cult recorded in chh 24-31. He is accompanied part of the way by his attendant Josue, the leader in the battle with the Amalekites (17:8 ff.). Aaron and Hur are given charge of the people during his absence. The mountain is covered by a cloud, visible sign of the presence of Yahweh, into which he is admitted on the seventh day and where he remains forty days. The numbers are symbolical, indicating more or less lengthy periods.

XXV-XXXI Introduction to the Ritual Legislation—f The ritual legislation was an essential element of the Sinaitic Covenant. Israel could not become God's holy people by mere observance of a legal code which made no provision for an organization of cult. To the ancients in particular religion without ritual was inconceivable. Excavations have revealed to us highly developed rituals in Egypt and Mesopotamia in the third millennium B.C. and in Syria in the middle of the second. The error of Wellhausen in regarding Hebrew ritual as almost entirely a post-exilic product is now generally recognized. The ritual law is still supposed by his followers to have been codified after the exile but is conceded to incorporate much pre-exilic material. From historical parallels alone the conclusion is justified that the Hebrews had an organized cult at a very early period of their national existence. The text of Ex 25-31 contains moreover indications of time and place in agreement with the origin claimed for it by the sacred writer. The use of bronze instead of iron for base metal work suggests a date in the age of bronze which ended in the Near East c 1200 B.C. The exclusive employment of the acacia tree for woodwork supposes Sinai, where it was abundant, rather than Palestine, where it was rare, as the place of construction of the tabernacle and its furniture. While the Cherubim of the time of Ezechiel recall Babylonian parallels, those of the ark reproduce exactly a representation in the temple of Dendera in Egypt and thus suggest an early date and an acquaintance with Egyptian art. Such indications assign chh 25-31 to the Mosaic rather than the post-exilic period. But where did the Hebrews find the gold and silver and bronze, the linen and dyes and skins needed for their work? In Egypt, undoubtedly a very rich country, especially prosperous during the period of their sojourn. They were from the beginning an acquisitive people and utilized the many years during which they enjoyed the favour of the Egyptians and lived among them to accumulate riches to which they added the spoils of victory secured before their departure. In Egypt too they acquired the skill needed for the work and from the trading 176b caravans which passed through Sinai to Egypt they could purchase perfumes and spices. Had they been a small number of poor ignorant nomads, as some critics have supposed, the tabernacle and the conquest of Canaan would be inexplicable. Objections made to the historicity of various parts of the narrative will be discussed more conveniently in the commentary.

177a XXV 1-9 Provision of Materials—The materials here registered were the voluntary offerings (DV 'first-fruits') of the people. The fine Egyptian linen was naturally white, but was also dyed dark blue, purple, and bright scarlet. Blue and purple dyes were got from shell-fish, the murex trunculus and the murex brandaris, scarlet from a species of cochineal, the coccus ilicis. Only the purple stuffs, not the scarlet, were twice dyed. Goats' hair is still woven into material for tent covering. The tahaf was not a dye (Vg 'violet') but a marine animal, probably the sea-cow. Sittim is the plural of an Egyptian word for acacia. The acacias of Sinai were probably larger in Mosaic times than they are today. Onyx is a conjectural rendering of the Hebrew sham.

b 10-22 XXXVII 1-9 The Ark—The ark is described first as the most sacred instrument of cult. It was a chest made of acacia wood overlaid inside and outside with gold and measuring $2\frac{1}{2} \times 1\frac{1}{2} \times 1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits (half yards). Its cover was a slab of pure gold, the propitiatory, place or instrument of propitiation, on which the blood of the victims was sprinkled on the Feast of the Atonement to expiate the sins of Israel. The word is used of Christ (Rom 3:25) who by offering satisfaction for our sins made God propitious to us. The top of the ark was adorned all round with a gold crown or moulding and on its four corners (pinnôf for MT 'feet') were four gold rings into which staves of acacia wood overlaid with gold were fitted on the shorter sides for the purpose of transportation. On the two ends of the propitiatory were two golden cherubim facing each other and spreading their wings over it. Their position on the ends excludes the view of Heinisch that they were worked in relief on the propitiatory so that their heads nearly met in the centre and suggests rather standing or kneeling figures of winged youths (since angels appear in human form in the Pentateuch). An Egyptian ark at Dendera is thus adorned.

c The ark served a two-fold purpose. It contained the Decalogue, a lasting testimony of the Sinaitic Covenant and was therefore called Ark of the Testimony (Ex) and Ark of the Covenant (Deut). It was the throne of Yahweh 'sitting on the Cherubim' (1 Kg 4:4, etc.) who there manifested himself to his people, received their prayers and offerings and led them in their expeditions and was therefore called Ark of God (1 Kg). The question, much debated by the critics, whether chest or throne was the original concept, is otiose for those who hold a divine institution with a two-fold purpose illustrated by the monuments and affirmed by the texts. All admit the antiquity of the ark, but not its Mosaic origin.

d 23-30 XXXVII 10-16 The Table—It also was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold and was of the same breadth and height as the ark but a half-cubit shorter in length. The legs were connected, about half-way up according to the representation on the Arch of Titus, by a golden rail or border, a handsbreadth in height, adorned with a crown or moulding. There was a similar moulding at the top. The rings and staves for transportation were like those of the ark, but the position of the rings is more clearly indicated as close to the rail or border. Salvers for loaves, cups for incense, flagons for wine and bowls for libations are also prescribed as the furniture of the table. Twelve loaves of unleavened bread were placed on the table as an offering to Yahweh on the eve of the Sabbath and after a week were replaced by fresh loaves and eaten by the priests. The incense was also renewed each week-end. The bread is called presence bread, holy bread, continual bread, bread of proposition. Its ritual function is paralleled by the twelve cakes placed before Ishtar (Jer 7:18; 44:19). Its antiquity is attested by the episode of David and the high-priest (1 Kg 21:3-6).

31-40 XXXVII 17-24 The Lampstand—The lampstand (DV candlestick) was a conventional representation of a flowering almond-tree, as appears from the almond-blossoms (DV 'cups as it were nuts', 33-34). The knop (DV 'bowl') and the flower (DV 'lily') being in the singular do not indicate separate ornaments but the calix and the corolla or outer and inner parts of each blossom. The central shaft had four blossoms; the branches, three on each side, had three each. There were also knops but no flowers where the branches emerged from the central shaft. The seven blossoms on the top were the lamps. Peraf 'flower' denotes 'lamp-tray' in the Mishna. The lampstand was beaten-work of pure gold and weighed a talent (108 lb.). The almond-tree was called sâqed 'vigilant' because it awoke so early in the spring from its winter sleep, and thus aptly symbolized the vigil kept by the lights before the ark. As this symbolism appears elsewhere (Jer 1:11 f.; Eccl 12:5) and explains adequately the shape of the lampstand it is superfluous to connect it with the ancient veneration of sacred trees. The later tradition that some at least of the lamps burned also by day scarcely agrees with 1 Kg 3:3.

XXVI 1-37 XXXVI 8-38 The Tabernacle—The coverings are first described, then the framework and lastly the internal arrangement. 1-14. The coverings were four in number. The first (40 × 28 cubits) was of fine twisted linen of various colours, white, blue, purple, and scarlet, and adorned with figures of cherubim. Its two parts, each consisting of five curtains of the same dimensions (28 × 4 cubits), were united by means of fifty golden clasps fitted into corresponding blue loops in the curtains on either side. The second covering (44 × 30 cubits) was made of goats' hair like the Bedouin tent-covering. Its two parts, one of six and the other of five curtains measuring 30 × 4 cubits, were united like those of the first except that the colour of the loops is not given and the clasps were of bronze instead of gold. It is expressly stated that the excess in breadth of the second covering over the first overhung the tabernacle by one cubit on each side (13) and the excess in length by half a curtain or two cubits in the front (9) and at the back (12). It follows evidently from this, that the space covered on top was 40 cubits in length, not 30, as is generally assumed. Only the materials of the third and fourth coverings are given, skins of rams dyed red and skins of the sea-cow. 15-30. The framework consisted of boards of acacia wood overlaid with gold, measuring 10 × 1½ cubits, twenty on each side of the tabernacle, six at the back and two of special make at the corners between the sides and the back. 24. The corner boards, variously explained, are thus described: 'And they shall be equal [LXX; twins MT vocalizing t'ômim] below and they shall be equal on the top of it [the tent] unto one ring so shall it be for both of them, at the two corners they shall be'. Since the dimensions of the tabernacle like those of Solomon's temple were internal and did not include the thickness of the framework, if we assume this undefined thickness to be ½ cubit, each corner board had a breadth of ¾ cubit or just half that of the other boards. This may explain the epithet twin. All the boards had two projections underneath inserted in silver sockets. The cohesion of the framework was secured by bars of acacia wood overlaid with gold, which passed through gold rings on the outside of the boards, five on each side. The central bar (omitted DV 28) is usually regarded as one of the five, but its special mention and its special fabrication after the others (36:33) exclude this hypothesis. 31-37. The space enclosed by the framework consisted of the Holy Place in front (20 × 10 cubits) and the Holy of Holies at the back (10 × 10 cubits). The Veil separating .

177h them, like the first covering in material and ornamentation, was attached by golden hooks to four pillars of acacia wood overlaid with gold and resting on sockets of silver. The Ark alone was in the Holy of Holies, and the Table was on the right, the Lampstand on the left as one entered the Holy Place. 'Propitiatory' (kapporet) is probably a misreading of 'veil' (pārōket) (MT 34). Finally a Screen covered the entrance of the Tabernacle differing from the Veil in its adornment, devoid of figures of cherubim, and in its supports: five instead of four pillars and bronze instead of silver sockets.

i To verify these details we must assume that the tabernacle like all tents had not a flat but a sloping roof and that it was more like Solomon's temple (cf. Wis 9:8) than is generally supposed. The two parts of the temple which corresponded with the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, the hēkāl and the dōbīr were respectively twice as long and twice as wide as their counterparts. They were also twice as high if the tabernacle had a sloping roof with a maximum height of 15 cubits. The lateral buildings on three sides of the temple and the atrium in front had their counterpart in an additional covered space of five cubits on all four sides of the tabernacle. Only in this hypothesis can the space covered have a length of 40 and a breadth of more than 10 cubits, suggested by the five pillars of the Screen as opposed to the four of the Veil. The sockets of the pillars supporting the Screen, being of bronze, must also have been at some distance from the framework, since all objects in immediate contact with the Holy Place were of gold or silver. The long centre pole at the top over which the coverings were laid was the central bar distinguished from the five lateral ones and described as being in the middle of or between the boards, since there were twenty-four on either side, and as extending from one extremity of the tent to the other. The centre pole would be supported by transverse beams two pairs of which would rest on the outer pillars upholding the veil and the screen and a third on similar pillars at the back not mentioned because they had no screen. The description of the corner boards seems to imply such transverse beams meeting at the top of the tent. The first covering was 28 cubits wide. It would thus occupy the seven cubits between the centre pole and the framework on either side, and thence descend in the same diagonal line for seven cubits to a point five cubits distant from the framework and the earth where it would be secured by ropes and pegs. This disposition of the covering avoids textual alterations and removes other difficulties in the common view. It makes the beautiful first covering everywhere visible, instead of being mostly concealed by the framework, and it prevents all the coverings from being soiled by contact with the earth. It provides also a sleeping-place for Samuel (1 Kg 3:3).

178a The existence and sacred character of the tabernacle and the ark during the whole period between the entry into Canaan and the building of the temple is clearly attested in the early historical books. Both appear, at the army headquarters in Canaan, the ark at Gilgal (Jos 4:19), the tabernacle at Shiloh (Jos 18:1). The presence of the tabernacle implies that of the ark and vice versa. The ark moreover usually accompanied the army in battle and its presence is attested at the siege of Jericho (Jos 4:4 ff.) and in the Benjaminitic war (Jg 20:27). At Shiloh we subsequently find the house of God (Jg 18:31), an annual festival (Jg 21:19), the ark (1 Kg 3:3), the tabernacle (1 Kg 2:22), the house of God (1 Kg 3:15). It is objected that 1 Kg 2:22 is a later interpolation as it is omitted by LXX (B). But the omission is explained by the discrediting character of the verse and its presence in the text used by LXX is proved by the presence of the other not discrediting reference to the women watching at the entrance to the tabernacle (Ex 38:8). It is also objected that the house of God at Shiloh was not the tabernacle but a hēkāl or sacred edifice of stone (1 Kg 1:7) with doorposts (1 Kg 1:9) and door (1 Kg 3:15). But this description implies at most an edifice enclosing the tabernacle and certainly not replacing it, since it is repeatedly stated that Yahweh, regarded as seated on the cherubim of the ark, dwelt invariably, before the building of the temple, not in a house but in a tent (2 Kg 7:2, 6; 3 Kg 8:16). Recent excavations support this conclusion by showing that Shiloh, previously insignificant, enjoyed great prosperity in the early Israelitic period when it was the sacred city of Israel. The ark was captured by the Philistines at the battle of Aphek (1 Kg 4:11) but restored to Israel seven months later and, after a brief stay at Beth-Shemesh, remained about eighty years at Kiryath-Yearim. After the capture of Jerusalem David had it removed to his new capital, where it remained for three months in the house of Obbedom and subsequently in a special tent on Mt Sion until the temple was ready to receive it. The tabernacle on the other hand, when Shiloh was sacked by the Philistines, seems to have been removed to Nob, where we find, in the days of Saul, an important sanctuary, eighty-five priests including the high-priest Ahimelec, the Ephod containing the Urim and Thummim and the loaves of proposition (1 Kg 21:9). St Jerome is justified by these indications in rendering before Yahweh (7) by 'in the tabernacle of the Lord'. The destruction of Nob and the slaughter of its priests and people by Saul (1 Kg 22:9-19) offer a natural explanation of the transport of the tabernacle to Gabaon, where we find it in the beginning of Solomon's reign (2 Par 1:3-6). The separation of the ark from the tabernacle was a natural consequence of the historical vicissitudes of a disturbed period when restriction of public worship to a single sanctuary was practically impossible.

XXVII 1-8 XXXVIII 1-7 The Altar—It was made of acacia wood overlaid with bronze and was five cubits in length and breadth and three in height. The lower half was surrounded by an ornamental grating of bronze network supporting a border required by the priests, owing to the height of the altar, for the performance of their functions. The interpretation (LXX, Josephus) of this grating as a hearth let down from the top into the interior of the altar is untenable. It was a network, not a hearth, and was beneath the border outside the altar. There were four horn-shaped projections at the corners, regarded as the most sacred parts of the altar, grasped by fugitives seeking asylum and smeared with sacrificial blood on certain occasions. Horns are found also on the altars of the Assyrians and other ancient peoples. They are symbols of strength. The altar was transported by means of staves of acacia wood overlaid with bronze which passed through rings attached to the upper extremities of the network grating. It was hollow and therefore useless unless filled with earth or stones (20:24-25) as is evidently implied. Some critics, who consider the narrative (Chh 25-31) a post-exilic fiction, deny this implication and thus imagine the author so stupid as to invent a useless altar and yet so clever as to substitute bronze and acacia for iron and cedar in accordance with the requirements of time and place.

9-19 XXXVIII 9-20 The Court of the Tabernacle—It was 100 cubits long, from east to west, and 50 cubits wide and was enclosed by hangings supported on pillars, one for every 5 cubits and therefore 60 in all. The hangings were of fine twisted linen in its natural white colour except at the entrance in the middle of the east side. Here was a screen 20 cubits long of which the hangings were of various colours, white, blue, purple, and scarlet. The material of the pillars was acacia wood (not bronze Vg 38:10, 12) since they are not numbered among the bronze articles (38:30 f.). They had sockets of bronze, capitals of silver and fillets or neckings of silver at the base of the capitals. The hangings 5 cubits high were attached to the pillars by hooks. The altar was in the eastern half of the court, the tabernacle in the western, each probably in the centre of its respective square. God dwelt in the Holy of Holies, gave audience to his Ministers in the Holy Place, and received the homage of his people in the 178a Court. 20-21. The command to provide oil for the Lampstand, out of place here, appears again in a more suitable context (Lev 24:2-4).

179a XXVIII 1-5 Institution of the Aaronid Priesthood—The priestly office in Israel is here assigned by Yahweh to Aaron and his descendants. The high-priesthood of Aaron is implicitly indicated by the distinction made between his vestments (6-39) and those of his sons, the priests (40-43). He is sanctified by the vestments, set apart and consecrated to the service of Yahweh. After the death without issue of Nadab and Abihu the high-priesthood was inherited by the Eleazar branch (Pinchas and later Sadoc) but was temporarily usurped by the line of Ithamar (Eli, Ahimelek, Abiathar).

b 6-30 XXXIX 1-21 Ephod and Hōšen—They were united to form a single vestment, usually called Ephod and worn by the high-priest when he sought oracular responses from Yahweh by means of the Urim and Thummim contained in the hōšen or pouch (1 Kg 14:3; 18 [ephod LXX, ark MT, Vg]; 23:9 ff.; 30:7 ff.). The full name Ornament (DV rational) of Judgement expresses the beauty and the function of the hōšen. Ephod designates a garment. A simple linen ephod was worn by priests (1 Kg 22:18) and the young Samuel (1 Kg 2:18), probably not very different from a loin-cloth since David could be called naked when wearing it (2 Kg 6:14, 20). The ephod of Gideon (Jg 8:27) is not described and was probably similar to that of Micah (Jg 17:5; 18:14 ff.), which is clearly distinguished from his idol and appears from its association with the teraphim and its consultation by the Danites (Jg 18:5-6) to have been used for oracular purposes like the ephod of the high-priest. There is a similar association of ephod and teraphim in Os 3:4. The teraphim are consulted in Ez 21:21. It follows therefore that the critical theory, which regards the high-priests' ephod as a post-exilic invention, arising out of an erroneous identification of an ephod-idol with an ephod-garment, has no foundation in the texts. Both ephod and hōšen were made of linen of various colours interwoven with gold thread. The former was a single piece of brocade of indeterminate length, covering breast, back and sides from the armpits downwards and attached more closely to the body by a band of the same material and of one piece with it. It had two shoulder-straps, adorned each at the top with a šōham stone, inscribed with the names of six of the tribes of Israel. The brocade of the hōšen was doubled so as to form a pouch or burse, one handbreath in length and width, adorned on the outer side with twelve precious stones on which the names of the twelve tribes were engraved. It had two gold rings on the outside in its upper corners and two on the inside in its lower ones. The former were attached by gold chains to gold rosettes on the tops of the shoulder-straps, the latter by blue ribbons to gold rings on their ends. The gold chains were visible, the blue ribbons invisible. The hōšen rested on the band of the ephod and covered the upper part of the breast. The twelve precious stones have not been definitely identified. The inscriptions on them and on the two šōham stones of the shoulder-straps were to remind Yahweh of his people whom the high-priest represented.

d In ancient times the vestment was regularly worn in seeking oracular responses from Yahweh by means of the Urim and Thummim contained in the hōšen. These were lots of stone or wood, signifying conventionally one an affirmative, the other a negative reply to a question asked, or one approbation, the other disapprobation of a course of action proposed. The names of the lots according to the Masoretic vocalization, lights and perfections, have no bearing on their use. It is plausibly suggested that the original forms were ōrtm from the root rr 'curse', and tōtm, from the root tm 'be innocent'. Sometimes no answer was given, a contingency usually provided for by a third lot, excluded here. It may be supposed that no lot or both lots together issued from the pouch in these cases. The reply given in the texts sometimes supposes several questions not recorded in detail. The oracle was consulted only by the high-priest in presence of the ruler when he required divine guidance in matters of grave public importance. There is no recorded instance of such a consultation after the time of David. Prophets were approached instead.

31-48 XXXIX 22-31 Other Vestments of the High-priest and Priestly Vestments—The high-priest wore also a blue linen robe, corresponding to the ordinary outer garment, called the robe of the ephod, a mitre or head-dress also of linen, a white linen tunic, corresponding to the ordinary inner garment, and a girdle or sash in linen of various colours by which the tunic was bound; the priests had no outer robe but were otherwise similarly though less ornately vested. 31-35. f The robe was of a single piece with apertures, one for the head, around which it was strengthened by a band, and two for the arms. It extended to the knees and was adorned at its extremities with pomegranates made of linen of various colours and little bells of gold arranged alternately. The object of the bells was later regarded as similar to that of the inscriptions on the precious stones (Ecclus 45:9), but the fact that they rang at the entrance to and exit from the Holy Place to protect the life of the high-priest implies that their ringing was originally intended to avert dangers from evil spirits. 36-38. The mitre was a kind of turban, similar to that worn by royalty, and specially adorned with a gold plate in front, attached by blue fillets and inscribed: 'Holy to Yahweh'. The inscription indicates that the high-priest is the offering of the people to Yahweh and thus atones in person for the offences committed by people and priests in making their offerings. 39. The linen tunic is not described. h Probably it extended to the feet, was provided with sleeves and was elaborately adorned. The girdle, according to tradition, encircled the body several times and had lengthy extremities which were thrown over the shoulders during ceremonies. The Hebrew name 'abnī is of Egyptian origin. 40-41. The vestments of the priests are not described, but were doubtless similar to the similarly named ones of the high-priest. As all served barefoot there is no mention of footgear. 42-43. The linen breeches were not regarded as a priestly vestment.

XXIX 1-37 Consecration of Aaron and his Sons—180a The actual consecration is narrated Lev 8:1-36. The offerings are first brought to the tabernacle. 3. For 'offer' read bring in the basket. The washing of Aaron and his sons which follows is an outward symbol of the internal purity required. 5-7. Aaron is then clothed with the vestments of the high-priest and the oil of unction is poured on his head. For 'linen garment' and 'tunic' read tunic and robe of the ephod, for 'girdle' band of the ephod. The plate is called diadem in MT. Render 7b and anoint him. 8-9. The sons of Aaron are also clothed with the priestly vestments and thus consecrated or installed in office. In Hebrew as in Assyro-Babylonian to fill the hands means 'to install in office'. The high-priest is specially designated as the anointed b priest (Lev 4:16; 21:10; Num 35:25). The anointing of other priests, not mentioned here or Lev 8, is clearly indicated (Ex 28:41; 30:30; 40:13; Lev 7:35; 10:7; Num 3:3). Some explain these texts as only implying that ordinary priests were radically anointed in their high-priest ancestor. Others suppose a modification in practice at a later period. This view is supported by the fact that some at least of the texts mentioned (Ex 28:41; 30:30) appear to be later additions. The sprinkling with blood and oil (21) may also have been regarded as a priestly anointing, though it was also enjoined for the recovered leper (Lev 14:14, 17). 10-14. The young bullock, a sin-offering, was next slain after Aaron and his sons had laid their hands on the victim's head in token of solidarity that it might be associated with them and expiate for them. The blood of the victim was first poured out on the horns and at the base of the altar to purify it; the fatty parts were then burned on the altar and the rest burned outside the camp. The flesh of sin-offerings was usually eaten by 180c the priests, but not, as in this case, when their own sins were expiated. 15-18. One of the rams is next offered as a holocaust. The ritual is the customary one: imposition of hands by those for whom the sacrifice is offered, slaughter of the victim, effusion of the blood round the altar, dissection, washing of entrails and feet and total destruction by fire on the altar. 19-28. The second is then slain as a peace-offering but with certain rites peculiar to the occasion. Usually all the blood was poured on the altar. Here part of it is first smeared on the tip of the right ear, the right thumb, and the right big toe of Aaron and his sons to remind them that they must always listen to God's holy voice, do holy works and walk in holy ways. The blood is now poured on the altar as usual. Some of it is next taken and with some of the oil of unction sprinkled on the persons and vestments of Aaron and his sons to sanctify them (cf. 24:8) and unite them to God more closely than the people. The fatty parts of the peace-offering were consumed on the altar; the breast and the right thigh (DV 'shoulder') were usually assigned to the priest and the rest of the victim provided a sacrificial meal for the offerers. Here, however, Moses as priest receives the breast only; the right thigh of the ram of installation is burned on the altar with the fatty parts and some of the bread offerings after they have been waved (DV 'elevated') by Aaron and his sons. 'Wave' has the general sense of 'offer' but its special sense appears in the expression breast of the wave offering (27, DV 'consecrated breast') as a movement of the offering towards God in the tabernacle and back again to the priestly offerer, signifying that it was God's gift to the priest; cf. §186k. The thigh is called the separation offering because separated from the people's part for the priest. 29-30. The direction that Aaron's vestments be given to his sons or descendants at their installation in office is explained as referring to the son or descendant who becomes high-priest in his stead, but may be an interpolation as it interrupts the ritual. 31-32. The sacrificial meal is cooked in a holy place and eaten at the entry of the tabernacle. 33. 'Stranger' means here not of a priestly or Levitical family. 34. What is not eaten before morning must be burned. 36-37. The sanctification of the altar by the sacrifice of a young steer is continued for seven days. The altar is most holy and cannot be touched with impunity. g 38-42 The Daily Burnt-offering—Morning and evening a lamb was offered as a holocaust accompanied by meal (nearly $\frac{1}{2}$ peck) mingled with oil (nearly 3 pints) and a libation of wine (nearly 3 pints). A morning minhah is attested (4 Kg 3:20) and a morning holocaust and evening minhah (4 Kg 16:15). Minhah is always a meal offering in legal texts but sometimes denotes also an animal offering in historical ones (cf. Gen 4:4), so that entire agreement of legislation and pre-exilic practice cannot be affirmed or denied. Lack of materials (cf. Jl 1:13) might excuse non-observance of this law. 43-46. The dwelling of Yahweh among his chosen people and the benefits which result from his presence form a fitting conclusion to the ritual laws and indicate the reward of their faithful observance. h XXX 1-XXXI 17 Supplement to the Ritual Legislation—This section contains important additions to the directions given in chh 25-9. As it follows the conclusion (29:43-46) it is obviously an addition but not necessarily made by a different author. i XXX 1-10 XXXVII 25-28 The Altar of Incense—It was made of the same materials as the Table, had a similar moulding on top and similar rings and staves for transport, was a cubit in length and breadth and two cubits in height. It was called the golden altar as distinguished from the bronze altar of holocausts, and like it had four horns. It was in the Holy Place before the veil and at its centre where it was in line with the Propitiatory. As the incense, offered morning and evening, was intended for the Holy of Holies, which it entered through the opening above the veil provided by the sloping roof, it belonged to the Holy of Holies (Heb 9:4) just as the incense-altar, in Solomon's temple, belonged to the Debir (3 Kg 6:22). 180d The order given (10) is ignored in the ritual of the Atonement-day (Lev 16). Offerings of incense, mentioned Lev 10:1; Num 16:6-7, were made with censers. It would seem therefore that an altar of incense was not prescribed in the original plan of the tabernacle. That does not mean however that it was not a Mosaic institution, much less that it is a post-exilic invention. Incense altars were used in Mesopotamia in the third millennium B.C. and have been found in Canaan at Megiddo and Ta'anak (8th cent. B.C.) and at Tell Beth Mirsim (10th cent. B.C.). There is no reason therefore to exclude even from Solomon's temple the incense-altar mentioned by the texts, notably 3 Kg 6:20; 7:48. 11-16 The Poll-tax—The ancient Hebrews like the Romans considered a census an encroachment on God's domain (2 Kg 24:10). The poll-tax however of half a shekel (about 1s. 3d.), imposed alike on rich and poor and devoted to the upkeep of the sanctuary, would legitimate it. The narrative implies the Mosaic origin of the poll-tax, but was written after the construction of the tabernacle, since the census is that of Num 1:1 ff. The plague (DV 'scourge', 12) is not necessarily a reference to 2 Kg 24, but is based on the same belief. 17-21 XXXVIII 8 The Bronze Laver—It is not described and is clearly a later institution since it was made from the bronze mirrors of the women who served at the entrance of the tabernacle and is not numbered among the bronze objects (38:29-31). A constant supply of water for the priests' ablutions would be difficult to procure in the desert. 22-38 XXXVII 29 Anointing Oil and Incense—1 The holy oil consisted of pure olive oil, mixed in fixed proportions with four spices—myrrh, calamus, cinnamon and cassia. Myrrh was an Arabian gum exuding from the balsamodendron myrrha and is described as flowing, interpreted by some, spontaneously exuding, by others, of choicest quality. The three other spices were obtained from odoriferous shrubs indigenous to south-eastern Asia and imported by Sabaeen merchants. The oil thus prepared was restricted in its use to the sacred persons and objects mentioned, but its ingredients could be used singly or mixed in different proportions for profane purposes. The incense, a gum imported by the Sabaeans, was also mixed with other ingredients, stacte, onyx and galbanum, and was seasoned with salt. The stacte and galbanum were gums exuding from trees indigenous to Palestine. The onyx was provided by a shell-fish found in the Red Sea. The mixture was reduced to powder, burned on the altar of incense, morning and evening, and only used for sacred purposes. The mention of the altar of incense and the laver shows that the passage is part of the later addition. XXXI 1-11 Beseech and Oollab—The chief constructors of the tabernacle and its furniture are here introduced. B'sal'el means 'in the protection of God', 'Oh 'liab' 'father's tent'. This passage is also late since the sacred objects enumerated include those of ch 30. 5. 'And in the hewing of stone for setting and in the hewing of wood for construction—in all kinds of work.' In 10, 'the finely wrought vestments, namely the holy vestments', the conjunction is explicative, not connective. n 12-17 XXXV 1-3 The Sabbath—Previous legislation on the Sabbath is here emphasized and amplified. As the passage has no connection with the tabernacle and its furniture it seems a later insertion. Originally therefore 18 followed 28:42, the conclusion of the directions given to Moses, after which he received the two tables of stone containing the decalogue. XXXII 1-35 XXXIII 1-6 The Golden Calf—181a The sin of the people is shown by their demand: 'Make us Elohim who shall go before us'. Elohim means 'God', when construed with a singular verb, but 'gods' when the verb is plural, except in a few cases which may be textual errors. Here the meaning 'gods' is determined by the plural verb and still more by b 1a. Read around for 'against'. 4a. Read with a graving tool for 'by founder's work'. God informs Moses on Sinai of the sin of the people. 8. The action and words of Aaron are attributed to the people since he carried out their demand. 9b. Read I see for 'see'. 10. God proposes to destroy the people and make of Moses a great nation, but in a manner (let me alone) which invites the intercession of Moses on their behalf. 11-16. Moses pleads for mercy to the people as required for the promotion of God's glory on earth and for the fulfilment of the promises made to the Patriarchs. Having obtained his request he descends from the mount with the two tables of stone, rejoins Josue and approaches the camp. 17-18. The noise heard suggests fighting to Josue to whom Moses replies : 'It is not the sound of the cry of might, and it is not the sound of the cry of defeat ; the sound of singing I hear'. 19-24. The anger of Moses on seeing the calf and the dancing is manifested by throwing down and breaking the two tables of stone and burning the calf which is ground into powder mixed with water to be drunk by the people. He reproaches Aaron, who pleads the wickedness of the people and repeats the facts narrated above. 25. And when Moses saw that the people had broken loose ; for Aaron had let them loose for a whispering among their enemies. He realized that the issue was between the worship of Yahweh from whom they had revolted and the worship of strange gods and that immediate action and severe measures were necessary if the worship of Yahweh was to prevail. 26-29. The Levites show their zeal for Yahweh and execute the orders of Moses, who says : 'You have consecrated yourselves [LXX, not 'consecrate yourselves' MT] to-day to Yahweh, yea each man with his son and with his brother, that he may give you to-day a blessing'. The subsequent choice of the Levites to minister in the sanctuary (Num 3:6 ff.) is here foreshadowed, and the victims of their zeal are likened to the sacrifices offered at their installation (Num 8:8).

181a the plural pronoun, these (4b), otherwise inexplicable. By asking for gods in the form of idols to lead them they show their abandonment of the leadership of Yahweh. Aaron weakly compromises. He makes an image of a young bull, like the Egyptian Apis and the Canaanite Baal, but by proclaiming a feast to Yahweh shows that he regards it as an image of Yahweh. Though he only made one image, he (LXX, not 'they' MT) said : These are thy gods (4b), meaning : this is my answer to your demand for gods. He remained loyal to Yahweh, but really debased him to the level of a pagan deity and led the people astray by violating the precept of 20:23.

d 30-35. Next day Moses intercedes for the people with Yahweh and manifests his wish to die—not, however, to be anathema like St Paul (Rom 9:3)—if pardon be refused. Yahweh refuses to accept the offering of his life or to remit entirely the sin of the people, but shows at least that he still regards them as his people by ordering Moses to lead them to the land of promise. The punishment of their sin is not remitted but postponed ; not Yahweh himself but an angel will guide them. XXXIII 1-6, Yahweh reiterates his refusal. The people show their grief and repentance by ceasing to wear their ornaments from some of which the golden calf had been made. Yahweh still refuses to lead them on the march : 'If I go up in the midst of you for one moment I shall destroy you', approves of their repentance and implies that its continued manifestation may render him more propitious towards them. The text of 33:1-6 is not in good order, but the general sense is clear.

e XXXIII 7-11 The Tent of Meeting or Oracle Tent—This tent was in constant use. And Moses used to take the tent of meeting, etc., where the tense of the verbs is frequentative. It is also mentioned Num 11:16 ff. ; 12:4 ff. and probably Deut 31:14 ff. It differs from the tabernacle or tent of testimony in its location outside, not in the centre of the camp ; in its minister Josue the Ephraimite, not the Levites ; in its small size since Moses, helped perhaps by Josue, carried 181e and pitched it, while many Levites and wagons were required for the transport of the tabernacle ; in its use for meeting Yahweh and obtaining administrative and judicial decisions from him, not for ritual functions like the tabernacle. The tent was therefore not a ceremonial, but an oracle tent, where Yahweh manifested himself and gave his decisions to Moses. It must have preceded the erection of the tabernacle but was not immediately superseded by it, as its object was different and such changes are usually gradual. The early Christians frequented the Jewish temple even after they possessed meeting-places of their own. Verses 7-11 have no connection with the context, which they interrupt, and record an isolated tradition of no little interest and value.

12-23 Moses' Final Intercession and Request to see God f

—Moses renews his request that Yahweh himself and not one of his angels accompany the people in their march. The last words of 5 left the matter doubtful, but gave an opening for further intercession. The words Thy face (13) mean 'thou thyself' and are so rendered (15). Moses first pleads on his own behalf and then on behalf of the people that he and they may be distinguished from (DV 'glorified by') all the people on the face of the earth by God's presence. The granting of his request emboldens him to a further demand to see the glory or the face of God. Such a vision, reserved for the future life, cannot be granted. But the figurative language of 21-23 indicates that a special knowledge of God was accorded to Moses superior to that given to other prophets, as we learn also from Num 12:7-8. 19b. 'I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and I will be merciful to whom I will be merciful', means that man has no claim to the gratuitous gifts of God, such as the favours accorded to Moses and the forgiveness accorded to the people, which he gives to whom he wills. St Paul cites this text to prove that the Jewish nation had no claim to the gratuitous gift of an efficacious call to the faith of Christ (Rom 9:15).

XXXIV 1-28 The Renewal of the Sinaitic Covenant— g

Moses is ordered to ascend the mount for the last time bringing with him two tables of stone on which Yahweh will write the ten commandments to be preserved in the Ark of the Covenant. When Yahweh appears in a cloud it is Moses who invokes him by name (5), but it is Yahweh who passes before Moses and proclaims who he is in one of the finest passages of the OT (6-7). 9. Moses makes three requests : reassurance of the favour already granted (33:14) that Yahweh will accompany the people notwithstanding their rebellious character, forgiveness of their sin, their reinstatement as the chosen people of Yahweh. Yahweh grants his requests by renewing the broken covenant. 10-11. He states first his own engagements briefly but comprehensively. 12-26. He then repeats the cultural obligations of the people taken from the Book of the Covenant, since it was in this matter they had sinned. 27-28. Finally he orders Moses to write down the words of the renewed covenant and he himself similarly renews the legislation of the decalogue by writing the ten commandments on the tables of stone. The sequence of thought is clear and consistent but the conclusion of the narrative is obscured by a gloss or corruption in the text. 28c. MT reads : And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments. The tables and the ten commandments naturally refer to the writing of Yahweh (1), the words of the covenant to the writing of Moses (27), but he wrote indicates only one writer, apparently Moses. The conclusion seems to be that either the original text, chronicling both writings, was abbreviated and obscured or that 28c is an unskilful gloss, since the execution of the promise (1) and the command (27) might well be taken for granted by the narrator. The critics have concluded from 28c, contrary to the manifest requirements of the context, that the laws of 12-26 were originally a cultural decalogue, the earliest form 181h of the Book of the Covenant. They are not agreed, however, as to the original form of this decalogue and cannot explain why the original book of the covenant, like the decalogue which it develops, should not contain both social and cultural laws.

- 1 12-16. The law prohibiting the worship of strange gods or religious harlotry, since Israel was the bride of Yahweh, is especially inculcated. Canaanite altars and the stone pillars representing Baal as well as the wooden poles (DV 'groves') symbolizing his consort, Asherah, erected before them, must be destroyed and there must be no alliances or intermarriages with the Canaanites to avoid the danger of religious contamination. Asherah, the goddess of fecundity, mentioned 3 Kg 15:13; 18:19; 4 Kg 21:7; 23:4 (DV 'grove'), and supposed to be a textual error for Astarte by many critics, is now well known from the Räs-Shamra tablets. The development of the law of the firstborn (20), taken from 13:13 and not in the Book of the Covenant, and the homiletic comment on the law of the annual pilgrimages (24) seem to be later additions.
- j 29-35 The Horns and the Veil—Horns are lightning flashes which accompany a theophany (Hab 3:4) and similarly here indicate not excrescences but rays of light. St Paul explains the phenomenon as meaning that the brightness of the face of Moses, produced by his intimate and prolonged intercourse with Yahweh, was insupportable to the Israelites and had to be concealed by a veil which he only removed when he spoke with God (2 Cor 3:7). The religious lesson conveyed is that the greater our union with and knowledge of God the more like to him we become 181j (2 Cor 3:18).

XXXV-XL Execution of the Ritual Precepts—This section narrates the execution of the commands given in chh 25-31. The order is different and there are additions, discussed when important in the preceding commentary. LXX has an order of its own and some omissions of which only the incense-altar is noteworthy. As the version is by a new and perhaps less careful translator, these omissions may be accidental, but the different order suggests that there were different forms of the Hebrew text in the 3rd cent. B.C. Unsettlement in the order of a text does not affect its general authenticity but may expose it to minor interpolations. There seems to be one such in this section (38:25-28) which begins: And the silver of them that were numbered of the congregation. A voluntary contribution for the erection of the tabernacle (25:2 f.) is here identified with an obligatory poll-tax for the upkeep of the sanctuary (30:16) based on a census made after the tabernacle was erected (Num 1:1 ff.) and computed at a population figure several times greater than that of Ex 12:37. This evaluation of the silver is manifestly inaccurate and must have been substituted for the original one similar in character to the gold and bronze evaluations (38:24; 29-31).

The book concludes magnificently with the manifestation of the glory of Yahweh in the newly erected tabernacle where he dwells among his chosen people and directs them on their march to the promised land.

LEVITICUS

By P. P. SAYDON

182a Bibliography—A complete list of commentaries from the patristic age down to the 19th cent. is given by R. Cornely, Historica et Critica Introductio in U. T. Libros sacros, II i, Parisii, 1897¹, 161–9 (CSS); A. Crampon, La Sainte Bible, I, Pentateuque, Paris, 1894; F. de Hummelauer, Comm. in Exod. et Levit., Parisii, 1897 (CSS)—abbreviated as Humm.; *A. R. S. Kennedy, Leviticus, CB, 1911; *A. T. Chapman-A. B. Streane, The Book of Leviticus, CBSC, 1914; L. C. Fillion, La Sainte Bible, I, Le Pentateuque, Paris, 1925¹; P. Heinisch, Das Buch Leviticus, BB, 1935; A. Clamer, art. Lévitique in DTC 9 (1926) 462–98 and Lévitique, Nombres, Deutéronome in La Sainte Bible, II, Paris, 1946; La Bibbia tradotta dai testi originali: Il Pentateuco, Milano, 1923 (the trans. of Leviticus is by A. Vaccari, S. J.).

On Sacrifice: F. X. Kortleitner, Archaeologia Biblica, Oeniponte, 1917, 291–354; A. Médebielle, L'Expiation dans l'Ancien et le Nouveau Testament, Rome, 1924 (on the cover but 1923 on the title-page); *G. B. Gray, Sacrifice in the Old Testament, Oxford, 1925.

For comparative purposes: M.-J. Lagrange, Etudes sur les Religions Sémitiques, Paris, 1903¹; *W. Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites, ed. by S. A. Cook, London, 1927¹; E. Dhorme, L'Evolution religieuse d'Israël, Bruxelles, 1937.

Other subsidiary works: *S. R. Driver, Introd. to the Literature of the Old Testament, Edinburgh, 1913¹; *A. Edersheim, The Temple, its Ministry and Services, London, no date¹.

b Title—Leviticus, the title of the third book of the Pentateuch, is derived through Vg from the LXX Λευιτικόν. Though the title may have been added by later editors, it is certainly very old and probably of pre-Christian origin (*H. B. Swete, An Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek, 215). In the Hebrew Bible it is called wayyiqra (St Jerome Vaicra) from its opening word. Leviticus is an appropriate title descriptive of the contents of the book which deals mainly with the Levites' duties in connection with the sacrificial worship. It was the liturgical book of the Israelites and may be compared to our Ritual.

c Contents—The contents of Leviticus fall into two main parts corresponding to the two aspects of God's relation to his people. Yahweh was the God of the Israelites whom he had called out of Egypt and adopted as his firstborn. He was a God infinitely holy, unapproachable by man (Ex 19:21; 24:2) and yet dwelling amidst his people (Lev 22:32; 26:12). As the supreme Lord of Israel he had the right to their obedience, reverence, love and worship, while his divine presence demanded of them such sanctity of life as would make them his worthy children (Lev 11:44 f.; 19:2; 20:26). Sacrificial worship and sanctity of life are therefore the two leading motives of Leviticus and a general description of its contents which are exhibited more particularly in the following paragraphs.

d Analysis and Structure—The book of Exodus carries the history of Israel down to the erection of the Tabernacle. But there was yet no system of laws regulating divine worship, nor any body of ritual prescriptions expressive of that sanctity of life which was the indispensable condition for fellowship with God.

The liturgical and ceremonial legislation implementing the narrative of Exodus is contained in Leviticus 182d which opens with a detailed description of all the forms of sacrifice (chh 1–7). Then follows an account of the priestly ordination of Aaron and his sons and their solemn entry upon office (chh 8 and 9). A short appendix stressing the necessity of sacerdotal sanctity is added (ch 10). Chh 11–15 deal with the distinction between cleanness and uncleanness and the ritual purification from uncleanness. Ch 16 describes the ceremonial of the Day of Atonement. Chh 17–26 constitute a well-defined body of laws to which the title 'Law of Holiness' has been appropriately given. Although the various groups of laws in this collection, and sometimes even the several laws, appear to be independent, their character is determined by the principle that holiness must be the distinguishing mark of Israel. They differ notably from the laws contained in the preceding chapters. Their outlook is broader, their range of application more extensive and more varied. Although the priesthood and the sacrificial worship are clearly in view, they do not occupy a central position as in chh 1–16. Ch 17 contains prescriptions on the slaughtering of animals for sacrifice and for food. Ch 18 deals with unlawful sexual intercourse. Ch 19 is a miscellaneous collection of ordinances of a religious, domestic, and social character. Ch 20 gives a punitive sanction for the offences specified in chh 18 and 19. Chh 21 and 22 extend the Law of Holiness to priests in their domestic life and in the performance of their sacerdotal duties. Ch 23 is a festal calendar indicating the days on which religious assemblies are to be held and prescribing the manner in which these days are to be observed. Ch 24 is an erratic block of miscellaneous ordinances interrupting the logical sequence of chh 23 and 25. Ch 25 relates the institution of the Sabbatical Year and of the Year of Jubilee. Apparently it is the sequel to ch 23; but on a closer examination the character of the institutions in the two chapters will be found to be completely different. The Sabbatical Year and the Jubilee Year are a social and an economic, rather than a liturgical, institution. No sacrificial offerings, no holy convocations, no abstinence from work are enjoined. Ch 26 is a hortatory speech cast in the style of Deut 28, and concluding the section chh 17–26. Ch 27 contains two appendices on vows and tithes respectively.

It appears from a first reading that Lev is not a complete and systematic exposition of the various laws regulating divine worship and the domestic and social life of Israel. It is rather the result of the combination of various partial collections of laws. The Law of Sacrifice (chh 1–7) formed certainly one collection with its proper superscription (1:1) and subscription (7:37). Chh 8–10 formed another collection. Chh 11–15 consist of minor collections logically, but not necessarily chronologically, related to each other. Ch 16 may have originally followed ch 10, but its position after chh 11–15 is more appropriate. Chh 17–26 formed one collection of laws made up of smaller groups characterized by a common style and phraseology and by the frequent insistence on holiness as the distinguishing mark of Israel. Ch 26 is probably the work of the compiler who closed the collection 17–25 with a hortatory discourse. The last 184h sin-offering if they are sins of human frailty, and by a trespass-offering if they are sins of ignorance; cf. P. P. Saydon, Sin-offering and trespass-offering, CBQ (1946) 393-8. Inexpiable sins are punishable by death or excommunication (Lev 7:25; 17:9, 10; 19:8; 20:3; etc.). See also § 183c.

185a IV 1-12 Expiatory Offerings for the High-Priest—If the high-priest commits a sin through ignorance involving the whole people in his sin (A. Vaccari, Il Pentateuco, 153), he shall bring a young bull to the Lord for the expiation of his sin and slay it at the entrance of the tabernacle. The characteristic features of the ritual of this sacrifice are the disposal of the blood and the consumption by fire of the victim outside the camp. Since blood was regarded as the seat of life (Lev 17:11), the sprinkling of blood towards the veil, which concealed the inaccessible throne of God, and the smearing of the horns of the altar were a symbolical representation of the sinner crying before God for mercy and forgiveness and for the re-establishment of friendly relations with him. No part of the flesh could be eaten either by the priest or by the people, everyone being ceremonially unclean (2). Nor could the victim be burnt on the altar because it was not a holocaust. St Paul draws a parallel between the victim of the expiatory offering burnt outside the camp and Christ who suffered outside the gate of Jerusalem (Heb 13:12).

b 13-21 Expiatory Offering for the Community—13 f. are, for syntactical reasons, translated thus: 'If the whole community of Israel sins through ignorance by doing something which the Lord commanded not to be done, and the thing is concealed from the eyes of the assembly, they are guilty; and when the sin becomes known to them, the assembly shall bring. . .' This is a material transgression of the law which must be expiated when it becomes known to the offender. The only difference in ritual from that described in 3-12 is that the rite of the imposition of hands is performed by the elders as representatives of the people. The identity of the ritual is a clear indication that the sin of the high-priest and that of the community were considered to be of equal gravity. 20b. 'And the priest will expiate for them.' Some sort of prayer may have formed part of the expiatory ritual.

c 22-26 Expiatory Offering for a Ruler—22 is translated on the same syntactical lines as 13 f.: 'If a prince sins by inadvertently doing something which the Lord, his God, commanded not to be done, he will incur guilt, and when he comes to know his sin, he shall bring. . .' The sin of a chief of a tribe being considered to be of a lesser gravity than that of the whole people the expiation is obviously simpler. The victim is a he-goat without blemish. The ritual is like that in 13-21. But no blood is brought inside the sanctuary. The fat is burnt on the altar, and what remains of the victim is eaten by the priests (6:25 f.).

d 27-35 Expiatory Offering for an ordinary Israelite—27 is also translated according to the same syntactical rules implied in 13, 22: 'If a man of the land sins inadvertently by doing something that the Lord commanded not to be done, he will incur guilt, and when he comes to know his sin, he shall offer. . .' The victim is either a she-goat or a ewe-lamb. The ritual is the same as that described in 24-26.

e V 1-13 Expiatory Sacrifices for Special Sins—This section specifies some particular offences for which an expiation is required. In ch 4 the expiation is considered in relation to the social condition of the offender; in 5:1-6:7 it is considered in relation to the offence. It is possible that all the sins enumerated in this section are sins of ignorance, though this is not expressly stated for all.

The first case (1) is that of a person who, having heard the curse uttered on an unknown offender, fails to reveal what he knows (cf. Humm. 383 who cites Jg 17:2 and Prov 29:24). He is guilty because he hinders the execution of justice. But as such reticence is generally due either to fear of vengeance or to an imperfect sense of duty, his sin is practically comparable to an unintentional sin.

The second case (2, 3) is that of a person who inadvertently touches the dead body of an unclean animal or an unclean person or something which man has rendered unclean. In all these cases such a person is really unclean. On unclean animals, see Lev 11 and on human uncleanness Lev 12-15.

The third case (4) is that of a person who swears rashly. A rash oath is a sin and needs expiation.

When a person, who has committed any one of the sins mentioned above, becomes conscious of his sin, he must first confess his sin (5). Then he shall bring for his sin-offering a lamb or a goat as in the cases contemplated in 4:27-35. The ritual is the same as in similar expiatory sacrifices. If, however, the offender is not able to provide either a lamb or a goat, he shall offer two turtle-doves or two pigeons, one for a sin-offering and the other for a holocaust. But if he cannot provide even two turtle-doves or two pigeons, he shall bring as a sin-offering the tenth part of an ephah (c. 7 pints; see § 82j and A.R.S. Kennedy, HDB, art. Weights and Measures, IV, 912) of fine flour without oil and frankincense which were excluded from all sin-offerings (Num 5:15). The ritual is that prescribed in 2:2, 3. A characteristic feature of the ritual of these expiatory sacrifices is the confession of the offender's sin accompanying the rite of imposition of hands. The confession of sins is expressly prescribed in this case (cf. Num 5:7) and in the ceremonial of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:21), but very probably it was a feature common to all expiatory sacrifices; cf. F. Zorell in VD 1 (1921) 35.

V 14-VI 7 Expiatory Sacrifices for Sins of Fraud against God and Man—When a person unlawfully retains or withholds what is due to God or to man, he shall offer an expiatory sacrifice, make good the damage caused to God or man and moreover pay a fine amounting to one-fifth of the value of the property unlawfully retained or withheld.

First case, 15-16. A person who inadvertently fails to present such things as are claimed by Yahweh, such as tithes and firstfruits, shall offer a ram without blemish worth as many shekels (15) as the priest considers due by the standard shekel of the sanctuary (=2s 9d, cf. A. R. S. Kennedy, HDB, art. Money, III, 421-23). He shall also restore in full God's property and an additional fifth part of its value. These payments were made to the priests, God's representatives. On tithes and firstfruits, see Lev 27:30-33; Num 15:16-21; 18:8-24; 28:26; Deut 14:22-29; 15:19-23; 26:1-15.

Second case, 17-19. It does not appear to what particular case of fraud this article of law refers. Humm. (p 387), following St Augustine, believes that the offence referred to in 17 are those made against the temple, the priests and the holy vessels, for which no restitution was required. One fails to see the reason for this distinction. A. Vaccari, 156, distinguishes between sins of omission (15) and sins of commission (17). But in this case the offering of a ram would hardly be enough. It is probable that 17-19 do not refer to any particular case, but contain a general statement which receives further determination in the cases contemplated in 6:1-7.

Third case VI:1-7. If a person withholds a deposit or a pledge or extorts something by force, or finds a thing that has been lost and denies it, and swears falsely that he has committed none of these acts of injustice, he has incurred guilt and shall give back in full to its rightful owner the thing itself together with one fifth of its value. And for his expiation he shall bring a ram without blemish of a certain value.

VI 8-VII 38 Supplementary Regulations concerning the Various Sacrifices.

8-13 The holocaust—Apart from private holocausts and those offered publicly on festivals, the law prescribed that two holocausts should be offered daily, one in the morning and the other in the evening

186a (Ex 29:38-42; Num 28:3-8). It is the daily evening holocaust that the law refers to in 6:9. It was offered 'between the two evenings' (Num 28:4), that is, according to later Jewish practice, between the afternoon and the evening (Jos. Ant. 14, 4, 3 'about the ninth hour', i.e. 3 pm; cf. also Edersheim, 116). This holocaust is to be kept burning on a slow fire all night. As many sacrifices were offered during the day, the law, by this prescription of a night-long sacrifice, provided that there should not be a single moment in which a sacrifice was not offered to God, foreshadowing in this manner the sacrifice of the New Law which is offered at all times in all parts of the world. The fire on the altar must never be allowed to go out, and the priests must take care to put on fresh wood every morning. According to 9:24 this perpetual fire had a miraculous origin. It signifies God's perpetual presence among his people and has its Christian counterpart in the oil lamp continually burning in our Churches before the Blessed Sacrament.

b 14-18 Meal Offerings—Cf. ch 2. They are presented through the ministry of the priests but not necessarily on their own account. The ritual is that prescribed in ch 2. They must be eaten in the tabernacle and cannot be taken away. As holiness is considered to be communicable through contact, any person or thing that touches the sacred oblations becomes holy and must have the holiness washed out by means of certain ablutions before returning to the ordinary business of life (cf. M.-J. Lagrange, 149; W. R. Smith, 446). Only the male descendants of Aaron could eat of them.

c 19-23 The High-Priest's Oblation—According to later Jewish practice the high-priest, at his own expense, offered an oblation twice a day. It was made of flour mingled with oil and gently baked by the fire; he brought the half of it to the fire in the morning, and the other half at night (Jos. Ant. 3, 10, 7). The words 'in the day of their anointing' (20) very probably must be taken in the sense of 'On that day and onwards'. For a similar meaning of the expression 'in the day of', cf. 7:35. Vaccari, 157, restricts the meaning of the word 'perpetual' (Heb. tāmīd) to the seven days of the priestly ordination ceremony (Ex 29:35; Lev 8:33). But the word tāmīd is a technical term denoting the daily perpetual sacrifice. As this oblation was made by the high-priest, it could not be consumed either by himself or the priests, who were inferior to him, and therefore it had to be entirely burnt.

d 24-30 The Sin-offering—It was a most holy offering and was therefore to be eaten in a holy place, i.e. in the court of the tabernacle. The officiating priest naturally called other priests to share in the sacred meal, as is implied in 29, because it was impossible that any one man could consume such a quantity of meat in one meal. Its holiness could be communicated through contact; see §186b. The regulation concerning the sacred meal did not apply to the cases when blood was brought inside the sanctuary (4:1-21) and to the expiatory sacrifice on the Day of Atonement.

e VII 1-7 The Trespass-offering—There is a close similarity between the ritual of the sin-offering and that of the trespass-offering. The words 'the same shall be the law of both these sacrifices' (7) must be restricted to the concluding part of the verse, that is, in both sacrifices what remains of the victim belongs to the officiating priest.

f 8-10 Priests' Dues from Other Offerings—The skin of the burnt-offering belonged to the ministrant. In the Carthaginian table of sacrificial fees the skin is also assigned to the priest (G. A. Cooke, A Text-book of North Semitic Inscriptions, Oxford, 1903, 123), but at Marseilles it went to the offerer (Cooke, 112). As regards the meal-offerings a distinction is made between cooked offerings, as those mentioned in 2:4-10, and uncooked offerings, whether mingled with oil or dry, as those specified in 2:14-17 and 5:11. The former went to the officiating priest, the latter were divided between all the sons of Aaron in equal portions. The reason for this different assignment was that the uncooked offerings were usually so abundant that they could not be consumed by one man (Crampon, 367).

11-21 The Peace-offering—The Levitical liturgy distinguishes three kinds of peace-offerings, or rather three reasons for which peace-offerings are brought: (i) thank-offerings or 'sacrifices of praise' (Ps 49:14, 23; Ps 106:22); (ii) vow-offerings made in fulfilment of a vow (Ps 60:9; 65:13, 14); (iii) free-will offerings (Ps 53:8). There are some slight differences in the ritual of these various offerings. If it is a thank-offering, the offerer is to bring, besides the victim (omitted by Vg), unleavened cakes mingled with oil, unleavened wafers smeared with oil and fine flour well mixed and made into cakes mingled with oil. He shall also bring leavened bread which, however, is not presented on the altar (2:11), but is simply handed over to the priest and is intended for the sacrificial meal. The offerer presents one of each kind of cakes as a contribution (14) to Yahweh which goes to the priest who pours the blood of the victim. The remaining cakes go to the offerer. After the sacrifice has been offered, that is, after the portions reserved to the Lord have been burnt on the altar and the priest has taken his share of the flesh and the cakes, the offerer together with his relatives and friends sits at meal in the neighbourhood of the sanctuary. The whole of the flesh must be consumed on that day. In the case of vow- and free-will offerings the flesh may be eaten also on the following day. Only one day was allowed for the consumption of the thank-offering probably because the occasion being certainly a happy one, the offerer had to invite a number of guests such as would consume the whole of the flesh in one day and at the same time add to the festive character of the sacred meal. But vow- and free-will offerings were more of a private matter; there was no special reason for rejoicing and the flesh therefore could be consumed by fewer guests and in a longer time. But in no case was it permissible to eat the flesh on the third day. If any flesh was left over after the second day, it was to be burnt. Any eating on the third day rendered the sacrifice unacceptable, and in the case of a vow-offering the offerer would have to offer another sacrifice. Sacrificial meat could not be eaten after the second day because after the second day the flesh begins to go bad and becomes unfit for consumption. Such is the sanctity of the sacrificial meat that if it is brought into contact with anything that is unclean, it cannot be eaten but must be burnt; and if it is eaten by an unclean person, that person shall be cut off from his people. The expression 'to be cut off from one's people', used in a religious sense, is a technical expression for excommunication or exclusion from all the privileges and blessings granted by God to the Israelites. But in some cases the death penalty is meant.

22-27 The Use of the Fat and Blood of Animals—This is an abridged repetition, with some new details, of the regulations in ch 3 concerning the use of fat and blood. In ch 3 it is laid down that specified fatty parts of the peace-offering are to be burnt upon the altar; here it is forbidden to eat these parts, whether the animal (ox, sheep or goat) is killed as a sacrifice or for human consumption. They must always be brought before the Lord. In the case of other animals killed for human consumption it is not said what use the Israelites could make of the fat. As the Levitical legislator is concerned solely with the sacred offerings, this omission is easily accounted for. In the case of an animal, ox, sheep or goat, which dies of itself or is torn by some beast, it was allowed to make use of the fat but not to eat it. The prohibition of blood is more general. It extends to quadrupeds and fowls, and no distinction is made whether they are killed as sacrifice or for human consumption, or whether they die a natural death or are torn by a beast. Any person 184h sin-offering if they are sins of human frailty, and by a trespass-offering if they are sins of ignorance; cf. P. P. Saydon, Sin-offering and trespass-offering, CBQ (1946) 393-8. Inexpiable sins are punishable by death or excommunication (Lev 7:25; 17:9, 10; 19:8; 20:3; etc.). See also § 183c.

185a IV 1-12 Expiatory Offerings for the High-Priest—If the high-priest commits a sin through ignorance involving the whole people in his sin (A. Vaccari, Il Pentateuco, 153), he shall bring a young bull to the Lord for the expiation of his sin and slay it at the entrance of the tabernacle. The characteristic features of the ritual of this sacrifice are the disposal of the blood and the consumption by fire of the victim outside the camp. Since blood was regarded as the seat of life (Lev 17:11), the sprinkling of blood towards the veil, which concealed the inaccessible throne of God, and the smearing of the horns of the altar were a symbolical representation of the sinner crying before God for mercy and forgiveness and for the re-establishment of friendly relations with him. No part of the flesh could be eaten either by the priest or by the people, everyone being ceremonially unclean (2). Nor could the victim be burnt on the altar because it was not a holocaust. St Paul draws a parallel between the victim of the expiatory offering burnt outside the camp and Christ who suffered outside the gate of Jerusalem (Heb 13:12).

b 13-21 Expiatory Offering for the Community—13 f. are, for syntactical reasons, translated thus: 'If the whole community of Israel sins through ignorance by doing something which the Lord commanded not to be done, and the thing is concealed from the eyes of the assembly, they are guilty; and when the sin becomes known to them, the assembly shall bring...' This is a material transgression of the law which must be expiated when it becomes known to the offender. The only difference in ritual from that described in 3-12 is that the rite of the imposition of hands is performed by the elders as representatives of the people. The identity of the ritual is a clear indication that the sin of the high-priest and that of the community were considered to be of equal gravity. 20b. 'And the priest will expiate for them.' Some sort of prayer may have formed part of the expiatory ritual.

c 22-26 Expiatory Offering for a Ruler—22 is translated on the same syntactical lines as 13 f.: 'If a prince sins by inadvertently doing something which the Lord, his God, commanded not to be done, he will incur guilt, and when he comes to know his sin, he shall bring...' The sin of a chief of a tribe being considered to be of a lesser gravity than that of the whole people the expiation is obviously simpler. The victim is a he-goat without blemish. The ritual is like that in 13-21. But no blood is brought inside the sanctuary. The fat is burnt on the altar, and what remains of the victim is eaten by the priests (6:25 f.).

d 27-35 Expiatory Offering for an ordinary Israelite—27 is also translated according to the same syntactical rules implied in 13, 22: 'If a man of the land sins inadvertently by doing something that the Lord commanded not to be done, he will incur guilt, and when he comes to know his sin, he shall offer...' The victim is either a she-goat or a ewe-lamb. The ritual is the same as that described in 24-26.

e V 1-13 Expiatory Sacrifices for Special Sins—This section specifies some particular offences for which an expiation is required. In ch 4 the expiation is considered in relation to the social condition of the offender; in 5:1-6:7 it is considered in relation to the offence. It is possible that all the sins enumerated in this section are sins of ignorance, though this is not expressly stated for all.

The first case (1) is that of a person who, having heard the curse uttered on an unknown offender, fails to reveal what he knows (cf. Humm. 383 who cites Jg 17:2 and Prov 29:24). He is guilty because he hinders the execution of justice. But as such reticence is generally due either to fear of vengeance or to an imperfect sense of duty, his sin is practically comparable to an unintentional sin. 185e

The second case (2, 8) is that of a person who inadvertently touches the dead body of an unclean animal or an unclean person or something which man has rendered unclean. In all these cases such a person is really unclean. On unclean animals, see Lev 11 and on human uncleanness Lev 12-15.

The third case (4) is that of a person who swears rashly. A rash oath is a sin and needs expiation.

When a person, who has committed any one of the sins mentioned above, becomes conscious of his sin, he must first confess his sin (5). Then he shall bring for his sin-offering a lamb or a goat as in the cases contemplated in 4:27-35. The ritual is the same as in similar expiatory sacrifices. If, however, the offender is not able to provide either a lamb or a goat, he shall offer two turtle-doves or two pigeons, one for a sin-offering and the other for a holocaust. But if he cannot provide even two turtle-doves or two pigeons, he shall bring as a sin-offering the tenth part of an ephah (c. 7 pints; see § 82j and A.R.S. Kennedy, HDB, art. Weights and Measures, IV, 912) of fine flour without oil and frankincense which were excluded from all sin-offerings (Num 5:15). The ritual is that prescribed in 2:2, 3. A characteristic feature of the ritual of these expiatory sacrifices is the confession of the offender's sin accompanying the rite of imposition of hands. The confession of sins is expressly prescribed in this case (cf. Num 5:7) and in the ceremonial of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:21), but very probably it was a feature common to all expiatory sacrifices; cf. F. Zorell in VD 1 (1921) 35.

V 14-VI 7 Expiatory Sacrifices for Sins of Fraud against God and Man—When a person unlawfully retains or withholds what is due to God or to man, he shall offer an expiatory sacrifice, make good the damage caused to God or man and moreover pay a fine amounting to one-fifth of the value of the property unlawfully retained or withheld.

First case, 15-16. A person who inadvertently fails to present such things as are claimed by Yahweh, such as tithes and firstfruits, shall offer a ram without blemish worth as many shekels (15) as the priest considers due by the standard shekel of the sanctuary (= 28 gd, cf. A. R. S. Kennedy, HDB, art. Money, III, 421-23). He shall also restore in full God's property and an additional fifth part of its value. These payments were made to the priests, God's representatives. On tithes and firstfruits, see Lev 27:30-33; Num 15:16-21; 18:8-24; 28:26; Deut 14:22-29; 15:19-23; 26:1-15.

Second case, 17-19. It does not appear to what particular case of fraud this article of law refers. Humm. (p 387), following St Augustine, believes that the offence referred to in 17 are those made against the temple, the priests and the holy vessels, for which no restitution was required. One fails to see the reason for this distinction. A. Vaccari, 156, distinguishes between sins of omission (15) and sins of commission (17). But in this case the offering of a ram would hardly be enough. It is probable that 17-19 do not refer to any particular case, but contain a general statement which receives further determination in the cases contemplated in 6:1-7.

Third case VI:1-7. If a person withholds a deposit or a pledge or extorts something by force, or finds a thing that has been lost and denies it, and swears falsely that he has committed none of these acts of injustice, he has incurred guilt and shall give back in full to its rightful owner the thing itself together with one fifth of its value. And for his expiation he shall bring a ram without blemish of a certain value.

VI 8-VII 38 Supplementary Regulations concerning the Various Sacrifices. 185a

8-13 The holocaust—Apart from private holocausts and those offered publicly on festivals, the law prescribed that two holocausts should be offered daily, one in the morning and the other in the evening

186a (Ex 29:38-42; Num 28:3-8). It is the daily evening holocaust that the law refers to in 6:9. It was offered 'between the two evenings' (Num 28:4), that is, according to later Jewish practice, between the afternoon and the evening (Jos. Ant. 14, 4, 3 'about the ninth hour', i.e. 3 pm; cf. also Edersheim, 116). This holocaust is to be kept burning on a slow fire all night. As many sacrifices were offered during the day, the law, by this prescription of a night-long sacrifice, provided that there should not be a single moment in which a sacrifice was not offered to God, foreshadowing in this manner the sacrifice of the New Law which is offered at all times in all parts of the world. The fire on the altar must never be allowed to go out, and the priests must take care to put on fresh wood every morning. According to 9:24 this perpetual fire had a miraculous origin. It signifies God's perpetual presence among his people and has its Christian counterpart in the oil lamp continually burning in our Churches before the Blessed Sacrament.

b 14-18 Meal Offerings—Cf. ch 2. They are presented through the ministry of the priests but not necessarily on their own account. The ritual is that prescribed in ch 2. They must be eaten in the tabernacle and cannot be taken away. As holiness is considered to be communicable through contact, any person or thing that touches the sacred oblations becomes holy and must have the holiness washed out by means of certain ablutions before returning to the ordinary business of life (cf. M.-J. Lagrange, 149; W. R. Smith, 446). Only the male descendants of Aaron could eat of them.

c 19-23 The High-Priest's Oblation—According to later Jewish practice the high-priest, at his own expense, offered an oblation twice a day. It was made of flour mingled with oil and gently baked by the fire; he brought the half of it to the fire in the morning, and the other half at night (Jos. Ant. 3, 10, 7). The words 'in the day of their anointing' (20) very probably must be taken in the sense of 'On that day and onwards'. For a similar meaning of the expression 'in the day of', cf. 7:35. Vaccari, 157, restricts the meaning of the word 'perpetual' (Heb. tāmīd) to the seven days of the priestly ordination ceremony (Ex 29:35; Lev 8:33). But the word tāmīd is a technical term denoting the daily perpetual sacrifice. As this oblation was made by the high-priest, it could not be consumed either by himself or the priests, who were inferior to him, and therefore it had to be entirely burnt.

d 24-30 The Sin-offering—It was a most holy offering and was therefore to be eaten in a holy place, i.e. in the court of the tabernacle. The officiating priest naturally called other priests to share in the sacred meal, as is implied in 29, because it was impossible that any one man could consume such a quantity of meat in one meal. Its holiness could be communicated through contact; see §186b. The regulation concerning the sacred meal did not apply to the cases when blood was brought inside the sanctuary (4:1-21) and to the expiatory sacrifice on the Day of Atonement.

e VII 1-7 The Trespass-offering—There is a close similarity between the ritual of the sin-offering and that of the trespass-offering. The words 'the same shall be the law of both these sacrifices' (7) must be restricted to the concluding part of the verse, that is, in both sacrifices what remains of the victim belongs to the officiating priest.

f 8-10 Priests' Dues from Other Offerings—The skin of the burnt-offering belonged to the ministrant. In the Carthaginian table of sacrificial fees the skin is also assigned to the priest (G. A. Cooke, A Text-book of North Semitic Inscriptions, Oxford, 1903, 123), but at Marseilles it went to the offerer (Cooke, 112). As regards the meal-offerings a distinction is made between cooked offerings, as those mentioned in 2:4-10, and uncooked offerings, whether mingled with oil or dry, as those specified in 2:14-17 and 5:11. The former went to the officiating priest, the latter were divided between all the sons of Aaron in equal portions. The reason for this different assignment was that the uncooked offerings were usually so abundant that they could not be consumed by one man (Crampon, 367).

11-21 The Peace-offering—The Levitical liturgy distinguishes three kinds of peace-offerings, or rather three reasons for which peace-offerings are brought: (i) thank-offerings or 'sacrifices of praise' (Ps 49:14, 23; Ps 106:22); (ii) vow-offerings made in fulfilment of a vow (Ps 60:9; 65:13,14); (iii) free-will offerings (Ps 53:8). There are some slight differences in the ritual of these various offerings. If it is a thank-offering, the offerer is to bring, besides the victim (omitted by Vg), unleavened cakes mingled with oil, unleavened wafers smeared with oil and fine flour well mixed and made into cakes mingled with oil. He shall also bring leavened bread which, however, is not presented on the altar (2:11), but is simply handed over to the priest and is intended for the sacrificial meal. The offerer presents one of each kind of cakes as a contribution (14) to Yahweh which goes to the priest who pours the blood of the victim. The remaining cakes go to the offerer. After the sacrifice has been offered, that is, after the portions reserved to the Lord have been burnt on the altar and the priest has taken his share of the flesh and the cakes, the offerer together with his relatives and friends sits at meal in the neighbourhood of the sanctuary. The whole of the flesh must be consumed on that day. In the case of vow- and free-will offerings the flesh may be eaten also on the following day. Only one day was allowed for the consumption of the thank-offering probably because the occasion being certainly a happy one, the offerer had to invite a number of guests such as would consume the whole of the flesh in one day and at the same time add to the festive character of the sacred meal. But vow- and free-will offerings were more of a private matter; there was no special reason for rejoicing and the flesh therefore could be consumed by fewer guests and in a longer time. But in no case was it permissible to eat the flesh on the third day. If any flesh was left over after the second day, it was to be burnt. Any eating on the third day rendered the sacrifice unacceptable, and in the case of a vow-offering the offerer would have to offer another sacrifice. Sacrificial meat could not be eaten after the second day because after the second day the flesh begins to go bad and becomes unfit for consumption. Such is the sanctity of the sacrificial meat that if it is brought into contact with anything that is unclean, it cannot be eaten but must be burnt; and if it is eaten by an unclean person, that person shall be cut off from his people. The expression 'to be cut off from one's people', used in a religious sense, is a technical expression for excommunication or exclusion from all the privileges and blessings granted by God to the Israelites. But in some cases the death penalty is meant.

22-27 The Use of the Fat and Blood of Animals—This is an abridged repetition, with some new details, of the regulations in ch 3 concerning the use of fat and blood. In ch 3 it is laid down that specified fatty parts of the peace-offering are to be burnt upon the altar; here it is forbidden to eat these parts, whether the animal (ox, sheep or goat) is killed as a sacrifice or for human consumption. They must always be brought before the Lord. In the case of other animals killed for human consumption it is not said what use the Israelites could make of the fat. As the Levitical legislator is concerned solely with the sacred offerings, this omission is easily accounted for. In the case of an animal, ox, sheep or goat, which dies of itself or is torn by some beast, it was allowed to make use of the fat but not to eat it. The prohibition of blood is more general. It extends to quadrupeds and fowls, and no distinction is made whether they are killed as sacrifice or for human consumption, or whether they die a natural death or are torn by a beast. Any person j 23-34 The Priests' Share of the Peace-offering—It has been said above (12-14) that a portion of the oblation accompanying the peace-offering went to the priest. Now the law specifies which parts of the peace-offering itself fell to the priest. 29-32. 'He who offers to the Lord his peace-offering, shall bring an offering of his sacrifice to the Lord. His own hands shall bring the fire-offering of the Lord; he shall bring the fat with the breast—the breast to be waved before the Lord. And the priest shall burn the fat upon the altar, but the breast shall be Aaron's and his sons. And you shall give the right thigh of your peace-offerings as a contribution to the priest.' These verses supplement the ritual prescribed in ch 3. After having slain the victim, the offerer takes the fat and the breast upon his hands and carries them before the Lord, that is, to the altar. There the priest takes the fat to burn on the altar. Whether some ritual was prescribed for the presentation of the fat is not apparent, but in 8:26 f. the fat is said to be waved before the Lord.

186] who transgresses either of these laws shall be excommunicated; cf. 21. See also Lev 17:10-14.

k The rite of waving, which is certainly prescribed for the breast of the victim, consisted in swinging the offering towards the altar and back again with the hands of the offerer resting upon the hands of the priest. The forward motion was a symbolical declaration that those portions were given to God, while the backward motion signified that the gift was returned by God and assigned to his representative, the priest. This ceremony was so characteristic of certain offerings that the word ḥnūpāh 'waving' became a liturgical term denoting a wave-offering in general, or, in particular, the breast of the wave-offering (10:15). Another due of the priests was the right thigh of the victim, Heb. ḥrūmāh 'a lifting up', hence what is separated from the rest and raised up as a contribution. Probably the ḥrūmāh was a liturgical rite with a religious significance analogous to that of the waving rite. Compare the analogous rite of the Offertory in the Mass.

l Although the Levitical law expressly assigned to the priests the breast and the right thigh of all peace-offerings, usage may have varied from time to time. The Deuteronomic law gives the priest 'the shoulder, the two cheeks and the stomach' (18:3). From 1 Kg 2:13 ff. it appears that priests claimed more than the shoulder and the right thigh.

m 35-38 Conclusion—This is the conclusion of the section 6:8-7:34 dealing with the priestly dues. The Heb. word for 'anointing' in 35 (AV and RV anointing-portion) should very probably be rendered 'fixed or measured portion', the Heb. word mišhāh, which literally means 'anointing', being probably related to Assyrian mašāhu 'to measure', mašihu 'specific measure' of grain, dates, etc. (Muss-Arnolt, A Concise Dictionary of the Assyrian Language.) The word occurs again with the same meaning in Num 18:8. For DV 'in the ceremonies' read with Heb. 'from the fire-offering'. This right the priests begin to enjoy from the day of their priestly ordination, and they will continue to enjoy it for ever as the Lord has commanded; see chh 8-10.

n 37-38 General Conclusion—These verses are very probably a general conclusion of the whole section dealing with sacrifice (chh 1-7), though the order in which the various sacrifices are enumerated in 37, holocaust, oblation, sin-offering, trespass-offering, consecration-offering and peace-offerings agrees with 6:8-7:34 more than with chh 1-6.

187a 2 Institution of the Aaronic Priesthood (chh 8-10)—It is difficult to establish the chronological sequence of this section and the law of sacrifice (chh 1-7). The two are interrelated. The sacrificial legislation requires the priestly service and, on the other hand, the institution of the priesthood presupposes the existence of an organic body of sacrificial laws. The Israelites, even before the Sinaitic legislation, had their own sacrificial system (Ex 3:12, 18; 5:1, 3; etc.) which was further developed when the priesthood became a permanent institution.

VIII 1-36 The Consecration of Aaron and his Sons b—The instructions given in Ex 29 are here carried into effect. As the account of the consecration agrees almost verbally with Ex 29, we shall limit ourselves to a brief exposition of the ceremony referring the reader to the commentary on Exodus for a fuller explanation.

1-4 Introduction = Ex 29:1-3—Moses, accompanied by the congregation of Israel, leads Aaron and his sons to the entrance of the tabernacle carrying with him the sacred vestments, the anointing oil, the young bull for the sin-offering, the two rams and the basket of unleavened bread. The anointing oil is not mentioned in Ex 29:1-3 but in 7. The congregation has no part in Ex 29.

5-6 The Washing = Ex 29:4—Bodily cleanliness as a sign of internal purity is an indispensable condition before approaching the altar.

7-9 The Vesting = Ex 29:5, 6—The Urim and Thummim, DV 'Doctrine and Truth', are not mentioned in Ex 29:5, 6 but in Ex 28:30.

10-12 The Anointing of the Tabernacle and Aaron f—The anointing of the tabernacle and the sacred vessels is prescribed in Ex 30:26-28 and 40:9-11, but not in Ex 29. There is hardly any reason for rejecting 10b, 11 as an interpolation. The anointing of the tabernacle and that of Aaron are probably independent of each other and may have been prescribed on different occasions, but in point of fact they can hardly be separated as we cannot conceive of a consecrated tabernacle without consecrated priests and vice versa. For 12 cf. Ex 29:7.

13 The Vesting of Aaron's Sons = Ex 29:8, 9. g

14-17 The Sin-offering = Ex 29:10-14—The ritual is that prescribed in Lev 4:4-12, with the omission of the sprinkling of blood against the veil and the smearing of the horns of the altar of incense. In 15b it is expressly stated that the smearing of the horns of the altar of holocausts with blood had the effect of purifying, literally 'removing the sin from', the altar and sanctifying it. This sin-offering, unlike that of Lev 4:1-12, is not intended to expiate any particular sin or sins of Aaron's, but only as an indispensable requisite of holiness demanded of all the ministers of the altar. 18-21 The Holocaust = Ex 29:15-18—The ritual is that prescribed in Lev 1:10-13. After having purified and sanctified himself by the sin-offering, Aaron devotes himself entirely to God's service offering a holocaust. h

22-32 The Ram of Consecration = Ex 29:19-34—j This sacrifice is called 'the consecration sacrifice' (22, 28, 29) on account of the occasion on which it was offered. The Heb. word for consecration here is millū'im, which is derived from the verb millē 'to fill', which gave rise to the expression millē yād lit. 'to fill the hand' and as a liturgical expression 'to confer the power, to institute to a priestly office' hence 'to consecrate'. Therefore millū'im is 'institution to the priesthood, consecration'. But the fundamental idea conveyed by the word is the conferment of a certain power; cf. P. Joüon in Bi (1922) 64-6. Though the occasion of the sacrifice gives it a special character, certain features, such as the apportionment of the priestly dues, make it resemble a peace-offering.

When Moses, who on that occasion held the office of the officiating high-priest, had slain the second ram, he smeared with its blood the tip of Aaron's right ear, the thumb of his right hand and the great toe of his right foot, afterwards applying the blood to Aaron's sons in the same manner. The smearing of these organs with blood signified that 'the ear must be attentive to the commands of God, the hand ready to do his will, the foot prepared to walk in his ways', Chapman-Streane, 48. Then Moses poured the rest of the blood round over the altar and took the fat, the right thigh, one unleavened cake, one cake of oiled 187k bread and one wafer, putting the cakes upon the meat and placing everything on the hands of Aaron and his sons and then waving them before the Lord. Afterwards Moses took back all these things and burnt them on the altar, upon the burning holocaust as a sweet odour to the Lord. Then he waved the breast before the Lord and appropriated it as his priestly due. According to Lev 7:32 the right thigh too is reserved to the officiating priest, but Moses' portion was the breast only, the reason probably being that when priests were numerous it was but natural that they should have a more substantial share of the sacrifice, but when Moses alone could partake of the sacred meal a smaller portion may have been considered sufficient.

l The sacrifice being over, Moses sprinkled Aaron and his sons and their garments with oil and blood. The sprinkling with oil, though in strict conformity with the injunctions of Ex 29:21, raises some difficulties. There is no apparent reason why Aaron should be sprinkled with oil after having been anointed (12), nor is it clear whether there was only one sprinkling with blood and oil mingled together, or two separate sprinklings. The difficulty would disappear if we removed from the text of Ex 29:21 and Lev 8:30 the words 'the anointing oil' as an interpolation, but the excision is hardly justified.

Aaron and his sons having thus received investiture as God's ministers, it was natural that they should rejoice before the Lord. Accordingly Moses ordered them to cook what remained of the second ram and to eat it together with the remaining bread.

ma 33-36 Duration of the Consecration Ceremony—Cf. Ex 29:35-37. The ceremony described above was to be repeated for seven consecutive days. During this time they were to abide at the entrance of the tabernacle performing the special service prescribed to them. It was only after seven days of uninterrupted preparations in the seclusion of the tabernacle that the priests were entirely purified and became fit to perform their priestly duties.

n IX 1-24 The Inauguration of Aaron's Priestly Service—The day after the seven days' consecratory ceremonies Aaron assisted by his sons solemnly offered his first sacrifices. From this time onward Moses no longer exercises any priestly function, all ecclesiastical powers being concentrated in Aaron and his successors. Aaron first offered his own expiatory sacrifice with the ritual prescribed in 4:4-12, with the exception of the imposition of hands and the sprinkling of the blood against the veil. It must be remarked that Aaron had not yet been solemnly introduced into the inner sanctuary. After the holocaust, offered with the same ritual as in 1:10-13, there followed the sacrifices of the people. Aaron brought first the he-goat (15), 'and offered it as a sin-offering, as the first one'. The oblation was burnt upon the altar (17), 'beside the morning holocaust'. The last words are an allusion either to the holocaust which had been burnt that very morning or to the daily perpetual holocaust (Ex 29:38-42; Num 28:3-8). In the latter case either the words are a later gloss or the account was written when the morning sacrifice had become a regular feature of the divine service.

o God's acceptance of the first sacrifices was manifested by a heavenly sign. Aaron, having performed all the sacrificial service, lifted up his hands and blessed the people, probably in the manner prescribed in Num 6:22-26, descended from the altar and went into the tabernacle with Moses. Probably Moses by introducing Aaron into the inner sanctuary, but not into the Holy of Holies, vested him with further priestly rights. This ceremony may be compared with the solemn entry of a new bishop into his Cathedral Church and his enthronement. It is not excluded that Moses and Aaron in the tabernacle prayed God that he might manifest his glory to the people. When they came out, they blessed the people and the glory of the Lord appeared in the sight of all in the form of a fire consuming all the offerings upon the altar. For a similar manifestation of God's acceptance of a sacrifice 187o cf. Jg 6:21; 3 Kg 18:38; 1 Par 21:26; 2 Par 7:1. As Aaron had already set fire to the several offerings, it is probable that the heavenly fire only accelerated the consumption of the victims.

X 1-7 The First Priestly Transgression and Its Punishment—188a It is not clear what the sin of Aaron's sons was. It was certainly irreverence connected with fire and incense-offering. It is commonly held that Nadab and Abiu made use of fire that was not taken from the altar. But the expression 'a strange fire' probably means a fire-offering made against the regulations, therefore an irregular fire-offering, a fire-offering made not in the manner that was commanded. The irregularity may have been in the quality of the fire, the composition of the incense (Ex 30:9), the time and place of the offering. In any case it was irreverence which could not be left unpunished. The punishment was fatal. A fire like a flash of lightning struck them dead. For similar punishments cf. Num 11:1; 16:35; 4 Kg 1:12. The death penalty may have appeared disproportionate to the fault, but Moses justified the severity of the punishment on the ground of God's sanctity. God being holy, those who approach him must be holy. Any unholiness in his ministers would be reflected upon him and must therefore be punished with due severity in the presence of all the people. Moses here quoted God's words, but we cannot say on what occasion God pronounced them. The dead bodies of Nadab and Abiu were instantly removed and buried outside the camp. Aaron and his surviving sons, Eleazar and Ithamar, were strictly forbidden to show any sign of mourning, which, however, was allowed to other relatives and the whole people. The reason for this prohibition is given in Num 19:11-22. Later legislation was less strict as it permitted the priests, but not the high-priest, to mourn for their closest relatives; cf. 21:1-6, 10-12.

8-11 The Priests forbidden to drink Wine—b The close connexion between this prohibition and the episode of Nadab and Abiu gave rise to the tradition that drunkenness during the divine service was the sin of the two priests. The priests, the only persons who could approach God and who were the recognized teachers in Israel, had to be perfectly sober both out of due reverence and in order that they might be able to discriminate between what was holy and what was not holy, between what was clean and what was unclean, and to teach the people all the laws given by God to Moses.

12-15 The Portions reserved to the Priests—c This passage is supplementary to the narrative relating the offering of Aaron's first sacrifice (ch 9). Aaron and his sons are commanded to eat the unleavened cakes left over from the oblation, and the breast and the right thigh of the peace-offerings. These oblations being most holy must be eaten in a holy place, beside the altar, while the other portions were to be eaten in a clean place. Only the sons of Aaron had a right to a portion of the oblation (6:18), his daughters being allowed to share in the peace-offerings only. For the persons who were entitled to a share in the priestly portions, see 22:11-13.

16-20 The Sin-offering not eaten by the Priests—d Besides his own sin-offering (9:8), Aaron offered also a he-goat as a sin-offering for the people (9:15). The first was entirely burnt as prescribed (4:4-12), of the other a portion was to be eaten by the priest (6:26). Contrary to the prescriptions of 6:26 the sin-offering of the people was completely burnt. Moses was angry with Eleazar and Ithamar and rebuked them because they had not eaten the holy portion in a holy place. He put forward two reasons: (i) God has given you a portion of the sin-offerings that you might, by eating it, expiate the sins of the people. The eating is a complementary part of the whole sacrificial ritual which is acceptable to God only if the several constituent actions are properly performed. (ii) No blood was brought into the sanctuary, a portion of the 188d victim was therefore to be reserved to the priest (6:26). Aaron answers for his sons as the only person responsible. He justifies his action by expressing his doubts about God's acceptance of his partaking of the sin-offering. His sons' sin-offering and their holocaust could not avert the calamity which had befallen him. How could he therefore hope that his eating the victim would propitiate God? DV gives another meaning: 'How could I eat . . . having a sorrowful heart?' But the words 'having a sorrowful heart' are not in Heb.

189a B. Laws of Purification and Atonement (ehh 11-16).

1 Uncleaness and Its Removal (ehh 11-15)—In the Levitical legislation uncleaness denotes the state of a person who, on account of certain actions not necessarily sinful, cannot approach God. Both this person and the cause of his condition are said to be unclean. Uncleaness is generally external, not necessarily involving any transgression of the moral law, and therefore its removal too was an external ceremony reinstating the unclean person in his former condition. The study of anthropology has shown that the distinction between cleanness and uncleaness and the religious notions underlying the distinction are very widespread and far older than the Hebrew people. Some of these ideas and practices were taken over by the nomadic Israelites and were later sanctioned by God in so far as they were not inconsistent with monotheistic belief and as a means to train the Israelites to higher standards of moral cleanness. The moral and religious motive of the cleanness-laws is clearly stated in 11:44: 'Be holy because I am holy.' On the subject of Cleanness and Uncleaness, see M.-J. Lagrange, 141-57; W. R. Smith, 446-56.

b XI 1-47 Clean and Unclean Food—The distinction between clean and unclean animals is based on sanitary grounds, on a sense of natural aversion and, to some extent, on religious considerations, certain animals having idolatrous and superstitious associations. A parallel list of unclean animals is given in Deut 14:3-20. For a comparison, see Driver, Deuteronomy, in ICC, 156-9.

c 1-8 Beasts = Deut 14:3-8—The criterion whereby animals are judged 'clean' is that they must 'have the hoof divided and chew the cud'. According to this criterion the camel is pronounced unclean because it chews the cud but has not the hoof divided. For the same reason the rock-badger (DV cherogrillus) and the hare are unclean because they do not divide the hoof although they move the jaws like ruminants. The pig is unclean for the opposite reason. The swine was forbidden food to the Semites and an abomination to the Jews (2 Mac 6:18 f.). Uncleaness, like holiness, could be transmitted by contact, and an unclean person had to be temporarily separated from all social intercourse until he was purified. Contact with a living unclean animal was not forbidden, otherwise the Israelites would have been deprived of their ordinary means of conveyance, the camel and the ass.

d 9-12 Fishes = Deut 14:11-18—The criterion of cleanness for aquatic animals is that they must have 'fins and scales'. No application of this general principle to particular cases is made either in Lev or in Deut.

e 13-19 Birds = Deut 14:9 f.—The principle underlying the classification of these birds as unclean is that they are mostly birds of prey feeding on carrion. Some of the birds enumerated are of doubtful identification.

f 20-23 Winged Insects = Deut 14:19, 20—All flying insects having four feet are classed with unclean animals except those that have two posterior legs of greater strength and length for leaping, such as certain kinds of locusts which may be eaten; cf. Mt 3:4; Mk 1:6.

g 24-28 Uncleaness by Contact—As uncleaness is communicable by contact, whoever carries or touches, even inadvertently, the carcass of an unclean animal defiles himself and remains defiled till the evening. Contact with a dead unclean animal was believed to be dangerous whereas contact with a living unclean animal was not; cf. § 189c.

29-38 Uncleaness caused by Reptiles, etc.—The h uncleaness produced by reptiles is restricted to contact with their corpses as they were never used as food. Three ways of dealing with such uncleaness are here indicated. (i) The uncleaness adheres to the surface and can be washed away by water (32). (ii) The uncleaness penetrates into the thing itself which must therefore be destroyed (33-35). (iii) The uncleaness cannot be removed and may therefore be disregarded (36, 37).

39, 40 Contact with the Corpse of a Clean Animal—

i This rule is meant to supplement the law concerning the contact with dead animals (24-28). By 'dead animal' is meant an animal which dies a natural death.

41-47 Conclusion—This is a regulation supplementary j to 29-31 and the conclusion of the whole section on the prohibition of unclean food. The ultimate reason why the Israelites must guard themselves against any uncleaness is the Lord's holiness and his relation to the Israelites. Yahweh is the God of the Israelites, and the Israelites are his people. Fellowship with God implies a certain likeness to him, or imitation of his perfections. The Israelites must be holy because their God is holy. This is a fundamental principle of Christian life enunciated in almost the same terms by Jesus Christ: 'Be you therefore perfect, as also your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5:48).

XII 1-8 Purification after Childbirth—The origin of k life, which could not be explained naturally, was attributed by all primitive peoples to mysterious powers acting on woman. Generation was therefore always looked upon with superstitious awe, and women after childbirth were tabooed all the world over (cf. *J. C. Frazer, Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, 1914⁸ [The Golden Bough, III] 147 ff.; also Humm., 435). But the Levitical law has also a religious significance. God is the source of life, and a holocaust is accordingly offered him in recognition of the origin of a new life from him. The sin-offering (8, 8) does not imply that childbirth or conjugal intercourse were considered morally sinful. The only inference is that the mother after childbirth is ceremonially unclean, and atonement has to be made by a sin-offering (Humm., 437). Sin-offerings were also prescribed for other ceremonial uncleanesses; cf. 14:19, 22; 15:15, 30.

1-4 The Birth of a Male—If a woman gives birth to l a male, she is unclean for seven days, as in her courses, and is therefore subject to the restrictions specified in 15:19-24. For the next thirty-three days she continues to purify herself, the only restriction being abstinence from holy things and the sanctuary. The number thirty-three has no other value but that of a remainder of forty after subtracting seven. Seven and forty are two symbolical round numbers indicating two stages in the period of recovery from childbirth.

5 The Birth of a Female—In this case the two periods

m of seven and thirty-three are doubled. The reason may be either the popular belief that the birth of a girl is physiologically more dangerous for her mother and therefore requires a longer period of convalescence, or the opinion that, as woman was the first to bring sin into the world, the birth of a female should impose on her mother a longer seclusion (Humm., 436; Crampon, 385).

6-8 The Purification—At the end of the purification n period the mother had to bring a lamb in its first year for a holocaust and a pigeon or a turtle-dove for a sin-offering. If she was poor, the law allowed her to bring two turtle-doves or two pigeons, one for the holocaust and the other for the sin-offering. The Virgin Mary offered the sacrifice allowed to a poor woman (Lk 2:24).

XIII-XIV Leprosy—Leprosy was a fairly common

190a disease in ancient times. References to it occur in both the OT and the NT, cf. Ex 4:6; Num 12:10; 2 Kg 3:29; 4 Kg 5:1, 27; 7:3; 15:5; Mt 10:8; 11:5; Lk 7:22; etc. But it is doubtful whether the 190a Heb. word šār'aṭ, LXX λέπρα, and Vg lepra denote always what is now known as leprosy, or are also applied to other skin diseases. In ch 13 various forms are described. The Hebrews always regarded leprosy as a contagious disease and perhaps as a punishment by God, and this explains both the isolation of the diseased and the necessity of ceremonial purification. On leprosy, see *A. R. Bennett, Diseases of the Bible (1887), 15-53; HDB, II, 95-9; DBV, IV, 175-87.

b XIII 2-8 First Form of Leprosy—Its symptoms are subcutaneous nodules, scabby patches on the skin, white shining spots. When these symptoms become visible the person affected must be brought before the priest who has to decide on the nature of the disease. If the priest observes that the hair in the affected part has turned white and the swelling has a depressed centre thus appearing deeper than the skin, he shall pronounce him unclean because it is leprosy. If these two distinctive marks are not present, the man is to be secluded for seven days and then examined again. If the disease has not spread, he is to be isolated for another week. If after the second week the symptoms have not spread, and on the contrary the white spots have faded, it is no leprosy, it is only scab or psoriasis, and the priest shall pronounce him clean. As a precautionary measure the man will have to wash his clothes. If however after being declared clean, the symptoms recur with increased intensity, he must appear again before the priest who shall pronounce him unclean.

c 9-17 Second Form—Its symptoms are a white tumour on the skin and the hair turned white, with raw flesh in the tumour or ulceration. This is a case of an inveterate leprosy, and the priest shall pronounce the person affected unclean without further examination. If there is only a white efflorescence covering the skin from head to foot, it is not leprosy but some form of psoriasis or scaly cutaneous disease which is neither contagious nor incurable, and the priest shall therefore pronounce him clean. But if there is an ulceration ('raw flesh'), which must be distinguished from a temporary sore, it is a case of leprosy, and the person affected must be declared unclean.

d 18-28 Third Form—This form of skin disease is characterized by white or reddish elevated patches with central depressions and hair turned white breaking out on the scar of a healed boil. It is a case of leprosy, and the person affected is unclean. But if the eruption is not deep-seated and the surrounding hair has not turned white, if the scar is dim-coloured, the suspected person shall be secluded for seven days, and if the symptoms do not spread, he shall be declared clean. If they spread, it is leprosy and he is unclean. The case of an eruption on the scar of a healed burn is treated in a similar manner.

e 29-37 Leprosy in the Hair—This is a skin disease affecting the hairy scalp and characterized by thin yellow hair. It is a contagious disease, and the person affected is unclean. Suspicious cases are to be re-examined after a week's quarantine. The patient must shave the hair of his head except that on the affected part. If the disease spreads, he is unclean; otherwise, and especially if there is black hair, he must be declared clean.

f 38-39 White Spots on the Skin—The disease described here is a form of eczematous, cutaneous affection distinguished by spots of a dull white colour. It is not contagious and produces no uncleanness.

g 40-43 Baldness—Baldness is not infectious and produces no uncleanness except when it is complicated by the usual leprosy symptoms. Such complicated cases are to be treated as the other cases of leprosy.

h 44-46 Seclusion of Lepers—A person pronounced unclean is excluded from the community. He must have his garments rent or open in front, his head unbound and the hair let loose, and the upper lip covered as in mourning, and must warn passers-by not to approach; cf. 4 Kg 7:3; Lk 17:12.

i 47-59 Leprosy in Garments—What is meant by this form of leprosy is not clear. The opinion that leprosy garments are those worn by lepers is not probable. It is commonly believed that the word 'leprosy' is applied to certain greenish and reddish spots in garments caused by mildew on account of their similarity to the leprosy symptoms and of their corrosive action and insanitary effects. The treatment is more or less the same as in the case of leprosy in man including isolation of the infected garment, washing and in some cases destruction.

XIV 1-32 The Purification of the Leper—Although true leprosy is an incurable disease and no purification will therefore be required, some of the varieties described in ch 13 can be cured. When a diseased person is cured, he must be formally readmitted into the community according to a prescribed ritual. The cleansing ceremony consists of two parts, the removal of the uncleanness (2-9) and the readmission to the community, and consequently to fellowship with God (10-20). When the leper is definitely cured he is brought before the priest. The priest goes to meet him outside the camp and on seeing that he is really healed orders two 'clean' live birds, a piece of cedar wood, a scarlet band and a bunch of hyssop to be brought to him. One of the birds is killed over an earthen vessel filled with water from a spring. Then the other bird is dipped in the water mixed with blood together with the cedar wood to which the bunch of hyssop had been tied with the scarlet band. The priest sprinkles the leper seven times with blood and water, pronounces him clean and sets the bird free.

The symbolism of this ceremony is obvious. The sprinkling cleanses; the blood, and the water from a spring, not from a cistern, symbolize the new life which is being imparted to a person hitherto regarded as dead; the setting of the bird free represents release from confinement and reinstatement in civil rights; the cedar is noted for its soundness and medicinal powers; the hyssop, not the hyssopus officinalis L. which does not grow in Palestine, but the caper (capparis spinosa L.) or a kind of marjoram (origanum marjorana L.) was selected for its cleansing properties; the scarlet colour of the band represents the blood of a new life.

When the first purificatory rite has been completed, the person to be cleansed washes his clothes, shaves all his hair and washes himself. He is then admitted into the camp, but must remain for seven days outside his dwelling. On the seventh day he repeats the same ablutions and thus the cleansing process is complete. The next day he shall bring his offerings consisting of two he-lambs, one ewe-lamb in its first year, three-tenths of an ephah of fine flour mingled with oil and one log (DV sextary) of oil. The first lamb is to be offered as a trespass-offering. The reason for such an offering is that the uncleanness of the leper is considered as an involuntary guilt which has to be atoned for as a sin of ignorance or inadvertence; cf. Saydon, CBQ 8 (1946) 307.

The guilt is of a lesser gravity in comparison with those specified in 5:14-6:7, and this is the reason why a lamb and not a ram is offered. The ritual of the sacrifice is substantially identical with that of other trespass-offerings, but is accompanied by additional ceremonies which give the sacrifice its distinguishing feature. The priest, not the offerer as in 7:29-34, waves the lamb together with the log of oil. It may be however that the waving ceremony is performed by the offerer himself assisted by the priest; see note to 7:28-34. The lamb is then slain in the court of the sanctuary as the holocaust and the sin-offering. The smearing of the leper with blood has the same symbolic significance as in the consecration of priests (8:23), the purification of a leper being regarded as a reconsecration to the Lord's service. The priest next takes the log (c one pint) of oil pouring some of it on the palm of his left hand and with the forefinger of his right hand sprinkles it seven times before the Lord, and anoints the blood-smear parts of the leper. The rest of the oil is poured over the leper's head. Finally the 190m priest offers the sin-offering and the holocaust according to the prescribed ritual, and the leper is declared clean and free to re-enter his house and to partake of the sacred offerings.

If the leper is poor and cannot provide all these offerings, he shall bring one lamb for the trespass-offering with one-tenth of an ephah of fine flour, tempered with oil, one log of oil, and two turtle-doves or two pigeons. The ritual is that prescribed for similar cases.

n 33-53 Leprosy in Houses—Certain greenish and reddish patches in the inner walls of a house are called leprosy on account of their similarity to macular leprosy. Their natural cause is damp or decay, but they are represented as a plague inflicted by God. The infected house is examined by the priest who is to order the necessary repairs or its destruction or declare it clean according to the nature and gravity of the infection. It is a sanitary regulation with a religious significance.

o 33-42, 46-48 First Case—When the symptoms first become visible, the owner of the house must inform the priest who will inspect the house after all the furniture has been removed. After seven days the priest inspects the house again, and if the spots have spread, the infected stones shall be removed and replaced by new ones, and the inner walls scraped and plastered again. If the infection is thus arrested, the house is clean, (48).

p 43-45 Second Case—If after these repairs the discoloured spots reappear, the house shall be demolished.

q 49-53 Purification—The rite of purification is similar to that prescribed for the leper (3-7). The setting of the bird free lends support to the opinion that this rite expresses symbolically the carrying away of the uncleanness by the fleeing bird (W. R. Smith, 422).

191a XV 1-53 Sexual Uncleaness and its Purification—Although hygienic considerations and the practice of many ancient peoples may lie at the root of these regulations, it cannot be reasonably doubted that their informing principle is eminently moral and religious. The immediate reason for such purifications is not the sinful character of the actions nor the pathological affections specified in this chapter, but the holiness of God which excludes from his service anything that offends decency.

b 1-18 Uncleaness in Men—This is produced : (i) by abnormal seminal emission (2-3) ; (ii) by a normal emission as in the case of a nocturnal accident (16) [Deut 23:10] ; (iii) by lawful sexual intercourse (18).

c 19-30 Uncleaness in Women—This is produced : (i) by normal periodical discharges. A woman during her courses is unclean and communicates her uncleaness by contact. The apparent contradiction between 24 and 20:18 is readily removed by supposing that the former deals with lawful conjugal relations and the latter with unlawful sexual relations during the prohibited time. Vg omits 23 (Heb) which reads thus : ' If it is the bed or anything on which she sits, he who touches it becomes unclean until the evening '. (ii) By abnormal discharges, that is, those occurring outside the ordinary course or lasting longer than usual. Purification is required on account of God's presence among his people. The tabernacle is his dwelling-place and anyone approaching the tabernacle with an uncleaness upon him defiles God's dwelling and deserves punishment.

d 2 Ritual of the Day of Atonement (ch 16)—This day holds a prominent place in the Jewish calendar. Both its ritual and its religious significance mark it off from all other festival days and give it a special character which has earned for it, in later Judaism, the name Yoma 'the Day', or Yoma Rabba 'the Great Day'. As regards its religious significance suffice it to remark that the public and solemn expiatory sacrifice is offered by, and for, the whole people collectively. The Israelites are considered as one moral person asking forgiveness for all past offences. And Yahweh thus propitiated continues to look upon his people favourably, although he may be wrathful with individual persons for their private unexpiated sins. Additional regulations are laid down in 23:26-32 and Num 29:7-11. On the ritual and meaning of the festival see Médebielle, 89-114, and art. Expiation in DBV(S), especially the bibliography 259-62. The literary problems are discussed by S. Landersdorfer, Studien zum bibl. Versöhnungstag, Münster, 1924.

XVI 1 Historical Introduction—The institution is connected with the death of Aaron's sons, Nadab and Abiu. But it is difficult to see what this connexion really implies. 1 may be simply a chronological indication having no logical bearing on the narrative. Some non-Catholic critics believe that ch 16 deals 'in reality with two subjects, viz. (1) the conditions under which the high-priest might enter the Holy of Holies (see 2), and (2) an atoning ceremony, to be enacted once annually, on behalf of the nation' (cf. Driver, LOT, 47), and that the two ceremonials were imperfectly combined together when the entry into the Most Holy Place came gradually to be restricted to the single annual Day of Atonement. Some Catholic interpreters admit a development in the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Landersdorfer, 84 ; Heinisch, 77-79 ; Clamer, 122). Without denying the possibility of such development we prefer to consider that the entry into the Holy of Holies and the atoning ceremony were two complementary parts of a single institution. Now considering the close relation between these two actions and the expiatory virtue connected with the blood ritual performed within the Holy of Holies, one can easily understand why the legislator has combined together two apparently distinct ceremonials beginning with the more important one, namely, the entry into the Holy of Holies.

2-28 The Ritual—The high-priest is forbidden to enter freely at any time into the inner part of the sanctuary within the veil (Ex 26:31-33) lest he should die. It was only on the annual recurrence of this occasion that he was allowed to enter the Holy of Holies ; cf. the symbolical interpretation in Heb 9:6-12. Supplementing the biblical narrative by later traditions recorded in the Mishnah (tr. Yoma, English trans. by H. Danby) we can easily reconstruct the whole ceremony. After having offered the daily morning holocaust the high-priest put on the linen garments (4), laid his hands on the head of the young bull brought for his sin-offering and confessed his sins. Two buck-goats were then presented (5), one for a sin-offering on behalf of the people, the other for the atoning ceremony. Two lots bearing the inscriptions 'For Yahweh' and 'For Azazel' respectively were placed in a casket. The high-priest then shook the casket, drew the two lots, and bound a scarlet thread of wool on the head of the goat for Azazel and another thread about the throat of the goat for Yahweh. The true meaning of the word Azazel, which occurs nowhere else in the OT, is doubtful. Early Jewish tradition identified it with one of the fallen angels (cf. CAP II, 191 ff.). Christian writers protest against this interpretation on the ground that what has been presented to the Lord cannot belong to anyone else (see Humm., 461). LXX and Vg break the word up into two parts, 'ēz 'goat' and 'āzal 'to go away' and translate [Χίμαρος] ἀνομιμαῖος, 'caper emissarius', whence DV 'emissary goat' and AV '[e]scapegoat'. But whatever the etymology, the symbolical meaning is clear ; see further on.

After the designation of the two goats (11), the high-priest killed the young bull of his sin-offering for himself and for his family. What follows is the most solemn part of the ceremony and one of its most distinctive features. 12-14. The high-priest took the censer filled with burning coals from the altar and put a handful of frankincense in a cup and went into the sanctuary within the veil. There he burned the incense thus raising a cloud of smoke that concealed the majesty of God from human sight, 'for man shall not see the Lord and live' (Ex 33:20). Then after a 191g short prayer outside the veil he returned within the veil with a bowl of the slaughtered animal's blood and sprinkled it upon the propitiatory and in front of it once upwards and seven times downwards. This blood ritual is the essential part of the whole service. Blood has certainly a special expiatory virtue which becomes still greater when it is brought before the presence of God.

h 15. He then killed the goat set apart for Yahweh, brought the blood within the veil and sprinkled it as before. He again sprinkled first the blood of the young bull and afterwards the blood of the goat on the veil outside the Holy of Holies. 18-19. After these sprinklings the high-priest mixed the blood of the two animals and smeared the horns of the altar of incense and sprinkled the altar seven times, pouring out what was left of the blood at the base of the altar of holocaust. These blood aspersions had the effect of cleansing the sanctuary, the tabernacle and the altar from the defilement of the priests and the people. The sins of the people, their ceremonial uncleannesses, the transgressions of the priests themselves were considered as contaminating God's dwelling-place among his people and thus rendering the sacrificial worship unacceptable. A purification was necessary that would restore the temple to its sanctity and secure the forgiveness of sins and fellowship with God.

i After the expiatory and purificatory rites the forgiveness and complete destruction of sins was represented dramatically by a characteristic ceremonial. While the scapegoat stood before the people, the high-priest laid his hands on its head and confessed the sins of the people, thus laying them symbolically upon the goat. Then a man appointed for the purpose took the sin-laden goat to an uninhabited place in the wilderness and there let it go, or, according to the Mishnah, pushed it over the rocks from the top of a mountain. There is a similar symbolism in the purification of the leper (14:7). See the spiritual application to Christ made by St Paul in Heb 9.

j While the emissary goat was being taken into the wilderness, the high-priest put off his linen garments and arrayed himself in pontifical robes after having washed himself again. He then advanced to the altar and burned his holocaust and that of the people. No sacred meal followed, the young bull and the goat for the sin-offering being completely burnt outside the camp as their blood had been brought into the Holy of Holies (6:30). The man who led the scapegoat into the desert had to wash himself and his clothes, probably because the goat laden with sins was regarded as unclean and producing uncleanness by contact. For a complete description of the ceremonial at the time of Christ see A. Edersheim, 263-88.

k 20-34 Additional Ordinances and Annual Celebration—The ceremonial described above was instituted as an annual festival to be celebrated on the tenth day of Tishri, the seventh month (=Sept.-Oct.). The reason for this date is not stated. The two numbers ten and seven had a certain sanctity attached to them (*E. König in HDB, III, 565). Besides attending the service in the temple the Israelites and all resident foreigners had to 'afflict themselves' and 'to abstain from work'. The expression 'to afflict oneself' used in a liturgical sense, means 'to fast' (Is 58:3-5). This is the only occasion for which fasting is prescribed, although fasting is a very ancient custom and is frequently referred to in the OT; cf. 1 Kg 14:24; 2 Kg 1:12; 12:16; Jer 36:6,9; etc. An allusion to the fasting of the Day of Atonement is made in Ac 27:9. Abstention from work is not restricted to any particular kind of work. The prohibition is general, 'thou shalt do no work' (cf. 23:28-30), and is emphatically expressed in 31 by the alliterative assonant expression šabbat šabbāṭōn 'absolute rest'.

192a C. The Law of Holiness (chh 17-26).

XVII 1-16 Regulations concerning the Slaying of Animals for Food and for Sacrifice—These regulations are a fitting introduction to the collection of the laws of holiness. The underlying principle of the whole collection is that the people must be holy because their God is holy. Now the basis and root of holiness is the recognition and exclusive worship of the one true God, and therefore the avoidance of all practices that may lead to idolatry.

3-7 The Slaughter of Animals fit for Sacrifice—If an Israelite wished to kill any such animal for domestic use, he had to bring it to the priest and present it before the Lord at the entrance of the tabernacle with certain religious rites. Private slaughter was therefore forbidden. This may point to a time when all slaughter of domestic animals was connected with sacrifice. Lagrange, 254, remarks that with the Arabs every immolation was in some way a sacrifice. The reason was that blood, considered as the source of life and as possessing a special atoning efficacy (11), belonged to God alone. Man therefore had no right over blood and consequently animal bloodshed was a crime, punishable by civil excommunication. The animal therefore must be killed at the tabernacle, the blood poured out at the base of the altar and the fat portions burnt on the altar. Another reason for the prohibition of domestic slaughter of animals was the danger of idolatrous and superstitious practices. If the Israelites had been allowed to kill their animals anywhere, they would hardly have resisted the inclination to offer sacrifices to the desert gods in the shape of goats (now called 'satyrs', DV 'devils') whom they worshipped so often. Idolatrous worship, generally involving prostitution, is called in the OT 'fornication'; cf. Ex 34:15, 16; Deut 31:16; Jg 2:17; 8:27, 33; etc. This was a temporary regulation meant for the time of the desert wanderings. When the people settled down in Canaan, it became impracticable and had to be modified, making the killing of an animal at home permissible (Deut 12:15). The words 'an ordinance for ever' mean as long as possible and necessary.

8-9 The Place of the Sacrifice—All sacrifices, whether holocausts or otherwise, must be made in the tabernacle, and transgressions are punishable by excommunication. This law, unlike the preceding one, binds resident foreigners also and was never abrogated nor modified, but was further developed in Deut 12:5-14.

10-12 The Use of Blood—The prohibition to eat flesh with blood goes back to Noe's time (Gen 9:4), and is based on primitive physiological conceptions and on religious grounds. Blood is the seat of life, and as such is best suited for expiation. The relation between expiation and the blood or life of an animal is commonly explained by the substitution theory according to which the blood of an animal is accepted by God as a substitute for man's life. There is a penal substitution and a substitution which we may call simply symbolical. The supporters of the penal substitution theory explain the expiatory virtue of blood by the supposition that the animal is killed instead of the death-deserving sinner, and the blood of an animal is accepted by God for the blood of man (see Médebielle, 114-65, and more recently in DBV (S) art. Expiation). According to the non-penal or symbolical substitution theory the victim stands before God not as a substitute of a death-deserving man but as a concrete expression of the offerer's internal sentiments of repentance, love, adoration, etc., and the victim's blood or life is accepted by God as the expression of these sentiments. It is in view of these internal sentiments transferred symbolically to the victim by the imposition of hands that the blood or life becomes an efficacious means of re-establishing normal relations between God and man; see A. Metzinger, Die Substitutionstheorie und das alttestamentliche Opfer in Bi (1940) 159-87, esp. 176 f., 247-72, 353-77. The latter theory seems to me preferable because it can be applied to all forms of sacrifice; but it is by no means excluded that in particular cases an offerer may have expressed by his sacrifice and especially by the imposition of hands his o It should be remarked, however, that the theory of penal substitution has no support in 11 which in MT reads thus: 'Because the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you (to be brought) upon the altar that you may make atonement (by it) for your lives, because the blood makes atonement by means of the life (which is in it)'. LXX has wrongly translated the phrase 'by means of the life' as 'instead of life', i.e. 'of your lives'. The offering of blood, therefore, represents the offering of life, and the offering of an animal's life symbolizes the offering of man's life. In this sense we may say that the blood of an animal is a substitute for human life.

192d sense of death-guiltiness which he transferred to the victim.

f 13-14 Animals Caught by Hunting—A beast or a fowl that can be eaten but cannot be offered to the Lord, is not brought to the tabernacle, but its blood must be poured out and covered with dust before the flesh is eaten. But in no case is flesh to be eaten with blood.

g 15-16 The Eating of Dead Animals—Anyone eating of an animal which dies a natural death or has been torn by a beast becomes unclean and must wash himself and his clothes. As regards the blood, the disposition of 13, 14 must be applied. This law binds both the Israelite and the resident foreigner, but according to Deut 14:21 these foreigners are allowed to eat of an animal which dies a natural death.

h XVIII 1-5 Prohibition of Unlawful Marriages—On the whole subject see *E. Neufeld, Ancient Hebrew Marriage Laws (London, 1944) 191-212. The immoral practices of the Egyptians and the Canaanites are condemned, and God's will is to be Israel's only guide. Life and temporal prosperity (though spiritual rewards are not excluded) are promised to those who walk in the way of the Lord. 5b is cited in Rom 10:5 and Gal 3:12. The expression 'I am the Lord your God' at the beginning and at the end adds solemnity to the enactments which follow and may be compared with similar formulas in royal decrees.

i 6-18 Forbidden Degrees of Kinship—No man shall have sexual intercourse with a woman who is near of kin to him. This is a general prohibition specified by the following list of degrees of relationship: (i) a son and his mother (7); (ii) a son and his step-mother (8); this must have been a common case in polygamous families, cf. Gen 49:3; (iii) a brother and his paternal or maternal half-sister (9); the case of a marriage of a brother with his sister, though not expressly mentioned, is implied in this; (iv) a father and his granddaughter (10); (v) a brother and his step-sister (11); this case is already contemplated in 9 unless we read there 'and' instead of 'or' thus making the half-sister a full sister and supplying the missing case; (vi) a nephew and his paternal aunt (12); (vii) a nephew and his maternal aunt (13); (viii) a nephew and his uncle's wife (14); (ix) a father and his daughter-in-law (15); (x) a brother and his sister-in-law (16); see however the exception in Deut 25:5 ff.; (xi) a father and his step-daughter (17a); a father and the daughter of his stepson or his stepdaughter (17b); (xii) a husband and his living wife's sister (18); but marriage with a deceased wife's sister was not prohibited. Jacob's marriages with the two sisters Lia and Rachel were not in conformity with this law. The words 'for a harlot' in 18 have no equivalent in Heb. On the whole the Levitical marriage legislation is stricter than that of the patriarchal age, thus pointing to a more developed social organization.

j 19-23 Certain Cases of Unchastity and Moloch Worship—Sexual relations with one's lawful wife during the menstruation period are forbidden; see also 15:24; 20:18. Moloch worship consisting in sacrificing children as burnt-offerings is severely condemned; cf. 4 Kg 23:10; Ez 20:31; and E. Mader, Die Menschenopfer der alten Hebräer, in BS, XIV, 5, 6.

k 24-30 Parenthetic Conclusion—In the introduction,

1-5, life and prosperity are promised to those who keep God's commandments, the conclusion threatens transgressors with the loss of the land which God is about to give them.

XIX 1-37 A Miscellany of Laws—This is a heterogeneous collection of laws regulating the domestic and social life of the Israelites and inculcating the necessity of holiness as a condition of fellowship with God.

1-4 Introduction—Parental respect, the observance of the sabbath and prohibition of idolatry; cf. the decalogue Ex 20:1-12.

5-8 Peace-offerings—Cf. 7:16-18.

9-10 Gleaning in the Cornfield and the Vineyard—The corn was not to be reaped up to the corner of the field, but a strip was to be left for the poor, and the ears that slipped out of the reapers' hands were also to be left for them. Cf. the story of Ruth. Some bunches of grapes were also to be left to be gathered by the poor. Cf. 23:22 and Deut 24:19-21.

11-14 Duties of Justice towards One's Neighbours—Unjust dealing is forbidden. The Heb. verbs rendered 'calumniate . . . oppress' (13) mean 'to withhold what is due' and 'to take away one's property'; cf. P. Joüin in Bi (1922) 445-7. The poor hireling must receive his wages daily. Unkind treatment of helpless persons is forbidden; cf. Deut 24:14, 15.

15-18 Righteousness and Love for One's Neighbour—Justice must be administered irrespective of social positions. One interpretation of 16b is: You shall not stand by when your neighbour's life is in peril. Another: You shall not withhold your true witness against a murderer. Or: You shall not endanger your neighbour's life by slander. Mutual love and fraternal correction are commanded, and feelings of hatred and vengeance must be uprooted from the heart. 18 in Heb reads thus: 'Seek not revenge, nor bear rancour towards the children of thy people; thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself'. Note that the OT conception of 'neighbour' was restricted to one's fellow-nationals. Love was first limited to fellow-Israelites, and then extended to the resident aliens (33,34). But the grand commandment of universal love was first proclaimed by our Lord; cf. Mt 5:43, 44 and J. Dean in WV ad loc.

19 Unlawful Mixtures—The breeding together of cattle of different species, the sowing of a field with two kinds of seed, the wearing of garments woven of two sorts, wool and linen, are forbidden. The prohibition in a slightly modified form occurs again in Deut 22:5, 9-11. 'The motive of the prohibition', writes *S. R. Driver, 'appears to be the preservation of natural distinctions: species . . . are designed by God to be distinct (cf. Gen 1:11, 12, 21, 24, 25); each possesses its own characteristic features; and a principle thus visibly impressed by the Creator upon nature is not to be interfered with by man' (Deuteronomy in ICC, 252). This principle of individual existence applied to religion was meant to safeguard the integrity of the Israelite religion against any foreign heathenish infiltrations.

20-22 A Special Case of Adultery—Adultery with a q bondmaid betrothed to a husband but not yet made free by her master is punishable though not by death as in the case of ordinary adultery (20:10.) The guilty man has to offer a trespass-offering.

23-25 Firstfruits—The fruit of trees newly planted in the land of Canaan shall for the first three years (23) be considered as uncircumcised infants and consequently unconsecrated, unclean, unfit to be offered to God. In the fourth year the fruit must be offered to God, and in the fifth the people are permitted to eat of it. The reason for this injunction is that fruit trees must be allowed to attain their full development before their fruit is offered to God or eaten by man. In 23 DV's 'firstfruits' should with MT and Vg be foreskins.

26a Blood Eating again forbidden—See 17:10.

26b-31 Magic and Superstition—Divination and augury so very widely practised in the East are for-

- 192a bidden. The cutting off of the hair or a part of it was, with certain Arab tribes, a superstitious practice. Cuttings in the flesh or lacerations as a sign of mourning, and tattooing are condemned on account of their heathenish associations (W. R. Smith, 334). In 29 the reference is probably to sacred prostitution although the prohibition as worded comprehends all prostitution. The Israelites must not consult those who conjure ghosts (cf. 1 Kg 28), nor those who pretend to receive extraordinary knowledge from their 'familiar' spirit. Any connexion with diviners would be a source of moral defilement.
- 32-34 Rules of Behaviour—Old age deserves respect and resident foreigners must be treated with affection.
- 35-36 Righteousness in Judgements and Honesty in Trade—Cf. Deut 25:13-16. The bushel is the approximate equivalent of the Heb. ephah. The hin (DV 'sextary') is about 1½ gallons.
- 193a XX 1-21 Punitive Sanction of the Preceding Laws—This is a penal code supplementing the criminal code contained in ch 18. Certain penalties may appear disproportionate to the gravity of the offence, but they must be estimated according to the standards of the times. In the Code of Hammurabi many similar offences were punished by death (*C. H. W. Johns in HDB, V, 584-612).
- b 2-5 Moloch Worship = 18:21—Stoning is the penalty inflicted on the offender. If the people take no heed of the offence, God himself will punish the offender by cutting him off from among his people. This divine punishment is not banishment from one's city, but death in some unspecified manner. Fornication in 5 and very often in the OT denotes unfaithfulness to God, idolatry.
- c 6 Consulting Diviners = 19:31—Death is inflicted by God himself as above.
- d 9 Cursing a Parent is punished by death; cf. 19:3; Ex 21:17. And the offender is held responsible for his own death. In § 195 of the Code of Hammurabi a man who struck his father had his hands cut off.
- e 10 Adultery—The penalty is the death of both parties. Cf. 18:20; Deut 22:22 and § 129 of the Code of Hammurabi.
- f 11-21 The cases contemplated correspond to those in 18:8, 15, 22, 18, 23, 10, 19, 12, 14, 16 respectively.
- g 22-26 Hortatory Conclusion—The ultimate reason for keeping these laws is God's holiness on which the writer insists so strongly and so often; cf. 19:2; 20:7 f. If God is holy, his people must be holy. The holiness of the people demands their separation from other peoples considered as unholy. The discrimination between clean and unclean food was also meant to emphasize the idea of Israel's separateness from other nations.
- h 27 Against Witchcraft—This precept is supplementary to 19:31 and 20:6, where the Israelites are forbidden to consult magicians.
- i XXI 1-XXII 16 The Holiness of Priests—(i) In their domestic life (21:1-15) and (ii) in the discharge of their priestly duties (21:16-22:16).
- j 1-9 Regulations concerning Priests in general—As contact with a dead body produces uncleanness lasting seven days (Num 19:11), priests, who must always be ceremonially clean in order to be fit to offer the offerings of the Lord, are forbidden to mourn for any person except those who live in the same house. 4 is obscure in Heb and still more so in Vg. Probably the sense is: If he is married, he must not defile himself for his wife's relatives. The shaving of the head or, more precisely, of the forehead (Deut 14:1), the cutting of the corners of the beard, the scratching of the body were signs of mourning and superstitious practices; cf. 19:27 f. The character of their wives must be above suspicion, because the priest is consecrated to God.
- k 10-15 Analogous Regulations concerning the High-Priest—These were stricter and significant of the higher degree of sanctity inherent in the dignity of the high-priest. It was not permitted to him to mourn even for his parents. He was not to depart from the sanctuary where he resided or where he was officiating, because on his return he would defile it. He must marry a virgin, otherwise his children would be unholy.
- 16-24 Physical Disqualifications for the Priesthood—I The following blemishes were considered as canonical irregularities: blindness, lameness, hare-lip (?), congenital malformation, leg or hand fracture, to be crook-backed, dwarfism (or perhaps, emaciation), defective sight (?), scab, scurvy, crushed testicles. The persons affected were not unclean and therefore were not excluded from a share of the sacred offerings.
- XXII 1-9 Ceremonial Disqualifications in Priests to m partake of a Sacrificial Meal—The priests must be careful not to touch the holy offerings when they are in a condition of ceremonial impurity. Any transgression will be punished by degradation. On the impurities mentioned in 4-7 see chh 11 and 13-15; on 8 see 17:15.
- 10-16 Those Permitted to eat of the Priests' Portion—n The general rule is that only the members of a priest's family and those considered to belong thereto have the right to eat of the sacred offerings. Strangers have no right because they do not form part of the priest's household. A person living with a priest for a short time and a priest's hireling are not considered as members of his family. But a priest's slave and all those born in his house form part of his household. A priest's daughter married to one who is not a priest forfeits her right. But if she becomes a widow and, having no children, returns to her father's house, she becomes once more a member of the priestly family. Any unqualified person who inadvertently eats of the holy things, shall pay to the priest the price of the portion misappropriated and an additional fine equivalent to one-fifth of that price. No trespass-offerings are imposed.
- 17-25 Animals Disqualified for Sacrifice—Animals o offered for sacrifice must have no blemish in order that they may be acceptable to God. Victims that are blind or have a broken limb or are maimed, ulcerated, scabbed or scurried shall not be offered to the Lord. A slight concession is made in the case of freewill offerings; but in the case of vow-offerings when a benefit has been received from God the law admits of no exceptions. Such tainted victims are never accepted, not even if they are offered by a foreigner. On this general prohibition see Mal 1:8, 13.
- 26-30 Further Regulations concerning Sacrificial p Victims—These directions rest on humanitarian motives and are meant also to develop a stronger sense of parental affection.
- 31-33 Hortatory Conclusion. Cf. 20:22-26.
- XXIII 1-44 A Festal Calendar—This is a popular q liturgical calendar regulating divine worship and prescribing the religious observances of each feast day; cf. Num 28 and 29; Deut 16.
- 1-3 The Sabbath—The mention of the Sabbath is r very probably an insertion made by a reviser desiring to make a complete list. Note the repetition of the introductory formula: 'These are the feasts of the Lord' in 2 and 4 (Humm., 512); cf. §§ 172k, 173b.
- 4-14 The Passover (DV Phase)—For its institution s see Ex 12. The paschal observances were: attendance at the sanctuary on the first and the seventh day; abstention from servile work, but not from ordinary domestic work, during these two days; offering of sacrifices during the seven days of the festival. A ritual feature consisted in presenting a sheaf, the first-fruits of the harvest, to be waved by the priest before the Lord. On the waving ceremony see 7:30. This was done 'the next day after the sabbath' (11), the sabbath here denoting the first day of the paschal week, or, more probably, the sabbath falling during that week. The offering of the sheaf was a communal, not a private, offering. The consumption of the new crop became lawful only after the offering of the first sheaf. But bread could not be eaten before Pentecost (17).

193f 15-22 Pentecost or the Feast of Weeks—Its date fell seven weeks or fifty days after the offering of the first sheaf. This chronological relation between the Passover and Pentecost still survives in our liturgy. On this day a new offering is made by the whole community consisting of two leavened loaves, made of fine flour of that season, which are waved before the Lord. In addition to the loaves the following sacrifices are offered: seven lambs, a young bull and two rams for a holocaust with the usual oblation and libation; a he-goat for a sin-offering and two lambs for a peace-offering. In Num 28:27 the victims are slightly different. This may be due to textual corruption in either text. Attendance at the sanctuary and abstention from servile work are obligatory. 22 is an insertion from 19:9.

u 23-25 New Year's Day—There were at least two ways of reckoning the year. The religious year, which regulated the annual cycle of festivals, commenced with Nisan (= March-Apr.) in the spring (Ex 12:2), and the civil year commenced with Tishri (= Sept.-Oct.) in the autumn, as is still the Jewish practice today (Mishnah, tr. Rosh ha-shanah). Therefore the first day of the seventh month was the beginning of the civil year. The religious observances were: blowing of trumpets (cf. Ps 80:4), attendance at the sanctuary, abstention from servile work and offerings as specified in Num 29:1-6.

v 26-32 The Day of Atonement—See ch 16, especially 29-34.

w 33-36 The Feast of Tabernacles—Its date is fixed for the full moon day of Tishri, the seventh month. The celebrations last seven days and include abstention from servile work, attendance at the sanctuary and sacrifices. The eighth day was a supernumerary day marked by an 'aseref which is commonly taken to mean 'assembly', but is probably a technical term denoting abstention from work. The expression 'you shall do no servile work' would then be a popular way of expressing abstention from work. Supplementary instructions are given in 39-43. See also Num 29:7-11; Deut 16:13-15.

x 37-38 Subscription to the Calendar.

y 39-43 Supplementary Regulations concerning the Feast of Tabernacles—This seems to be an addition made when the calendar had already been closed. Here the festival is associated with the gathering of all the crops, though its historical origin is connected with the wanderings in the desert. Its characteristic feature was that during the seven days the Israelites were to dwell in booths. On the first day they carried in their hands fruits of beautiful trees, identified by a later tradition with the ethrog or citron, branches of palm trees, boughs of thick trees or, according to tradition, boughs of myrtle and willows of the brook. See Edersheim, 232-49.

44 is another conclusion which became necessary after the insertion of 39-43.

194a XXIV 1-9 Instructions respecting the Lamps of the Tabernacle and the Loaves of Proposition—This section forms an erratic block apparently detached from Ex 25-28. The reason for its actual position here and its relation to the law of holiness are matters of conjecture. 1-4 on the oil for the lamps are almost a verbal repetition of Ex 27:20 f.

b 5-9 The Loaves of Proposition—See Ex 25:30. Twelve cakes made of fine flour were to be placed in two symmetrical rows or piles on the golden table outside the veil of the sanctuary. Frankincense was put upon them in order with its sweet odour to remind God of the offering. They were a communal offering, not a sacrifice (9), and were most sacred. As they belonged to God, they could not be eaten except by the priests. Later references to the loaves of proposition or shewbread occur in 1 Kg 21:3-6; 3 Kg 7:48; cf. also Mt 12:3 f.

This practice of placing loaves upon a table before the deity was wide-spread and reflected the popular belief that gods, like men, needed daily nourishment

(W. R. Smith, 225 f.). But though the Israelitic practice may be a survival from an earlier stage of religious development, it acquired a higher significance. The bread was placed before God not for his nourishment but as a concrete expression of the nation's gratitude to God, the Giver of bread and all good things (Crampon on Ex 25:30).

10-23 The Punishment of a Blasphemer and the Law of Talion—It is not possible to determine either the historical context of this episode or its historical connexion with the penal laws apparently arising out of it. Cf. a similar incident in Num 15:32-36.

10-16, 23 The Blasphemer—Blasphemy was always regarded as one of the gravest offences. Later Judaism went so far as to forbid any mention of the Sacred Name substituting Adonai 'the Lord' for Yahweh in the reading of the Scripture. There being as yet no punitive dispositions against blasphemy a divine ruling was given to the effect that a blasphemer should be put to death. The witnesses then laid their hands on the offender's head thus signifying that he must bear the burden of his sin, and the whole congregation stoned him to death.

17-22 The Law of Talion—The provisions here laid down are based on the principle of criminal law current among the Babylonians and the Arabs of the desert, namely, the law of retaliation ('lex talionis'); cf. Ex 21:23-25 and the Code of Hammurabi, §§ 116, 200, 210, 219, 229, 232, 245, 263.

XXV 1-55 The Sabbatical Year and the Year of Jubilee—Two different institutions, which at certain times coincided, form the object of the regulations in this chapter. For the sake of clarity we will deal with the two institutions separately.

1-7, 20-22 The Sabbatical Year—This law is parallel to the law of the Sabbath (Ex 20:8-11). As a period of six days is followed by a day of rest, so a period of six years is followed by a year of rest. The two laws have a religious and a humanitarian motive. After six days' work man must have a day's rest and turn his mind to God; in the same manner the land, after having for six years exerted its full powers, must have a year's rest. Periodical fallow years were, and are still, normal in the agriculture of many countries, but the fixing of the fallow year permanently in the seventh year and the relation between the rest day and the rest year mark off the Hebrew institution from similar practices. In the seventh year it was not permitted to sow or to prune the vine. The spontaneous growth of the land could not be stored, but could only be gathered when needed for food by the owner of the field and his dependants (8) as well as by the poor people of the country (Ex 23:11). An assurance of divine providence in the shape of an abundant yield in the sixth year was intended to remove any apprehensiveness as to the sufficiency of the means of subsistence during the seventh year (20-22). The produce of the sixth year was to last not only for that year, but also for the following year and till the harvest time of the eighth year; therefore practically for three years (21).

8-19, 23-55 The Year of Jubilee—This institution is but another form of the week-institution based on the same principle of a period of seven time-units the last one of which is consecrated to God, the time-unit in this case being a seven-year period and the day of rest being transferred to the year following the seven septennial periods. This year, which was the 50th year, was called the year of jubilee from Heb. yôbel which passed into our languages through Greek and Latin. The word yôbel means 'a ram's horn used as a cornet' hence 'the blowing of cornets' and metonymically 'a festival or an extraordinary occurrence announced by the blowing of cornets' (BDB s.v.). The jubilee year was an institution of a social and economic character based on religious considerations. Its characteristic features were: (i) a fallow year; (ii) the reverting of property to its former owners; (iii) the emancipation of slaves; (iv) the suspension or, perhaps, the remission of debts. The relation of j 8-12 Institution of the Jubilee—The year of jubilee began on the tenth day of the seventh month (Tishri), that is, on the Day of Atonement and was announced by the blowing of trumpets. At the same time a proclamation went round that general release (DV 'remission') was granted, namely, that all landed property that had been sold, reverted to its original owners, and slaves were sent free to their families. It was also a fallow year, 11 f.

194h meaning between the Hebrew jubilee and the Catholic jubilee is obvious; cf. also Lk 4:19.

j 13-19, 23-24 Alienation of Land—The law regulating the purchase of land was based on the fact that God was the sole owner and man had only the use thereof. Consequently no one could sell his property outright; all he could do was to sell the usufruct, and even this sale was valid only to the next jubilee. In the jubilee year the usufruct thus acquired would expire and the land revert to its original owner. This law involves another social-economic principle, namely, that property is inseparably attached to the family.

k 25-28 Redemption of Land—This is a general provision of law based on the last-mentioned principle and contemplating, amongst other cases, one to which the jubilee concessions are applicable. If a person sells his field, his next-of-kin has the right to redeem it. If the vendor can afford it, he can buy it back himself. And if he cannot redeem it, and there is no kinsman to redeem it, he has to wait till the jubilee year when the land will be returned to him.

l 29-34 Redemption of Houses—29-30. A house in a walled city, if sold, may be redeemed within a year. If it is not redeemed within that period, it remains the permanent property of the buyer without enjoying the benefits of the jubilee law. But houses in a village or farmhouses are subject to the provisions of 14-28. 32. The houses of the Levites are redeemable at any time. 33-34. If they are not redeemed (the negative to be retained with Vg against MT), they revert to their original owners in the jubilee year. But their 'suburbs', i.e. the farmland adjacent to their cities, are inalienable, because they are their only means of subsistence.

m 35-38 Prohibition of Usury—It was forbidden to receive any sort of interest on money or on food from an Israelite. An impoverished Israelite must be given such help as is accorded to anyone who receives hospitality at one's house.

n 39-45 Emancipation of Slaves—An Israelite who has sold himself to another Israelite is set free in the jubilee year. Permanent servitude and ill-treatment are forbidden. God is their only master. Slaves were to be bought from other nations, and these were to be bond-servants for life. This different treatment was in accordance with the privileged position of Israel as God's chosen people.

o The apparent discrepancy between the Levitical law on slavery and the parallel law in Ex 21:2 ff. and Deut 15:12 is easily explained. Slaves were to regain their liberty in the sabbatical year. As the interval between two consecutive sabbatical years was six years, a six-year service was the maximum period for which a Hebrew slave could be made to serve. The six-year servitude, therefore, of Ex and Deut is to be taken as a maximum period, not as an invariable duration. The sabbatical year being a year of release, and the jubilee year being for all legal purposes a sabbatical year, it is evident that the same concessions are accorded to both. p If an Israelite is a slave of a resident foreigner he must be set free in the year of jubilee. But he may be redeemed before that year, the price of redemption being proportionate to the number of years intervening before the jubilee, as in the case of land (25-27).

q XXVI 1-2 Prohibition of Idolatry—This is a repetition of precepts which are found in other parts of the law of holiness; cf. 19:3 f.

3-46 Hortatory Conclusion—For similar exhortations see Ex 23:24-33; Lev 20:22-27; Deut 28.

r 3-13 The Blessings of Obedience—Blessings for this life are promised to those who obey God's law. They are: rain in its proper season and abundant crops; 194r peace and security; extermination of all enemies; increase of offspring; fulfilment of God's covenant; familiarity with God. These blessings must be taken in their literal and proper sense in accordance with the spirit of the OT religion which had to be adapted to the mentality of a primitive people in order to train them up to higher ideals of an unseen world by means of promises of material blessings. Spiritual blessings, however, are not excluded.

14-39 The Curses of Disobedience—These are arranged in groups, each one being introduced by a statement of the people's obstinacy: (i) disease, terrible things such as consumption, fever and defeat in war; (ii) drought will make the fertility of their land—the pride and the support of their strength (19) and the source of their prosperity—like a broken rod; (iii) wild animals will ravage the country and devour the children; (iv) siege and pestilence, the siege conditions being so severe that only a very scanty supply of bread will be available; (v) famine, desolation, dispersion among the nations (cf. 4 Kg 6:28 f. and Lam 4:10), the places of worship will not escape the ravages of war, and sacrifices will no longer be acceptable to God. Then after the people's deportation the land will enjoy a rest, the sabbatical rest to which she is entitled and which she has not enjoyed on account of the people's disregard of the law. In this manner the land will pay back her due to God. And those who survive this terrible ordeal will drag on a miserable existence in the land of their enemies on account of their iniquities and those of their fathers.

40-46 Repentance and Restoration—God's temporal punishments are corrective not vindictive. When their purpose is achieved forgiveness is granted. If the Israelites in the land of their exile confess their sins which have provoked God's anger, if they humble their insensible hearts acknowledging their punishment as an expiation for their sins, God will remember his covenant and will take them once more for his people. No mention of the return from the exile is made here as in Deut 30:3-5, the reason being that the restoration is represented as an accomplishment of God's promises to the patriarchs and not merely as a return to the land of their fathers.

D. Appendix. Commutation of Vows and Tithes 195a (ch 27).

XXVII 1-29 On Vows—The general law is that man is not obliged to make a vow; but if he does, he is under an obligation to fulfil it (Deut 23:21-3). The Levitical legislation deals only with the commutation of vows and contemplates the cases of a person, cattle, houses and lands being offered to God by vow.

1-8 Persons—If anyone offers himself to God, he must fulfil his vow by paying a sum of money corresponding to the estimated value of his person. The estimated value of male persons from the age of 20 years to 60 is 50 silver shekels. The estimate is different for different sexes and ages. In cases of poverty a reduction may be granted.

9-13 Cattle—No commutation is allowed for sacrificial animals. If any commutation is attempted, both animals become consecrated to God. Unclean animals, if vowed, must be presented to the priest and sold at the price adjudged by him. The person who made the vow may redeem the votive animal paying its estimated price and one-fifth in addition.

14-15 Houses—The regulations for unclean animals apply also to houses.

16-25 Fields—Two cases are contemplated. 16-21. If a field belongs to its owner by inheritance, the priest values it at the rate of 50 silver shekels for the amount of land that yields one homer (c 11 bushels) of barley. But as no inherited land can be alienated in perpetuity, the consecration of a field to God is only of temporary duration lasting till the next year of jubilee. Its price therefore will have to be lowered

195e according to the number of years since the last jubilee. The person consecrating a field has always the right of redemption as in the case of unclean animals and houses. If he fails to redeem it, his right will lapse, and in the jubilee year the field, instead of reverting to its original owner, will fall to the priests as sacred property. 22-25. If a field belongs to its owner by purchase, as the purchase is only temporary (25:14-17), the consecration is also temporary, and in the year of jubilee the field will revert to the vendor. All these transactions must be made on the basis of the sacred shekel which is worth 20 gerahs or obols, the gerah or obol being equivalent to about 1/3d.

f 26-27 What may not be vowed—The firstlings of cattle, sheep and goats cannot be vowed to God because they are already his (Ex 13:2). The firstlings of unclean animals fall under the general provision for unclean animals (11-13). According to Ex 13:13 the firstling of an ass, a non-sacrificial animal, must be redeemed by a lamb.

g 28-29 Things interdicted—The technical Heb. word expressing religious interdict is herem, Vg and DV anathema, EVV ban. The fundamental meaning of herem is 'separation, seclusion' and, in a religious sense, the separation of a thing from ordinary use and its dedication to God. Hence the biblical notion of herem is 'a thing or person irrevocably withdrawn from common use and entirely devoted to God'.

This general notion may be split up into two apparently opposite, though closely related, notions. A thing may be devoted to God either because it is agreeable to him, or because it is dangerous to the religious life of the people and therefore disagreeable to him. The first meaning naturally involves the idea of consecration the other that of destruction. What is irrevocably devoted to God, whether a man, animal or field, can neither be sold nor redeemed. If it is a thing consecrated to God, it goes to the priests for their maintenance or for the temple-service (Num 18:14; Ez 44:29); if it is harmful to the religious interests, it must be utterly destroyed (Ex 22:20; Num 21:2 f.; Deut 7:2; Jos 7; 1 Kg 15; etc.; cf. A. Fernandez, 'El herem biblico' in Bi (1924) 3-25).

h 30-33 Tithes—One-tenth of all the agricultural produce went yearly to the Lord and was given to the Levites for their maintenance (Num 18:21). Tithes however were redeemable on payment of an additional fifth part of their estimated value. But the tithes of cattle were not redeemable nor commutable. Every tenth animal passing under the rod, while the flock or herd was being counted on entering or leaving the fold, was separated from the others and consecrated to God. Though the animals were counted daily, tithes were paid once a year only.

34 Conclusion—This is a conclusion not of the appendix only but of the whole book.

NUMBERS

By P. P. SAYDON

196a Bibliography—For a list of commentaries from the patristic age to the closing years of the 19th century see R. Cornely, Historica et critica Intr. in U.T. libros sacros, II, 161–9 (CSS).

The following may be added: L. Cl. Fillion, La Sainte Bible commentée, tome I, Paris, 1888, 1925; A. Crampon, La Sainte Bible, tome I, Pentateuque, Paris, 1894; F. de Hummelauer, Commentarius in Numeros, Paris, 1899; *G. B. Gray, A critical and exegetical commentary on Numbers, Edinburgh, 1903; *A. R. S. Kennedy, Leviticus and Numbers (CBi), London, 1910–11; *A. McNeile, The Book of Numbers (CBSC), 1911; *L. E. Binns, The Book of Numbers (WC), London, 1927; P. Heinisch, Das Buch Numeri (BB), 1936; A. Clamer, Levitique, Nombres, Deutéronome, La Sainte Bible II, Paris, 1946.

For reference: F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, 2 vols, Paris, 1933–8; M. Hetzenauer, Theologia biblica VT, Freiburg i. B., 1908; Meignan, L'Ancien Testament, de Moïse à David, Paris, 1896; *W. R. Smith, The Religion of the Semites, London, 1927; *G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, London, 1935²⁸; A. Clamer, art. Nombres in DTC.

b Title—Numbers, the title of the fourth book of the Pentateuch, is derived from the Greek Ἀριθμοί through the Latin Numeri. It occurs in our oldest MSS B and S and may probably be referred to a pre-Christian origin (*H. B. Swete, An Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek, Cambridge, 1914, 215). In our modern editions of the Hebrew Bible it is called b'midbār 'in the wilderness,' which is the fifth word of the book, but in older times it was called way'dabbār 'and [Yahweh] spoke', the opening words of the book (St Jerome, Praef. in libros Sam. et Mal., PL 28, 552).

c Contents—The Greek-Latin title fails to convey any idea of the contents of the book. The chapters relating the numbering of the people, occupy a very small and not very important part of the book. The Hebrew title is more indicative of the contents which relate the history of the wanderings of the Israelites in the wilderness from the Sinaitic region to the plains of Moab. The Israelites had been for about one year in the wilderness of Sinai. They had received a religious and a social constitution and a complete system of liturgical worship. After being thus socially and religiously organized they moved northwards in the direction of the land of Canaan. On arriving at Cades (Qadesh) they attempted to invade the country from the south, but were defeated and had to turn back. For many years they wandered in the wilderness marching down the Arabah and up the land of Edom to the plains of Moab. Balaam the magician was called by the king of Moab to curse the Israelites, but God turned the magician's words into a blessing and a promise of further conquests. The Medianites are conquered, the land east of the Jordan is allotted to the tribes of Ruben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasse, and instructions are given for the division of the land of Canaan. Interspersed among the various episodes are a few groups of laws which are loosely connected with the narrative and can hardly be classified under headings.

d Structure and Analysis—The Book of Numbers is made up of historical narratives and legislation. The historical narrative covering a period of 38 years 196d has many wide gaps which render the reconstruction of the history of the wanderings impossible. But this lack of unity and proportion is generally exaggerated. On closer examination it is not difficult to discover at least the main lines and the leading ideas of the whole narrative. The book falls into three main sections: the Sinai section (1:1–10:10) relating the last events in the Sinai region; the desert section (10:11–22:1) relating some of the events which took place during the desert wanderings; the Moab section (22:2–36:13) relating the events in Moab. The geographical connexion is obvious. Not less obvious is the logical sequence.

Part I is apparently an appendix to Exodus and e Leviticus, but it is also, at least in its general lines, an introduction to Part II. The establishment of the tribal divisions round the tabernacle was a practical means to ensure a regular march of that vast army (10:5 f.). Part II is the main part of the book and one expects there a fuller history of the journey. On the contrary only a few isolated events are picked out. There is however a slender thread linking together these seemingly disconnected events. The leading ideas are the people's lack of confidence in God and God's punitive justice and fidelity. The people murmured and were punished at Qibron hatta'w'wāh (ch 11). Mary and Aaron murmured against Moses (ch 12). The people and the spies murmured again and God would have destroyed them had not Moses interceded (chh 13 and 14). Core, Dathan and Abiron rose up against Moses and were punished (ch 16). Once more the people murmured at Me Meribah (ch 20). Therefore rather than a history of the wanderings in the desert we have in Part II a few selected narratives illustrating the people's ingratitude and lack of faith and the justice and fidelity of God who punishes the ungrateful people, but in such a manner as not to render his promises void. Part III is an account of the end of the journey, the first conquests and the arrangements concerning the occupation and the division of the land of Canaan.

In each part there is a group of laws interrupting the f development of the narrative. Whether these laws have any chronological connexion with their historical context it is not possible to determine. They are generally very loosely connected with the context and with each other. Some of them supplement previous laws, as 5:5–8 and Lev 6:1–7; 9:6–14 and Ex 12; 15:1–15 and Lev chh 1–5. Others introduce completely new matter as the Nazarite regulations in 6:1–21. The legal sections form a small part of the book and should not cause any serious difficulty in understanding the desert story.

Religious Value—Some of the religious truths of g Leviticus, such as the holiness and unapproachableness of God, the sanctity demanded of his worshippers and particularly of his ministers are common to Numbers. Among those characteristic of Numbers we may mention:

1. The institution of ecclesiastical hierarchy. The divine service was to be performed by one tribe alone chosen by God (1:51; 3:5–13; 16). Divine vocation was absolutely necessary, and any usurpation of rights was severely punished (1:51; 16; 18:7). The 196g hierarchy consisted of three grades: the high-priest, the ordinary priests and the Levites. They had different rights and different duties. As they served at the sanctuary, they derived their maintenance from the sanctuary.

2. God's presence with his people, his care of and love for, them. This is illustrated by the cloud ever present amidst the people (9:15-23) and God's explicit declaration (35:34); by his responsive attitude to the needs of the people (11:31 f.; 20:2-13); by the assistance given to them to defeat their enemies and to conquer their lands (chh 21-31).

3. God's punitive justice and unchangeableness of purpose. Sin is always punished irrespective of the condition of the sinner. The people are punished (11:1-3, 33; 21:6; 25:1-5, 6-13); tribal chiefs are punished (14:36 f.); the Levites are punished (ch 16); Mary is punished (12:10); Moses and Aaron are punished (20:12). But the people is not totally exterminated, and so God's promises stand firm; cf. Ez 20:18-22.

4. The power of intercession. 'The continual prayer of a just man availeth much' (Jas 5:16). Moses, the faithful servant in the Lord's house (12:7; Heb 3:5) repeatedly and successfully interceded with God for his unfaithful people (12:11-14; 14:11-24).

197a A. I 10-X 10 The Last Events at Sinai.

I-IV Before the Departure from Sinai.

I The Census of the Twelve Tribes—The reason for this census is not stated. Allusions to a census in view of a religious tax occur in Ex 30:12; 38:25. The total number of the Israelites under the leadership of Moses is given on three most important occasions: when they set out from Egypt to Palestine (Ex 12:37), when they marched off from Sinai towards Palestine (Num 1), and when they were about to enter Palestine (Num 26). There appears therefore to be in the mind of the writer a relation between the number of the Israelites and the ultimate destination of their journey. This relation accounts for the numbering of the people better than any supposed motive of taxation and military service.

b 1-19 The Appointment of 12 Tribal Representatives—On the first of the second month of the second year after the departure from Egypt Moses was commanded to number all male Israelites from the age of 20 years and upwards. The census was to be carried out on the basis of military fitness or, better, on the principle that the age of 20 marked the beginning of manhood and that the real strength of a nation was represented by its fully-grown male members. Each tribe was to be numbered clan by clan and family by family. The tribe of Levi was not to be included (47).

c 20-46 The Numbers of the Several Tribes—The order of the tribes is slightly different in LXX. A more serious difficulty is raised by the numbers which seem exaggerated. Their historicity can hardly be maintained (Humm., 220-30, 321; Gray, 11-15). A total of 603,550 males from 20 years upwards represented a population of well over 2,000,000, including women and children. Now considering the size of the Sinaitic peninsula and the enormous provisions and supplies of water which this multitude and their cattle required, it is inconceivable how a population of two millions could live for over one year in the Sinaitic peninsula and travel in the wilderness for nearly forty years. But it is not easy to explain how these numbers arose. Humm. believes that a scribe (inepte pius) has multiplied each number a hundredfold, so that the total of 603,550 (46) is really 6,035 (226). There are other instances of similar numerical inflations (cf. 1 Kg 6:19), which are best explained sometimes as rhetorical devices and sometimes as textual corruptions.

d 47-54 The Levites not Numbered—The sacred duties of the Levites, as specified in 50 f., account for their not being numbered with the other tribes. They had no civil duties and therefore, constitutionally, they did not form part of the civil population, but were, so to say, an independent unit, a religious group under ecclesiastical jurisdiction. No one but Levites had the right to approach the tabernacle. Intruders were punished by death. This unapproachableness of God symbolized the unbridgeable distance between God and man.

II The Arrangement of the Camp—This chapter embodies a description of the camp and the order of marching. The position of the priests and the Levites in the camp is given in the next chapter. The encampment was a vast quadrilateral with the central quadrangle occupied by the tabernacle. The Israelites were to pitch their tents on the four sides of the tabernacle, three tribes on each side, and everyone with his own company and under the ensign of his family. Judah was to encamp on the eastern side. This position of honour was a sign of the pre-eminence promised to Judah by his father (Gen 49:8 ff.). Next to them were Issachar and Zabulon. The three tribes formed one camp, the camp of Judah, and were to march first. Ruben was to encamp on the southern side with Simeon and Gad. They formed the camp of Ruben and were to march in the second place. Then followed the tabernacle, i.e. the camp of the Levites in the middle of the march. The western side was to be occupied by Ephraim with Manasses and Benjamin. They formed the camp of Ephraim and were to march in the third place or first after the Levites. The northern side was assigned to Dan with Nephtali and Aser. They formed the camp of Aser and were to march at the rear.

III-IV The Levites, their Numbers and Duties—The sacerdotal legislation of Leviticus makes no mention of the Levites, all priestly duties being performed by the sons of Aaron. The institution of the Levitical order is first narrated here. The genealogical relation between the priests and the Levites was as follows: the priests were the direct descendants of Aaron, the son of Amram, son of Caath, son of Levi (Ex 6:16-20); the Levites were the descendants of Levi by other branches. The priesthood was reserved to the sons of Aaron, who were assisted in their duties by the Levites.

III 1-4 The Priests—The Aaronic priests were Eleazar and Ithamar and their offspring, Nadab and Abiu having died without issue (Lev 10:1 f.). Moses' name in 1 is unnecessary because his descendants had no right to the priesthood, but were simply Levites.

5-10 The Order of the Levites—The Levites are appointed to assist the priests in their service, such as the offering of sacrifices, and the community in their duties towards the sanctuary, to do all the work of the tabernacle and to take care of its furniture (cf. 1:50). They are given to Aaron and his descendants as a gift from the children of Israel, but the priesthood will be the exclusive right of the Aaronites, and any encroachment on their rights will be punished by death.

11-13 The Substitution of the Levites for the Firstborn—All the firstborn of Israel, representing as they do the first reproduction of life by a married couple, belong to God, the source of life. They became peculiarly his when he smote the firstborn of Egypt (Ex 13). They must therefore be devoted to his service. As this however was hardly practicable, God substituted the males of the tribe of Levi for the male firstborn of the other tribes. Thus the Levites became 'sanctified', i.e. separated from the rest and dedicated to the divine service. The reason why the sons of Levi were elected as a substitute was perhaps the zeal shown by them in avenging the honour of God for the idolatrous worship of the golden calf (Ex 32:26-29).

14-39 The Census of the Levites, their Stations and Charges—The Levites were divided into three main divisions descending from the three sons of Levi, Gerson, Caath, and Merari respectively (Ex 6:16). They were to be numbered from the age of one month, because the firstborn were not redeemable before that age (Num 18:16). The Gerson division numbered 7,500. They were encamped on the western side of the tabernacle and were in charge of its hangings. The Caath division numbered 8,300 according to a gener-

197j ally adopted emendation of MT and Vg. They camped on the southern side and were entrusted with the care of the sacred furniture. The Merari division numbered 6,200. They camped on the northern side and had the care of the framework of the tabernacle. The eastern side was reserved to Moses and the priests. The camp of the Levites was between that of the Israelites and the tabernacle. The total number of the Levites was 22,000. The priests were not included. On the value of these numbers see note to 1:20-46.

k 40-51 The Substitution of the Levites—The substitution enjoined in 3:11-13 is carried into effect. The census of the redeemable firstborn yielded a total of 22,273 with an excess of 273 over the number of Levites. As there were no more Levites to substitute for the surplus firstborn, these were redeemed by the payment of 5 shekels (c 12s 6d) apiece. The proceeds were handed over to the priests.

l IV 1-49 The Numbers of the Serving Levites and their Duties—In ch 3 the Levites were numbered in view of their substitution for the firstborn, here they are numbered in view of their special duties. In ch 3 their service is described in a general way, here it is defined more particularly. On account of the heavy work of transport they entered upon their service at the age of 30 and were released at 50. In 8:23-26 the period of Levitical service is from 25 to 50, and in 1 Par 23:24-27 from 20 and upwards; cf. also 2 Par 31:17; Esd 3:8. The difference may be easily explained by the nature of the duties they had to perform; see on 8:23-26.

m The sons of Caath were entrusted with the transport of the ark, the table, the candlestick, the altar of incense, the altar of sacrifice and, according to LXX, the laver, and their vessels. As the Levites could not touch these sacred objects, the priests did all the preliminary work of wrapping them up, fitting them with staves and placing those which could not be so fitted upon a sort of wagon (DV 'bars' 10, 12). Then the sons of Caath would come and carry these objects. Eleazar exercised a general supervision over the tabernacle and had the immediate care of certain specified objects, 16. The words 'and over them shall be Eleazar' 16, are not in MT, but they agree with 3:32; 4:28b, 33b. The sacredness of these objects was further emphasized by the death penalty with which any Levite imprudently looking at them was threatened (cf. 1 Kg 6:19).

n The Gersonites were to carry the hangings of the tent and the court, and the curtain at the entrance of the court which was around the tabernacle and around the altar. They were under the supervision of Ithamar. The task of the Merarites was to carry the framework of the tabernacle, the pillars, boards, bars, sockets and cords. They too were under the supervision of Ithamar.

198a V 1-X 10 A Miscellany of Laws and Narratives—Some of these regulations and narratives, e.g. ch 7, would have had a better place in Exodus; others, as 5:5-6, 27, belong to the Levitical legislation; a few, as 5:1-4, 10:1-10, are supplemental to chh 1-4.

b V 1-4 The Removal of Unclean Persons from the Camp—The camp, God's dwelling-place amidst his people, had to be kept clean by the removal of lepers (Lev 13), those who suffered from a discharge (Lev 15) and those who were defiled by contact with the dead (Num 19). Lepers were always excluded from cities (4 Kg 7:3; 15:5); natural discharges too involved exclusion from the military camp (Deut 23:9-11).

c 5-10 Reparation for Certain Offences, and Sacred Gifts—The regulation contained in 6-8 contemplates the case when the person to whom compensation for damages is due is dead and there is no relative to represent him. If a person commits a sin that causes material damage to another person (6), he will incur a guilt involving a duty of compensation; cf. Lev 6: 1-7. The words 'by negligence' are not in MT, but have been improperly supplied by LXX and Vg from Lev 5:15; 6:2, etc. But if the wronged person is dead and has no relative to receive the compensation, 198c this shall be paid to the priest as God's representative. The offender shall moreover offer a ram for his expiation as prescribed in Lev 6:6.

9f. are supplemental to Lev 7:28-38. The word trūmah (DV 'firstfruits') is used in its liturgical sense of anything 'lifted off a larger mass, or separated from it, for sacred purposes' (Driver, Deuteronomy, ICC, 142). This portion is assigned to the officiating priest, but the rest belongs to the offerer.

11-31 Trial by Ordeal—This was a widespread practice in antiquity. It was known in Babylonia long before Moses (cf. Code of Hammurabi §§ 2 and 132; HDB, V, 599-608) and was common among many Semitic peoples (W. R. Smith, 179 ff.). It survived down to the Middle Ages, and the Church has repeatedly expressed her disapproval thereof. From the 14th and 15th cent. the practice was gradually discontinued (cf. J. P. Kirsch in CE art. Ordeal).

Although this practice rests on the universal belief that no one guilty of any sin may appear before God with impunity, and that God will never permit an innocent person to be punished as guilty, with the Hebrews it had no superstitious associations nor any presumptuous call for a divine intervention. It does not subject the suspected person to any dreadful hazard such as walking over red-hot bars. An innocuous potion was the only means used as a test of innocence. Moreover, with other peoples this practice was intended to detect a secret sin; with the Hebrews, on the contrary, it was intended to prove one's innocence by washing away all suspicions of conjugal infidelity.

12f. are a description of the sin which a woman is suspected of having committed. When the suspicious husband has no legal proof against his wife, he has the right to bring her before the priest carrying with him an offering called 'the offering of jealousy' or 'the offering of remembrance (of a real or supposed sin)' and consisting of one-tenth part of an ephah (7 pints) of barley meal without oil and without frankincense, as in the case of a poor man's offering (Lev 5:11). The priest then takes some water mixed with a small dose of dust from the floor of the sanctuary, leads the woman before the tabernacle, uncovers her head as a sign of distress and places the offering on her hands, while he holds the water which is 'holy' (17) on account of the holiness of the place whence the dust has been taken, and 'bitter' (18) on account either of its taste or of the harmful effect it was intended to produce in case of guilt. Then follows the most impressive part of the ceremony. The woman swears her innocence, calling down upon herself a divine punishment if she is really guilty. The punishment very probably was miscarriage or sterility or something similar. In order to express the entrance of the imprecations into the woman's bowels more forcibly, the curses were written down on a piece of skin or some other writing material and washed off into the bitter water which was then given to the woman to drink. Then the offering was brought to the altar. For the waving ceremony see Lev 7:30. It was not usual to wave cereal offerings. Although an instantaneous divine response was naturally expected, it appears that the result was not so speedy (28). Pregnancy and normal childbirth were infallible signs of innocence, but miscarriage would convict the unfortunate woman.

The concluding 29-31 must be interpreted in the same sense as 12 f. viz. whether the woman is guilty or not, the husband has the right to bring her to the priest and call upon God to decide. If she is innocent, the husband is not to blame for having suspected his wife's fidelity; but if she is guilty, she will have to bear the consequences of her sin.

VI 1-21 The Nazarite Vow—A Nazarite is a person who submits himself by vow to certain restrictions. The Hebrew word is nāzīr from the verb nāzar which implies the idea of a religious separation, hence 198i dedication to God (cf. BDB s.v.). The Nazarite vow was, as a rule, of temporary duration. Lifelong Nazarites were exceptional; we know only of Samson (Jg 13:5) and Samuel (1 Kg 1:11), in both cases the vow being made by the mother. The institution survived into NT times. John the Baptist was probably a Nazarite (Lk 1:15); cf. also Ac 18:18; 21:23-25.

j The representation of a Nazarite as a person consecrated to God needs explanation. Considering the prominent part which hair plays in the Nazarite regulations, one feels inclined to consider the Nazarite vow as a hair-offering or as a consecration of one's hair to God. Hair is certainly an appreciable element of man's natural perfection, and its offering to God involves on the part of the offerer a loss which not many people may be willing to sustain. Hence the religious significance of the hair-offering does not lie in a symbolical union of the worshipper with the deity (W. R. Smith, 325-35), but rather in giving up to God, the Giver of all one has and is, a part of one's self. This consecration of one's hair renders the whole person in some way sacred, and it is in this sense that a Nazarite may be considered as a person consecrated to God.

k 2-8 Regulations to be Observed by the Nazarite—The Nazarite is to observe these regulations: (i) He shall abstain from all intoxicant liquors and from all the products of the vine. This may be considered as a secondary feature meant to render the consecration more agreeable to God; (ii) The most important regulation is that the Nazarite must not cut his hair during the term of his vow. The reason is that his hair has already been promised to God and therefore cannot be cut until the day when it is actually offered on the altar. The period of the vow may therefore be regarded as a preparatory sanctification of one's hair before it is given to God. (iii) He must avoid any contact with a dead body. Not even for his closest relatives is he allowed to defile himself, because he has 'the consecration of his God upon his head', i.e. he has on his head not only the mark of his consecration to God, but the thing itself that is consecrated to God.

l 9-12 Involuntary Violation of the Vow—These regulations were so stringent that if a Nazarite happened to defile himself unintentionally, his vow was considered violated and was therefore to be undertaken afresh. On the seventh day, when he purified himself, he shaved his head, his hair being no longer worthy to be offered to God, and the day after he brought to the priest two turtledoves or two pigeons for a sin-offering and a holocaust. He brought also a lamb for a trespass offering. The reason for this sacrifice was that the defilement of the Nazarite, though unintentional, constituted a real transgression which had to be expiated by a special sacrifice; see P. P. Saydon, CBQ (1946) 397. On that day he recovered his sanctity and had to commence the period of his vow afresh.

m 13-21 The Conclusion of the Vow—On the expiration of the period of the vow the Nazarite was presented at the entrance of the tabernacle. Various sacrifices were offered with their accompaniments of cereal-offerings and libations. Then the Nazarite shaved off his hair and burned it over the fire on the altar. The ceremony might now be considered terminated; what remained was the waving of the portions due to the priest and the sacred meal. On the waving ceremony see note to Lev 7:30. Although the law prescribed only three sacrifices, the Nazarite might bind himself to more (21b). The original significance of the ceremony, which was the offering of a part of one's self to God, was, to a great extent, obscured by the preponderant part played by the sacrifices which formed the central part of all the liturgical ceremonies.

n 22-27 The Form of the Priestly Blessing—This is obviously out of its context. Its original place was probably after Lev 9:22 where the first mention of Aaron's blessing occurs. It is a short poem of three verses with two members each: bless—keep; shew his face—have mercy; turn his countenance—give peace. It is a prayer for material prosperity and safety from enemies, divine pleasure symbolized by the brightness of the face and bestowal of divine favours, divine protection and security against all misfortunes. Thus the name of the Lord invoked upon the people will be for them a source of blessings. There is an echo of this form of blessing in Ps 66; cf. also Eccus 50:22. The analogy of this triple benediction to the Christian form of benediction in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost has already been noticed by the Fathers. cf. also 2 Cor 13:13.

VII 1-89 The Gifts of the Princess—Chronologically this chapter should come after Ex 40 or after Lev 8-9 where the consecration of the tabernacle is referred to (Lev 8:10 f.). Stylistically, however, it is related to chh 1-4, having in common with them the same love for classification, numbers, and names.

The heads of the twelve tribes made two offerings. The first consisted of six wagons and twelve oxen for the transport of the tabernacle. Moses received the gifts and assigned them to the Gersonites and to the Merarites who had to carry the tabernacle (4:21-33). To the Caathites he gave nothing as they had to carry the sacred objects on their shoulders (4:15).

The other offering (10-89) was a dedication gift of the same amount for the several tribes and was to be presented on separate days. Each gift consisted of one silver dish of c 60 oz. Troy, one silver bowl of c 33 oz., both full of fine flour tempered with oil, one golden mortar or saucer weighing c 4½ oz. full of frankincense, one bullock, one ram and one lamb for a holocaust, one he-goat for a sin-offering, and two oxen, five rams, five lambs for a peace-offering.

The concluding verse records the fulfilment of the divine promise contained in Ex 25:22, but it has hardly any relation to what precedes.

VIII 1-4 Instructions concerning the Setting of the Lamps upon the Candlestick—For a detailed description of the candlestick and the manner in which the lamps were to be set up see Ex 25:31-39. 2 according to MT must read as follows: '... When thou settest up the lamps, the seven lamps shall (be placed so as to) give light in front of the candlestick'.

5-22 The Institution of the Levites—This section supplements the parallel passage in 3:5-13 where their institution is enjoined. The ritual comprehends two parts: purification and presentation, besides the usual sacrifices.

The Levites were first sprinkled with the water of purification, so called because it was intended to remove any ceremonial uncleanness (Num 19); cf. the rite of aspersion with holy water in the Catholic Church. Then they shaved themselves all over the body and washed their garments. This outward cleanness symbolized inward purity. They were not anointed like priests, hence their sanctity was merely negative.

When so cleansed, they were brought before the tabernacle where the representatives of the people laid their hands on them. The imposition of hands, which in NT times became a rite of the ordination of presbyters and deacons, here meant that the Levites were set apart and appointed for a certain office; cf. Ac 6:6; 13:3. Then followed the 'waving ceremony' which consisted, probably, in a forward movement of the Levites towards the tabernacle and back again to their original position. The waving ceremony, which is expressed in Heb. by the verb hēnīp, is inadequately rendered by DV 'offered' (Vg oblatus) 18, and 'lifted' (Vg elevavit) 21. The offering of the sacrifices was the last part of the ceremonial, after which the Levites entered on their duties.

23-26 The Age Limits of the Levitical Service—The period of Levitical service was from the age of twenty-five until fifty. This apparently contradicts 4:3, but 26 gives the clue to the solution. At the age of fifty the Levites were released from compulsory service, but were allowed to give voluntary assistance or to 199a do light work compatible with their age. We may therefore assume that the Levites entered upon their duties at the age of twenty-five, but the heavier work of transport was not compulsory before they were thirty (Humm., 68).

f IX 1-14 The Institution of a Supplementary Passover—This section may be divided into three parts: celebration of the Passover on the appointed day (1-5); a case arising out of the impossibility of unclean persons keeping the Passover (6-8); supplementary paschal regulations (9-14).

1-5. On the celebration of the Passover, see Ex 12:6 ff. On defilement through contact with a corpse, 6-8, see Lev 21:1; Num 19:11. Implicitly these men asked for a modification of the existing law.

Supplementary regulations are given in 9-14. The petition was granted and a new law was given providing also for the case of those who happened to be on a distant journey. The second Passover must be kept exactly according to all the prescriptions of the normal Passover; 11b=Ex 12:8; 12a=Ex 12:10, 46. Those who without any reason fail to keep the Passover on the appointed day are to be punished by civil excommunication or banishment. 14=Ex 12:48, 49.

g 15-23 The Cloud Directing the Israelites—This and the following section (10:1-10) close the Sinai period and are an introduction to another period of the history of the desert wanderings. The cloud has already been mentioned in Ex 40:34-38, but here a detailed description is given of its functions. It rested over the tabernacle all day and all night. It looked dark by day and bright by night. When it was lifted up, the people would march off, and where it stopped, they would halt and remain camped until it moved again. The cloud therefore served not only as a symbol of divine protection but also as a divine guidance through the desert. Despite a certain remote analogy with the smoking cresset mounted on a pole above Alexander's tent (Q. Curtius Rufus, Hist. Alex. Magni, 5, 2, 7), the cloud, both in its origin and movements, is represented as a miraculous phenomenon and for such it is generally held.

h X 1-10 The Silver Trumpets—The silver trumpet is described by BDB as 'a long, straight, slender metal tube, with a flaring end' like those that can still be seen represented on the Arch of Titus at Rome. Their purpose was to summon the community when the camp was to break up. They were also to be blown in battle and on all the festivals; cf. 31:6; Jos 6:4-20; 2 Par 13:12, 14; 2 Par 29:27; Ps 97:6.

200a B. X 11-XX 21 From Sinai to Cades (Qadesh)—This part covers a period of about thirty-eight years, which with the one-year sojourn in the Sinaitic wilderness and the three-month journey from Egypt to Sinai (Ex 19:1) make up the forty foretold (14:34). Although the number forty may not have an exact mathematical value, the time of the wanderings was certainly much longer than the events related suggest. Of the whole period very little is known, and all attempts to reconstruct the history must necessarily involve much guesswork.

X 11-XI 34a From Sinai to Qibrôt hatta'wāh.

X 11-36 The Departure from Sinai.

11-23 The Order of the March—On the twentieth of the second month of the second year, eleven months after their arrival in Sinai, the Israelites started again upon their journey towards the land of promise. The cloud of smoke rose up and the people marched out of Sinai by successive stages. After several days of journeying they reached the wilderness of Pharan which lay north of Sinai and south of the wilderness of Cades and is commonly identified with the eastern part of the desert of et-Tih (Abel, I, 434).

b The order of the march corresponds exactly with that described in ch 2. The order of the Levites is seemingly different. But in 2:17 the Levites are mentioned collectively as one body, while in 10:17 they are mentioned separately according to their various duties. It is but natural that those carrying the framework and the hangings of the tabernacle should march in front in order to have time to set up the tabernacle before the arrival of the ark and the sacred objects (Humm., 80).

29-32 Hobab requested to accompany the People—e Moses' father-in-law is called Hobab here and Jg 4:11, while in Ex 3:1 and 18:1 his name is Jethro. Moreover in 29 and Ex he is described as a Midianite, but in Jg he is called a Kenite. Finally Moses' request to Hobab is inconsistent with God's promise to lead the Israelites through the desert, Ex 32:34. Limiting ourselves to the exegetical aspect of the problem, we may say that Hobab was probably the real name of Moses' father-in-law, and Jethro an honorific title, while Raguel (Ex 2:18; Num 10:29) may have been the name of a remoter ancestor. It is possible that Hobab was Moses' brother-in-law, and Jethro his father-in-law (Humm., 81; Fillion, 463; Crampon, 486), but Heb. hōlên denotes always the father-in-law. The Midianites and the Kenites were two racially related nomadic tribes whose centre of radiation was the eastern side of the Gulf of Aqabah and the rocky land SW. of the Dead Sea respectively. Lastly I am inclined to believe that Moses simply wished his kinsman to have a share of the good things which the Lord was about to give them (29). On Hobab's refusing this attractive promise, Moses urged his kinsman further alleging his own ignorance of the desert routes to Canaan (31). An alternative explanation of 31 is: You know well the places through which we shall have to travel under the direction of the cloud. It is not impossible, however, that Moses showed some lack of faith as on another occasion; cf. 20:10. We do not know Hobab's final reply.

33-34 The Departure from the Mount of the Lord—d They started on a three days' journey with the ark going before them. We are not to understand that they never halted during this time, but the halts were short. The position of the ark in front of the host contradicts v 21 which places the ark in the middle of the march. It may be that a detachment of Levites carrying the ark marched in front of the people while the other Levites carrying the sacred objects marched in the middle (Crampon, 486; Fillion, 464), or the words 'before them' are to be taken in a wide sense denoting simply a prominent position of the ark in respect of the people (Humm., 84 f). 33b is perhaps a redactional addition made after Jos 3:11.

35-36 The Song of the Ark—These two verses are probably the beginning of two songs composed after some victory; cf. 35 and Ps 67:1. Their martial tone hardly suits the conditions of the initial stages of the wanderings.

XI Incidents at Taberah and Qibrôt hatta'wāh—f The incidents related here are: the punishment of the murmurers; the lust for flesh and the quails; the appointment of the seventy elders.

1-3 The Murmurings at Taberah—Taberah is not mentioned elsewhere in the OT except in Deut 9:22. The locality is unknown. After long months of sedentary life in the Sinaitic region the march through 'the terrible and vast wilderness' (Deut 1:19) must have been far from pleasant, and soon produced an outburst of complaints. The Lord punished their lack of faith by fire, probably caused by lightning, which destroyed a part of the camp. Through Moses' intercession the fire was extinguished and the place was called Tab'ērāh, i.e. 'a burning.'

4-15 The Lust for Flesh—This incident seems to have followed immediately upon the preceding, but no time indication is given. The people led by Moses were to some extent a mixed multitude (cf. Ex 12:38). There were some who had joined the Israelites without being particularly attached to the religion of Yahweh. As their chief interest was their material well-being, they asked for flesh as a change of diet. They were dissatisfied with the manna, and their dissatisfaction soon spread. The Israelites began to voice their dis-

200b content, remembering their varied diet in Egypt. In 6 Heb. nepes (often 'soul') means 'throat' (P. Dhorme, L'emploi métaphorique des noms de parties du corps en hébreu et en arabe, 1923, Paris, 18 f.). The incident illustrates a fact of universal experience that bad company is a source of corruption; cf. 1 Cor 5:6 'A little leaven corrupteth the whole lump'. The mention of the manna has called for a parenthetic digression (7-9) supplementing the scanty information given in Ex 16:14, 31. The narrative then returns to v 6.

1 Moses must have been sorely grieved at the people's insensibility and ingratitude, and his state of mind is clearly reflected in his expostulation with God which reaches its climax in his petition for a sudden death as a means of deliverance from a desperate situation. Moses' words, strong though they are, do not reveal any lack of confidence in God (11-15). On the contrary they express an unshakeable conviction in God's power and a sense of filial attachment to him. Moses had accepted the task of leading the people through the desert, he had repeatedly warned them, he had wrought wonders before them, he had borne with their weaknesses, but their many infidelities were a burden too heavy for him to carry. He needed further assistance, but if he did not deserve it, then he was ready to give up his life to God rather than bear the responsibility of the people's offences. For similar outbursts of apparent despair cf. Ex 32:32; 3 Kg 19:4.

201a 16-17, 24-30 The Appointment of the Seventy Elders—In his expostulation with God Moses raised two points: he was unable to carry the burden alone and he was unable to feed the people with meat. God's answer covers both points. For the sake of clarity however we separate the two, dealing first with the appointment of the elders and then with the feeding of the people.

b Moses was commanded to select seventy leading personalities of the people and bring them to the tent of meeting. There God would come down and communicate to them a portion of Moses' spirit in order that they might assist him in his difficult task. Though the spirit was conceived of materially as something that could be multiplied and divided (cf. 4 Kg 2:9 f.), the words 'taking away of the spirit that was in Moses' (25) must be taken in the sense of a communication of a divine spirit from the spirit that was in Moses, a communication which would involve no diminution of the spirit of Moses. Spirit here means a power enabling one to perform extraordinary deeds. On the appointed day a divine spirit descended upon the seventy elders who immediately began to prophesy. 'To prophesy' does not mean 'to predict the future', but 'to act and speak in the name of God, on his authority, as his delegate and spokesman' (E. Tobac-J. Coppens, Les Prophètes d'Israël, I, Malines, 1932, 3-9). Therefore the seventy elders were to be God's representatives but subordinate to Moses. The exercise of the prophetic office may have involved the performance of certain actions which were intended to manifest the powers communicated to them by God and to enhance their authority over the people and thus to render their assistance to Moses more effective. The end of 25 should read: 'and they ceased'.

c Meanwhile two men, Eldad and Medad, received the gift of prophecy without going to the tent of meeting. Nothing is known of these two, not even whether they were two of the seventy prevented by some unknown reason from going to the tent or another two besides the seventy. On their manifesting by means of certain external actions the reception of the prophetic gift which was not a communication from the spirit of Moses, and which was therefore considered as placing them in a position of independence in regard to Moses, a young man brought him the news. Josue, who from a youth had been his attendant, interfered asking that they should be stopped. Josue was too much concerned for Moses' honour and pre-eminence which, he thought, would be seriously jeopardized if similar prophetic outbreaks were permitted outside the control of his leader. But the latter was far more concerned for the good of the people than for his own honour, and to his jealous attendant he replied expressing his desire that God would even bestow his spirit upon the whole people. The story besides illustrating the principle that the prophetic gift is not restricted to any class, reveals also a fine trait of Moses' character. Cf. Christ's reply to the sons of Zebedee, Lk 9:54-56. Nothing is known of the later history of this prophetic council.

18-23, 31-34a The Quails—God granted the second d request. The people were to be ceremonially clean on the following day when God would manifest his power before them. God's gifts are always generously given, and therefore the supply of meat would be so abundant as to satisfy the people's wish even for a month till at last the flesh became nauseous to them. Moses hardly believed this to be possible, or at least wondered how God could provide such an enormous quantity of flesh. But God removed all his doubts by asserting his unlimited power. God fulfilled his promise. A wind blowing in a NW. direction from the Gulf of Aqabah drove a huge flight of quails over the camp. It is a well-known fact that quails in springtime migrate in enormous flocks from the east, cross the Mediterranean and in autumn return to the south. In their long flights they are sometimes exhausted and fall to the ground so that they can easily be caught. See the chapter on 'Quail Netting' in Yesterday and To-day in Sinai, by Major C. S. Jarvis (Edinburgh and London, 1933). The people soon began to catch the birds, and the quantity was so enormous that the least fortunate man caught as much as ten cores (=100 bushels). These were cured by drying and eaten without cooking. The people's lust for flesh was thus satisfied, but they had to pay a terrible penalty. They had not yet exhausted the whole supply of dried quails when an epidemic broke out. Intemperance may have been one of the causes of the mortality. Those who died were buried outside the camp, and the place was called Qibrôt halla'wāh or 'the graves of lust'. The locality is generally identified with a site called Rweis el-Ebeirig, a ten hours' march from Jebel Musa (Abel, II, 214).

34b-XII 15 At Haseroth; Moses Vindicated—The e people moved from 'the graves of lust' and camped at Haseroth, the modern 'Ain el-Hadra (Abel, II, 214). Whether this narrative relates a domestic incident originating in female jealousy (Binns, 75) or expresses a widespread feeling of opposition to marriages with foreigners (Humm., 98), such as we meet with in the time of Esdras, it is certainly intended to vindicate Moses' supreme authority and his lawful right to speak for Yahweh. Mary, Moses' sister, has the leading part. The motive of her murmuring was that Moses' wife was a Cushite. Cush, which usually denotes Ethiopia, is here probably the name of a N. Arabian tribe to which reference is made in 2 Par 14:9, 12 f.; 16:8. According to Ex 2:15-21 Sephora, Moses' wife, was a Madianite, and Madian is in NW. Arabia. It is possible that Moses married another woman beside Sephora. Moses' wife may have enjoyed some special privileges on account of her husband's position. In any case the proud sister of the great leader would never tolerate that a man allied with a foreign woman should have pre-eminence over her and over her brother who had preserved unstained the purity of their race. She herself was a prophetess (Ex 15:20), and claimed equal authority and equal rights to leadership.

Mary's complaints were not unnoticed by Yahweh. f This anticipates the impending divine judgement. In a parenthetic remark Moses is said to be 'a man exceeding meek above all men'. Though he was attacked by his sister, he suffered silently and did not ask God to vindicate his honour. This laudatory statement is commonly toned down by modern commentators who give to the Heb. word translated 'meek' the meaning 'afflicted, ill-treated, bowed down' or 201f 'humble, submissive' (E. König, Hebr. und aram. Wörterbuch, 338; Humm., 99 f.; Gray, 123). Yahweh himself took up the defence of his servant. Moses, Aaron, and Mary were summoned before him to the tabernacle where a statement of Moses' position was made. The ordinary mode of prophetic revelation is by means of visions and dreams (cf. J1 2:28), but with Moses, who was Yahweh's most trusted servant (Heb 3:2), God dealt with greater intimacy speaking to him mouth to mouth or face to face (Ex 33:11; Deut 34:10), plainly and not enigmatically. Moreover Moses beheld the form of the Lord (DV 'not by riddles and figures doth he see the Lord'). It was a common belief in OT times that no one could see the deity and remain alive (Gen 32:30; Ex 33:20; Jg 6:22 f.; 13:22), but Moses was allowed to see the form of the Lord though not the Lord himself. The form of God was a human, though perhaps indistinct, appearance of God. It must be remarked, however, that the purpose of the writer is to illustrate the familiarity of intercourse between Yahweh and Moses, and consequently Moses' superiority over Mary and the other prophets rather than to express any definite theological conception of God.

g After this vindication of Moses' privileged position Yahweh punished Mary with leprosy, the white leprosy, which was a milder form of the disease. Aaron was not punished, either because of his dignity as high priest or because he had only an unimportant part in the complaint. But he fully acknowledged their fault and appealed to Moses to intercede with God for her expressing his fear that Mary might become half-consumed by leprosy. Yahweh acceded to Moses' intercession on condition however that she should be secluded for seven days. For if a father were to spit in his daughter's face, she would keep herself shut up for at least seven days in order to avoid the presence of her father and to hide her shame. We may assume that Mary too begged Moses to forgive her sin. This story is instructive as illustrating the necessity of repentance, confession, and satisfaction—the three elements of the sacramental confession of the New Law—for the forgiveness of sin.

202a XIII-XIV The Exploration of the Land of Canaan—When the Israelites had reached the wilderness of Pharan, they proposed that, before attempting the invasion of Canaan, spies should be sent to reconnoitre the land and to report on the strength of its defences. The report had disastrous effects.

b XIII 1-17 The Selection of the Spies—When Moses' sister was healed from leprosy, the camp moved from Haseeroth and halted in the wilderness of Pharan. This geographical indication is so wide that the locality of the halting-place cannot be determined. In 27 the general designation 'wilderness of Pharan' is further defined by the indication 'which is in Cades'. It is therefore legitimate to infer that the place reached by the Israelites was the northernmost part of the wilderness of Pharan. This bordered on the wilderness of Qadesh which lay south of Canaan. Twelve men, one from each tribe, were selected in order to spy out the land of Canaan. Although the mission is here referred to God, the first proposal was made by the people (Deut 1:22). At the end of the list it is added that Moses changed Osee's name, the representative of the tribe of Ephraim (9), into Josue. Osee, Heb. hōšāa', means 'salvation'; Josue, Heb. hōšīa', means 'Yahweh is salvation'. Jesus is a Greek form of Heb. hōšīa'.

c 18-21 The Mission of the Spies—The mission was both military and economic. They were to consider the fortifications of the land and its natural resources. They were directed to pass through the Negeb, the wilderness stretching along the southern boundary of Palestine, and to go up as far as the hill-country, which was later known as the mountains of Judah. There are many redundancies in these verses. On the Negeb see SHG, 278-86.

d 22-25 The Journey of the Spies—Two narratives seem to be here interwoven. In 22 the spies traverse the whole country from the wilderness of Sin, properly Sin, which lies NE. of Qadesh, up to Rohob in the north of Canaan, SW. of Mt Hermon. The wilderness of Sin (RV Zin) must be distinguished from the apparently homonymous place mentioned in Ex 17:1 and Num 33:11 f. The expression 'the entry of Emath' is the name of a valley between Lebanon and Hermon, but as a topographical expression it denotes very often the northern boundary of Palestine (34:8; Jos 13:5; 1 Kg 8:65, etc.). But in 23 the spies come to Hebron which lies about 19 miles S. of Jerusalem and 70 miles N. of Qadesh. Thence they advance as far as the valley which was later called Wady Eshcol (24 f.) and which is generally identified with one of the valleys round Hebron (Abel, I, 404). The apparent inconsistency is easily removed if we assume that the spies were divided into two or more groups who were to explore different part of the country (Humm., 107). Their separate reports were then amalgamated into one. The Hebron group met three Enacite chieftains of gigantic stature. The writer adds parenthetically the historical remark that Hebron was built seven years before Tanis (Heb. Šō'an) of Egypt. Tanis was built probably before 2000 B.C. It is often mentioned in the OT (cf. Is 19:11, 13; Ez 30:14; Ps 77:12, 43). This is easily explained if Tanis is identified with the city of Ramesses where the Hebrews lived for many years. At a certain place, afterwards called Wady Eshcol or the valley of the cluster of grapes, the spies cut off a heavy bunch of grapes which they carried back home on a frame together with a quantity of pomegranates and figs.

26-34 Conflicting Reports—After 40 days the spies were back at Qadesh to report. First a favourable report was given. It was a land flowing with milk and honey, a proverbial expression denoting great fertility of soil and exquisiteness of food; cf. Ex 3:8, 17; 13:5; 33:3, etc., and E. Power, VD, 2 (1922) 52-8. But the country was invincible. The report which promised to be very encouraging ended on a dismal note. The people began to murmur against Moses, but Caleb, one of the spies, tried to calm them by the assurance that they were strong enough to conquer the land. Although in 31 and in 14:24 Caleb alone is represented as opposing the majority report, in 14:5, 30, 38 he is supported by Josue. Considering that the 'Caleb sections' acknowledge Moses as the only leader, while the 'Caleb-Josue sections' associate Aaron with Moses, we do not hesitate to recognize another reason for the existence of two narratives and two reports combined into one story.

The majority report was alarmingly discouraging. The land did not produce enough to support its inhabitants. The people were stronger and taller. Although there may be some truth in this report (cf. Ez 36:13 f.; Am 2:9), one feels an exaggerated terror and a lack of confidence in God.

XIV 1-10 The Sedition—Terror soon spread like a wildfire and the people proposed to return to Egypt. They had completely forgotten the wonders wrought by God for them in the land of Egypt and how he had delivered them from the Egyptians, and now they dared to think that God was really leading them where they would certainly perish, as if he were unwilling or unable to protect them any longer.

On hearing this, Moses and Aaron fell on their faces, thus expressing their submission to God and humbly entreating him to forgive this incredulity of the people. Josue and Caleb, with their clothes rent as a sign of grief, came forward endeavouring to bring the people to their senses. They did not underestimate the strength of the Canaanitish peoples, but with the help of God they would be able to consume them as a morsel of bread. Their defensive forces and their protecting gods were as good as gone from them, and God being with the Israelites there was no need to fear. These words fell on deaf ears, and the people were about to stone the two men, when the glory of g 11-25 The Punishment—A voice came out of the cloud threatening the incredulous people with extermination and promising to make of Moses a greater and mightier nation. Moses very ably pleaded for his people in the same manner as in Ex 32:11-13. The sense of 13-15 is: The Egyptians know very well that you have brought out this people from their land and that you dwell among them. If therefore you destroy this people as one man, the Egyptians and all the peoples who may have heard of your fame will say that you destroyed them because you could not bring them into the land of Canaan. Let your power be manifested not by destroying this people but by showing forbearance and mercy, or by punishing them with leniency; cf. Ex 34:6f.

202f Yahweh, i.e. the fiery cloud, appeared over the tabernacle.

h After Moses' intercession God pardoned the people, but inflicted on them, as his justice demanded, the punishment of exclusion from the land of promise. By their persistent incredulity they had proved themselves unworthy. Caleb alone, in reward for his wholehearted attachment to Yahweh, was to enter into the land and inherit his portion (Jos 14:12). Josue is not mentioned with Caleb as this passage is a Caleb-section.

i God immediately executed his sentence. You think, he says to the people, that you are unable to conquer the Amalecites and the Canaanites who dwell in the lowlands; well, therefore, instead of proceeding any farther turn down southwards in the direction of the Red Sea, i.e. towards the Gulf of Aqabah which washes the right side of the Sinaitic peninsula.

j 26-38 The Forty Years' Wandering—This is a duplicate account of the punishment of the people and is really the sequel to v 10. Josue is associated with Caleb, and Aaron with Moses. In 11-25 the punishment consists in the exclusion of the murmuring people from the land of Canaan; in 26-38 it is described as a forty years' wandering in the desert until the death of all the living generation from the age of 20 years upwards. Their children under 20 years and, it may be reasonably assumed, the Levites together with Josue and Caleb will survive to enter the land of Canaan. Even these will share, to some extent, the lot which will befall the people. The number 40 is a round number. The spies who had spread a false report were struck by the Lord and died on the spot.

k 39-45 The Israelites defeated at Horma—The people, repenting of their disobedience, changed their minds and prepared to enter the land of Canaan. But repentance, in order to be acceptable to God, must be accompanied by such satisfaction as the divine justice may demand. The seemingly repentant Israelites wishing to make up for their past lack of confidence presumptuously rushed into a military expedition in which they suffered a heavy defeat by the Amalecites and the Canaanites. Horma, so called on account of the facts related in 21:3, is generally placed in the vicinity of Beersheba (Abel, II, 350).

203a XV A Miscellaneous Collection of Laws—This chapter contains various disconnected regulations mostly concerning the sacrifices. No reason for their present position can be assigned.

1-15 The Quantities of Oblations and Libations accompanying the various Sacrifices—Every sacrifice was to be accompanied by an oblation and a libation according to the following table: for one lamb $\frac{1}{2}$ ephah (≈ 7 pints) of fine flour, $\frac{1}{4}$ hin ($2\frac{1}{2}$ pts) of oil and $\frac{1}{4}$ hin of wine. For a ram $\frac{1}{3}$ ephah of fine flour, $\frac{1}{3}$ hin of oil, $\frac{1}{3}$ hin of wine. For a bullock $\frac{1}{2}$ ephah of fine flour, $\frac{1}{2}$ hin of oil, $\frac{1}{2}$ hin of wine. If more than one victim was offered, these quantities were to be multiplied proportionally. A different scale is given in Ez 46:5-7, 11, 14. These are ritual oblations and libations prescribed for the public sacrifices. For private and voluntary oblations no fixed measure is prescribed.

b 16-21 The Dough-offering—After their settlement in the land of Canaan the Israelites, before eating of the bread of the land, shall lift off a portion of the cereal produce, knead it into a cake and offer it to the Lord in the same manner as the contribution of the threshing-floor. 19. The Heb. word רִיסֹף , which may be approximately rendered 'dough' is of uncertain meaning. DV 'firstfruits' is not correct.

22-31 Unintentional and Intentional Sins—22-29 are probably a more primitive form of the parallel legislation contained in Lev 4 and 5. The law here contemplates two cases only, a sin of ignorance committed by the community, and a sin of ignorance committed by an individual. In the first case expiation is made by a young bull offered for a holocaust and a he-goat for a sin-offering. The Levitical law requires one young bull only. In the second case a she-goat is to be offered as in Leviticus 30. Sins committed with a high hand, in defiance of the law, cannot be expiated, but the offender is to be punished with excommunication. 32-36 The Sabbath-breaker—Though Sabbath-breaking was a capital offence (Ex 31:14; 35:2), the present case may not have appeared of sufficient gravity to deserve the death penalty. A divine pronouncement was considered necessary.

37-41 The Tassels—The custom of attaching fringes or tassels to a garment is very old and probably connected with superstition (W. R. Smith, 437). The Israelites may have known and adopted this practice. Instead of rooting it up God impresses it with a new religious significance making it serve as a reminder of his commandments. The tassels were to be attached to the four corners of the mantle by a blue cord; cf. Deut 22:12. References occur also in the NT; cf. Mt 23:5. Christ himself wore a 'tasselled' cloak (Mt 9:20 and parallel passages). This Jewish custom has survived down to modern times. For illustrations see DBV art. Frangie.

XVI 1-XX 21 The Journey to Qadesh—The time and place of the events narrated in chh 16-19 are not indicated and cannot be determined with certainty. The incidents in ch 14 are localized in the wilderness of Qadesh whence the Israelites moved in a southerly direction. In 20:1 the Israelites are again in Qadesh. It is therefore probable that the events related in chh 16-19 took place during the journey from Qadesh to the Red Sea and back again.

XVI 1-40 The Rebellion of Core and its Punishment—The narrative shows some signs of being composite. Moses addresses Core and his party, and Dathan and Abiron separately. Core was a Levite; Dathan and Abiron were Rubenites. Core's grievance was that the Levites had not the same rights as the priests; Dathan and Abiron complained that Moses and Aaron exercised full powers over the whole community. It is not improbable that two stories relating similar incidents have been amalgamated into one narrative. Core and his followers claimed the same priestly privileges as the sons of Aaron, while Dathan and Abiron, descendants of Ruben, Jacob's firstborn, may have claimed for themselves the primacy over the other tribes and consequently the leadership and supreme authority over the people. The sedition was therefore an attack on the religious rights of the priests and on the civil rights of Moses. The two attacks may or may not have been made at the same time. In Eccles 45:22 the three rebels are mentioned together, but in Ps 105:17 Dathan and Abiron are mentioned alone, and in Jude 11 only Core.

A Levite and three Rubenites, one of whom however has no part in the narrative, rose up against Moses and Aaron challenging their authority. 250 of the leading personalities made common cause with the rebels. Their main grievance was that all the congregation being holy (Ex 19:6) Moses and Aaron should have no superior rights. Moses replied first to the Levites proposing to appeal to the tribunal of God. Election to the priesthood depended exclusively on divine vocation. It was a signal mark of honour to be separated from the rest of the people and assigned 203h to the service of the tabernacle, but any further pretensions to the priesthood were an act of revolt against God who had instituted the priesthood and not against Aaron against whom they were murmuring.

1 Then Moses tried to appease the Rubenites (12). Their grievance was that Moses had brought them out from Egypt promising a land flowing with milk and honey without however being able to fulfil his promise. DV omits the negative in 14, 'Thou hast not brought us'. On their refusing to appear before him, Moses requested God to disregard their offerings (15). Moses' request cannot be referred to any sacrifice being offered because the Rubenites were in their tents away from the tabernacle. Either something has fallen out of the text or Moses' words are to be taken in a general sense expressing a wish that God may never accept any offering made by the rebels.

2 The narrative now reverts to Core (16) who is requested to appear together with his company before the Lord bringing their censers with them (6). Core accepted the proposal and on the appointed day he gathered his company round Moses and Aaron at the door of the tabernacle. Immediately the fiery cloud appeared to the whole congregation, and a voice came out of it threatening the rebels with destruction. Moses intervened in favour of the people praying God, the author of life, that he would not punish the people for the sin of a single man. For the doctrine of individual responsibility cf. Ez 18.

k There seems to be some inconsistency in 24. Core is supposed to be in his tent as were Dathan and Abiron (so DV). But Core had come up to the tabernacle to burn the incense (18). But 24 is very probably corrupt. The Heb. miškān is always used of the Divine Tabernacle, never of human habitations, therefore the expression 'the tabernacle' (DV 'the tents') of Core, can hardly be genuine. We can emend the text either by reading 'the tabernacle of Yahweh' as in 17:13 (Heb 17:28) or by adopting the LXX reading 'the congregation of Core'. At any rate the sense of 24 requires simply a command to the people to separate themselves from Core and his followers. Dathan and Abiron cannot be original in 24. After Moses' command to the people the narrative must originally have related the tragic end of Core and his adherents which in the present form of the text is put off to 32b, where Core is associated with Dathan and Abiron, and to 35, where the censor-bearers are said to have perished by fire (cf. 26:10). After the death of Core and his followers Moses went to the tents of Dathan and Abiron and requested God to declare by means of an extraordinary manifestation of his power who were his rightful representatives. Immediately the earth broke asunder swallowing them up with their households. The word 'hell' (DV; Vg 'infernum') denotes here the underworld, the region of the departed.

1 Eleazar was then commanded to remove the censers out of the burning and to beat them into plates wherewith to cover the altar of holocaust. The task of gathering the censers was entrusted to Eleazar because Aaron, the high-priest, was not allowed on any occasion to defile himself by contact with a dead body (Lev 21:11). Both the fire and the censers which had been brought before God had contracted holiness and had therefore to be removed from any profane use. 28a should read: the censers of the men who have sinned at the cost of their lives.

m 41-50 Another Sedition—The following day the people murmured once more against Moses and Aaron laying upon them the responsibility for the death of so many of the people of the Lord. Immediately the fiery cloud overshadowed the tabernacle. On seeing this Moses and Aaron fled to the tent of meeting where the Lord threatened to destroy the whole people. Again Moses interceded for them and, at his command, Aaron took up the censor and rushed to the multitude among whom plague had already broken out. Aaron's propitiatory action (48) is expressed in Heb. by the verb kippēr 'to expiate' which, though generally used in connexion with sacrifice, is connected occasionally with other actions (cf. 8:19; 25:13; 31:50). DV as usual renders 'to pray'; see §183f for the meaning of kippēr. The expiatory smoke of the incense may be considered as symbolizing man's prayer rising up to God (Ps 140:2).

XVII 1-18 The Blossoming of Aaron's Rod—This story is intended to vindicate the superiority of the tribe of Levi over the secular tribes and to quash their pretentious claims to the priesthood. The tribal representatives were commanded by Moses to bring each his own rod with his name carved on it. The tribe of Levi was represented by Aaron. The rods were to be brought before the ark where the Lord used to meet Moses (Ex 25:22). The election of the privileged tribe was to be demonstrated by the miraculous blossoming of the rod of the chosen one. On the following day Aaron's rod was found to have blossomed and borne fruit. The superiority of the tribe of Levi being thus vindicated, Aaron's rod was kept in the tent of meeting as a permanent sign of pre-eminence.

12f. are the introduction to ch 18 and a connecting link between chh 16 and 18.

XVIII The Duties and the Dues of the Priests and the Levites—The sons of Aaron alone are authorized to approach the Lord, and they are assisted by the Levites in the performance of their duties. As the rightful representatives of God they have a share of all the offerings.

1-7 The Duties of the Priests and of the Levites—The priests and the rest of the house of Levi shall be responsible for all the sins committed in connexion with the sanctuary, such as any unlawful approach thereto; and the priests shall be responsible for all the offences committed by them and by others in connexion with the priestly functions. The tribe of Levi ('the tribe of thy father' 2) is to assist the priests during the divine service and take care of the tabernacle and the sacred vessels (3;7; 4:15). No layman may interfere; transgressions are to be punished by death. The Levites have been chosen from amongst the children of Israel as a gift to the Lord to serve in the tabernacle. But it is the exclusive right of the priests to serve at the altar and within the (outer) curtain of the tent. In the middle of 7 Vg and DV omit these words: 'as a service of gift I give you the priesthood', the priesthood being considered, as it really is, a gift bestowed by God.

8-20 The Priestly Dues—As the priests possessed no landed property, God assigned to them certain offerings made to himself. In a general way it is laid down that what is left over of all the contributions made to the Lord (i.e. those portions of the offerings which have not been burnt) belongs to the priests as a share perpetually assigned to them. These portions are then specifically enumerated: in every offering those portions of the meal-offering, of the sin-offering, and of the trespass-offering that are not burnt on the altar are most holy and belong to the priests (Lev 7:32-34). They must be eaten in the court of the tabernacle (Lev 10:12) by males only (Lev 6:18, 29). Likewise those parts of the peace-offering that are assigned to the priest (Lev 7:29, 34) may be eaten by all male and female members of his household, provided they are ceremonially clean. To the priests are assigned also the best of the oil, of the wine, and of the corn as new produce, and all the firstfruits which the Israelites bring to the Lord. Things devoted to God go to the priest (Lev 27:28). All the firstborn, whether of man or of animal, belong to the priest, who will receive the redemption price of five shekels for the firstborn of man, and an unfixed price (Lev 27:11) for the firstborn of an unclean animal. But the firstlings of cattle, sheep or goats, are to be offered for a peace-offering. The blood is poured round about the altar, the fat is burnt thereon, but all the flesh, not as in ordinary peace-offerings, falls to the priest. All these portions are assigned to the priests by an inviolable covenant.

204e For the meaning of 'covenant of salt' see note to Lev 1:13.

d 20 winds up the whole section on the Levitical and priestly dues. As the priests and the Levites were the only persons authorized to approach the sanctuary, they had to direct all their care to its service rather than to the cultivation of the land. They had to depend chiefly on the sanctuary for their means of subsistence. God was their possession in the sense that he gave them of the offerings made to him. A similar, though far loftier, idea is expressed by David in Ps 15:5 and applied by the Church to clerics on the reception of the tonsure.

e 21-24 The Levitical Dues—The sons of Levi had no portion in the distribution of the land of Canaan, except some cities and the adjacent pasture-lands (35:3-8). In return for their service in the tabernacle on behalf of the people they were to receive a tithe of all agricultural produce. On tithes see Lev 27:30-33; Deut 14:22-29; 26:12-15.

f 25-32 A Tithe of the Tithes—The tithes received by the Levites are themselves subject to a tithe payable to the priests (cf. Neh 10:38), all the Israelites, the Levites included, being obliged to offer to the Lord a contribution of their land produce. The tithe paid by the Levites must be the best of the tithes received from the people. What remains of the tithes may be eaten by them in any place, as the tithes are not holy things. By failing to pay the priests their due the Levites will incur guilt and become liable to the death penalty.

g XIX The Water for Purification—Many primitive peoples have considered contact with a dead body to be a source of uncleanness, and various purificatory rites have been practised to avert the dangerous influences which such contact was believed to exercise; see Gray, 243-44 and references. The Hebrew rite rests ultimately on this widespread belief, its scope however is not personal safety from dangerous influences, but the necessity of safeguarding the holiness of God's dwelling. In NT times it furnished ample matter for allegorizing, cf. Heb 9:13; Ep. Barn. 8, 1-7; Aug. Quest. 33 in Num., PL, 34, 732-7.

h 1-10 Preparation of the Water—The preparatory ceremony is as follows: (i) a red, or rather a reddish brown, cow without blemish which has never borne the yoke, is brought to the priest Eleazar and slain by him outside the camp. As the cow is selected for a sacred purpose it must not have been put to ordinary uses. The officiating minister is Eleazar, not Aaron, as the ceremony involves a contamination of all who take part. The reason why the cow is, contrary to custom, slain away from the tabernacle is not apparent; (ii) the priest dips his finger in the blood and sprinkles it seven times in the direction of the tabernacle (cf. Heb 13:11), expressing thus the relation between the cow which has been slain and the Lord; (iii) the cow is entirely burnt, and while it burns the priest throws a piece of cedar wood and hyssop and a scarlet thread into the fire. As these ingredients are used in the purification of the leper (Lev 14:4), it is probable that they are used in this case with a similar, though perhaps weaker, symbolical meaning; (iv) when the cow has been burnt to ashes, the ashes are collected and deposited in a clean place outside the camp and kept there for the preparation of the water 'of impurity' (DV 'of aspersion'), i.e. destined to remove impurity, the cow being burnt for sin (DV), i.e. to remove sin.

i All who take part in the ceremony become unclean. The reason is either the similarity of the burning ceremony to the burning of the sin-offering outside the camp (Lev 4:12, 21), or the sanctity of the rite which is communicated to those who take part and who must therefore submit to an 'unsanctifying' action before entering again into intercourse with the rest of the people.

j 11-22 Cases requiring Purification—Any person touching a dead body contracts uncleanness lasting seven days. He must be sprinkled on the third day and on the seventh with water mixed with the ashes of the red cow. Failing to comply with this regulation he shall be cut off from the people in order not to defile God's dwelling. Defilement is produced also (i) by proximity to a dead body, therefore all those who happen to be in a tent when a person dies, become unclean; (ii) by walking over a grave, hence the need for whitewashing the graves as a warning to passers-by to keep away (Mt 23:27; Lk 11:44). When an unclean person is to be purified, some of the ashes of the cow are mixed with spring water and a clean person sprinkles him with a bunch of hyssop on the third day and on the seventh. On the seventh day the unclean person washes his clothes and bathes himself in water and at evening he is clean. The person performing the ceremony contracts uncleanness, and has to wash his clothes and remain unclean until the evening.

XX Events at Qadesh—The events related in this section took place at the end of the forty years' wanderings, when the Israelites were about to march off for the definite conquest of the land of Canaan.

1 The Death of Mary—The Israelites arrived at the desert of Sin (see note to 13:27) in the first month of an unspecified year. If this sojourn at Cades is identified with that related in 13:1, it took place in the third year of the journey; but if it is the return to a place whence the Israelites had previously departed, no conclusion for the determination of the year can be drawn. As the events related after Mary's death belong to the last period of the wanderings, it is probable that the year of her death was much nearer to the end than to the beginning of the desert wanderings. It is strange how briefly Mary's death is narrated. Neither her brother's grief nor the people's mourning is recorded.

2-13 The People's Murmuring for Lack of Water—Shortage of water being an ordinary feature of the desert, no wonder that the Israelites with their large flocks suffered from it more than once. Unmindful of past benefits they assembled and expressed their complaints against Moses and Aaron in their usual aggressive manner (cf. Ex 16:2 f.; 17:3; Num 11:4, 6). Vg and DV have a long interpolation extending from 'and cried to the Lord' to 'cease to murmur', which is omitted in the revised edition of Vg (1936).

Moses is commanded to bring Aaron's rod (17:25), from before the Lord (9). In Ex 17:6 he was commanded to strike the rock, and obviously a similar action was intended here. Moses obeying God's command summoned the people and addressed them with these words: 'Can we bring you forth water out of this rock?' These words have been interpreted as an expression of Moses' ill-temper (Corn. a Lap. ad loc.), or unbelief (Humm., 161), impatience and unbelief (Crampon, 520). The text is probably corrupt. In Ps 105:33 Moses is charged with uttering rash words while in a state of excitement. The charge of lack of faith is hardly admissible especially after the events of Ex 17. But Moses' unbelief may have been restricted to God's willingness to provide an ungrateful people with water, independently of any consideration of his power (Calmet, ad loc.; Humm., 161; Heinisch, 78; Clamer, 365; Fillion, 497). A certain degree of impatience, due to human imperfection, can hardly be excluded from Moses' words and action. In the same way is to be explained the double striking of the rock. Water soon gushed forth from the rock, but Moses and Aaron were condemned, on account of their unbelief, not to enter into the land of promise. They thought, or may have thought, that God would no longer listen to their prayers. They believed in his punitive justice, not in his goodness, mercy, and fidelity. They expected a punishment rather than a manifestation of these attributes before the people. The place came to be called Mé m'riḥāh or 'water of strife', because there the Israelites strove with words against the Lord, and he vindicated his holiness. On the name meribah see Ex 17:7.

14-21 The Embassy to the King of Edom—After the p

204p failure of the attempted invasion of Canaan from the south (14:44 f.) the Israelites had to reach the land from the east. From Qadesh to the eastern side of the Dead Sea the way was through the land of Edom which stretched along the Arabah depression from the southern end of the Dead Sea down to the Gulf of Aqabah (SHG, 557-76).

Before crossing the land of Edom Moses sent messengers to the king requesting his permission and assuring him of his good intentions. In order to gain his favour he addressed him as 'brother'. The Edomites were in fact descendants of Esau, Jacob's brother, Gen 36:9-19. But mistrusting these assurances they refused the request, and the Israelites had therefore to make a detour to the south.

205a C. XX 22-XXXVI 18 From Qadesh to the Plains of Moab XX 22-XXII 1 From Qadesh to Moab—This section relates some military campaigns against peoples whose territory lay on the way of the Israelites towards the approaches to Canaan.

b 22-29 Death of Aaron and Investiture of Eleazar—The site of Mt Hor is unknown. It was certainly on the borders of the land of Edom. In Deut 10:6 the place of Aaron's death is called Mōstrāh. This may be the name of a range of mountains one of whose peaks was Mt Hor. Moses accompanied by Aaron and Eleazar ascended the mountain and, as Aaron's end was approaching, divested his brother of his pontifical garments (see Lev 8:7-9) transferring them to Eleazar as prescribed in Ex 29:29. Thus Eleazar received the investiture of high-priest and on descending from the mountain was acknowledged by the people as the successor of Aaron.

c XXI 1-3 The Victory of Horma—The topographical names Arad, identified with Tell Arad some 50 miles N. of Cades and some 15 miles S. of Hebron, and Negeb, the wilderness in southern Palestine, take us to the southern borders of the land of Canaan, a position which is hardly consistent with the itinerary indicated in 14:25 and 20:21. Moreover it is not conceivable that the Israelites should not have exploited their victory (3) and developed their conquests from the south. The narrative is either out of its chronological context or relates a campaign led by a single tribe while the bulk of the Israelites marched in a southern direction. References to Horma occur in Jos 12:14; Jg 1:17. The expression 'the way of the spies' (1) is scarcely helpful to determine the geographical position. Heb. ʿāfārim may be a place-name of impossible identification, or a common noun of doubtful meaning. DV (and Vg) rendering 'spies', which is based on the reading tārim for ʿāfārim must not be overlooked. In fulfilment of a vow the victorious Israelites placed the city under a ban, i.e. they utterly destroyed it and called the place Horma, which means, as St Jerome adds by way of explanation, 'anathema' or destruction. On the herem or ban see Lev 27:28 f. and A. Fernandez in Bi (1924) 3-25.

d 4-9 The Bronze Serpent—The people once more complained of the hardships of the journey. As a punishment they were attacked by venomous serpents, called 'fiery' on account of the inflammation caused by their bites. On the people acknowledging their sin, Moses, by God's command, made a bronze serpent and raised it up on a pole so that anyone bitten could look at it and be healed. The story is an illustration of God's power, for he alone could heal a deadly bite by using means that were absolutely inadequate for the purpose. There is an echo of the serpent story in 4 Kg 18:4. See also Wis 16:6 f. In Jn 3:14 it is a type of Christ's elevation on the cross.

e 10-20 The Journey to the NE. of the Dead Sea—In their detour round the territory of Edom the Israelites reached Oboto E. of Edom, and afterwards Jeabarim, SE. of the Dead Sea (Abel, II, 216) and E. of Moab. Then they camped in Wady Zared which flows into the southern end of the Dead Sea from the SE. Having departed from W. Zared they halted at the northern side of the river Arnon (= Wady el-Mojib, SHG, 588), at a place in the wilderness to the E. of Moab and on the borders of the Amorrites. A fragment of a popular song is cited from a collection of epic poems, called 'the Wars of Yahweh', celebrating the victories of the Israelites over their enemies. The meaning of the fragmentary lines is obscure. This is a literal translation:

Waheb in Suphah and the valleys of Arnon,
And the slope of the valleys which stretches out to the site of Ar,
And leans on the border of Moab.

From Arnon they journeyed to Beer, a word meaning 'a well'. The site is unknown. The name is perhaps an abbreviation of an original form such as 'the well of God'. Another popular song is given here which was probably sung when water was being drawn:

Spring up, O well! Sing ye to it!
The well which the princes dug,
Which the chiefs of the people excavated
With the sceptre, with their staffs.

Then following a NW. direction they came to a valley in the land of Moab, which is described by the appositional clause 'the top of Phasga', NE. of the Dead Sea.

21-32 Defeat of King Sehon and the Occupation of his Country—Before crossing the borders of the land of the Amorrites, the Israelites sent messengers to their king, as they had done to the king of Edom (20:14-21), requesting permission to pass through his territory. Apparently the embassy was despatched from the place reached in 21:20. It is preferable however to make the mission of the messengers follow immediately after 13 as all the sites mentioned in 14-20 are in Sehon's territory. The Amorrites refused the request and marched with arms to meet the Israelites at Jaza. They were defeated, and Israel occupied all their territory from the Arnon to the river Jabok (Jeboc = Nahr ez-Zerqa) which flows into the Jordan from the east. The writer remarks that Jazer was on the borders of the Ammonites, and this statement would account for Sehon's limitation of territory. Hesebon (= the modern Hesban) was the capital of Sehon's kingdom and had been captured from the former king of Moab. A popular song is again cited celebrating the Israelites' victory. Hesebon has been burnt down, who will build it up? Moab, the former lord of Hesebon, has been forsaken by Chemosh (Chamos), their national god, and gone into captivity. The Israelites have conquered all the land.

33-35 Defeat of King Og and Occupation of his Country—The Israelites continued their victorious march northwards, defeated Og, king of Bashan, at Edrai some 32 miles E. of the southern end of the Sea of Genesareth, and occupied all his territory.

XXII 1 Israel's Encampment in the Plains of Moab—The plains of Moab, the scene of the last events before the crossing of the Jordan into Canaan, cover an area not more than 7 miles wide, N. of the Dead Sea and E. of the mouth of the Jordan.

XXII 2-XXXVI 18 Events in Moab—The contents of this section are the story of Balaam, a second census and a miscellaneous collection of laws and narratives.

XXII 2-XXIV 25 The Story of Balaam—The narrative has formed the subject of important discussions and still engages the attention of scholars. Theologians are mainly concerned with the Messianic character of Balaam's predictions; preachers moralize on his character; critics analyse the narrative into sources; interpreters aim at giving a clear and full exposition of facts.

Balaam's character is differently estimated. Jewish tradition was always unfavourable, cf. 2 Pet 2:13 ff.; Jude 11; Apoc 2:14. St Augustine calls him 'a very bad man' (Quaest. in Hept., q 47 in Num, PL 34, 740)

206e and St Thomas 'a prophet of the devil' (2, 2, q 172, a 6 ad 1). St Jerome is less hard upon him (Quaest. in Gen. 22, 20, PL 23, 971). Modern opinion is also divided. The question however is not one of great importance, because according to a universally admitted theological principle the gift of prophecy is bestowed in view of the good of others, irrespective of the merits of the prophet (St Thomas, loc. cit.).

d 2-14 The First Embassy to Balaam—On receiving the news of the Israelites' conquests Balac, king of Moab, summoned his council in order to devise a plan of defence in case of invasion. One would expect 'Moab' instead of 'Madian' (4). But the Medianites are mentioned again together with the Moabites in 7. The presence of the Medianites in Moab may be due to the migratory movements of the nomadic tribes; cf. Abel, RB (1931) 225. Balac first summoned his own council and then sought the advice of the Medianites who made common cause with him. Feeling themselves unable to resist the enemy the Moabites resort to a peculiar form of strategy, that of cursing the enemy in order to render them powerless. It was a common belief shared by the Israelites themselves (Gen 9:25-27; 27:27-40; 49:3-28) that the blessings and cursings of a person living in close relations with the deity were never ineffective. The king, accordingly, sends for Balaam, requesting him to curse the Israelites. Balaam lived at Pethor (DV 'soothsayer', 5) which is commonly identified with Pitru of the Assyrian inscriptions, a city on the Euphrates some 400 miles from Moab. His country is called 'the land of the Ammonites' (Vg, DV), a description which suits the historical circumstances of Balaam's story, but not the location of Pethor on the Euphrates. MT, however, instead of 'the land of the Ammonites', has 'the land of his people', a reading preferred by many interpreters, E. Palis in DBV art. Balaam; Fillion, 507; Crampon, 529; E. Sutcliffe in Bi (1926) 9-18, 31-9 and (1937) 439-42. This fits in with the preceding text which states that Balaam lived at Pethor.

e Balaam promised the messengers to give them an answer the following day according to the revelation which God would make to him that night. The use of the name Yahweh by Balaam has led interpreters to believe that Balaam was a worshipper of the true God whose advice he sought and acted upon. There is no a priori impossibility in this, but I am more inclined to believe that Balaam knew nothing of the true God and that the name of Yahweh has been put on his lips by later scribes, who on more than one occasion have interchanged the divine names, God and Yahweh. Most probably Balaam was a heathen magician who sought revelation from his own god, but the response was given by Yahweh himself.

f 15-20 The Second Embassy—Balac, not at all discouraged by Balaam's refusal, sent another embassy with the promise of richer presents. Balaam, believing that his god might have changed his mind, sought his advice once more. This time God granted him the permission to accept Balac's invitation, on condition however that he would speak under his direction.

g 21-35 Balaam's Journey—21. The next morning Balaam set out with the messengers. But the journey displeased Yahweh. 22 apparently contradicts 20b, but it is generally agreed that God disapproved of Balaam's evil intention, not of the journey; cf. Sutcliffe, Bi (1926) 23. Balaam's intention was certainly perverse (32); he believed that God had permitted him to curse the Israelites and that he would even suggest the words for the cursing, cf. 'do what I shall command thee' (20) i.e. 'speak what I shall command thee' (35). This however was not God's intention. God intended to turn evil into good, and it was in order to bring out the opposition between Balaam's intention and that of Yahweh that the episode has been recorded. 23-35. The historical character of the episode of the angel obstructing the road and of the dialogue between Balaam and the ass is generally maintained. But it is not improbable that the dialogue between Balaam and the ass is to some extent a dramatic representation of an unusual incident which occurred in the journey, cf. Card. Meignan, L'Ancien Testament, de Moïse à David (Paris, 1896), 216, not. 1. The writer's main concern is made manifest from 35: 'see that thou speak no other thing than what I shall command thee'. Balaam was to act as an instrument in the hands of God independently of Balac's instructions. The story of the ass is a source of trouble to commentators. Non-Catholic interpreters consider it as folklore and endeavour to find parallels in ancient stories (Gray, 334; Binns, 157), but Catholic interpreters have always regarded the fact as historical and miraculous (St Aug. Quaest. in Num., 22, PL 34, 742; Humm., 275, etc.) and have tried to explain the way in which the miracle was wrought. As to its historical character reference is made to the principle laid down by the Pontifical Biblical Commission concerning narratives in a historical form; see § 52j.

36-40 Balaam's Arrival at Moab—Balac went to meet Balaam at Ir Moab which lay on the river Arnon, on the extreme border of his kingdom. After having explained to Balac the conditions of his mission, Balaam went with him to Qiryat hūšōt, a place of unknown situation, where numerous sacrifices were offered and substantial portions were given to the honoured guest.

41-XXIII 12 Balaam's First Oracle—On the following morning Balac took Balaam to Bamoth Baal, N. of the Arnon, whence he could see an extremity of the Israelite camp and so pronounce his curses in sight of the enemy. Preparatory to Balaam's receiving God's revelation seven bullocks and seven rams were offered on seven altars. Then Balaam went some distance away and there he was commanded by God to take back to Balac the following message.

Balaam's first parabolic utterance consists of seven couplets cast in synonymous parallelism. The general thought is this: I have been called by Balac to curse this people; but how can I curse a people which is not cursed by God? There are unmistakable signs that this people is blessed by God. It is a people dwelling by itself, segregated from other nations. Who can count these descendants of Jacob who are innumerable as the dust of the earth? (cf. Gen 13:16; 28:24). Who can count even a fourth part (or, according to LXX, the myriads) of the Israelites (10)? At the end Balaam expresses the desire of a happy end like that of the Israelites. Some commentators have seen in these words an allusion to the belief in a future life which, for the righteous people, will be a life of happiness (Humm., 281). It is preferable however to interpret Balaam's words in the light of OT conceptions of future life as a desire of a happy end after a prosperous life.

XXIII 13-26 Balaam's Second Oracle—Balac, believing he could obtain a favourable response from God if the curses were pronounced in the presence of another part of Israel, took Balaam to the top of Mt Phasga (Pisgah) which commanded an extensive view of the Israelites' camp.

Balaam's second utterance is cast in the same poetical form as the first. Its general thought is the immutability of God's purpose and the irrevocability of his blessings. God will not change his mind like us mortals. I have been instructed by God to bless and I have no power to recall God's blessings. There are no evil-doers among the Israelites (or, there is no calamity in Israel). Yahweh is in their midst, and they proclaim him their king with joyful shouts. They are invincible because God who brought them out of Egypt is as strong as the wild ox (DV 'rhinoceros'). Living in such familiarity with God they need no divination, because God announces to them in due time what he intends to do. Balac seeing that all his endeavours to get a curse from Balaam had the contrary effect of stressing the privileged position of the Israelites stopped Balaam blessing.

27-XXIV 18 Balaam's Third Oracle—Balac tries

206m once more to obtain a curse from Balaam. His persistence is easily explained by the analogous heathen custom of consulting the oracle repeatedly until a favourable response is obtained. Balac accordingly took Balaam to the top of Mt Phogor which overlooks the waste land stretching out E. of the mouth of the Jordan. Balaam inspired by God delivered his third oracle which differs from the others both in form and contents. It is introduced by the title: 'The oracle of Balaam, the oracle of a man whose eye is closed, of a man who hears the words of God, who sees the vision of the Almighty, whose eyes are opened when he falls down. The general sense of these words seems to be this: The seer, while receiving a divine communication, has his eyes closed; after receiving the communication, he opens his eyes and falls down in a state of exhaustion (Humm., 289). The description of the seer with closed eyes has a parallel in the magical practices of the Arabs. The seer, while in communication with god, has his eyes covered, but after the divine communication the covering falls down and his eyes are opened to the reality of the world (see I. Guidi, in Acts of the XIV Congress of Orientalists, II, 8-12, Algiers, 1905).

n 5-9 form the body of the oracle. The tents of Israel and consequently the Israelites who dwell in them and the land in which they are to settle, are prosperous and beautiful as fertile valleys stretching far, as gardens near the river side, as aloe-trees planted by Yahweh, as cedars by the waterside. Their prosperity will be like water overflowing from a bucket, 'and his seed shall be in many waters'. These last words hardly make any sense. A slight emendation based on LXX gives this sense: his seed, i.e. Israel's posterity, will be spread among many nations. If we read z'ro'v 'his arm' for zar'v 'his seed' a still better sense is obtained: his arm, i.e. Israel's power, will be over many nations. Their king is mightier than Agag, king of the Amalecites (who was conquered by Saul, 1 Kg 15), and his kingdom will be exalted. King Balac, sorely disappointed, sends Balaam away.

o XXIV 14-25 Balaam's Last Oracles—Before leaving for home Balaam foretold what the Israelites would do to the Moabites in the future. The oracle contained in 15-19 is by far the most important on account of its reference to the Messias. For 15 f. see note to 3 f. Balaam is contemplating, in an ecstatic vision, the Israel of the future. He beholds a star rising out of Jacob, and a sceptre coming out of Israel. 'Star' and 'sceptre' are used here metaphorically as symbols of royal power. For the use of the term 'star' as a royal title in the Assyrian and Egyptian literatures, see L. Dürr, Ursprung und Ausbau der israelitisch-jüdischen Heilandserwartung (Berlin, 1925), 105-9; and for the metaphorical use of the word 'sceptre' cf. Gen 49:10. This mighty king will smite the chiefs of Moab, or, generically, the inhabitants of Moab, the specific meaning of the Heb. word not being clear, and he will lay waste all the sons of tumult, this being a designation of the Moabites, cf. Is 16:6; Jer 48:29, 39. He will conquer Edom and Seir, the land of his enemies. Edom and Seir are synonyms, cf. 36:8; Jg 5:4. Domination will come out, or will be exercised, from Jacob, and he will destroy all the survivors from the cities.

p Commentators have always endeavoured to identify this powerful king of Israel. David, naturally, was generally considered as possessing the strongest claims. He defeated the Moabites (2 Kg 8:2), the Edomites (2 Kg 8:13, 14; 3 Kg 11:15) and all the neighbouring hostile peoples. But from very early times Jewish and Christian interpreters have applied this prophecy to the Messias (Just., Dial. cum Tryph. 106, PG 4, 450 f.; Iren., Contra Haer. III, 9, 2, PG 5, 782; Theodoretus, Quaest. in Num. 44, PG 80, 394; Hier., Ep. ad Oceanum, PL 22, 695) and the Messianic interpretation has remained general in the Christian Church. The Messias is represented here as a victorious king crushing all opposition and ruling over Israel and the conquered nations. The Moabites and the Edomites are, politically, the peoples conquered, though not permanently (cf. the Moabite stone, § 80j), by David, and are mentioned out of other nations conquered by David on account of the historical circumstances of the prophecy. But at the same time they represent all the nations that will have to submit to Christ. The prophecy, though applicable to David in a limited sense, had its complete fulfilment in Christ. It is interesting to note that the nativity of Christ was announced by a star (Mt 2:2) and Christ is called the morning star (Apoc 22:16). See F. Ceuppens, De Prophetiis messianicis in Antiquo Testamento (Rome, 1935), 84-101.

Three more oracles are added which have no connexion with the Moabites. The first (20) refers to the Amalecites who are described as 'the beginning of the nations', i.e. the first who fought against Israel (Ex 17:8 ff.) or, with a poetic exaggeration, the most powerful of the nations, but whose end was to be utter destruction (1 Kg 15). The second (21 f.) refers to the Kenites. The general sense is: though the Kenites dwell in rocky, inaccessible and therefore unassailable places (note the assonance of qen 'nest' and qenit 'Kenite'), they will be led into captivity by the Assyrians. What particular deportation is here referred to we are unable to say. The last oracle (23 f.) is very obscure and seems to refer to the period of Greek domination. Ships will come from Kittim, i.e. Cyprus, or, according to later usage, from the western maritime countries (Vg, Italy). The Kittim will conquer Assyria and Eber who will perish for ever. A detailed explanation is impossible.

XXV The Events at Beelphegor—After the events narrated in the last two chapters the Israelites were encamped in Shittim E. of the Jordan and not far from its mouth. There they mixed with the Moabites and had immoral intercourse with their women. As a result of this intimacy they partook of the sacrificial meals to which they were invited by the Moabite women. By this idolatrous worship the Israelites attached themselves to the Moabite deity Chemosh, called here Beelphegor or 'the Lord of Peor'. This idolatry provoked God's anger who commanded Moses to execute all the chiefs responsible for this act of infidelity. The execution of this order is not related. Very probably God commanded that all the offenders should be punished, but those who were responsible were to be punished in such a way as to serve as an example for others (St Thom, 2, 2, q 108, a 1 ad 5).

While the Israelites were mourning for the death of their brethren, a chief of the tribe of Simeon publicly led a Madianite woman to the camp. This act suggests either a mixed marriage or immoral intercourse. The latter is the interpretation of Vg and DV (6 'a harlot', Heb. 'a Madianite'). On seeing this, Phinees, the grandson of Aaron, followed them to their tent and stabbed them with his dagger. Phinees' zeal became proverbial; cf. Ps 105:30; Ecclus 45:28; 1 Mac. 2:26. Phinees was rewarded by the promise of the (high) priesthood which was to remain perpetually in his family. God had already chosen Eleazar for Aaron's successor (20:25), but now the right is given to Phinees' posterity to succeed their fathers as high-priests. The Ithamar line is therefore excluded from holding the office of high-priest, at least in perpetuity.

The Israelites were then commanded to avenge themselves on the Madianites for having seduced them into idolatry. The Madianites seem to have acted at the suggestion of Balaam; cf. 31:16.

XXVI The Second Census—After so many disastrous events during forty years' wanderings in the desert it was necessary to number the people again, now that they were about to enter the land of Promise (see note to 1:1).

1-51 The Census—It is taken according to the same general directions as in ch 1. The order of the tribes is the same, except that Manasses and Ephraim change places. For each tribe the main clan divisions are given.

- 207d For the value of the numbers see the remarks on ch 1. 'Spoke to them' (8) which is the reading of MT and Vg, should probably be corrected to numbered them.
- 52-56 General Directions concerning the Division of the Land—The land was to be divided among the tribes according to their numerical strength, and each portion assigned by lot. In other words the extent of the several portions was determined by the size of the several tribes, but the situation of each portion was determined by lot. See Jos 13-19.
 - 57-62 The Census of the Levites.
 - 63-65 Conclusion.
 - f XXVII 1-11 The Law of the Inheritance of Daughters—Hebrew custom did not give women the right to inherit. Hence if a man died without male issue his property would go out of his family. The levirate marriage was an inadequate provision against this forced alienation of the family property (Deut 25:5-10; see also the Introduction to the Book of Ruth, xx-xxix by C. Lattey in WV). The present law gave daughters an equal share of their father's inheritance.
 - g The daughters of Salphaad, putting their case before Moses and the assembly, state that their father had no part in the revolt of Core, otherwise his property would probably have been confiscated, but died for his own personal sins. As one's name was inseparable from one's land-property, their father's name would die away if his property passed into other hands outside the family circle. Their claim was recognized and a general law promulgated giving daughters the right to inherit their father's property in default of male issue. A similar practice prevailed in the ancient Near East long before Moses; cf. C. H. Gordon, 'Parallèles Nouziens aux lois et coutumes de l'A. T.' in RB (1935) 38. The law contemplates also other cases of succession to a father's property.
 - h 12-23 Josue Appointed Moses' Successor—Moses' request to be allowed to enter the Promised Land (Deut 3:25 f.) was rejected for the reason stated in 14, but he was given, before his death, a view of the land from Mt Nebo, a peak of the range of Abarim, E. of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. The punishment may appear disproportionate to his fault, especially considering his faithful service for so many years. 'But the divine majesty had to be vindicated, and a public failure atoned for, by a striking and impressive punishment: moreover there was another Land of Promise from which Moses was not excluded by his offence' (Binns, 189). It may be added that the divine punishments are proportionate not only to the gravity of the offence in itself but also to the position of the offender and to the degree of sanctity demanded of him.
 - i Moses humbly submitted to God's dispositions and asked him, the author of life (16:22), to appoint a successor who would lead the people into the Promised Land. Josue was chosen, a man endowed with spirit, i.e. the spirit of wisdom (Deut 34:9), or, in a general sense, ability for leadership. Moses was then commanded to lay his hands on Josue. The rite of imposition of hands in the O and NT has more than one significance; cf. see J. Coppens, L'Imposition des mains et les rites connexes dans le Nouveau Testament et dans l'Eglise ancienne (Paris, 1925), esp. 162 f. Here it symbolizes the transference of power and may be compared with the analogous rite in the ordination of the Levites (8:10). Moses was further commanded to bestow upon Josue 'a part of his glory', i.e. publicly to declare him to possess authority over the people and therefore to have the right to their obedience. Josue would stand before the priest, i.e. he would have an inferior position; the priest would consult God for him by the use of the Urim (Ex 28:30), and both Josue and the people should abide by the instructions communicated to them by God through the priest. The secular authority was thus subordinated to the ecclesiastical authority.
- 208a XXVIII-XXIX A Liturgical Calendar—In Lev 23 a list of the yearly feast-days is given, here we have a

- table defining the sacrifices which are to be offered on each festival.
- 1, 2 Introduction—The Israelites must regularly present to God the offerings due to him which are anthropomorphically represented as God's food.
 - 3-8 The Daily Offerings—See Ex 29:38-42; Lev 6:8-13.
 - 9, 10 The Sabbath-Offering—This was of equal value to the daily offering, and offered in addition to it.
 - 11-15 The Offerings of the First Day of each Month—In 13 read: one-tenth part of an ephah.
 - 16-25 The Offerings of Paschal Week—Liturgical prescriptions taken from Lev 23:5-8 with additional instructions.
 - 26-31 The Offerings of the Day of the Firstfruits, called also the feast of Weeks (Lev 23:15-22).
 - XXIX 1-6 The Offerings for the Day of Trumpets—See Lev 23:23-25. Since this festival fell on the first day of the month the offerings prescribed here were in addition to those prescribed in 28:11-15.
 - 7-11 The Offerings for the Day of Atonement—See Lev 23:26-32 and Lev 16.
 - 12-38 The Offerings for the Feast of Tabernacles—See Lev 23:33 ff.
 - 39 Conclusion—These are public offerings made on behalf of the whole community. In addition any person may present freewill and vow-offerings on any of these festivals.
 - XXX On Vows especially those made by Women—The following regulations are based on the principle that women are subject to their fathers or husbands, and therefore, without their approval, cannot promise to God anything that will interfere with the management of the house.
 - 3 General Principle—If a man makes a vow to the Lord, or binds himself by oath to some abstinence, he shall keep his promise.
 - 4-6 The Vows of an Unmarried Woman—If a marriageable girl makes a vow, the vow will be valid if the father, on becoming aware of it, does not express his disapproval. If he disapproves, her vow is annulled.
 - 7-9, 11-16 The Vows of a Married Woman—A husband has the right to veto his wife's vows, whether these were made before marriage or, inconsiderately, during marriage. God has no delight in hasty vows, Eccl 5:4. If a husband, after having tacitly approved his wife's vows, pretends to annul them, he will be guilty of a breach of promise, but his wife will be guiltless.
 - The vows of a widow and those of a divorced woman are valid, 10, as these women are no longer subject to their husbands. In 17 delete 'or' (DV).
 - XXXI The Extermination of the Madianites—The story is alleged to be an unhistorical account illustrating the way certain instructions such as those concerning total war, the removal of uncleanness through contact with the dead, and the distribution of the booty were to be carried out (Gray, 418). The reasons are not convincing. Certain apparent inconsistencies are due to rules of style and to the particular scope of the writer. Many important details are purposely left out and the whole campaign is represented as a single event of short duration. There may be rhetorical exaggeration in numbers as well as in the assertion that all the male Madianites were slain and their cities burnt down. See § 211g.
 - 1-10 The Expedition—The incidents which caused this war are related in ch 25. Moses organized an expedition of 12,000 men under the command of Phinees. The reason why Phinees, the priest, not Josue, the future leader of the people, is chosen as commander may be the zeal displayed by him for Yahweh's honour on another occasion (25:7 f.). He carried with him 'the holy vessels and the trumpets to sound'. On the trumpets see 10:1-10. What is meant by 'holy vessels' is not clear. Humm. (345) takes them to mean the sacred vestments. The phrase 'the trumpets to sound' must perhaps be read in apposition to 'the holy vessels'. The campaign was successful.

208a 11-18 Slaughter of Prisoners—When the warriors returned with prisoners and booty Moses disapproved of their sparing the women and the children and ordered that all the women who were either married or deflowered, and all the male children should be slain, the former for having seduced the Israelites into idolatry and immorality, the latter in order to ensure a total extinction of the Midianite race. The virgins alone were to be spared and given as a prize to the combatants (cf. Jg 21-11). The possibility of the girls seducing their husbands or masters was disregarded, but mixed marriages were, as a rule, prohibited; cf. Ex 34:16; 3 Kg 11:2.

1 19-24 Purification of the Warriors and the Spoil—The warriors owing to their state of defilement (Num 19:16-19) had to stay outside the camp until they purified themselves and the spoil according to the rite prescribed in Num 19:14-22. On this occasion Eleazar gave some further regulations. All objects of metal that could stand the fire were to be purified by fire and by the water of purification. All other objects were purified by water only.

25-47 The Division of the Spoil—The whole booty was to be divided into two equal parts between the combatants and those who remained in the camp. David acted in the same way (1 Kg 30:24, 25). Out of each moiety a tribute was to be paid to the Lord. The contribution of the warriors consisted of 1-500th of their entire portion and was handed over to Eleazar; that of the rest of the people was fixed at 1-50th of their share and was assigned to the Levites. Thus, although the booty was divided into two equal portions, the individual shares of those who fought were in reality greater than those of the non-combatants.

k 48-54 The Present of the Officers—The officers, of their own freewill and as a token of gratitude to Yahweh, made another offering to God consisting of various gold ornaments weighing 16,750 shekels, or c 5½ cwt.

1 XXXIII The Transjordanic Region is granted to the Tribes of Ruben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasses—The tribes of Ruben and Gad, with whom the half-tribe of Manasses is later (33) associated, asked Moses to be allowed to settle down in the land E. of the Jordan. The request was granted under certain conditions.

m 1-5 The Request—Seeing that the land of Jazer and the land of Galaad were lands of pasture the Rubenites and the Gadites asked to settle there. The land of Jazer is the city of Jazer and its adjacent pasture-land. The land of Galaad sometimes denotes the whole region E. of the Jordan (Deut 3:12 f.); sometimes it is restricted to the country, S. of the river Jabbok, or N. of it, the river Jabbok being considered as dividing the land of Galaad into two halves (Jos 12:2). In this chapter it is used in both these restricted senses. As the places mentioned in 8 are all situated S. of the Jabbok, the land of Galaad in 1 designates southern Galaad (on Galaad, see SHG, ch 28).

n 6-32 The Request first Refused and then Granted—The request, if granted, would have encouraged the other tribes to stay where they were and give up all prospects of further conquests. This would frustrate God's promise and thus provoke his wrath, as on the occasion of the mission of the spies (chs 13 f.). In order to avert both consequences Moses strongly opposed their demands. The representatives of the two tribes explained to Moses that their request did not imply a refusal to take part in the conquest of the land W. of the Jordan. After assuring adequate protection for their wives, children, flocks and herds in the territory allotted to them, they would pass over the Jordan to fight together with the other tribes. Their explanation was accepted by Moses who directed that southern Galaad be assigned to them.

o 33-42 The Territory of the Rubenites, the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasses—The 14 cities mentioned in 34-38 are all situated in a strip of land E. of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, measuring c 800 sq. miles. No line of demarcation between the two groups of cities can be drawn. It appears that each city was provisionally assigned to either tribe, the definite demarcation being made later by Josue (Jos 13:8-28).

Of the tribe of Manasses some clans only had their territory E. of the Jordan. The clan of Machir conquered northern Galaad. Jair, another Manassite clan, took the tent-villages (Heb. ḥavvōt) and called them after its name. This district was, very probably, in Galaad itself (Jg 10:3-5; 3 Kg 4:13; 1 Par 2:22) and SE. of the lake of Genesareth. Nob, another clan, took the district of Canath, which was probably E. of Jair and on the western slopes of the Hauran.

209a XXXIII 1-49 The Itinerary from Egypt to Moab—This is a summary of the forty years' journeyings in the desert from Egypt to Moab through the various stages of the journey. The list of the stations is not complete. Many places cannot be identified with any degree of probability. Most of them have already been mentioned in Exodus or Numbers, but a few occur here for the first time. The description of the itinerary is said to have been written by Moses (2), valuable information for the determination of the authorship of this document. For the whole section see Abel, II, 208-17).

50-56 Directions respecting the Occupation of the Land of Canaan—The Israelites are commanded:

(i) to drive out and dispossess (58) all the inhabitants; a partial extermination will have for its effects retaliation by the Canaanites, seduction into idolatry, and punishment by God; (ii) to destroy all idolatrous representations carved on stone, and the molten images of their deities; (iii) to demolish all their high places, or places of worship (for a description of Canaanitish high places see *S. R. Driver, Modern Research as illustrating the Bible, London, 1922, 60 f.); (iv) to divide the land by lot as prescribed in 26:55.

XXXIV The Boundaries of the Promised Land W. of the Jordan—Cf. Ez 47:13-20. A distinction must be drawn between the boundaries promised by God and those actually possessed by the Israelites. The description given here is an ideal one representing the extension of the territory which the Israelites had the right to conquer, but which in point of fact they never completely conquered. Thus the western border, which is represented as running along the Mediterranean coast, was never in the hands of the Israelites, save for a small stretch in its central part, and even that for a short time only. The reason for this distinction is that God's promise was conditional, i.e. subject to the faithful observance of his law by the Israelites; cf. Jos 23:12 f.; Jg 3:1-4. The territory of Israel reached its greatest expansion during the reign of David.

3-5 The Southern Border—This is described in a general way as running from the wilderness of Sin (13:21) along the side of Edom. More particularly the southern line started from the southernmost extremity of the Dead (or Salt) Sea on the east, turned to the south of the ascent or pass of Agrabbim, passed through Šin, an unknown place, reached the south of Qadesh Barnea and followed its course to the Mediterranean Sea along the torrent of Egypt (=Wady el-'Arish) after passing through Hasar Addar and 'Asmon. 6 The Western Border ran along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea.

7-9 The Northern Border extended from an undefined point on the Mediterranean coast, reached Mt Hor, of uncertain identification but certainly different from that of Aaron's death (20:22), went to the pass of Emath (13:21) and ended at Hasar 'Enan, probably between Damascus and the Hauran, after passing through Sedada and Zephron.

10-12 The Eastern Border started from Hasar 'Enan to Sepham, then it descended to Rebla east of an anonymous spring which an interpolation in the Vg arbitrarily calls 'Daphnis', flanked the eastern side of the lake of Genesareth and followed the course of the Jordan down to the Dead Sea.

13-15 Conclusion.

209g 16-29 Appointment of Twelve Superintendents for the Division of the Land—Cf. Jos chh 14-19.

h XXXV 1-8 The Levitical Cities—As no territory was assigned to the Levites, provision was to be made whereby they could possess at least some cities to dwell in and the surrounding land for their flocks. The several tribes were therefore commanded to cede to the Levites some of their cities in proportion to the size of their respective territories. The execution of the command is related in Jos 21. The Levitical cities were 48 in all including the 6 cities of refuge (cf. 9-15). It is difficult to form a correct idea of the geometrical disposition of the Levitical possessions. In 4 the pasture-land extends 1,000 cubits, or 1,500 feet, from the wall of the city, and each side of the pasture-land is 2,000 cubits long (8). Some interpreters describe the Levitical possessions as consisting of a city and four square plots of ground, one on each side of the city and not adjoining each other (Humm., 373). But 5 implies that the whole space is a perfect square. But a square of 2,000 × 2,000 cubits and a width of 1,000 cubits from the outer line of the pasture-land to the inner wall of the city leaves no space for the city. Apart from the possibility of textual corruption (the LXX has 2,000 cubits in 4 instead of 1,000) there may be some artificiality in the numbers and in the description of the Levitical possessions.

i 9-34 The Cities of Refuge—Primitive social organization considered every individual as an inseparable part of his clan. Hence an offence against an individual was regarded as an offence against the whole clan and demanded adequate reparation. The Hebrew law modified this ancient custom by distinguishing between voluntary and involuntary manslaughter, and giving the right of blood-revenge to the next-of-kin only.

